Dec. 639, and Watson v. Moore, 2 Cush. 133, 140, are decisive of this point, and the defendant has no ground of complaint in reference to the ruling upon it. * * *

WEAVER v. LLOYD.

(Court of King's Bench, 1824. 2 Barn. & C. 678, 107 Reprint, 535.)

Case for a libel published in an Oxford newspaper. The paragraph set out in the declaration charged the plaintiff with the brutal usage of a horse, in riding from Oxford to Abingdon, and after various particulars concluded as follows:

"We learn that, on reaching Abingdon, the horse presented a most shocking spectacle, having one eye literally knocked out, besides being dreadfully lacerated and injured in various parts of its body. Being conscious that its condition would excite attention, he ordered the person who had the care of the horse not to let anyone go into the stables."

The defendant pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, a justification, averring the truth of each particular of the statement; thirdly, that the matters contained in the supposed libel were true in substance and effect. Replication, de injuria. At the trial the jury found for the plaintiff on the first plea, and as to the others, that two of the matters alleged were not true; viz. that the horse's eye, although much injured, was not literally knocked out, and that the plaintiff had not ordered that no person should be allowed to go into the stable to see the horse; but that the alleged libel was true in substance and effect. The Judge then directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and gave the defendant leave to move to enter a verdict in his favour, if the Court should think the third plea supported by the evidence. The jury accordingly found a verdict for the plaintiff with one shilling damages.

W. E. Taunton now moved to enter a verdict for the defendant, and contended, that the jury were warranted in finding that the alleged libel was true in substance and effect. The horse's eye was shewn to be much injured, although the sight was not entirely destroyed, and the supposed order, not to admit any person into the stable was not any part of the libellous matter, it was therefore unnecessary to prove the truth of it. Edwards v. Bell, 1 Bing. 403.

Per Curiam. The defendant did not succeed in proving either of his special pleas. The second plea, which distinctly averred the truth of the two facts which were not proven, clearly was not supported, and the third plea alleging that the charge was true in substance and effect, must mean that each particular of the charge was true in substance. In the case cited, the passage not proved formed no ingredient of the charge against the plaintiff. Here, the statement that he knocked out the horse's eye imputed a much greater degree of cruelty than a charge of beating him on the other parts of the body. If we were to hold this a sufficient justification, exaggerated accounts of any transaction might always be given with impunity.

RUTHERFORD v. PADDOCK.

Tort for slander. The plaintiff alleged that she was a married woman, and that the defendant "charged her with adultery" through speaking these words: "You (meaning the plaintiff) are a dirty old whore, and I can prove it." The defendant pleaded the truth of the charge, in that "the plaintiff had, before said words were spoken and published, committed the crime of adultery." On the trial, the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff had committed adultery two or three times with the same person. The defendant asked the judge to rule as follows:

"The words as alleged in the declaration are actionable, without proof of special damage, only because they charge the plaintiff with, or impute to her, the commission of a crime—the crime of adultery. The defendant therefore justified if she proves that before the words were spoken the plaintiff had committed the crime of adultery. It is not necessary for her to prove, in order to justify, the full truth of the words spoken—i. e., that the plaintiff was a whore in the ordinary acceptation of the word, if she proves that defendant had committed the only crime which those words import, to wit, the crime of adultery."

The judge refused to so rule, and left the case to the jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant alleged exceptions.

HOLMES, C. J. This is an action of tort brought by a married woman for calling her a dirty old whore. We repeat the qualifying adjectives as bearing on what we have to say. At the trial the defendant asked for a ruling that a justification was made out by proof that before the words were spoken the plaintiff had committed adultery. The judge refused so to rule, but left it to the jury to decide in what sense the words were used, and instructed them that the justification must be as broad as the charge. On this ground the judge further instructed them that proof that the plaintiff had committed adultery at some time would not be a justification, if, that is to say, the jury should be of opinion that the words meant more than the charge of the act on a single occasion, and imported, for instance, making merchandise of the plaintiff's person for hire. The defendant excepted.

No special reference was made to the pleadings in the request or ruling, and so we lay on one side the fact that the justification pleaded followed the innuendo of the declaration, which went little or no further than to aver that the defendant charged the plaintiff with the crime of adultery. See Simmons v. Mitchell, 6 App. Cas. 156, 162; Haynes v. Clinton Printing Co., 169 Mass. 512, 515, 48 N. E. 275. Of course the judge was right in his instruction that the justification must be as broad as the charge. Apart from the pleadings, clearly the jury were at liberty to find that the words charged the commission of adultery on more than one occasion, and therefore the ruling requested was wrong.

But, as a general rule, the justification need be no broader than the charge in a legal sense—than the actionable portion or significance of the words. It need not extend to the further abuse with which a sentence or word may be loaded, where the truth of the substance of the imputation has been made out. Morrison v. Harmer, 3 Bing. N. C. 759, 767; Edwards v. Bell, 1 Bing. 403, 409. The judge, by suggesting that usually the epithet carried the notion of hire, implied that if that meaning were found the justification must extend to that. There is no doubt that the jury were warranted in finding that the epithet with its adjectives meant more and worse in a social sense than even repeated lapses from conjugal faith. But it would be rather a stretch to say, and it was not argued, that they could have found that any other crime was charged—for instance, that of being a common nightwalker, or a lewd, wanton and lascivious person in speech or behavior, under Public Statutes, chapter 207, section 29. Therefore, the question is suggested whether we are to confine the cause of action to so much of the charge as imports criminal conduct, or are to recognize as an element to be included in the justification such further import of the word as adds to the heinousness of the crime and possibly affects the degree of the punishment, although it does not change the technical character of the offense.

If we take the former view, we follow to its extreme results a tradition of the common law, the reasons for which have disappeared, and which has been corrected in England and in some of our states by statute. Odgers on Libel and Slander (3d Ed.) 90. By the old law, apart from an allegation of special damage, an action lay in the spiritual courts only, because the offense charged was dealt with only in the spiritual courts, and it was said that therefore the spiritual courts alone could determine the truth of the charge. Y. B. 27 Henry VIII, 14, pl. 4. Perhaps it would have been simpler to say that originally the whole jurisdiction was ecclesiastical, and that it was retained by the church, except in those instances where for special reasons the common law had encroached. In Coke's time the state of the law seems to have been accounted for or justified by treating such charges as "brabling words." Oxford v. Cross, 4 Rep. 18. But see Ogden v. Turner, 6 Mod. 104, 105; Graves v. Blanchet, 2 Salk. 696; Davis v. Sladden, 17 Or. 259, 262, 263, 21 Pac. 140. It has been suggested that the taking by the common-law courts of a portion of the original ecclesiastical jurisdiction over slander started from the fact that in the cases where the common law interfered the matter charged was the subject of a common-law writ, and that the principal matter drew to it the accessory. In such cases the common-law courts best could determine the truth of the charge: Smith v. Teutonia Ins. Co., Fed. Cas. No. 13,115, 6 Am. Law Rev. 593, 595, 603, 605. Of course at that stage the common law could not present a systematic scheme of liability, but only examples of occasional interference which seemed merely arbitrary when the explanation was lost.

At the present day, when slander is fully domiciled in the common law as a tort and the only remedy recognized as a remedy must be found in the common-law courts, it may be argued with some force that there should be an effort after consistency of theory, and that the remedy for one of the greatest wrongs that can be done by words should not be distorted by the necessity of referring it to the liability to a small fine or imprisonment if the falsehood were true. The older law already has been broken in upon by holding liability to a trivial punishment enough if the crime involves moral turpitude, or if the punishment will bring disgrace. See Miller v. Parish, 8 Pick. 384; Brown v. Nickerson, 5 Gray, 1. Compare Turner v. Ogden, 2 Salk. 696, 6 Mod. 104; Onslow v. Horne, 2 W. Black. 750, 753, 3 Wils. 177, 186; Holt v. Scholefield, 6 Term Rep. 691, 694; Eure v. Odom, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks) 52. At all events, so long as the action for slander is preserved and lies for imputing unchastity to a woman, it is so reasonable to hold the liability coextensive with the imputation that we shall not be more curious than our predecessors in finding an arbitrary and technical limit. In Doherty v. Brown, 10 Gray, 250, 251, it was said by a very able judge, and said as a material part of the reasoning on which the case was decided, that proof of the unchastity of the plaintiff would not be a justification of the charge that she was a whore. We are content to take the law as we find it stated. See Cleveland v. Detweiler, 18 Iowa, 299; Sheehey v. Cokley, 43 Iowa, 183, 22 Am. Rep. 236; Peterson v. Murray, 13 Ind. App. 420, 41 N. E. 836.

Exceptions overruled.

CUDDINGTON v. WILKINS.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1615. Hob. 67, 80 Reprint, 216.)

Cuddington brought an action on the case against Wilkins, for calling him thief; the defendant justified, because beforetime he had stolen somewhat: the plaintiff replied, that since the supposed felony the general pardon in the seventh year of the King was made, and makes the usual averment to bring himself within the pardon. Whereupon the defendant demurs: See Staundford plac. Coronæ, 180, that a man arrested for felony break prison, he shall lose his battail; but yet if the King pardon him that it is restored. F. Coronæ, 281; 1 and 2 E. 3, F. Coronæ, 154. So here the felony is by the pardon extinct.

And in the end this case was adjudged for the plaintiff, though it may be, he knew him not to be within the pardon; for there is no cause to favour idle and injurious words: but perhaps if he had arrested him for the felony after pardon, it might have been excused if he knew it not, because it is an act of justice.[85]

LARSON v. COX.

SULLIVAN, C. J. This was an action by Larson against Cox to recover damages for slander. The defamatory words set out in the petition amount to a charge of larceny. The defendant in his answer alleged that the charge was true, and that it was made with good motives and for justifiable ends. The jury found against the plaintiff, and judgment followed the verdict.

The assignments of error discussed by counsel relate for the most part to the plea of justification, and raise the question whether the truth of slanderous matter is per se a complete defense. The contention of counsel for plaintiff is that the truth is unavailing unless it was uttered with a good motive and for a proper purpose. His argument is grounded altogether upon the provision of the Constitution which declares that "in all trials for libel, both civil and criminal, the truth, when published with good motives and for justifiable ends, shall be a sufficient defense." Const. art. 1, § 5. The provision here quoted is a substitute for section 3, art. 1, of the Constitution of 1866, which was an almost literal copy of a New York statute adopted soon after the trial of the celebrated case in which Croswell was convicted of publishing a libel on Thomas Jefferson. People v. Croswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 337, append. This statute was intended to secure and safeguard the freedom of the press, and is now fundamental law in many of the states. It was a modification of the doctrine of the common law that in public prosecutions for libel the truth of the libel is no excuse for its publication.

Div. 15, 20: (The editor of a newspaper sued for libel in calling him a "felon editor"; the defendants justified, alleging that the plaintiff had been convicted of felony and sentenced to twelve months imprisonment and hard labour. The plaintiff replied that after his conviction he underwent his sentence of twelve months' imprisonment and hard labour and so became as cleared of the crime and its consequences as if he had received the Queen's pardon under the great seal.) Compare the application of the principle in Hay v. Justices of the Tower, [1890] 24 Q. B. D. 561, and in Monson v. Tussauds, Limited, [1894] 1 Q. B. 671, 687.

For an elaborate consideration of the effect of a pardon, and of the doctrine of Cuddington v. Wilkins, see Bronson, J.'s, opinion in Baum v. Clause (1843) 5 Hill (N. Y.) 196.

When considered in the light of history, there is much reason to suppose that the constitutional provision upon which plaintiff relies was designed as a sure and permanent protection, both in civil and criminal actions, to persons who have occasion, in the discharge of some legal, social, or moral duty, to write and publish criticisms on the character and conduct of others, and that it was not any part of its purpose to take away from the defendant in a libel case any right given him either by the statutory law or the common law. The truth of a defamatory publication is still a complete and perfect defense in a criminal case, irrespective of the motive or object of the publisher. The Legislature has made it so by definition of the crime. Section 132 of the Code of Civil Procedure in effect declares that, in an action for a libel or slander, the truth of the defamatory matter may be pleaded and proved as a defense. Castle v. Houston, 19 Kan. 417, 27 Am. Rep. 127. The validity of this section was of course necessarily involved in Pokrok Zapadu Pub. Co. v. Zizkovsky, 42 Neb. 64, 60 N. W. 358, and Neilson v. Jensen, 56 Neb. 430, 76 N. W. 866, which seem to have been decided on the assumption that the constitutional provision above quoted, so far as it relates to libels which are the subjects of civil action, was intended as a restraint upon the freedom of the press, and that it operated as a partial repeal of the statute. It is not necessary at this time to either affirm or deny the doctrine of these cases, as the constitutional provision with which they deal has no reference to actions for slander. Section 132, so far at least as it relates to spoken defamation, is in harmony with the Constitution, and is therefore valid.

Under the instructions given by the court at plaintiff's request, the jury must have found that the plea of justification was sustained by the proof. In our opinion, the evidence was sufficient to warrant the conclusion that Larson had committed the crime imputed to him. This being so, the verdict and judgment are right, even though defendant did not make the accusation with good motives and for justifiable ends. * * * [86] Judgment affirmed.

Said Bronson, J.: "The plaintiff has so far retrieved his character that he has been made one of the inspectors of elections for the town in which he resides. This proves that he enjoys the good opinion of his neighbors, and it was a malicious thing on the part of the defendant to open this old sore. But our law allows a man to speak the truth, although it be done maliciously.") And see the remarks of Chapman, J., in Foss v. Hildreth (1865) 10 Allen (Mass.) 76, 79. Declaration (1836) for libel contained in a letter. Plea, not guilty. On the trial before Lord Denman, C. J., at the sittings in Middlesex after last Trinity term, the defence was, that the alleged libel was a privileged communication. The defendant's counsel objected that this answer could not be given under the plea of not guilty. The Lord Chief Justice thought otherwise, and left the whole case to the jury, who found for the defendant.

Sir W. W. Follett in this term moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be had, on the ground of misdirection.

libelous per se." Herald Pub. Co. v. Feltner (1914) 158 Ky. 35, 164 S. W. 371; 25 Cyc. 413, 414, note 25.

But this common law rule as to justification through a showing of the mere truth of the charge, has been modified by constitutional or statutory provisions in a considerable number of states. In some of these states, a plea of the truth in libel is a prima facie justification, but the plaintiff may overcome it by proving a malicious intention on the part of the defendant. Perry v. Porter (1878) 124 Mass. 338; Conner v. Standard Pub. Co. (1903) 183 Mass. 474, 67 N. E. 596. Compare the charge in Cardarelli v. Providence Journal Co. (1911) 33 R. I. 268, 80 Atl. 583, 588. In other states, a plea of the truth in libel is a justification if the defendant goes further and shows that he published it with good motives and for justifiable ends. Neilson v. Jensen (1898) 56 Neb. 430, 76 N. W. 866.

In Hutchins v. Page (1909) 75 N. H. 215, 72 Atl. 689, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 132, however, it was held, on common law grounds, that whether truth is a valid defense to an action to recover damages for a libel "depends upon the good faith and real purpose of the publisher." See infra, in the discussion of torts through intentional harm. See also, in general, 25 Cyc. 414, note 26, and the elaborate note to Hutchins v. Page, in 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 132.

[87] "The defence that the occasion or circumstances under which words of themselves slanderous were spoken afford an excuse for their utterance, and so repel the legal inference of malice, is clearly matter in the nature of avoidance of the cause of action, and must be duly pleaded in the answer in order to enable a defendant to avail himself of it under the provisions of the practice act. Gen. Sts. c. 129, §§ 15, 17, 20, 27." Per Bigelow, C. J., in Goodwin v. Daniels (1863) 7 Allen (Mass.) 61, 63. This principle is now recognized by statute in a number of American states. 25 Cyc. 481, note 86. And under the English Judicature Acts a defendant who relies on a privilege "should set out the facts which he alleges constitute the privileged occasion." 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 685, note (a).

(aa) Absolute Privileges [88]

RAM v. LAMLEY.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1633. Hut. 113, 123 Reprint, 1139.)

Norff. Ram brought an action upon the case against Lamley, and declared, that whereas he was "bonus & legalis homo and free a suspitione feloniæ," the defendant maliciously went to the Major of Linn, and requested a warrant of him (being a justice of peace) against the plaintiff for stealing his ropes: the major said to him, "be advised and look what you do," the defendant said to the major, "Sir, I will charge him with flat felony for stealing my ropes from my shop," quorum quidem verborum, &c. And after not guilty pleaded, and verdict for the plaintiff, Hitcham moved in arrest of judgment; and the Court unanimously resolved that these words being spoken to the justice of peace when he came for his warrant, which was lawful, would not maintain an action, for if they should, no other would come to a justice to make complaint, and to inform him of any felony. Querens nil capiat per breve.[89]

[88] "I should first like to explain my view, which is derived from the former cases, as to the meaning of what is called 'absolute privilege.' I do not think that it is a very accurate expression, and I am sure that calling it a 'privilege' is sometimes misleading. Privilege means, in the ordinary way, a private right. Now there is no private right of a judge, or a witness, or an advocate to be malicious. It would be wrong of him, and if it could be proved I am by no means sure that it would not be actionable. The real doctrine of what is called 'absolute privilege' is that in the public interest it is not desirable to inquire whether the words or acts of certain persons are malicious or not. It is not that there is any privilege to be malicious, but that, so far as it is a privilege of the individual—I should call it rather a right of the public—the privilege is to be exempt from all inquiry as to malice; that he should not be liable to have his conduct inquired into to see whether it is malicious or not—the reason being that it is desirable that persons who occupy certain positions as judges, as advocates, or as litigants should be perfectly free and independent, and, to secure their independence, that their acts and words should not be brought before tribunals for inquiry into them merely on the allegation that they are malicious. I think there is something more in that distinction than mere words, and the reason that this peculiar doctrine of 'absolute privilege' is sometimes complained of is that it is not thoroughly understood. That explanation of the doctrine will be found here and there in many of the cases, although it never seems to have been put into the head-note, and so it does not appear prominently as the real ground of the doctrine. In Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588, for instance, the explanation of the doctrine is given in some of the judgments, but it is not to be found in the head-note; and the same remark applies to some of the cases earlier than Munster v. Lamb." Per Channell, J., in Bottomley v. Brougham (1908) 1 K. B. 584.

[89] Accord: Cutler v. Dixon (1585) 4 Co. Rep. 14 b: "If actions should be permitted in such cases, those who have just cause for complaint, would not dare to complain for fear of infinite vexation." Hartsock v. Reddick (1842) 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 255, 38 Am. Dec. 141.

SCOTT v. STANSFIELD.

Declaration, for that the plaintiff carried on the business of an accountant and scrivener, and the defendant spoke and published of and concerning him, in relation to his said business, the words following:

"You," meaning the plaintiff, "are a harpy, preying on the vitals of the poor."

Plea, that at the time when the alleged grievance was committed, the defendant was the judge of a certain court of record, being the County Court of Yorkshire, and spoke and published the words complained of when he was sitting in the said court, and acting in his capacity as such judge, and was as such judge hearing and trying a cause in which the now plaintiff was defendant, the hearing and determination of which was within the jurisdiction of the said court. Replication, that the said words so spoken and published by the defendant—were spoken falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable, probable or justifiable cause, and without any foundation whatever, and not bona fide in the discharge of his duty as judge as aforesaid, and were wholly uncalled for, immaterial, irrelevant, and impertinent, in reference to, or in respect of, the matters before him, and were wholly unwarranted on the said occasion, of all which premises the defendant had notice before and at the time of the committing of the said grievance, and then well knew.

To this replication the defendant demurred, and the plaintiff joined in the issue thus raised.

MARTIN, B.[90] It seems to me quite clear that words spoken under the circumstances stated in these pleadings are not the subject of an action of slander. The plea states that the defendant at the time when he spoke the words complained of, was sitting as the judge of a court of record, and spoke them while acting in his capacity of judge, and trying a cause within his jurisdiction in which the present plaintiff was the defendant. If the words spoken under such circumstances were the subject of an action of slander, the most mischievous consequences would ensue; no judge would then be able freely to administer justice, for if it were alleged, as is the case here, that he spoke falsely and maliciously, and not bona fide in the discharge of his duty, and that what he said was irrelevant to the matter in hand, a jury would have to determine the question whether what he said in the course of a case which he had jurisdiction to try was or was not said under the circumstances so alleged. What judge could try a case with any degree of independence if he was to be afterwards subject to have his conduct in the administration of justice commented on to a jury, and the propriety of it determined by them? It appears to me that the opinion expressed by Chief Justice Kent, in the American case cited,[91] puts this matter upon its proper foundation, and states, that which is both sound law and good sense in reference to it. I do not think we are really deciding anything new, for to my mind the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench have gone the full length of our present decision.[92]

Judgment for the defendant.

[91] Yates v. Lansing (1810) 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 282; Id. (1811) 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 395, 6 Am. Dec. 290.

[92] "Why is it that a judge who disgraces his office, and speaks from the bench words of defamation, falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, is not liable to an action? Is not such conduct of the worst description, and does it not produce great injury to the person affected by it? Why should a witness be able to avail himself of his position in the box and to make without fear of civil consequences a false statement, which in many cases is perjured, and which is malicious and affects the character of another? The rule of law exists, not because the conduct of those persons ought not of itself to be actionable, but because, if their conduct was actionable, actions would be brought against judges and witnesses in cases in which they had not spoken with malice, in which they had not spoken with falsehood It is not a desire to prevent actions from being brought in cases where they ought to be maintained that has led to the adoption of the present rule of law; but it is the fear that if the rule were otherwise, numerous actions would be brought against persons who were merely discharging their duty. It must always be borne in mind that it is not intended to protect malicious and untruthful persons, but that it is intended to protect persons acting bona fide, who under a different rule would be liable, not perhaps to verdicts and judgments against them, but to the vexation of defending actions." Fry, L. J., in Munster v. Lamb (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 588, 607.

This immunity of judges from civil action for defamation is but one instance of a doctrine which "has a deep root in the common law." See Chancellor Kent's remarks in Yates v. Lansing (1810) 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 282, 291, and the cases there referred to; Bradley v. Fisher (1871) 13 Wall. 335, 347, 20 L. Ed. 646; Alzua v. Johnson (1913) 231 U. S. 106, 107, 34 Sup. Ct. 27, 58 L. Ed. 142. The action in the last case was against a justice of the Supreme Court of the Philippines. "Whatever may have been the Spanish law," said Mr. Justice Holmes, "this [the immunity of judges] is a principle so deep seated in our system that we should regard it as carried into the Philippines by implication as soon as we established courts in those islands." And it was held therefore that an act of the Philippine commission providing that no judge shall be liable to civil action for official acts done in good faith, is not to be construed as rendering judges of the Supreme Court liable for official acts done in bad faith.

BROOK v. SIR HENRY MONTAGUE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1605. Cro. Jac. 90, 79 Reprint, 77.)

Action for words, for that the defendant spake these words of the plaintiff: "He was arraigned and convicted of felony, &c." The defendant pleads, that the plaintiff at another time brought false imprisonment against J. S., one of the serjeants of London, and found against the plaintiff, who brought an attaint: and the defendant being consiliarius et peritus in lege, was retained to be of counsel with the petty jury; and in evidence at the trial spake these words in the declaration; and so justifies. Yelverton and Coke, Attorney General, were of counsel for the defendant.

THE COURT resolved that the justification was good: for a counsellor in law retained hath a privilege to enforce any thing which is informed him by his client, and to give it in evidence, it being pertinent to the matter in question, and not to examine whether it be false or true; but it is at the peril of him who informs it: for a counsellor is at his peril to give in evidence that which his client informs him, being pertinent to the matter in question; otherwise action upon the case lies against him by his client, as Popham said. But matter not pertinent to the issue, or the matter in question, he need not to deliver; for he is to discern in his discretion what he is to deliver, and what not: and although it be false, he is excusable, being pertinent to the matter: but if he give in evidence any thing not material to the issue which is scandalous, he ought to aver it to be true, otherwise he is punishable; for it shall be intended as spoken maliciously and without cause; which is a good ground for an action. So if a counsellor object matter against a witness which is slanderous, if there be cause to discredit his testimony, and it be pertinent to the matter in question, it is justifiable what he delivers by information, although it be false. So here it is material evidence to prove him a person fit to be bound to his good behaviour, and in maintenance of the first verdict; therefore his justification is good. * * * [93]

Wherefore, for these reasons it was adjudged for the defendant.

[93] The statement of the case is slightly abridged.

Accord: Hodgson v. Scarlett (1818) 1 B. & Ald. 232, 19 R. R. 301, where the words used by the defendant, Scarlett, afterwards Lord Abinger, were as follows: "Some actions are founded in folly, some in knavery, some in both, some in the folly of the attorney, some in the knavery of the attorney, some in the folly and knavery of the parties themselves. Mr. Peter Hodgson was the attorney of the parties, drew the promissory note, fraudulently got Bowman to pay into his hands £150 for the benefit of the plaintiff. This was one of the most profligate things I ever knew done by a professional man. Mr. Hodgson is a fraudulent and wicked attorney." The words, said Lord Ellenborough, were "not used at random and unnecessary, but were a comment upon the plaintiff's conduct as attorney," and "were relevant and pertinent to it."

MUNSTER v. LAMB.

(In the Court of Appeal, 1883. 11 Q. B. Div. 588.)

BRETT, M. R.[94] * * * This action is brought against a solicitor for words spoken by him before a court of justice, whilst he was acting as the advocate for a person charged in that court with an offence against the law. For the purposes of my judgment I shall assume that the words complained of were uttered by the solicitor maliciously, that is to say, not with the object of doing something useful towards the defence of his client: I shall assume that the words were uttered without any justification or even excuse, and from an indirect motive of personal ill will or anger towards the prosecutor arising out of some previously existing cause; and I shall assume that the words were irrelevant to every issue of fact which was contested in the court where they were uttered; nevertheless, inasmuch as the words were uttered with reference to, and in the course of the judicial inquiry which was going on, no action will lie against the defendant, however improper his behaviour may have been. * * * It was admitted that so long as an advocate acts bona fide and says what is relevant, owing to the privileged occasion defamatory statements made by him do not amount to libel or slander, although they would have been actionable if they had not been made whilst he was discharging his duty as advocate. But it was contended that an advocate cannot claim the benefit of the privilege unless he acts bona fide, that is, for the purpose of doing his duty as an advocate, and unless what he says is relevant. That is the question which we now have to determine. Certain persons can claim the benefit of the privilege which arises as to everything said or written in the course of an inquiry as to the administration of the law, and without making an exhaustive enumeration I may say that those persons are judges, advocates, parties, and witnesses. * * *

If upon the grounds of public policy and free administration of the law the privilege be extended to judges and witnesses, although they speak maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, is it not for the benefit of the administration of the law that counsel also should have an entirely free mind? Of the three classes—judge, witness, and counsel—it seems to me that a counsel has a special need to have his mind clear from all anxiety. A counsel's position is one of the utmost difficulty. He is not to speak of that which he knows; he is not called upon to consider, whether the facts with which he is dealing are true or false. What he has to do, is to argue as best he can, without degrading himself, in order to maintain the proposition which will carry with it either the protection or the remedy which he desires for his client. If amidst the difficulties of his position he were to be called upon during the heat of his argument to consider whether what he says is true or false, whether what he says is relevant or irrelevant, he would have his mind so embarrassed that he could not do the duty which he is called upon to perform. For, more than a judge, infinitely more than a witness, he wants protection on the ground of benefit to the public. The rule of law is that what is said in the course of the administration of the law, is privileged; and the reason of that rule covers a counsel even more than a judge or a witness. To my mind it is illogical to argue that the protection of privilege ought not to exist for a counsel, who deliberately and maliciously slanders another person. The reason of the rule is, that a counsel, who is not malicious, and who is acting bona fide, may not be in danger of having actions brought against him. If the rule of law were otherwise, the most innocent of counsel might be unrighteously harassed with suits, and therefore it is better to make the rule of law so large that an innocent counsel shall never be troubled, although by making it so large counsel are included who have been guilty of malice and misconduct. * * * I will refer to Kennedy v. Hilliard, 10 Ir. Com. Law Rep. (N. S.) 195; and in that case Pigott, C. B., delivered a most learned judgment, in the course of which he said: "I take this to be a rule of law, not founded (as is the protection in other cases of privileged statements) on the absence of malice in the party sued, but founded on public policy, which requires that a judge, in dealing with the matter before him, a party in preferring or resisting a legal proceeding, and a witness in giving evidence, oral or written, in a court of justice, shall do so with his mind uninfluenced by the fear of an action for defamation or a prosecution for libel." Into the rule thus stated the word "counsel" must be introduced, and the rule may be taken to be the rule of the common law. That rule is founded upon public policy. With regard to the counsel, the question of malice, bona fides, and relevancy, cannot be raised; the only question is, whether what is complained of has been said in the course of the administration of the law. If that be so, the case against a counsel must be stopped at once. No action of any kind, no criminal prosecution, can be maintained against a defendant, when it is established that the words complained of were uttered by him as counsel in the course of a judicial inquiry, that is, an inquiry before any court of justice into any matter concerning the administration of the law.[95]

[95] "The authorities are clear, uniform and conclusive that no action lies, whether against judges, counsel, witnesses, or parties, for words spoken in the ordinary course of any proceeding before any court or tribunal recognized by law. It is manifest that the administration of justice would be paralysed if those who are engaged in it were to be liable to actions of libel or slander upon the imputation that they had acted maliciously and not bona fide. The doctrine is not confined to the administration of justice in the superior courts. It has been applied in its fullest extent to county courts. It applies not only to all kinds of courts of justice, but to other tribunals recognised by law acting judicially. It has not, however, been

I am of opinion that the rule of law is such as I have pointed out, that it ought to be applied in the present case, and therefore that this action cannot be maintained.

Appeal [by the plaintiff] dismissed.

McLAUGHLIN v. COWLEY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1879. 127 Mass. 316.)

Tort. The second count in the declaration stated in due form that the defendant in a declaration signed and filed by him as attorney for the plaintiff in an action brought by one Leggate against one Moulton had falsely and maliciously charged the present plaintiff with murder and adultery. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleges exceptions.[96]

LORD, J. It was stated in the opinion of this court in the recent case of Rice v. Coolidge, 121 Mass. 393, 23 Am. Rep. 279, that it seems to be settled by the English authorities that judges, counsel, parties and witnesses are absolutely exempted from liability to an action for defamatory words published in the course of judicial proceedings; and that the same doctrine is generally held in the American courts, with the qualification, as to parties, counsel and witnesses, that their statements made in the course of an action must be pertinent and material to the case. The doctrine thus qualified was set forth by Shaw, C. J., in an elaborate opinion, in Hoar v. Wood, 3 Metc. 193. The qualification of the English rule is adopted in order that the protection given to individuals in the interest of an efficient administration of justice may not be abused as a cloak from beneath which to gratify private malice. The question presented by the first exception in this case depends upon the proper application of this rule.

A careful examination of the declaration in the case of Leggate against Moulton shows that that action was brought to recover damages for losses sustained by Leggate in consequence of employing McLaughlin, the plaintiff in the case at bar, as her agent; and that he was so employed because Leggate believed certain false representations made by Moulton as to McLaughlin's trustworthiness and fitness for the agency. The declaration sets forth the representations made, alleges that they were false and that Moulton knew it, and then proceeds with the statements which are here charged to be libellous. These statements relate to matters not mentioned in the extended further than to courts of justice and tribunals acting in a manner similar to that in which such courts act." 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 678–681 (1911), and cases there cited.

[96] The statement of the case is abridged, and a portion of the opinion, dealing with other questions, is omitted. The defendant's exceptions were sustained for error in the admission of testimony under a plea of justification.

representations made by Moulton. They do not directly negative the truth of any of his representations, and were not necessary nor material to a full and complete presentation of the case on which Leggate asked for damages. The ground of action was not strengthened by adding them, nor did they furnish any basis for enhancing the damages which might be recovered. They were not pertinent to the action, and were struck out of the declaration, by the court, on motion of Moulton. They contained charges against the present plaintiff of criminal conduct of the grossest character.

To hold that such statements, thus uncalled for and irrelevant, are privileged, as part of pleadings in a cause, would be to disregard the salutary modification of the English rule which has been made by the American courts,[97] and is stated in Rice v. Coolidge. The defendant stands, therefore, as to liability to action on account of these statements, precisely as if he had published them in a newspaper, and cannot justify, by showing his belief that they were true, the sources

[97] "In England, the law seems to be settled now that judges, counsel, parties and witnesses are absolutely exempted from liability to an action for defamatory words published in the course of judicial proceedings (Rice v. Coolidge [1876] 121 Mass. 393, 23 Am. Rep. 279), and it has been broadly stated that this was the rule at common law. As the common law of England, as it existed down to the 4th day of July, 1776, is declared by statute to be of force in this state, let us see what was the state of the common law prior to the time stated. [Mr. Justice Parkhill here reviewed the earlier English cases on the point.] We need not comment upon the other English cases cited by counsel for the defendant in error further than to say that many of them were decided long after the 4th day of July, 1776, and only support the modern doctrine of privilege prevailing in that country. We do not think the rule at common law sustains the contention for an absolute privilege for defamatory words published in the due course of judicial proceeding.

"In the United States, according to the overwhelming weight of authority, in order that defamatory words, published by parties, counsel, or witnesses in the due course of a judicial procedure, may be absolutely privileged, they must be connected with, or relevant or material to, the cause in hand or subject of inquiry. If they are so published and are so relevant or pertinent to the subject of inquiry, no action will lie therefor, however false or malicious they may in fact be." Per Parkhill, J., in Myers v. Hodges (1907) 53 Fla. 197, 44 South. 357, 361, citing many cases.

See also Dodge v. Gilman (1913) 122 Minn. 177, 142 N. W. 147, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 894. But in Sebree v. Thompson (1907) 126 Ky. 223, 103 S. W. 374, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 723, 15 Ann. Cas. 770, a dictum inclines toward the later English view. See, in general, 25 Cyc. 377–380; "Libel and Slander," Cent. Dig. §§ 117–123, Dec. Dig. Key-No. § 38.

The range of the principle of "absolute privilege" is indicated in the following passage from the considered judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1873) L. R. 8 Q. B. 255, 268: "Whatever is said, however false or injurious to the character or interests of a complainant, by judges upon the bench, whether in the superior courts of law or equity, or in county courts, or sessions of the peace, by counsel at the bar in pleading causes, or by witnesses in giving evidence, or by members of the legislature in either house of parliament, or by ministers of the Crown in advising the Sovereign, is absolutely privileged and cannot be inquired into in an action at law for defamation." This passage is quoted by Fry, L. J., in Munster v. Lamb (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 588, 606, as a dictum of the highest value and "in my opinion nothing less than a declaration of the common law on the point."

of his information, or his instructions from his client. It is only when words are published on an occasion which makes them privileged, that the belief of the publisher that they are true can be shown. * * *

SEAMAN v. NETHERCLIFT.

(In the Court of Appeal, 1876. 2 C. P. Div. 53.)

Appeal from the decision of the Common Pleas Division, ordering judgment to be entered for the defendant.[98]

COCKBURN, C. J. * * * At the trial before Lord Coleridge it appeared that in the probate suit of Davies v. May the defendant had been examined, as an adept, to express his opinion as to the genuineness of a signature to a will, and he gave it as his opinion that the signature was a forgery. The president of the Court, in addressing the jury, made some very strong observations on the rashness of the defendant in expressing so confident an opinion in the face of the direct evidence. Soon afterwards, on a prosecution for forgery before the magistrate, the defendant was called as an adept by the person charged, when he expressed an opinion favourable to the genuineness of the document. He was then asked by the counsel for the prosecution whether he had been a witness in the suit of Davies v. May. He answered "Yes." And he was then asked, "Did you read a report of the observations which the presiding judge made on your evidence?" He again said "Yes." And then the counsel stopped. I presume the circumstances of the trial were well known, and the counsel thought he had done enough. The defendant, the witness, expressed a desire to make a statement. The magistrate told him he could not hear it. Nevertheless the defendant persisted and made the statement, the subject matter of this action of slander.

On the proof of these facts Lord Coleridge reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter judgment, if the Court should be of opinion that there was no evidence on behalf of the plaintiff which ought to be left to the jury. It occurred to him, however, that it would

Seaman v. Netherclift (1876) 1 C. P. D. 540. The pleading in the case was as follows:

Claim: that defendant said of a will, to the signature of which the plaintiff was a witness, "I believe the signature to the will to be a rank forgery, and I shall believe so to the day of my death," meaning that the plaintiff had been guilty of forging the signature of the testator, or of aiding and abetting in the forgery.

Defence: that defendant spoke the words in the course of giving his evidence as a witness on a charge of forgery before a magistrate.

Reply: that the words were not bona fide spoken by defendant as a witness, or in answer to any question put to him as a witness, and he was a mere volunteer in speaking them for his own purposes otherwise than as a witness and maliciously and out of the course of his examination.

be as well to take the opinion of the jury, and they found that the replication was true, viz. that the words were spoken not as a witness in the course of the inquiry, but maliciously for his own purpose, that is, with intent to injure the plaintiff. Upon these findings judgment was entered for the plaintiff, leave being again reserved to enter judgment for the defendant, and the Court of Common Pleas gave judgment for the defendant.

Now, if the findings of the jury had been founded upon evidence by which they could have been supported, I might have had some hesitation about the decision. But they were not; and we are asked to come to a conclusion contrary to what has been established law for nearly three centuries.

If there is anything as to which the authority is overwhelming it is that a witness is privileged to the extent of what he says in the course of his examination. Neither is that privilege affected by the relevancy or irrelevancy of what he says; for then he would be obliged to judge of what is relevant or irrelevant, and questions might be, and are, constantly asked which are not strictly relevant to the issue. But that, beyond all question, this unqualified privilege extends to a witness is established by a long series of cases, the last of which is Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby [1875] Law Rep. 7 H. L. 744, after which to contend to the contrary is hopeless. It was there expressly decided that the evidence of a witness with reference to the inquiry is privileged, notwithstanding it may be malicious; and to ask us to decide to the contrary is to ask what is beyond our power. But I agree that if in this case, beyond being spoken maliciously the words had not been spoken in the character of a witness or not while he was giving evidence in the case, the result might have been different. For I am very far from desiring to be considered as laying down as law that what a witness states altogether out of the character and sphere of a witness, or what he may say dehors the matter in hand, is necessarily protected. I quite agree that what he says before he enters or after he has left the witness-box is not privileged, which was the question in the case before Lord Ellenborough, Trotman v. Dunn [1815] 4 Camp. 211. Or if a man when in the witness-box were to take advantage of his position to utter something having no reference to the cause or matter of inquiry in order to assail the character of another, as if he were asked: "Were you at York on a certain day?" and he were to answer: "Yes, and A. B. picked my pocket there;" it certainly might well be said in such a case that the statement was altogether dehors the character of witness, and not within the privilege.

If, therefore, the findings of the jury, that the defendant had ceased to be a witness when he spoke the words, were justified by the evidence, I should hesitate before I decided in his favour. But I think the defendant was entitled to judgment on the first reservation.

There was no evidence to go to the jury upon the plaintiff's case. What the defendant said was said in his character of witness; for there can be no doubt that the words were spoken in consequence of the question put to him by counsel for the prosecution, the object and effect of the cross-examination having been to damage his credibility as a witness before the magistrate, and of this the witness was conscious. The counsel, having put the question, stops; and if there had been counsel present for the prisoner who had re-examined the witness, he would have put the proper questions to rehabilitate him to the degree of credit to which he was entitled. That such questions would have been relevant I cannot bring myself for a moment to doubt, relating as they do to the credibility of the witness, which is part of the matter of which the magistrate has to take cognizance. That being so, the witness himself, who is sworn to speak the whole truth, is properly entitled, not only with a view to his own vindication, but in the interests of justice, to make such an observation in explanation of his former answer as is just and fair under the circumstances. That is what the defendant did. The sitting magistrate having allowed the disparaging question to be put and answered, ought not to have interfered to prevent the defendant from giving an explanation. I think the statement, coming immediately after the damaging question had been put to him, must be taken to be part of his testimony touching the matter in question, as it affects his credibility as a witness in the matter as to which he was called. It was given as part of his evidence before he had become divested of his character of witness; and but for the question of the opposite counsel he never would have made the statement at all. * * *

In my opinion, the Lord Chief Justice should have nonsuited the plaintiff, which is the conclusion at which the Court of Common Pleas ultimately arrived; for there really was no evidence that the defendant was speaking otherwise than as a witness and relevantly [99]

[99] On this point in the case, Bramwell, J. A., concurring with Cockburn, C. J., remarked: "I am by no means sure that the word 'relevant' is the best word that could be used: the phrases used by the Lord Chief Baron and the Lord Chancellor in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1875) Law Rep. 7 H. L. at page 744, would seem preferable, 'having reference,' or 'made with reference to the inquiry.' Now, were the judges of the Common Pleas Division right in holding that this statement of the defendant had reference to the inquiry? I think that they were. There can be no doubt that the question put by the cross-examining counsel ought not to have been allowed: 'Have you read what Sir James Hannen is reported to have said as to your evidence in Davies v. May?' What Sir James Hannen had said in a former case was not evidence. It was, therefore, an improper question, and the answer to it, if untrue, would not have subjected the witness to an indictment for perjury. But the question having been put, and the answer having been in the affirmative—and the question being, as Lord Coleridge observed, 'ingeniously suggestive,' viz., that the way the defendant had been dealt with on the former occasion did not redound to his credit as a witness—the defendant insisted on making in addition the statement complained of. He did so, in my opinion, very foolishly. It would have been better to have been satisfied with retaining his own opinion without setting it up in direct op-to the matters in issue, because relevantly to his own character and credibility as a witness in the matter. That being so, even if express malice could have been properly inferred from the circumstances, the case of Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, Law Rep. 7 H. L. 744, conclusively decides that malice has ceased to be an element in the consideration of such cases, unless it can be shewn that the statement was made not in the course of giving evidence, and therefore not in the character of a witness. A long series of authorities, from the time of Elizabeth to the present time, has established that the privilege of a witness while giving evidence is absolute and unqualified. * * *

The judgment of the Common Pleas must therefore be affirmed.

position to the positive testimony of eyewitnesses. But he foolishly, as I think, and coarsely exclaimed, 'I believe that will to be a rank forgery, and shall believe so to the day of my death.' Suppose after he had said 'yes,' he had added in a decent and becoming manner, 'and I am sorry Sir James Hannen said what he did, for I took great pains to form my own opinion, and I shall always retain it, as I still think it right.' Would not that have had reference to the inquiry before the magistrate? And would it not have been reasonable and right that the witness should have added that statement in justification of himself? Surely, yes. Mr. Clarke said he was prepared to maintain that as long as a witness spoke as a witness in the witness-box, he was protected, whether the matter had reference to the inquiry or not. I am reluctant to affirm so extreme a proposition. Suppose while the witness is in the box, a man were to come in at the door, and the witness were to exclaim, 'that man picked my pocket.' I can hardly think that would be privileged. I can scarcely think a witness would be protected for anything he might say in the witness-box, wantonly and without reference to the inquiry. I do not say he would not be protected. It might be held that it was better that everything a witness said as a witness should be protected, than that witnesses should be under the impression that what they said in the witness-box might subject them to an action. I certainly should pause before I affirmed so extreme a proposition, but without affirming that, I think the words 'having reference to the inquiry' ought to have a very wide and comprehensive application, and ought not to be limited to statements for which, if not true, a witness might be indicted for perjury, or the exclusion of which by the judge would give ground for a new trial; but ought to extend to that which a witness might naturally and reasonably say when giving evidence with reference to the inquiry as to which he had been called as a witness. Taking that view, I think the first proposition is established, that the statement of the defendant was made as witness and had reference to the inquiry."

Amphlett, J. A., also concurring, remarked: "How it would have been if this statement had been volunteered by the defendant, without it being necessary or in any way arising from questions he had been asked, we need not express any opinion. In such a case it may be that the words would not have been spoken in his office of a witness. I must by no means be taken as expressing an opinion that in such a case the witness would not be protected. I can see many reasons why a witness should be absolutely protected for anything he said in the witness box. If he did voluntarily make a scandalous attack while giving evidence, he would be guilty of a gross contempt of Court, and might be committed to prison by the presiding judge; or if he were before an inferior tribunal, and he persevered in his scandalous statements, he might be liable to an indictment for obstructing the course of justice. But this question does not arise here."

LAMBERSON v. LONG.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals, Missouri, 1896. 66 Mo. App. 253.)

The action was slander. The petition charged that the defendant, in the presence and hearing of others, spoke of and concerning the plaintiff certain words which imputed to the plaintiff the crime of larceny. There was an answer in denial, with a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.[1]

ROMBAUER, P. J. * * * The assignment of error mainly relied on arises upon the refusal of three instructions asked by the defendant, all of which were to the effect that, if the jury found that the words charged to have been spoken were spoken by the defendant while he was being cross-examined as a witness, and that he was merely undertaking to repeat, in answer to a question asked him, what he had said to plaintiff in a former difficulty between them, the plaintiff could not recover.

There was no controversy touching the fact that the actionable words were spoken by the defendant while he was being cross-examined as a witness in a legal proceeding. There is, however, no pretense that they were responsive to any question propounded to him, and a careful analysis of the evidence has satisfied us that there is no substantial evidence in the record that they were intended by him to be a mere repetition of what he had formerly stated. We have very fully examined the law touching the privileged remarks of witnesses in the recent case of Crecelius v. Bierman, 59 Mo. App. 513, and have there fully defined the character and extent of such a privilege. Under that definition the utterance complained of could not be absolutely privileged, because it was not responsive to any question propounded by counsel, nor did it fairly arise out of any question propounded by counsel. It is well settled that a remark made by a witness in the box, wholly irrelevant to the matter of inquiry and uncalled for in any question of counsel, but introduced by the witness maliciously for his own purposes, will not be privileged. Odgers on Libel and Slander, top page 144. In order to make a statement which is not responsive to a question, and which is irrelevant to the issue, relatively privileged, it is incumbent upon the defendant to satisfy the jury that the statement was made by the witness because he deemed it relevant on reasonable grounds, and, moreover, that the witness believed the statement to be true. Had the instructions refused contained these qualifications, it would have been error to refuse them, since there was evidence in the case supporting that hypothesis. As they did not contain these qualifications, but were based upon a hypothesis unsupported by any substantial evidence in the record, we can not put the trial court in the wrong for refusing them.

[1] The statement of the case is abridged and part of the opinion is omitted.

It thus appears that neither of the errors assigned are well assigned, and hence the judgment must be affirmed. So ordered. All the judges concur, Judge BOND in the result.[2]

[2] Compare White v. Carroll (1870) 42 N. Y. 161, 1 Am. Rep. 503: (White was a homeopathic doctor; Carroll, an allopathic doctor. The latter was testifying as a witness on an issue as to the sanity of a testator, whom he had attended. He was asked, "Did any other physician attend him then?" The answer was: "Not as I know of. I understand he had a quack, I would not call him a physician; I understood that Dr. White, as he is called, had been there." The Court held that this answer was not material and pertinent to the enquiry, that it was privileged if the defendant when he gave it believed in good faith that it was, and that whether he so believed was a question of fact for the jury.) See Grover, J., in Marsh v. Ellsworth (1872) 50 N. Y. 309, 313.

See also the remark of Fields, J., in Wright v. Lothrop (1889) 149 Mass. 385, 389, 21 N. E. 963, 965: "The examination of witnesses is regulated by the tribunal before which they testify, and if witnesses answer pertinently questions asked them by counsel which are not excluded by the tribunal, or answer pertinently questions asked them by the tribunal, they ought to be absolutely protected. It is not the duty of a witness to decide for himself whether the questions asked him under the direction of the tribunal are relevant. As the witness is sworn to tell the whole truth relating to the matter concerning which his testimony is taken, he ought also to be absolutely protected in testifying to any matter which is relevant to the inquiry, or which he reasonably believes to be relevant to it. But a witness ought not to be permitted with impunity to volunteer defamatory statements which are irrelevant to the matter of inquiry, and which he does not believe to be relevant. This statement of the law, we think, is supported by the decisions in this Commonwealth. The English decisions, perhaps, go somewhat further than this in favor of a witness: certainly they apply the rule liberally for his protection."

In Buschbaum v. Heriot (1909) 5 Ga. App. 521, 63 S. E. 645, Russell, J., remarked: "The fact that a witness, without inquiry, and influenced by malice, volunteers false testimony defamatory of another, the immateriality of which is apparent to any ordinary mind, is such a circumstance as places the testimony of the witness in the class of conditional privilege, where he is no longer shielded by the law, unless it be made to appear that he bona fide believes that the facts stated by him are true, and unless with at least some show of reason he is of opinion that his testimony is material. What we have said relates wholly to such testimony as is immaterial, and not only immaterial but volunteered by the witness, because, in a case where the testimony is given in direct response to a question propounded by an officer of the court, the witness is not to be the judge of the materiality of his answer, but is required to answer the question, if it is not objected to or is not self-incriminatory. 'Pertinent matter in pleadings, motions, affidavits, and other papers in any judicial proceeding is absolutely privileged, though false and malicious. And in determining whether matter is pertinent or not the court will indulge in no strained, technical, or close construction to deprive the defendant of the protection of the privilege.' 1 Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 432, § 251. This rule, which applies especially to parties, is rather extended than restricted in favor of the witness."

But see Hunckel v. Voneiff (1889) 69 Md. 179, 14 Atl. 500, 17 Atl. 1056, 9 Am. St. Rep. 413: "It was perfectly competent for this court, having the questions before them for the first time in these cases, to follow and adopt the current of the American decisions in regard to the privilege of the advocate, and to follow and adopt the rule of the English courts as regards the privilege of the witness. This is what has been done, and it does not seem to me that the privileges of the two are so tied together, either by reason or authority, as to make these decisions inconsistent and irreconcilable." BOND, J. Being unable to agree to all the expressions used in the opinion of my associates, it becomes necessary to state separately my views of the law applicable to this case:

I. A statement made by a witness in a judicial proceeding is presumptively privileged. If the statement is relevant, or believed on reasonable ground to be relevant to the issues on trial, or if it is responsive to an inquiry by court or counsel, the privilege becomes absolute irrespective of the intent of the utterer.

II. To overcome the prima facie presumption of privilege arising from the occasion, it is incumbent on the plaintiff (in an action of slander or libel) to show that the statement of the witness was not responsive to a question asked by the court or counsel, and that it was not believed on reasonable grounds to be relevant to the issues on trial. If the jury believes the evidence adduced to this effect, all presumption arising from the fact that the statement was made under examination in court ceases, and the statement, if actionable per se, will authorize a recovery. These principles are sustained by the cases cited in my opinion in Crecelius v. Bierman, 59 Mo. App. 513. As defendant's instructions did not conform to these rules, they were properly refused.

KEELEY v. GREAT NORTHERN RY. CO.

The action was against the Great Northern Railway Company for defamation. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and the plaintiff appealed.

The complaint, in substance, set forth that in 1907 the husband of plaintiff, while in the employment of defendant, was killed in consequence of defendant's negligence; that she brought an action against the defendant for damages under the death statute, and recovered after a trial in which she was a witness in her own behalf with reference to formal and uncontested points, and in which an employé of the defendant was called as a witness for the plaintiff, and gave relevant and material testimony tending to establish the liability of defendant. After verdict for the plaintiff defendant moved for a new trial. Attached to and made part of the motion papers was an affida-Immunity in Defamation: Legislative and Executive Proceedings," and see the same topics in 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 683, 684 (1911).

The nature and extent of legislative immunity is effectively presented in Chief Justice Parsons' opinion in Coffin v. Coffin (1808) 4 Mass. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 189. The case is the more valuable in that it marks the limits of a very wide principle.

For the application of the principle in official communications by executive officers of the government, see Chatterton v. Secretary of State, [1895] 2 Q. B. 189.

vit of one Sandager, a detective in the employment of defendant, made in 1908, reflecting upon the chastity of the plaintiff. It is averred that this affidavit and the statement above referred to were wholly and entirely immaterial, irrelevant, and not pertinent to any issues involved in the action or on said motion, and that the affidavit and statements were not material, pertinent, or relevant to any matter or subject in the action, or considered, or proper to be considered, on said motion, and that neither the affidavit, nor any of the statements therein contained, nor any of the statements quoted therefrom, were proper to be used or filed in said action or upon said motion, which facts were well known to the defendant and its attorneys at and prior to the time of making and filing said affidavit and statements. The defendant, acting through its attorneys at the hearing of the motion for a new trial, read said affidavit and statements in open court. The presiding judge filed an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, which order contained the following statement: "The affidavits of Zearfoss, Barr, and Sandager presented by defendant's counsel, in the opinion of this court, are improper and ought not to be considered, and they are not considered on the decisions of the several motions." This order and the decision of the circuit judge were affirmed by the Supreme Court. On the day the affidavit was presented and filed in the circuit court plaintiff caused to be served on the defendant a notice in writing, advising the defendant of the filing of the libelous affidavit and statements by its attorneys, but the defendant, after receipt of this notice by and through its attorneys, caused and procured said affidavit containing the alleged libelous statements to be filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, and thereafter to be filed with the clerk of the Supreme Court, and made no effort or request to withdraw from the files said affidavit and such statements therein contained. It is further averred that the acts and conduct of Sandager and of said attorneys were fully ratified by the defendant, and that the said acts and conduct were malicious, vindictive, and with the intention and for the purpose of destroying the good name and reputation of the plaintiff, and to cause her disgrace and degradation. It is also averred that the plaintiff has always been, and is now, a woman of chaste character and of good reputation.

TIMLIN, J.[3] * * * It is contended here that the demurrer admits these averments of the complaint which charged lack of good faith, want of reasonable belief in the truth of the affidavit made against the plaintiff, and knowledge on the part of the defendant that the affidavit in question was false and malicious; hence that the defendant cannot shelter itself behind a plea of privilege. This would be true as to conditional privilege. But this complaint shows on its face that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the motion, and that the matter complained of was relevant to the inquiry upon this motion, and in this respect shows a case of absolute privilege within the rule of Jennings v. Paine, 4 Wis. 358; Calkins v. Sumner, 13 Wis. 193, 80 Am. Dec. 738; Larkin v. Noonan, 19 Wis. 82; Schultz v. Strauss, 127 Wis. 325, 106 N. W. 1066, 7 Ann. Cas. 528. The cases of Cottrill v. Cramer, 43 Wis. 242, Eviston v. Cramer, 47 Wis. 659, 3 N. W. 392, and Cochran v. Melendy, 59 Wis. 207, 18 N. W. 24, were cases of communications conditionally privileged, and are not in point here.

[3] In the omitted portion of the opinion it was held that the statement, in the defendant's affidavit for a new trial, that illicit relations existed between the plaintiff and her principal witness, was relevant, since on the trial the witness appeared to be disinterested. And "the fact that the judge apparently disapproved of this attack upon the reputation of the plaintiff, and also denied the motion for a new trial, as he lawfully might do, is immaterial."

In order to bring a witness, counsel, or party in a litigation within the rule of absolute privilege it is only necessary to show that the alleged slanderous or libelous words at the time when made or published were clearly relevant to the pending legal inquiry in which they were uttered or used. Nothing less than this would be an adequate protection. Ogders on Libel and Slander, p. 191; Hoar v. Wood, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 193; Laing v. Mitten, 185 Mass. 233, 70 N. E. 128. Where slanderous or libelous words employed in such a proceeding are irrelevant, they fall within the rule of conditional privilege, and if they are shown to be false, and not put forward with any bona fide belief in their truth or their relevancy, or any other ground of actual malice be shown, the conditional privilege is lost and the utterer liable. Without approving everything said therein we may here cite Myers v. Hodges, 53 Fla. 197, 44 South. 357; Lauder v. Jones, 13 N. D. 525, 101 N. W. 907. In some of the cases and text-books cited the distinction between absolute and conditional privilege is not accurately stated as in Newell on Defamation, Slander and Libel, p. 423; but see page 425 of the same work. Cases from other courts may also be found which ignore the distinction between absolute and conditional privilege, here made to rest upon the nature of the judicial proceeding and the relevancy of the matter complained of. But such cases are not the law of this state.

In legal proceedings, if the matter be relevant but false in fact, the law undertakes to punish for perjury, but civil damages are not recoverable. If irrelevant, false, and uttered or published with express malice, damages may be recovered in a civil action. If irrelevant and false, but uttered or published without actual as contradistinguished from imputed malice, it usually falls within the rule of conditional privilege, depending somewhat upon the degree of its irrelevancy; for if the matter is very obviously irrelevant, that circumstance may impugn the good faith of the utterer or publisher, and either take the case out of the rule of conditional privilege or be considered evidence to support a finding of express malice. Sherwood v. Powell, 61 Minn. 479, 63 N. W. 1103, 29 L. R. A. 153, 52 Am. St. Rep. 614; McLaughlin v. Cowley, 127 Mass. 316; s. c., 131 Mass. 70.

Order affirmed.

WATSON v. McEWAN.

SAME v. JONES.

(House of Lords. [1905] A. C. 480.)

Appeal from the Second Division of the Court of Session, Scotland.

The appellant was Sir Patrick H. Watson, a doctor of medicine; and the respondents were respectively Jessie Prentice Jones or McEwan, wife of Thomas McEwan, and her father, James Jones. The ground of the actions was that the appellant, while being examined as a witness in an action of separation brought by the respondent Jessie McEwan, made certain statements which the respondents alleged were slanderous. The respondent Jessie McEwan alleged that the statements made in the witness-box had been, prior to the trial, and with a view to giving evidence, communicated by the appellant to her husband, Thomas McEwan, his agent and his counsel. The Lord Ordinary and their Lordships of the Second Division were unanimously of opinion that no action would lie against the appellant for the statements made in the witness-box; but their Lordships (Lord Young dissenting) allowed an issue with reference to the information previously given to the husband's law agent. The main question raised in this appeal was whether the averment of the respondent Jessie McEwan that the statements made in the witness-box were previously communicated to her husband and his agent and counsel formed a ground of action against the appellant Sir Patrick H. Watson. * * *[4]

Earl of Halsbury, L. C. * * * By complete authority, including the authority of this House, it has been decided that the privilege of a witness, the immunity from responsibility in an action when evidence has been given by him in a Court of justice, is too well established now to be shaken. Practically I may say that in my view it is absolutely unarguable—it is settled law and cannot be doubted. The remedy against a witness who has given evidence which is false and injurious to another is to indict him for perjury; but for very obvious reasons, the conduct of legal procedure by Courts of justice, with the necessity of compelling witnesses to attend, involves as one of the necessities of the administration of justice the immunity of witnesses from actions being brought against them in respect of evidence they have given. So far the matter, I think, is too plain for argument.

But then comes the question which, so far as I know, has been raised for the first time in this case. The ingenious suggestion has been made that although it is true that a witness is protected from an action in respect of evidence actually given in a Court of justice, yet no such protection exists in respect of his attendance before the solicitor at what is called apparently in Scottish law his precognition—what we call the interview between the intended witness and the solicitor who takes from him what we call the proof—that is to say, reduces to writing the evidence which the witness is about to give. One very serious element of difficulty which those who insist upon such a liability have to meet is manifest—namely, that in the whole course of the diligent inquiry that the learned counsel on both sides have made into this matter they have not found that any such liability has ever been sought to be established before. So far as I know personally in my experience no such question has ever arisen. The learned judges who have allowed these issues have done so apparently for the first time in this case.

It appears to me that the privilege which surrounds the evidence actually given in a Court of justice necessarily involves the same privilege in the case of making a statement to a solicitor and other persons who are engaged in the conduct of proceedings in Courts of justice when what is intended to be stated in a Court of justice is narrated to them—that is, to the solicitor or writer to the Signet. If it were otherwise, I think what one of the learned counsel has with great cogency pointed out would apply—that from time to time in these various efforts which have been made to make actual witnesses responsible in the shape of an action against them for the evidence they have given, the difficulty in the way of those who were bringing the action would have been removed at once by saying, "I do not bring the action against you for what you said in the witness-box, but I bring the action against you for what you told the solicitor you were about to say in the witness-box." If that could be done the object for which the privilege exists is gone, because then no witness could be called; no one would know whether what he was going to say was relevant to the question in debate between the parties. A witness would only have to say, "I shall not tell you anything; I may have an action brought against me to-morrow if I do; therefore I shall not give you any information at all." It is very obvious that the public policy which renders the protection of witnesses necessary for the administration of justice must as a necessary consequence involve that which is a step towards and is part of the administration of justice—namely, the preliminary examination of witnesses to find out what they can prove. It may be that to some extent it seems to impose a hardship, but after all the hardship is not to be compared with that which would arise if it were impossible to administer justice, because people would be afraid to give their testimony.

My Lords, the hardship to which I refer is this: that although when a witness does give evidence which is wilfully false you can indict him for perjury, on the other hand, if he makes the same statement not upon oath to a person taking down the evidence he is prepared to give, it seems to be very difficult to devise anything that would bring him to justice for that false statement. The answer, of course, dealing with it as a matter of convenience and indeed of necessity for the administration of justice, I suppose, is this: unless he does give evidence in a Court of justice, in which case he can be indicted for perjury if his evidence is wilfully false, nobody knows anything about it—it slumbers, I suppose, in the office of the solicitor, and nobody hears or cares anything about it. Practically, I think that would be the answer. But whether that be a good answer or not, what seems to me to be an overwhelming consideration in the determination of this case is that a witness must be protected for his preliminary statement or he has no protection at all, and that there is that protection established is, as I have already said, beyond all possibility of doubt. * * *

Under these circumstances, my Lords, it appears to me that there is but one point in this case; namely, whether the preliminary examination of a witness by a solicitor is within the same privilege as that which he would have if he had said the same thing in his sworn testimony in Court. I think the privilege is the same, and for that reason I think these judgments ought to be reversed, and I move accordingly.[5]

(1) Reports in Public Interest

CURRY v. WALTER.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1796. 1 Bos. & P. 525, 4 R. R. 717, 126 Reprint, 1046.)

This was an action for printing and publishing in the newspaper called The Times, under the title of "Law Reports," a libel on the plaintiff. It imported to be an account of an application to the Court of King's Bench for an information against the plaintiff and a Mr. Bingham, both justices of the peace for Hampshire, for refusing to license an inn at Gosport. The ground of the application, as moved by Mr. Erskine, was that the magistrates had conspired with the landlord of the inn-keeper to find a pretence for refusing him a licence, thereby to compel him to surrender a very beneficial lease to his landlord. The supposed libel, which was set out verbatim in the declaration, stated the circumstances of this charge very distinctly, and concluded by shewing that the rule was not granted, because there was no

[5] Lord James and Lord Robertson concurred. The cause was remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with a direction to dismiss the action.

[6] "The term 'qualified privilege' is almost invariably used to distinguish this kind of privilege from 'absolute privilege.' The term 'conditional privilege' is, however, convenient as emphasizing the fact that the defence of privilege which is not absolute is conditional only, and liable to be displaced if the plaintiff establishes that the communication was actuated by express or actual malice." 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 685, note (a).

affidavit on the part of the prosecutor of the magistrates having had due notice of the motion.

The defendant pleaded the general issue, and at the trial, after the plaintiff had proved the publication of the paper in question by him, produced as witness a person whom he employed to collect legal intelligence for the use of his paper, in order to prove that the report was a true and faithful account of what passed in the Court of King's Bench upon the motion. It was objected on the other side, that this defence ought to have been put upon the record, and could not be given in evidence under the general issue. This objection, however, was overruled by Eyre, C. J., who in summing up, told the Jury, that though the matter contained in the paper might be very injurious to the character of the magistrates, yet he was of opinion, that being a true account of what took place in a court of justice which is open to all the world, the publication of it was not unlawful. The Jury found a verdict for the defendant. A rule nisi for setting aside this verdict was obtained and argued.[7]

THE COURT were of opinion that this action could not be maintained, but some doubts being entertained upon the bench whether the matter of justification ought not to have been pleaded, the case stood over; and no judgment was ever given.[8]

WASON v. WALTER.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1868. L. R. 4 Q. B. 73.)

A petition of the plaintiff was presented to the House of Lords, charging a high judicial officer with having made a false statement to his own knowledge, in order to deceive a committee of the House of Commons, and praying inquiry and the removal of the officer if the charge was found true. A debate ensued on the presentation of the petition, and the charge was utterly refuted. In the course of the debate statements disparaging to the character of the plaintiff were made by the Lord Chancellor and other Lords. The Times newspaper published a faithful and correct report of these proceedings in the House of Lords, including the debate. The plaintiff sued the proprietor of the Times for libel. The defendant pleaded "Not guilty."

At the trial, the Lord Chief Justice told the jury that if they were satisfied that the matter charged as a libel in the first count was a faithful and correct report of the proceedings in the House of Lords, and of the speeches delivered on the occasion, he directed them in point of law that it was a privileged publication, and one which was not the subject of a civil action, and they should find for the defendant on that count.

There was a verdict for the defendant. Afterwards a rule was obtained for a new trial, on the ground of a misdirection in charging the jury that the publication of the libel was privileged if they should find it to be a true and faithful report of the debate in the House of Lords.[9]

COCKBURN, C. J. * * * The main question for our decision is, whether a faithful report in a public newspaper of a debate in either house of parliament, containing matter disparaging to the character of an individual, as having been spoken in the course of the debate, is actionable at the suit of the party whose character has thus been called in question. We are of opinion that it is not.

Important as the question is, it comes now for the first time before a court of law for decision. Numerous as are the instances in which the conduct and character of individuals have been called in question in parliament during the many years that parliamentary debates have been reported in the public journals, this is the first instance in which an action of libel founded on a report of a parliamentary debate has come before a court of law. There is, therefore, a total absence of direct authority to guide us. There are, indeed, dicta of learned judges having reference to the point in question, but they are conflicting and inconclusive, and, having been unnecessary to the decision of the cases in which they were pronounced, may be said to be extrajudicial. In the case of Rex v. Wright, 8 T. R. 293, Lawrence, J., placed the reports of parliamentary debates on the same footing with respect to privilege as is accorded to reports of proceedings in courts of justice, and expressed an opinion that the former were as much entitled to protection as the latter. But it is to be observed that in that case the question related to the publication by the defendant of a copy of a report of a committee of the House of Commons, which report the House had ordered to be printed, not to the publication of a debate unauthorized by the House. * * *

Decided cases thus leaving us without authority on which to proceed in the present instance, we must have recourse to principle in order to arrive at a solution of the question before us, and fortunately we have not far to seek before we find principles in our opinion applicable to the case, and which will afford a safe and sure foundation for our judgment.

It is now well established that faithful and fair reports of the proceedings of courts of justice, though the character of individuals may incidentally suffer, are privileged, and that for the publication of such reports the publishers are neither criminally nor civilly responsible.

The immunity thus afforded in respect of the publication of proceedings of courts of justice rests upon a twofold ground. * * *

The broader principle on which this exception to the general law of libel is founded is, that the advantage to the community from publicity being given to the proceedings of courts of justice is so great, that the occasional inconvenience to individuals arising from it must yield to the general good. It is true that with a view to distinguish the publication of proceedings in parliament from that of proceedings of courts of justice, it has been said that the immunity accorded to the reports of the proceedings of courts of justice is grounded on the fact of the courts being open to the public, while the houses of parliament are not; as also that by the publication of the proceedings of the courts the people obtain a knowledge of the law by which their dealings and conduct are to be regulated. But in our opinion the true ground is that given by Lawrence, J., in Rex v. Wright,[10] namely, that "though the publication of such proceedings may be to the disadvantage of the particular individual concerned, yet it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of courts of justice should be universally known. The general advantage to the country in having these proceedings made public, more than counterbalances the inconvenience to the private persons whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings." In Davison v. Duncan, 7 E. & B. 231, Lord Campbell says: "A fair account of what takes place in a court of justice is privileged. The reason is, that the balance of public benefit from publicity is great. It is of great consequence that the public should know what takes place in court; and the proceedings are under the control of the judges. The inconvenience, therefore, arising from the chance of injury to private character is infinitesimally small as compared to the convenience of publicity." And Wightman, J., says: "The only foundation for the exception is the superior benefit of the publicity of judicial proceedings which counterbalances the injury to individuals, though that at times may be great." * * *

[10] 8 T. R. 293, 298 (1799), where Mr. Justice Lawrence recurs to the facts "of an action brought not many years ago by Mr. Currie against Walter, proprietor of the Times," and, in the passage quoted, gives the ratio decidendi in that case. "The same reasons also apply to the proceedings in Parliament: It is of advantage to the public, and even to the legislative bodies, that the accounts of their proceedings should be generally circulated; and they would be deprived of their advantage if no person could publish their proceedings without being punished as a libellor."

We entirely concur with Lawrence, J., in Rex v. Wright, 8 T. R. 298, that the same reasons which apply to the reports of the proceedings in courts of justice apply also to the proceedings in Parliament. It seems to us impossible to doubt that it is of paramount public and national importance that the proceedings of the houses of Parliament shall be communicated to the public, who have the deepest interest in knowing what passes within their walls, seeing that on what is there said and done, the welfare of the community depends. * * * The analogy between the two cases is in every respect complete. If the rule has never been applied to the reports of parliamentary proceedings till now, we must assume that it is only because the occasion has never before arisen. If the principles which are the foundation of the privilege in the one case are applicable to the other, we must not hesitate to apply them, more especially when by so doing we avoid the glaring anomaly and injustice to which we have before adverted. Whatever disadvantages attach to a system of unwritten law, and of these we are fully sensible, it has at least this advantage, that its elasticity enables those who administer it to adapt it to the varying conditions of society, and to the requirements and habits of the age in which we live, so as to avoid the inconsistencies and injustice which arise when the law is no longer in harmony with the wants and usages and interests of the generation to which it is immediately applied. Our law of libel has, in many respects, only gradually developed itself into anything like a satisfactory and settled form. The full liberty of public writers to comment on the conduct and motive of public men has only in very recent times been recognized. Comments on government, on ministers and officers of state, on members of both houses of Parliament, on judges and other public functionaries, are now made every day, which half a century ago would have been the subject of actions or ex officio informations, and would have brought down fine and imprisonment on publishers and authors. Yet who can doubt that the public are gainers by the change, and that, though injustice may often be done, and though public men may often have to smart under the keen sense of wrong inflicted by hostile criticism, the nation profits by public opinion being thus freely brought to bear on the discharge of public duties? Again, the recognition of the right to publish the proceedings of courts of justice has been of modern growth. Till a comparatively recent time the sanction of the judges was thought necessary even for the publication of the decisions of the courts upon points of law. * * *

It is to be observed that the analogy between the case of reports of proceedings of courts of justice and those of proceedings in Parliament being complete, all the limitations placed on the one to prevent injustice to individuals will necessarily attach on the other: a garbled or partial report, or of detached parts of proceedings, published with intent to injure individuals, will equally be disentitled to protection.

Our judgment will in no way interfere with the decisions that the publication of a single speech for the purpose or with the effect of injuring an individual will be unlawful, as was held in the cases of Rex v. Lord Abingdon, 1 Esp. 226, and Rex v. Creevey, 1 M. & S. 273. * * *

Rule discharged.

STEVENS v. SAMPSON.

(In the Court of Appeal, 1879. 5 Exch. Div. 53.)

In the trial of the action of Nettlefold v. Fulcher in the Marylebone County Court, the defendant in the present action appeared for Nettlefold and made statements reflecting on the plaintiff in the present action, who was a debt collector and employed by Fulcher as agent in the Nettlefold case. Afterwards, the defendant sent a report of these proceedings in the Nettlefold case, including his remarks, to local newspapers, where they were published. This action for libel followed. The case came on for trial before Cockburn, C. J., at the Hilary Sittings, 1879, at Westminster, who left two questions to the jury: 1. Was the report a fair one? 2. Was it sent honestly, or with a desire to injure the plaintiff? The jury answered these questions: 1. That it was in substance a fair report: 2. That it was sent with a certain amount of malice: and found a verdict for the plaintiff with 40s. damages. Cockburn, C. J., directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for that amount.

The defendant appealed on the ground that the judgment entered upon the findings of the jury was wrong; and that it should have been directed to be entered for the defendant, the jury having found that an alleged libel, being a report in certain newspapers of proceedings which took place in a court of justice, was a fair report of the proceedings.

Harris and Poulter, for the defendant. The judgment ought to be entered for the defendant, for a true report of proceedings in a court of justice is privileged absolutely. Hoare v. Silverlock, 9 C. B. 20; Lewis v. Levy, 27 L. J. (Q. B.) 282. The motive that the defendant had for sending the report is immaterial. All the public have a right to be present in a court of justice and hear the proceedings. The defendant by the publication of the report has made the proceedings, which were accessible to all who were present, universally known. The publication, though to the disadvantage of a particular individual, is of importance to the public, and it is, therefore, privileged.

LORD COLERIDGE, C. J.[11] The question before us is whether, on the findings of the jury, the entry of the judgment for the plaintiff is right. I am of opinion that it was rightly entered for the plaintiff. The principle which governs this case is plain. It is like that which governs most other cases of privilege. In order, in cases of libel, to establish that the communication is privileged, two elements must exist; not only must the occasion create the privilege, but the occasion must be made use of bona fide and without malice; if either of these is absent, the privilege does not attach; here the second element is absent, for bona fides is wanting, and malice exists. There are certain cases in which the privilege is absolute. Words spoken in the course of a legal proceeding by a witness or by counsel, and words used in an affidavit in the course of a legal proceeding are absolutely privileged. It is considered advantageous for the public interests that such persons should not in any way be fettered in their statements. This is the first time that a report of proceedings in a court of justice has been sought to be brought within this same class of privilege. I am not disposed to extend the bounds of privilege beyond the principles already laid down, and I find no authority for its extension.

BRETT, L. J. It seems to me that the verdict of the jury means that the defendant did not send this report to be published for the benefit of the public in a matter as to which they ought to be informed, but from a desire to injure the plaintiff. Assuming the report to be a fair and correct account of the proceedings in a court of justice, was it privileged? It seems to me that, whatever privilege is relied upon in an action, the defendant is bound to prove that the occasion is privileged, and that he used the occasion in a privileged way. He is bound to shew that he used the privilege bona fide and without malice; if he fails in either of these incidents, he fails to shew that the communication is privileged. The defendant, in order to establish his defence, must shew that the report was substantially correct and that this substantially correct report was made without malice. It is said that the publication of proceedings in a court of justice is a case of absolute privilege, but there is no authority for that statement, and the case comes within the general rule. The defendant has failed to make out the defence he has put on the record.

Judgment affirmed.

KIMBALL v. POST PUB. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1908. 199 Mass. 248, 85 N. E. 103, 19 L. R. A. [N. S.] 862, 127 Am. St. Rep. 492.)

Separate actions for libel were brought against the Post Publishing Company by Kimball and Galletly, and by the same plaintiffs against the Boston Transcript Company. From judgments for the defendants, the plaintiffs bring exceptions.

HAMMOND, J. The articles of which the plaintiffs complain contained reports of certain proceedings in court and also of a meeting of stockholders of a corporation called the Burrows Lighting & Heating Company.

So far as respects the report of the court proceedings the articles were privileged. This case differs materially from Cowley v. Pulsifer, 137 Mass. 392, 50 Am. Rep. 318. In that case there had been no action by the court. Here the bill had been presented to the court and the court had acted upon it so far as to make a special order that the defendants therein should appear and show cause why they should not be enjoined. This act of the court was a judicial proceeding and, whatever might formerly have been the rule, it was a subject for a privileged report, although the cause had not yet been finished. It was an act begun in a case, and in the end there must be a final decision. The words of Esher, M. R., in Kimber v. Press Ass'n (1893) L. R. 1 Q. B. 65, 71, seem to us to be a true statement of the law on this subject: "I am, therefore, of opinion that where the proceedings are such as will result in a final decision being given, a final and accurate report, made bona fide, of those proceedings is privileged, although it be published before the final decision." And in that case the rule was applied to the proceedings upon an ex parte application for the issue of a summons on a charge of perjury. * * *

But there was something more in the articles than the report of the proceedings in court. There was a report of the meeting of the stockholders of a private corporation; and unless this part of the report is also privileged the defense, so far as resting upon that ground, must fail. It is argued by the defendants that "the public is interested and concerned in a meeting of stockholders of a corporation such as is described in the" articles in question, and that reports of such meetings are privileged if fair and made without malice. But the difficulty with this argument is that, unless modified by statutory provision, the law in England and in this commonwealth always has been otherwise. It is to be noted that we are not dealing with what is said at the meeting nor with the person who said it. No doubt a stockholder at such a meeting, speaking to stockholders, may with impunity say things derogatory to an officer or the manager of the company provided that what he says be pertinent to the matter in hand and he speaks in good faith and without malice. His justification rests upon the fact that he is speaking to the stockholders upon a subject in which he and they have an interest. On the contrary, we are dealing with a report in the nature of a repetition of the defamatory remarks, which report is made by a stranger, having no interest in the question, to other strangers, called the public, equally without interest. It is manifest that the grounds for the privilege under which the original speaker, the stockholder, is protected cannot serve the publisher of the report. Davison v. Duncan, 7 El. & Bl. 231; De Crespigny v. Wellesley, 5 Bing. 402. The privilege of the publisher, if any he has, must rest upon other grounds.

It is stated by some authorities that by the common law of England reports of judicial and parliamentary proceedings alone were privileged. While it is said by Shaw, C. J., in Barrows v. Bell, 7 Gray, 301, 66 Am. Dec. 479, that this statement, unqualified, is too broad, still subsequent decisions seem to show clearly that in England the principle of privilege is confined to reports of judicial or quasi judicial bodies. No privilege was attached to the report of other public unofficial meetings. Hence, if in such a case a report containing any defamatory statement of fact was printed in a newspaper the proprietor's only defense was that the statement was true. Purcell v. Sowler, 1 C. P. D. 781, 2 C. P. D. 215. See, also, Odgers, Libel & Slander (4th Ed.) Append. B, and the authorities therein cited. Since the decision in this last case the law has been somewhat modified so far as respects official and other public meetings. But these statutes have been somewhat strictly construed, and even now a fair report is not always safe. Ponsford v. Financial Times, 16 T. L. R. 248.

The subject was quite freely discussed by Shaw, C. J., in Barrows v. Bell, 7 Gray, 301, 66 Am. Dec. 479, and the following language was used (7 Gray, 313): "Whatever may be the rule as adopted and practiced on in England, we think that a somewhat larger liberty may be claimed in this country and in this commonwealth, both for the proceedings before all public bodies, and for the publication of those proceedings for the necessary information of the people. So many municipal, parochial and other public corporations, and so many large voluntary associations formed for almost every lawful purpose of benevolence, business or interest, are constantly holding meetings, in their nature public, and so usual is it that their proceedings are published for general use and information, that the law to adapt itself to this necessary condition of society, must of necessity admit of these public proceedings, and a just and proper publication of them, as far as it can be done consistently with private rights. This view of the law of libel in Massachusetts is recognized, and to some extent sanctioned by the case of Com. v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, 3 Am. Dec. 212, and many other cases." And it was held that the publication by a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society of a true account of the proceedings of that society in the expulsion of another member for a cause within its jurisdiction, and of the result of certain suits subsequently brought by him against the society and its members on account of such expulsion, is privileged.

The above language of the court, however liberal its construction, is not to be understood as applying to strictly private meetings. It applies at the most only to meetings public in their nature, or where the proceedings concern the public. In that case it was said that the charter of the Massachusetts Medical Society "invested the society, their members and licentiates, with large powers and privileges, in regulating the important public interest of the practice of medicine and surgery, enabled them to prescribe a course of studies, to examine candidates in regard to their qualifications for practice, and give letters testimonial to those who might be found duly qualified." It was also stated that it appeared by the acts incorporating this society that it was regarded by the Legislature "as a public institution, by the action of which the public would be deeply affected in one of its important public interests, the health of the people." It was further said that the proceedings of which the report was made "might be rightly characterized, as in the case of Farnsworth v. Storrs, 5 Cush. 412, as quasi judicial." And it was upon the latter ground that the communication was adjudged to be privileged.

The case before us is entirely different. The meeting was simply that of a private corporation invested with no privileges and owing no special duty to the public. It was an ordinary business meeting. Whether any member was in fraudulent possession of stock, or had mismanaged the affairs of the corporation, or whether the plaintiffs were unfit to continue as officers, or the corporation had been made bankrupt, were matters with which the public were in no way concerned. The meeting was for the stockholders alone. Only they or their duly constituted agents were entitled to be present. The meeting was neither public nor for a public purpose. As well might it be said that a private conference between the members of a partnership on partnership matters was a public meeting. For the purposes of the meeting it might have been necessary for charges to be made by one stockholder against another stockholder or an officer, and that the charges should be discussed and their truth or falsity determined; and so far the actors were well within the privilege. They had a duty to perform in a matter in which all were interested. But for obvious reasons hereinbefore stated the mantle of protection cannot cover him who, having no interest, repeats the defamatory words to others also without interest. And in this matter the conductor of a newspaper stands no better than any other person. As was said in Sheckell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. 25, 26, 27, in reply to a contention that conductors of the public press are entitled to peculiar indulgences and have special rights and privileges, "the law recognizes no such peculiar rights, privileges, or claims to indulgence. They have no rights but such as are common to all. They have just the same rights that the rest of the community have, and no more." These words, although spoken more than half a century ago, state the law as it exists today, except so far as it has been modified by statute, and there has been no statute material to the question before us. The result is that the articles were not privileged so far as they reported the proceedings of the corporation.

It is argued by the defendants that inasmuch as the charge in the bill in equity was the same as that made at the meeting, namely, that the majority of the stock was in the fraudulent possession of the plaintiffs, it will be impossible for the plaintiffs to contend that any alleged damage was suffered from the one rather than from the other, and therefore if one report is privileged the action cannot be maintained. This is untenable. Even if the charge in substance is the same, it is evident that a charge made in a bill in equity filed in court may not be regarded as so serious a matter as a charge made by one's business associates in a business meeting. The difficulty of separating the damages gives no immunity to the defendants.

Exceptions sustained.[12]

TREBBY v. TRANSCRIPT PUB. CO.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1898. 74 Minn. 84, 76 N. W. 961, 73 Am. St. Rep. 330.)

The action was against the Publishing Company for libel. The trial court rendered judgment for the defendant, and denied the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The plaintiff appeals.

MITCHELL, J. * * * The facts leading up to the publication of the alleged libel were as follows: The city of Little Falls had issued to a waterpower company its bonds to the amount of $25,000 in aid of the improvement of the waterpower of the Mississippi River at this place, whereupon the plaintiff brought an action to restrain the city treasurer from paying the bonds, and to compel the waterpower company to return them, on the ground that they were illegally issued and void. To the complaint in this action the waterpower company demurred on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and from the order overruling it the waterpower company appealed to this court. The bonds having been subsequently surrendered and cancelled under some new agreement between the city and the waterpower company, this appeal was not prosecuted further, and was finally dismissed by this court for want of prosecution, and judgment for costs rendered against the waterpower company. Thereupon the plaintiff caused to be published in a St. Paul paper an article to the effect that the judgment of this court in relation to the bonds was in favor of the plaintiff; that the amount in controversy was $25,000; that this decision rendered the bonds void; that the case had been in contest for some time, and was quite important.

This article having come to the notice of some bankers and brokers in Chicago, they wrote to the mayor of the city, asking for the particulars, and inquiring if the city had started on an era of repudiation, and why the bonds were contested. Thereupon some of the citizens of Little Falls presented a petition to the city council, reciting the facts, and stating that they deemed the city had been slandered by the publication of the article, and that action should be taken "to make the truth public, so that the good name of the city should be continued." Thereupon the city council passed a resolution set out in the complaint, in which they characterized the plaintiff as a "disreputable person," and recited that the facts were falsely reported by him to the St. Paul paper with full knowledge of the true facts, and that he maliciously and intentionally made a false report, and condemned his conduct as execrable and odious, and as having caused the city irreparable damage. This resolution, preceded by an historical introduction, and headed "The City's Credit" (also set out in the complaint), the defendant published in its newspaper published in the city of Little Falls, and circulated in that city and the surrounding country. This is the publication complained of.

1. We shall spend no time on the question whether this publication was libellous on its face. It was clearly calculated to injure plaintiff in the good opinion and respect of others, and expose him to the contempt and hatred of his neighbors, especially in the city of Little Falls. It was manifestly libellous unless privileged. * * *

2. Defendant contends that the publication was absolutely privileged, because its paper was the official newspaper of the city, and the city charter (Sp. Laws 1889, c. 8, § 52) required all ordinances and resolutions to be published in the official newspaper before they shall be in force. To this there are several answers: First, the provision of the charter invoked does not seem to apply to resolutions of this character, but merely to ordinances which will have some operative force after they are passed; second, this does not purport to be an official publication, but merely the publication of an item of news; and, third, the resolution was not within the scope of the duty of the city council, but wholly outside of it, and privilege can only be claimed of things published within the scope of official authority. The city council had no more authority to libel or traduce the private character of a private citizen than an assemblage of private citizens would have. Buckstaff v. Hicks, 94 Wis. 34, 68 N. W. 403, 59 Am. St. Rep. 853; Wilcox v. Moore, 69 Minn. 49, 71 N. W. 917.

Neither was the publication privileged conditionally. A privileged communication is one made in good faith upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has, or honestly believes he has, a duty to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, and which contains matter, which, without the occasion upon which it is made, would be defamatory and actionable. Newell, Defam. 388. If the article published by the plaintiff in the St. Paul paper was calculated to unjustly impair the credit of the city, the city council or the defendant would have a perfect right to publish the actual facts, in order to set the city's credit right before the public, although such facts might reflect on the conduct of the plaintiff, but not to make false and defamatory statements regarding plaintiff's character. Landon v. Watkins, 61 Minn. 137, 63 N. W. 615.

It is true that the publication complained of was, as a matter of news, entirely true; that is, the city council did pass the resolution just as stated by the defendant. But the publication in a newspaper of false and defamatory matter is not privileged because made in good faith as a matter of news. The right to publish through the newspaper press such matters of interest as may be thus properly laid before the public does not go to the extent of allowing the publication concerning a person of false and defamatory matter, there being no other reason or justification for doing so than merely the purpose of publishing news. Mallory v. Pioneer Press Co., 34 Minn. 521, 26 N. W. 904. The article was not privileged, either absolutely or conditionally. * * *

Order reversed and new trial granted.[13]

LUNDIN v. POST PUB. CO.

This action was against the Publishing Company, for libel. Judgment for the plaintiff and the defendant brings exceptions.

SHELDON, J. The defendant published in its newspaper a statement that "it was alleged" that the plaintiff had committed an assault upon a woman named, which had resulted in stated personal injuries to her. For this publication the plaintiff had a right of action, unless it was privileged, or unless it was true, or unless for some other reason it was not libelous. The mere fact that the charge against the plaintiff was not made by direct averment but only by saying that such an allegation had been made was not material; for the statement of unfounded charges is none the less actionable that it is made only by way of repeating them as having been made by others. Kimball v. Post Publishing Co., 199 Mass. 248, 251, 85 N. E. 103, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 862, 127 Am. St. Rep. 492, et seq.; Metcalf v. Times Publishing Co., 20 R. I. 674, 678, 40 Atl. 864, 78 Am. St. Rep. 900; Park v. Detroit Free Press Co., 72 Mich. 560, 40 N. W. 731, 1 L. R. A. 599, 16 Am. St. Rep. 544; Popham v. Pickburn, 7 H. & N. 891; Davison v. Duncan, 7 El. & Bl. 229; Purcell v. Sowles, 1 C. P. D. 781, 2 C. P. D. 251. Nor have the publishers of newspapers any greater right to give in this way currency to false charges than other persons. They have no peculiar rights or privileges. Sheckell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. 25, 26; Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co., 154 Mass. 238, 243, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L. R. A. 97.

The defendant claims that this was a fair report of the fact that a suit for damages had been brought against the plaintiff by the woman named, and that in her declaration she had made charges against him which were fairly and correctly stated in the article complained of; that her writ and declaration had been made the subject of judicial proceedings in open court; and therefore that the article was privileged as a fair and correct report of judicial proceedings published in good faith and without malice. This is the main, though not the only contention now relied on by the defendant.

It is not open to dispute that a fair report in a newspaper of pending judicial proceedings is proper, and that this privilege extends to all matters which have been made the subject of judicial proceedings, though such proceedings may be merely preliminary or interlocutory, or even ex parte. For example, it will render privileged a fair report of the charges made in a bill in equity which has been presented to the court and upon which the court has acted by making an order that the defendants shall appear and show cause why an injunction shall not be issued against them. Kimball v. Post Publishing Co., 199 Mass. 248, 85 N. E. 103, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 862, 127 Am. St. Rep. 492; Kimber v. Press Association [1893] 1 Q. B. 65, 71. So it will extend to fair and accurate reports of hearings had upon applications for the issuance of warrants or other criminal process, or upon hearings had after such process has been issued, though they be not final trials upon the merits.[14] * * *

But this principle is limited to matters which really have been made the subject of judicial action. It does not give the right to publish statements made in declarations or other papers filed in court on the ground merely that they have been placed on the files of the court, or until they have been brought to the attention of the court and some judicial action has been taken upon them. Cowley v. Pulsifer, 137 Mass. 392, 50 Am. Rep. 318. As was said by Mr. Justice Holmes in that case, the reasons for allowing fair reports of the proceedings of courts of justice "have no application whatever to the contents of a preliminary written statement of a claim or charge. These do not constitute a proceeding in open court. Knowledge of them throws no light upon the administration of justice. Both form and contents depend wholly on the will of a private individual, who may not be even an officer of the court. It would be carrying privilege farther than we feel prepared to carry it, to say that, by the easy means of entitling and filing it in a cause, a sufficient foundation may be laid for scattering any libel broadcast with impunity." In that case, to be sure, the paper had been neither presented to the court nor entered upon the docket. But the fundamental ground of the decision was that it had not been made the foundation of any judicial action. The rule again was well stated in Barber v. St. Louis Dispatch, 3 Mo. App. 377, in language which, though used by a court of inferior jurisdiction, often has been quoted with approval by courts of last resort. So too the Supreme Court of Rhode Island has said, in Metcalf v. Times Publishing Co., 20 R. I. 674, 678, 40 Atl. 864, 865 (78 Am. St. Rep. 900), that the rule of privilege "gives no license to publish libelous matter simply because it is found in the files of a court. As publishers of news and items of public importance the press should have the freest scope, but as a scandal-monger it should be held to the most rigid limitation. If a man has not the right to go around to tell the charges made by one against another, much less should a newspaper have the right to spread it broadcast and in an enduring form. It is necessary to the ends of justice that a party should be allowed to make his charges against another, for adjudication, even though they may be of a libelous character, and as such they are privileged. * * * But the right of a party to make charges gives no right to others to spread them." See, also, Park v. Detroit Free Press Co., 72 Mich. 560, 40 N. W. 731, 1 L. R. A. 599, 16 Am. St. Rep. 544, and American Pub. Co. v. Gamble, 115 Tenn. 663, 90 S. W. 1005. The general doctrine of privilege has been limited similarly in analogous cases. Monaghan v. Globe Newspaper Co., 190 Mass. 394, 77 N. E. 467; Sweet v. Post Publishing Co., 215 Mass. 450, 102 N. E. 660; Smith v. Streatfield (1913) 3 K. B. 764.

The averments of the declaration mentioned in the defendant's article had not been made the subject of any judicial action within the rule which we have stated. The woman named in that article had brought an action against this plaintiff, but had failed to enter it in court upon the return day thereof. She then presented to the court a petition that she be allowed to make a late entry of her writ and declaration. Her petition was allowed by the court upon consent of the respondent thereto. But this was merely a permission given to that plaintiff to make a late entry of her action, under R. L. c. 173, § 11. It involved no examination of the averments of her declaration in that action, no passing upon their sufficiency, no consideration of the question whether she was entitled to any special relief pending the suit, or of the question whether any special process should be issued against the defendant therein under the provisions of R. L. c. 167, § 80, or otherwise. There was no question as to the making of any order resting upon the character of her action or of the charges made in her declaration. Indeed, there was and is nothing to indicate that her declaration was presented to any judge for action of any kind, and the defendant made no pretense at the trial that this was the case. It cannot be said that there was any judicial action whatever upon that declaration. For this reason the case stands now as showing the bare repetition by the defendant of charges made, or claimed to have been made, by a third person in her action against this plaintiff. As we have seen, because the defendant had no privilege to report these charges, it took the risk, when it chose to repeat them, of being held liable for any damage thus caused to this plaintiff. The privilege which that woman enjoyed of stating her charges against this plaintiff for the purpose of having them adjudicated did not extend to this defendant or afford it any defense for the publication of libelous matter. * * * [15]

(2) Communications in Pursuance of a Duty

CHILD v. AFFLECK et ux.

(Court of King's Bench, 1829. 9 Barn. & C. 403, 33 R. R. 216, 109 Reprint, 150.)

Case for a libel. Plea, the general issue. At the trial before Lord Tenterden, C. J., at the Westminster sittings after Hilary Term, it appeared in evidence that the plaintiff had been in the service of the defendants, Mrs. Affleck having before she hired her made inquiries of two persons, who gave her a good character. The plaintiff remained in that service a few months, and was afterwards hired by another person, who wrote to Mrs. Affleck for her character, and received the following answer, which was the alleged libel:

"Mrs. A.'s compliments to Mrs. S., and is sorry that in reply to her inquiries respecting E. Child, nothing can be in justice said in her favour. She lived with Mrs. A. but for a few weeks, in which short time she frequently conducted herself disgracefully; and Mrs. A. is concerned to add she has, since her dismissal, been credibly informed she has been and now is a prostitute in Bury."

In consequence of this letter the plaintiff was dismissed from her situation. It further appeared that after that letter was written, Mrs. Affleck went to the persons who had recommended the plaintiff to her, and made a similar statement to them. Upon this evidence it was contended, for the defendants, that there was no proof of malice, and that consequently the plaintiff must be nonsuited. On the other hand, it was urged that Mrs. Affleck's statement of what the plaintiff's conduct had been after she left her service was not privileged, and that, at all events, that part of the letter and the statement that she voluntarily made to other persons, and not in answer to any inquiries, were evidence of malice. Lord Tenterden, C. J., was of opinion that the latter part of the letter was privileged, and that the other communications being made to persons who had recommended the plaintiff were not evidence of malice, and he directed a nonsuit.

PARKE, J. The rule laid down by Lord Mansfield in Edmonson v. Stevenson, Bull. N. P. 8, has been followed ever since. It is, that in an action for defamation in giving a character of a servant, "the gist of it must be malice, which is not implied from the occasion of speaking, but should be directly proved." The question then is, whether the plaintiff in this case adduced evidence, which, if laid before a jury, could properly lead them to find express malice. That does not appear upon the face of the letter. Prima facie it is fair, and undoubtedly a person asked as to the character of a servant may communicate all that is stated in that letter. Independently of the letter, there was no evidence except of the two persons that had recommended the plaintiff. The communication to them, therefore, was not officious, and Mrs. Affleck was justified in making it. In Rogers v. Clifton, 3 Bos. & P. 587, evidence of the good conduct of the servant was given, and the communication also appeared to be officious. In Blackburn v. Blackburn, 29 R. R. 583, 4 Bing. 395, the occasion of writing the alleged libel did not distinctly appear, it was therefore properly left to the jury to say, whether it was confidential and privileged or not, and they found that it was not. Here the letter was undoubtedly prima facie privileged, the plaintiff, therefore, was bound to prove express malice in order to take away the privilege.[16]

HARRISON v. BUSH.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1855. 5 El. & Bl. 344, 119 Reprint, 509, 103 R. R. 507.)

LORD CAMPBELL, C. J.[17] This was an action for a libel tried before my brother Crowder at the last Salisbury assizes. The defendant pleaded Not Guilty, and a justification.

It appeared that Dr. Harrison, the plaintiff, before and at the time when the cause of action accrued, was a justice of peace for the county of Somerset, and was in the habit of acting in petty sessions held in the borough of Frome. In the month of October last, there was a contested election for a member to represent this borough in [17] The reporter's statement of the facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

Parliament. During the election, there was much excitement; many windows were broken by the mob; and there were dangerous riots in the streets. The defendant was an elector and an inhabitant of the borough; and, after the election was over, he and several hundred other inhabitants of the borough prepared, signed, and transmitted to Viscount Palmerston a memorial complaining of the conduct of the plaintiff as a magistrate during the election, imputing to him that he had made speeches directly inciting to a breach of the peace; that, after reading the Riot Act, he had sent a man into the streets armed with a bludgeon, and ordered him to strike any person he might meet, indiscriminately; and that he had himself violently struck and kicked several men and women. The memorial alleged that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to remain in Her Majesty's Commission of the peace, and concluded thus: "Your memorialists therefore earnestly pray that your Lordship will cause such an inquiry to be made into the conduct of the said Dr. Harrison as your Lordship may think fit; and that, on the allegations contained in the memorial being duly substantiated and verified, your Lordship will feel it to be your duty to recommend to Her Majesty that the said Dr. Harrison be removed from the commission of the peace." * * *

The learned Judge said that on the authority of Blagg v. Sturt,[18] he should rule that the memorial to the Secretary of State was not a privileged communication, but would reserve leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him, if the jury found bona fides. On this point, he desired them to consider "whether the memorial was got up and signed by the defendant honestly for the purpose which is stated in it, or whether the defendant had any bye motive? If they found bona fides or not, they would assess damages; but these would vary as they thought defendant was actuated more or less by any malicious feeling. If he acted altogether bona fide, damages would be very considerably modified." The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 20s., saying: "We consider it a bona fide memorial."

[18] In Blagg v. Sturt (1846) 10 Q. B. 899, it appeared that D. sent to the Secretary of State a letter which imputed to P., who was town clerk, and clerk to the justices, corruption in the latter office. But the Secretary of State had no direct authority in respect of the matter complained of and was not a competent tribunal to receive the application. In Harrison v. Bush, on the other hand, Lord Campbell reached the conclusion that although the defendant might have addressed the memorial to the Lord Chancellor, in which case it would certainly have been privileged, it was equally privileged being addressed to the Secretary of State. "Legally and constitutionally a justice of the peace is appointed and removed by the sovereign, acting, as in every other exercise of the prerogative, by the advice of a responsible minister. Considering this as virtually a communication to the Queen through her Secretary of State, it cannot be doubted that Her Majesty has an interest in the matter; for she is to see that all in authority under her do their duty, and that justice is duly administered to all her subjects. We therefore come to the conclusion that this was a privileged communication, and that the verdict ought to be entered for the defendant."

A rule has been obtained to enter a verdict for the defendant; and this we think ought to be made absolute.

During the argument, a legal canon was propounded for our guidance by the plaintiff's counsel; and this we are willing to adopt, as we think that it is supported by the principles and authorities upon which the doctrine of privileged communications rests. "A communication made bona fide upon any subject matter in which the party communicating has an interest or in reference to which he has a duty, is privileged if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contained criminatory matter which, without this privilege, would be slanderous and actionable." In the present case, little need be said to show that the communicator had both an interest and a duty in the subject matter of the communication. Assuming that Dr. Harrison had misconducted himself as a magistrate in the manner alleged, all the electors and inhabitants of Frome had suffered a grievance by the magistrate having fomented the riot instead of quelling it, and having endangered instead of protecting life and property within the borough. They have an interest that they may not longer remain subject to the jurisdiction of a magistrate who so violates the law. Again, if Dr. Harrison had so misconducted himself as a magistrate, he had committed an offence, and it was the duty of those who witnessed it to try by all reasonable means in their power that it should be inquired into and punished. "Duty," in the proposed canon, cannot be confined to legal duties which may be enforced by indictment, action, or mandamus, but must include moral and social duties of imperfect obligation. One mode of proceeding for this offence would have been by applying to us for a criminal information, and seeking to have the offender punished by fine and imprisonment. But another, which though milder, may be more effectual, is to try by lawful and constitutional means to have the offender removed from his office, without calling down upon him the sentence of a criminal Court. In this land of law and liberty, all who are aggrieved may seek redress; and the alleged misconduct of any who are clothed with public authority may be brought to the notice of those who have the power and duty to inquire into it, and to take steps which may prevent the repetition of it. * * *

Rule absolute.

HEBDITCH v. MacILWAINE et al.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1894] 2 Q. B. 54.)

The action was for libel. The defendants pleaded a justification and privilege. It appeared that the plaintiff had been elected to the office of guardian of the poor of the parish of South Petherton. The defendants, who were rate payers of the parish and entitled to vote at the election, signed and sent to the board of guardians a letter complaining of certain irregularities which they alleged to have occurred at the election, and suggesting that the matter ought to be inquired into. * * * The plaintiff alleged that the effect of the letter was to impute that he himself had participated in the malpractices therein mentioned.

The judge left to the jury the following questions: 1. Whether the letter was libellous with regard to the plaintiff. 2. Whether the plea of justification was proved. 3. Whether the defendants honestly believed it to be their duty to make each and all of the communications contained in the letter to the board of guardians, and did so acting under a sense of that duty. 4. Whether the defendants honestly and reasonably believed that the board of guardians were the proper authority to whom to apply in respect of each and all of the matters mentioned in the letter. The judge reserved any question of actual malice until these questions had been answered. The jury found that the letter was libellous with regard to the plaintiff, and that the plea of justification was not proved. In answer to the third question they found that the defendants acted partly from a sense of duty, and partly not. In answer to the fourth question they found that the defendants did honestly and reasonably believe that the board of guardians were the proper authority to whom to apply. The judge, thinking the effect of these answers ambiguous, asked the jury the following further questions: 1. Whether the defendants wrote the first part of the letter under a sense of duty, and believing the board of guardians to be the proper authority to whom to apply. 2. A similar question with regard to the latter part of the letter. The jury answered the first of these questions in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

The judge thereupon held that the occasion was not wholly privileged, and, therefore the plaintiff was entitled to damages, the amount of which he asked the jury to assess. The jury assessed the damages at £10, for which sum the judge gave the plaintiff judgment.

J. Alderson Foote, for the defendants. The defendants as rate payers had an interest in the matter to which the letter related. It may be admitted that the board of guardians could take no action in the matter brought before them by the defendants. They could not avoid the plaintiff's election. That could only be done by a petition under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, part IV. * * * It is contended however, that, where a person who has a grievance makes a complaint in respect thereof to a person or body, whose duty he honestly and reasonably believes it to be to inquire into and redress such grievance, the occasion is privileged. * * *

LORD ESHER, M. R.[19] * * * It must be borne in mind that the material part of the cause of action in libel is not the writing, but the publication of the libel. It was proved that the defendants had written and published to the board of guardians matter which the jury found libellous with regard to the plaintiff, and which was untrue. The defendants set up by way of defence that the occasion was privileged. It is for the defendant to prove that the occasion was privileged. If the defendant does so, the burden of shewing actual malice is cast upon the plaintiff, but, unless the defendant does so, the plaintiff is not called upon to prove actual malice. The question whether the occasion is privileged if the facts are not in dispute, is a question of law only, for the judge, not for the jury. If there are questions of fact in dispute upon which this question depends, they must be left to the jury, but, when the jury have found the facts, it is for the judge to say whether they constitute a privileged occasion.

What are the facts upon which the question whether the occasion was privileged, depends in the present case? There had been an election to the office of guardian of the poor, and the paintiff had been elected. The defendants were rate payers who had a right to vote at the election. After the election they wrote and sent the letter containing the matter complained of to the board of guardians. It seems clear that, when that board had received the letter, they could do nothing in the matter. They could not set aside the election. Such being the facts of the case, what was the judge called upon to consider in dealing with the question whether the occasion was privileged? He had first to consider whether the defendants, who published the defamatory matter, had any interest or duty in connection with the subject which they thus brought before the board of guardians. I am not prepared to say that they had not an interest or duty. On the contrary I am inclined to think that they had an interest in the matter. They were electors and had an interest in having the office filled by a person properly elected. Then the position of the board of guardians, to whom the defamatory matter was published, had to be considered. They had no interest in the matter, as it seems to me, and, as I have already said, they had no duty or power to take any action upon the communication made to them. Under these circumstances I think it clear that the occasion was not privileged.

It was argued that, although the board of guardians had no power or duty or interest in the matter, nevertheless the occasion was privileged, because the defendants honestly and reasonably believed that the board had such a duty or power or interest, and were asking them for redress in the matter which they believed they could give. Assuming that the defendants had such a belief, though I confess I cannot see how there could be any reason in such a belief, the argument in substance seems to come to this: that the belief of the defendants that the occasion was privileged makes it privileged. I cannot accept the proposition so put forward. I cannot see how the belief of the defendants who have made a mistake, and have published a libel to persons who have no interest or duty or power in the matter, can affect the question. The belief of the defendants might have a bearing on the question of malice; if it be assumed that the occasion was privileged, the belief of the defendants might be strong to shew that the communication was privileged, as being made without malice, but I do not think it has anything to do with the question whether the occasion was privileged.[20] * * *

Application [by defendant for judgment or a new trial] dismissed.

TODD v. HAWKINS.

(Northern Spring Circuit, York Assizes, 1837. 8 Car. & P. 88, 56 R. R. 834.)

Libel. Plea, not guilty. It appeared that the plaintiff was a share-broker, and that the plaintiff and the defendant had also been in partnership in the tea trade, but that they had dissolved their partnership in the year 1835. It further appeared that the wife of the defendant was the daughter of the late Dr. Taft, a Wesleyan minister, and that in the year 1836 the plaintiff was paying his addresses to Mrs. Taft, the mother of the defendant's wife. These facts were proved by Mrs. Taft, who also stated, that in the month of July, 1836, she received a letter, which was the subject of the present action, from [20] Lord Esher here considered the question on authority, found only one case which "really seems to me to be a strong authority in favour of the defendant's contention," Thompson v. Dashwood (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 43, and as to it remarked: "The only way to deal with that case, in my opinion, is to say that we do not agree with it." In his concurring opinion Davey, L. J., remarked: "I desire to say that I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that Tompson v. Dashwood cannot be supported."

The facts in Tompson v. Dashwood (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 43, were as follows: The plaintiff was the managing director, with a salary, of a manufacturing company. The defendant was a director in the same company. The plaintiff and the defendant being about to go to the continent at the expense of the company, the defendant wrote to the chairman of the company, Colonel Wood, a letter suggesting that the secretary's cash book be looked into, to see what sums the plaintiff had charged against the company for travelling expenses, and intimating that they were excessive. At the same time, the defendant wrote another letter, about a different matter, to the secretary of the company, who was the plaintiff's brother. By mistake the defendant put each letter into the envelope intended for the other, so that the letter intended for the chairman went to the secretary, who handed it to his brother. On these facts, it was held in the Queen's Bench Division that the publication was privileged. "It is admitted," said Watkin Williams, J., "that the defendant stood in such a relation to Colonel Wood that in writing to him the legal implication of malice was technically rebutted, and the defendant, in the absence of malice in fact, was protected by privilege; but it is contended for the plaintiff that, the defendant having carelessly put the letter into the wrong envelope, so that it reached the hands of a person with whom he had no such relation, the protection of privilege is destroyed, and the case put into the condition in which the law implies malice. I think there is a fallacy in that contention. The defendant's state of mind was never altered. His intention was always honestly to do that which he conceived to be his duty. I can see nothing to justify the conclusion as a matter of law, that by reason of the defendant's inadvertence the case is taken out of the category of privilege, so that malice should be implied."

the defendant, and that she gave it to the plaintiff, who returned it after a copy had been made of it, and that the original letter was then burnt. In her cross-examination Mrs. Taft said, the defendant would receive an accession of property on her second marriage, or when his youngest child comes of age, which would be about seven years hence, so that property would the sooner come into the possession of the defendant, in right of his wife, by Mrs. Taft's second marriage.

The letter was to the following effect:

"Dear Ma. I feel very severely the coldness and constraint which compels me to communicate my sentiments to you through the medium of a letter, but the misery to yourself and the evil consequences to your family, which must inevitably ensue from the step I fear you are about to take, impel me to waive every private consideration and to do my duty to you honestly, and, I hope you will feel, respectfully, as I am quite sure you would to me under an exchange of circumstances; but whilst in the following remarks I express my own private sentiments, I am anxious you should believe me they also contain the opinion (for there is but one) of all our friends without any exception. * * * Now, I am quite sure from all that I have ever seen and known of your character that wilfully to do so with your eyes open would be utterly abhorent to you, and that it can only be accounted for by your being the victim to the plausible artifice of a wicked and artful man, and I most earnestly wish you to investigate thoroughly his character, for I honestly assure you, and I speak it as free from personal prejudice as I am able, and with the fear of a lie in my heart, that his character in York amongst those who best know him is that of an unprincipled trickster. To make money, by no matter what means, appears to be his principal object, as he is constantly descending in transactions of that nature to the meanest artifice and juggle, which an honest-minded man would rather die than be guilty of. * * * Mamma, examine well into your motives, search deeply your own heart. Is the love of money or anxiety after worldly appearance there? Are you sacrificing to Mammon, and making your children pass through the fire to Moloch? The spoils of the widow and fatherless are in his treasure, the moth and rust will corrupt them, and his money will perish in the using. Do let me press upon you the conduct which, as a prudent person you ought, and as a professor of Christ you dare not but do. I mean, earnest and agonizing prayer for that guidance and direction of the spirit of God which is promised for these special occasions, by thoroughly examining your motives, and weighing well the consequences of such a step; and then, by diligent and extensive inquiry from parties most likely to give you honest and necessary information as to his character, and fitness for increasing and adding to the comfort and establishment of those interests which it is your duty, and I have no doubt your intention to protect—I say, if after having pursued this course you think him a man to whom you can fearlessly surrender your charge, I can only say that no one will more rejoice than myself if the issue be happy. But so contrary is my conviction of the result, that my earnest and daily prayer to God is, that he who has promised to be a husband to the widow, to be her counsellor and guide, and has declared that he will deal kindly with the relicts of his saints, will deliver you from this fatal snare, which has already had an unfavourable effect upon your character in the opinions of respectable and intelligent people both in and without the pale of the Christian church, and will eventually ruin your peace. I pray God bestow upon you every necessary good, and so direct your way that you may keep his testimonies.

"Yours very affectionately, W. Hawkins."

ALDERSON, B.[21] (in summing up). * * * Here is a widow about to contract marriage with the plaintiff; the defendant is her son in law;

I think, therefore, that he was justified in writing this letter to her, provided you are satisfied that in doing so he acted bona fide, although the imputations contained in the letter be false, or based upon the most erroneous information. There is no doubt, that unless this letter was justified by the occasion, it is a libel, and had Mrs. Taft and the defendant been strangers to each other this would have been a mere question of damages. However, in this case, although the letter be derogatory to the plaintiff's character, and written in stronger language than a prudent man would use, you must consider whether it was written sincerely, and with a desire to benefit the person to whom it was addressed. The letter professes to be so, and you must decide whether that profession is made bona fide. The request that this lady would make diligent and extensive inquiry into the character of Mr. Todd was extremely good advice, and so is the exhortation to her to apply herself to prayer. It may not be judicious on trifling or light occasions to make reference to sacred things; but on an important occasion like that which calls forth this letter, no better advice could be given. The question you have to try is, not whether Mr. Todd was guilty of the charges laid against him, but whether, although the defendant may have acted rashly, he wrote the letter bona fide. So far as pecuniary interests are concerned, it would be to the advantage of the defendant that this lady should marry, and that tends to show bona fides, as men do not in general act maliciously and at the same time against their own interests. The whole of the circumstances are before you, and the occasion is one which prima facie justifies the letter. If, however, the defendant has availed himself of the occasion for malicious purposes, he must answer for what he has done. If, on the other hand, he has used expressions, however harsh, hasty, or untrue, yet bona fide, and believing them to be true, he was justified in so doing. It is for the good of all that communications of this kind should be viewed liberally by juries; and unless you see clearly that this letter was written with a malicious intention of defaming the plaintiff, your verdict ought to be for the defendant.[22]

Verdict for the defendant.

ALDERSON, B. I hope it will be understood that this verdict is founded on the fact that this letter was a confidential communication.

The Foreman of the Jury: My Lord, that is so.

"THE COUNT JOANNES" v. BENNETT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1862. 5 Allen, 169, 81 Am. Dec. 738.)

Tort brought in the name of "The Count Joannes (born 'George Jones')" for two libels upon him contained in letters to a woman to whom he was then a suitor, and was afterwards married, endeavoring to dissuade her from entering into the marriage.

At the trial it appeared that the defendant had for several years held the relation of pastor to the parents of the woman, as members of his church, and to the daughter, as a member of his choir; and there was evidence tending to shew that he was on the most intimate terms of friendship with the parents, and that, being on a visit from his present residence in Lockport, New York, he called upon the father at his place of business in Boston, and was urged by him to accompany him to his residence in South Boston, the father stating that both he and his wife were in great distress of mind and anxiety about their daughter, and that they feared she would engage herself in marriage to the plaintiff. On their way to South Boston, the father stated to the defendant what he and his wife had heard and apprehended about the plaintiff, and their views with regard to his being a suitable match for their daughter, who, with a young child by a former husband, was living with them. On reaching the house it was found that the daughter had gone out; and it was then arranged that the defendant should write a letter, and materials for that purpose were furnished and the letter set forth in the first count was written, addressed to the daughter, and left open and unsealed with the mother, after the principal portion of it had been read aloud at the tea-table in the presence of the parents and a confidential friend of the family. On leaving, the defendant was further requested to do what he thought best to induce the daughter to break up the match. * * *

The judge ruled that neither of the letters was a privileged communication; and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff. The defendant alleged exceptions.

BIGELOW, C. J. The doctrine that the cause or occasion of the publication of defamatory matter may afford a sufficient justification in an action for damages, has been stated in the form of a legal rule or canon, which has been sanctioned by high judicial authority. The statement is this: A communication made bona fide upon any subject matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty to perform, is privileged, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contains defamatory matter, which without such privilege would be libellous and actionable. It would be difficult to state the result of judicial decisions on this subject, and of the principles on which they rest, in a more concise, accurate and intelligible form. Harrison v. Bush [1855], 5 El. & Bl. 344, 348; Gassett v. Gilbert [1856], 6 Gray, 94, and cases cited.

It seems to us very clear that the defendant in the present case fails to show any facts or circumstances in his own relation to the parties, or in the motives or inducements by which he was led to write the letter set out in the first count of the declaration, which bring the publication within the first branch of this rule. He certainly had no interest of his own to serve or protect in making a communication concerning the character, occupation and conduct of the plaintiff, containing defamatory or libellous matter. It does not appear that the proposed marriage which the letter written by the defendant was intended to discountenance and prevent, could in any way interfere with or disturb his personal or social relations. It did not even involve any sacrifice of his feelings or injury to his affections. The person to whom the letter was addressed was not connected with him by the ties of consanguinity or kindred. It is not shewn that he had any peculiar interest in her welfare. Under such circumstances, without indicating the state of facts which might afford a justification for the use of defamatory words, it is plain that the defendant held no such relation towards the parties as to give him any interest in the subject matter to which his communication concerning the plaintiff related. Todd v. Hawkins, 2 M. & Rob. 20; s. c., 8 C. & P. 88. No doubt, he acted from laudable motives in writing it. But these do not of themselves afford a legal justification for holding up the character of a person to contempt and ridicule. Good intentions do not furnish a valid excuse for violating another's rights, or give impunity to those who cast unjust imputations on private character.

It is equally clear that the defendant did not write and publish the alleged libellous communications in the exercise of any legal or moral duty. He stood in no such relation towards the parties as to confer on him a right or impose on him an obligation to write a letter containing calumnious statements concerning the plaintiff's character. Whatever may be the rule which would have been applicable under similiar circumstances while he retained his relation of religious teacher and pastor towards the person to whom this letter in question was addressed, and towards her parents, he certainly had no duty resting upon him after that relation had terminated. He then stood in no other attitude towards the parties than as a friend. His duty to render them a service was no greater or more obligatory than was his duty to refrain from uttering and publishing slanderous or libellous statements concerning another.[23]

It is obvious that if such communications could be protected merely on the ground that the party making them held friendly relations to those to whom they were written or spoken, a wide door would be left open by which indiscriminate aspersion of private character could escape with impunity. Indeed it would rarely be difficult for a party to shelter himself from the consequences of uttering or publishing a slander or libel under a privilege which could be readily made to embrace almost every species of communication. The law does not tolerate any such license of speech or pen. The duty of avoiding the use of defamatory words cannot be set aside except when it is essential to the protection of some substantial private interest, or to the discharge of some other paramount and urgent duty. It seems to us, therefore, that on the question of justification set up by the defendant under a supposed privilege which authorized him to write the letter set out in the first count, the instructions of the court were correct. * * *[24]

[23] "The letter does not appear to have been written in answer to any previous inquiry, but to have been voluntarily written. And it has been said that, where the matter is not of great or immediate importance, interference may be considered officious and meddlesome, although, if the party had been applied to, it would clearly have been his duty to give all the information he could; and an answer to a confidential inquiry may be privileged, where the same information, if volunteered, would be actionable. * * * As has been well said, 'Although the defendant may feel sure that if he were in his neighbor's place, he should be most grateful for the information conveyed, still he must recollect that it may eventually turn out that in endeavoring to avert a fancied injury to that neighbor, he has really inflicted an undoubted and undeserved injury on the plaintiff.'" Per Robinson, J., in Samples v. Carnahan (1898) 21 Ind. App. 55, 58, 51 N. E. 425, 426, quoting from Odgers, Libel & Slander (2d Ed.) 216.

Compare: Byam v. Collins (1888) 111 N. Y. 143, 19 N. E. 75, 2 L. R. A. 129, 7 Am. St. Rep. 726: (P. was paying attention to Dora with a view to matrimony. D. voluntarily wrote Dora a letter making defamatory charges against P. Until three months before, D. and Dora had long been very intimate friends, then they became somewhat estranged and their intimacy ceased. About four years before this letter, and when they were still close friends, Dora often requested D., "if she knew anything about any young man she went with, or in fact any young man in the place, to tell her." Dora was not then contemplating marriage with any young man, and did not know P. The letter, referring to this former friendship and the writer's continuing affection for Dora, declared: "I have decided to hold my peace no longer, feeling that if I do and your life is wrecked (as it is sure to be if you marry or have further acquaintance with that man) I shall in some way be responsible for it, inasmuch as I neglect to do my duty."

[24] The statement of facts is abridged and part of the opinion, dealing with a second count, is omitted. For error in the admission of evidence relating to the second count, a new trial was granted.

WALLER v. LOCH.

(In the Court of Appeal, 1881. 7 Q. B. Div. 619.)

Action for libel. At the trial before Grove, J., it appeared that the defendant was the Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society, one of the objects of which as stated in its circulars to be "the improvement of the condition of the poor by securing due investigation and fitting action in all cases and by repressing mendicity." The society consisted of a federation of local district committees, and by one of its circulars it is stated that the inhabitants of each district, whether subscribers or not, are invited to refer to the committee all cases of applicants for charitable relief which require investigation. "If requested so to do it communicates the result of such investigation to the person desiring inquiry, and should he wish to undertake the case leaves it in his hands. In the absence of such wish the committee deals with each case to the best of its judgment and ability."

The plaintiff was the daughter of a deceased officer in the army and was in distressed circumstances. A lady interested herself in obtaining subscriptions to make some provision for her, and obtained promises of contributions to a considerable amount. Another lady who was interested in the case applied to the society for information. The society communicated to her an unfavourable report on the case, which by their permission she communicated to the other lady. In consequence of this report the plaintiff lost the benefit of the subscriptions. She therefore commenced this action against the defendant, the secretary of the society.

The learned judge held the communication privileged, and left to the jury the question whether there was express malice. The jury found for the defendant. A rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection and that the verdict was against the evidence was refused by the Divisional Court. The plaintiff appealed.

BRETT, L. J. The jury having found that there was no express malice, a finding, the correctness of which I see no reason to doubt, then, if the communication was privileged it is immaterial whether the justification that the alleged libel was true can be supported or not. I agree that the communications were privileged. I think that the definition by Blackburn, J., in Davies v. Snead, Law Rep. 5 Q. B. 608, 611, is the best, it leaves out all misleading words, saying nothing about "duty," and states in plain terms what I conceive to be the true rule.[25] Then do the facts of this case bring it within the rule? It seems to me that they do, if the defendant reasonably believed that the question was asked in order to enable the questioner to decide whether relief should be given or should be continued to be given. It is not material whether the information was really wanted for that purpose or not, it is enough if the defendant reasonably supposed the questioner to be asking it for that purpose. He could not reasonably suppose that the question was asked for any other purpose, and that being so, I think it was right and for the benefit of society that he should answer it. If a person who is thinking of dealing with another in any matter of business asks a question about his character from some one who has means of knowledge, it is for the interests of society that the question should be answered, and if answered bona fide and without malice, the answer is a privileged communication.

[25] The "definition by Blackburn, J., in Davis v. Snead" (1870) L. R. 5 Q. B. 608, 611, as quoted in the concurring opinion of Jessel, M. R., was as follows: "Where a person is so situated that it becomes right in the interests of society that he should tell to a third person certain facts; then if he, bona fide and without malice, does tell them, it is a privileged communication."

See the approval of this by Andrews, J., in Moore v. Bank (1890) 123 N.

Judgment for the defendant.

FLANAGAN v. McLANE.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1913. 87 Conn. 220, 87 Atl. 727.)

Action for libel and slander. Verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals from the denial of his motion to set aside the verdict as against the evidence.

BEACH, J. The complaint contains three separate counts in libel and one in slander. The plaintiff and his helper worked in and about the house of the defendant's husband for some weeks. During this time a sum of money was missed which afterwards reappeared. While the money was missing the defendant wrote the letter set forth in the first count to one Sturtze, a constable of the town of Hamden, informing him of the loss and of her belief that the plaintiff had taken it. She had already written a similar letter, set forth in the fourth count, to the mother of the plaintiff's helper. After the money reappeared the defendant again wrote to Sturtze the letter which is the basis of the second count, saying in effect that the money had been found in a place where she had never put it and that she would do no more about the matter, but was satisfied that the plaintiff had taken it and brought it back again when he found that he was suspected. The third count of the complaint is in slander. The defendant's answer denied the allegations of the third count, admitted the authorship of the letters, and pleaded privilege and want of malice as to each. * * *

The law implies malice from a libelous publication, except in certain cases of privilege, one of which is "when the author and publisher of the alleged slander acted in the bona fide discharge of a public or private duty or in the prosecution of his own right or interest." * * *

We think that the letter set forth in the second count, although written after the money was found, must be dealt with as a part of the whole correspondence between the defendant and the officer. It is not very seriously disputed that the first letter to Sturtze, written before the money was found, is, on the facts pleaded, a privileged communication. Sturtze was a constable, and the defendant appealed to him to investigate her loss with a view to get "evidence and threaten them with arrest." She was concerned more with using the law in terrorem than with the punishment of the supposed thief. Then when the money was found she again writes the officer telling him that it is found, but in a place where she never put it; that she will do no more about the matter; and that she is still satisfied that the plaintiff took it and brought it back again. Clearly this second letter would never have been written except for the first. The defendant was in a way bound to let the officer know that the money had been found, and if she said no more her letter would be taken as an admission that her former suspicions were mistaken. We think, under these circumstances, that the defendant in writing to an officer already engaged in investigating the loss was legally entitled, if acting honestly and without malice, to reaffirm her belief in the plaintiff's guilt for the guidance of the officer in case it was or might become his duty to pursue the investigation with a view to criminal proceedings. There is no error.[26]

(Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. [1908] App. Cas. 390.)

This is an appeal from a decision of the High Court of Australia, pronounced on cross-appeals from the orders of the Full Court of New South Wales. The action was for libel. It was tried before Cohen, J., and a jury. The question was whether the occasion of the publication of the two libels, which were of and concerning the appellants in relation to their business, was privileged. They were contained in two reports in writing, published to a firm of Holdsworth, Macpherson & Co.

The case for the appellants was that the libels consisted partly of the repetition of alleged rumours and partly of defamatory statements put forward as being within the respondent's own knowledge, and the general purport and effect of them was that the appellants were persons with whom it was not wise to do business in the ordinary way, or upon the ordinary terms of credit; that they had concealed an important change in the constitution of their firm in order to give their business a fictitious appearance of financial stability; that the appellant James Mackintosh was commonly and correctly reported to be living beyond his means, and to possess habits and tastes which were likely to bring the appellants and their business rapidly into a state of insolvency; that the business was grossly mismanaged; and that the appellants were persons without personal resources or assets, except book-debts and a stock that was greatly depreciated, and were heavily in debt and unable to meet their current business liabilities and engagements, which included a heavy overdraft on their account with their bankers, and were struggling with severe financial difficulties which would probably end in disaster.

At the close of the appellants' case before Cohen, J., it was submitted that the appellants should be nonsuited on the ground that the occasion of the publication by the respondents to Holdsworth, Macpherson & Co. of the two reports was privileged and that there was no evidence of express malice to go to the jury. The respondents did not deny the fact of publication, nor that the two reports contained defamatory matter of and concerning the appellants in relation to their business. The trial judge ruled that the occasion was not privileged and so directed the jury. But with a view to a possible appeal against his ruling on the question of privilege the learned judge left to the jury two questions on the subject of malice:

1. Did the defendants in distributing the reports act from a sense of duty or from some indirect or improper motive?
2. Did the defendants distribute the reports recklessly, not caring whether they were true or false?

In reply the jury found that the respondents acted from a sense of duty to their own subscribers, and that they exercised care as far as possible. The plaintiffs obtained a verdict for £800.

The trial judge held that the plea of privilege was bad. The Full Court ruled that the occasion was privileged, and directed a new trial. The High Court held that the occasion was privileged and that judgment should be entered for the respondents. Thereupon an appeal by special leave, limited to the question of privilege, was obtained to the Privy Council.[27]

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

LORD MACNAGHTEN. * * * The question, and the only question on the present appeal, is whether the occasion on which the libels were published was or was not a privileged occasion.

The plaintiffs are wholesale and retail ironmongers in Sydney. The defendants (as their acting manager in Sydney stated in an affidavit filed in the action) carry on the business of a trade protective society "in almost all parts of the civilized world" under the name of "The Mercantile Agency." That business, as the acting manager explained, "consists in obtaining information with reference to the commercial standing and position of persons" in the state of New South Wales "and elsewhere and in communicating such information confidentially to subscribers to the agency in response to specific and confidential inquiry on their part." He stated further that all requests for information directed to the agency by their subscribers are in the following form:

"Subscriber's Ticket.

"The Mercantile Agency. R. G. Dun and Co.

"Subscribers to sign the above themselves.

"Subscriber."

The law with regard to the publication of information injurious to the character of another is well settled. The difficulty lies in applying the law to the circumstances of the particular case under consideration. In Toogood v. Spyring,[28] Parke, B., delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, says: "The law considers such publication as malicious, unless it is fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs in matters where his interest is concerned. In such cases the occasion prevents the inference of malice, which the law draws from unauthorized communications, and affords a qualified defence depending on the absence of actual malice. If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society, and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits."

That passage, which, as Lindley, L. J., observes,[29] is frequently cited, and "always with approval," not only defines the occasion which protects a communication otherwise actionable, but enunciates the principle on which the protection is founded. The underlying principle is "the common convenience and welfare of society"—not the convenience of individuals or the convenience of a class, but, to use the words of Erle, C. J., in Whiteley v. Adams,[30] "the general interest of society."

Communications injurious to the character of another may be made in answer to inquiry or may be volunteered. If the communication be made in the legitimate defence of a person's own interest, or plainly under a sense of duty such as would be "recognized by English people of ordinary intelligence and moral principle," [31] to borrow again the language of Lindley, L. J., it cannot matter whether it is volunteered or brought out in answer to an inquiry. But in cases which are near the line, and in cases which may give rise to a difference of opinion, the circumstance that the information is volunteered is an element for consideration certainly not without some importance.

In deference, therefore, to the views of the learned judges of the High Court, the first question would seem to be, under which category does the communication now in question properly fall? No doubt there was a specific request. In response to that request the communication was made. That much is clear. But it is equally clear that the defendants set themselves in motion and formulated and invited the request in answer to which the information complained of was produced. The defendants, in fact, hold themselves out as collectors of information about other people which they are ready to sell to their customers. It cannot matter whether the customer deals across the counter, so to speak, just as and when the occasion arises, or whether he enjoys the privilege of being enrolled as a subscriber and pays the fee in advance.

If, then, the proprietors of the Mercantile Agency are to be regarded as volunteers in supplying the information which they profess to have at their disposal, what is their motive? Is it a sense of duty? Certainly not. It is a matter of business with them. Their motive is self-interest. They carry on their trade, just as other traders do, in the hope and expectation of making a profit.

Then comes the real question: Is it in the interest of the community, is it for the welfare of society, that the protection which the law throws around communications made in legitimate self-defense, or from a bona fide sense of duty, should be extended to communications made from motives of self-interest by persons who trade for profit in the characters of other people? The trade is a peculiar one; still there seems to be much competition in it; and in this trade as in most others, success will attend the exertions of those who give the best value for money and probe most thoroughly the matter placed in their hands. There is no reason to suppose that the defendants generally have acted otherwise than cautiously and discreetly. But information such as that which they offer for sale may be obtained in many ways, not all of them deserving of commendation. It may be extorted from the person whose character is in question, through fear of misrepresentation or misconstruction if he remains silent. It may be gathered from gossip. It may be picked up from discharged servants. It may be betrayed by disloyal employees. It is only right that those who engage in such a business, touching so closely very dangerous ground, should take the consequences if they overstep the law.[32]

[32] Accord: Pacific Packing Co. v. Bradstreet Co. (1914) 25 Idaho, 696, 139 Pac. 1007, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 893, where this passage is quoted as giving whole-

It may not be out of place to recall the striking language of Knight Bruce, V. C.,[33] in reference to a somewhat similar subject. The question before him was the propriety of enforcing disclosure of communications between a client and his legal advisers. "The discovery and vindication and establishment of truth," his Honour says, "are main purposes certainly of the existence of Courts of justice; still, for the obtaining of these objects, which, however valuable and important, cannot be usefully pursued without moderation, cannot be either usefully or creditably pursued unfairly or gained by unfair means, not every channel is or ought to be open to them. * * * Truth, like all other good things, may be loved unwisely—may be pursued too keenly —may cost too much." And then he points out that the meanness and the mischief of prying into things which are regarded as confidential, with all the attending consequences, are "too great a price to pay for truth itself."

It seems to their Lordships, following out this train of thought, that, however convenient it may be to a trader to know all the secrets of his neighbour's position, his "standing," his "responsibility," and whatever else may be comprehended under the expression "et cetera," yet, even so, accuracy of information may be bought too dearly—at least for the good of society in general.

It is admitted that in this country there is no authority directly in point. There are direct authorities in the United States in favour of the conclusion at which the High Court has arrived. American authorities are, no doubt, entitled to the highest respect. But this is a question that must be decided by English law. In the dearth of English authority it seems to their Lordships that recourse must be had to the principle on which the law in England on this subject is founded. With the utmost deference to the learned judges of the High Court, their Lordships are of opinion that the decision under appeal is not in accordance with that principle.[34]

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the orders appealed from should be discharged and the judgments of the Full Court reversed, with costs in both Courts, including the costs of some doctrine applicable to the case at bar. The question in the Idaho case arose on demurrer to a complaint which is set forth at length and held sufficient.

(3) Communication in Protection of a Private Interest

McDOUGALL v. CLARIDGE.

(At Nisi Prius, Adjourned Sittings in London, 1808. 1 Camp. 267.)

This was an action for a libel on the plaintiff in his profession as a solicitor. Plea, the general issue.

The libel set out in the declaration was contained in a letter written by the defendant to Messrs. Wright and Co., bankers at Nottingham, and charged the plaintiff with improper conduct in the management of their concerns. It appeared, however, that the letter was intended as a confidential communication to these gentlemen, and that the defendant was himself interested in the affairs which he supposed to be mismanaged by the plaintiff. After the case had been opened by the plaintiff's counsel,—

LORD ELLENBOROUGH [35] said, if the letter had been written by the defendant confidentially, and under an impression that its statements were well founded, he was clearly of opinion that the action could not be maintained. It was impossible to say that the defendant had maliciously published a libel to aggrieve the plaintiff, if he was acting bona fide, with a view to the interests of himself and the persons whom he addressed; and if a communication of this sort, which was not meant to go beyond those immediately interested in it,[36] were the subject of an action for damages, it would be impossible for the affairs of mankind to be conducted. * * *

The Attorney General, for the defendant, said that his client at the time of writing the letter was certainly impressed with a belief of the truth of the charges it contained, but had since seen reason to believe they were groundless. He therefore consented to withdraw a juror.

[35] Part of the opinion is omitted.

[36] In Pearson v. Lemaitre (1843) 5 Man. & G. 700, 710, counsel in argument quoted a remark by Holroyd, J., in Fairman v. Ives (1822) 5 B. & A. 642: "In the case of a confidential communication made between friends, to prevent an injury, and not for the purpose of slandering, the occasion justifies the act." Thereupon Cresswell, J., made this comment: "That must mean a communication to some friend upon some subject in which he is interested." And see Lord Esher's comment in Hebditch v. MacIlwaine (1894) 2 Q. B. 54, 61.

COOK v. GUST.

This was an action for slander, by Cook against Gust. It was charged in the complaint that the defendant stated to one Lewer and his wife and son that plaintiff set fire to a certain cheese factory and burned it. The answer set forth facts tending to show that any communications made by defendant to Lewer were privileged. After the factory burned, the farmers in the vicinity decided to erect a new one, and some meetings were had between the proposed stockholders to make the necessary arrangements. At these meetings the advisability of not taking in the plaintiff was discussed, and he was left out apparently because he had caused considerable trouble while he was a member of the old company, and because there was a strong suspicion that he had burned the old factory because of such trouble. Lewer was a newcomer, and it was the purpose of the promoters of the new scheme to interest him in it.

The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the alleged slanderous words were spoken to Lewer at or near his house, and that the latter then called his wife and 14 year old son to the place where he and defendant were talking and requested the defendant to repeat the statement in their presence, which he did. There was no evidence tending to show malice. The jury returned a general verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

BARNES, J.[37] * * * 3. The principal contention of the appellant is that the following instruction given to the jury was erroneous and prejudicial:

"If you find that Mr. Gust spoke to Mr. Lewer on April 8, 1908, concerning Mr. Cook, and that such words were spoken to him as one who was interested in this factory under such circumstances that they would be privileged under the rules just given you, then the fact, if such be the fact, that Mrs. Lewer and her son heard what Mr. Gust said does not, standing alone, take the case out of the privilege, if you find that their presence could not have been avoided by Mr. Gust, or if you find that they happened to be present in the usual course of the business affairs in which Mrs. Lewer and her son were then engaged."

It is not claimed that the alleged statement made to Lewer was not qualifiedly privileged as to him under the circumstances under which it was made, but it is urged that it was not so privileged as to the wife and son. The portion of the instruction which advised the jury that they might find the communication privileged if satisfied that the presence of Mrs. Lewer and the son "could not have been avoided" should not have been given, because there was no evidence which warranted its submission. It is perfectly obvious to any one that their presence could have been avoided. That fact must have been apparent to the jury, and it is altogether improbable that they found for the defendant because of this part of the instruction, when there were other legitimate grounds on which the conclusions reached might be arrived at. The error committed in giving this part of the charge was not prejudicial under section 3072m, Stats.

The only other portion of the charge complained of is that by which the jury were informed that they might find the communication privileged if the wife and boy were "present in the usual course of the business affairs" in which they were then engaged. At the time of the alleged conversation Lewer had been invited to become a stockholder in the new corporation and was considering the matter. It was planned to leave Cook out, and, if not actuated by malice, the defendant might state the reasons which led him to believe that Cook should be left out. It is probably a very general custom for farmers to consult their wives and members of their family when they are about to engage in a new business enterprise of some importance. Where this practice is pursued, such communication as was here made is privileged as to the other members of the family as well as the husband, assuming that it is made in good faith and not from malicious motives.

What the court did in substance in the instant case was to permit the jurors to decide whether or not it was a matter of common knowledge that farmers counseled and advised with their wives in reference to business transactions of this nature.[38] Had the court so instructed

(At Nisi Prius, Sittings after Term at Westminster, 1803. 4 Esp. 191.)

This was an action on the case, for a libel. Plea of Not Guilty. The declaration stated that the defendant, who then carried on the business of a stationer, intending to charge the plaintiff with the crime of bigamy, and to bring him into danger of legal punishment, published the false and malicious libel following; that is to say,

"Ten Guineas Reward: Whereas, by a letter lately received from the West Indies, an event is stated to be announced by a newspaper, that can only be investigated by these means: This is to request, that if any printer, or other person, can ascertain that James Delany, Esq. [the plaintiff], some years since residing at Cork, late Lieutenant in the North Lincoln Militia, was married previous to nine o'clock in the morning of the 10th of August, 1799, they will give notice to ——— Jones [the defendant], No. 14, Duke Street, St. James's, and they shall receive the reward."

There was an innuendo that the defendant meant thereby to insinuate, and to be understood, that the said plaintiff had been, and was married before the time mentioned in the advertisement, and had another wife then living; he being then married to one Elizabeth Weston, his present wife.

The defence relied upon and given in evidence was that this advertisement had been inserted by the authority of the plaintiff's wife, for the purpose of making a discovery which was important for her to know, namely, Whether the plaintiff had another wife living? That beside this, from the terms of the advertisement, no direct slander was conveyed; without which there could be no libel. The advertisement might be to discover an heir, the legitimacy of a person, or for such like purpose; which would not be a libel.

It was answered by Erskine, of counsel for the plaintiff, That, to constitute a libel, it was not necessary that the libel should be apparent to all the world. If a man sends an advertisement to a newspaper so wrapped up, that, though not intelligible to the bulk of mankind, it is so to minds more intelligent, still it was a libel; and that the libellous tendency of this advertisement could not be mistaken.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in summing up to the jury, said, This paper is relied upon as necessarily carrying with it the imputation that the plaintiff was guilty of bigamy. You must be of opinion that it does carry such imputation, before you can find a verdict for the plain-forged checks on the bank. W.'s business relations with the bank had terminated before P.'s alleged forgeries had been discovered, nor were they now under investigation by the bank.)

tiff, as that meaning is necessary to make the paper a libel at all. The plaintiff's counsel contend, that you are to take into your consideration only, whether the advertisement conveys a libellous charge against the plaintiff or not? I am of a different opinion: I conceive the law to be, That though that which is spoken or written may be injurious to the character of the party, yet if done bona fide, as with a view of investigating a fact, in which the party making it is interested in it, is not libellous. If therefore this investigation was set on foot, and this advertisement published by the plaintiff's wife, either from anxiety to know, Whether she was legally the wife of the plaintiff or, Whether he had another wife living when he married her, though that is done through the medium of imputing bigamy to the plaintiff, it is justifiable; but in such a case, it is necessary for the defendant who publishes the libel, to shew that he published it under such authority, and with such a view. The jury are therefore first to say, Whether the advertisement imputes a charge of bigamy to the plaintiff; and if they think it does, then to enquire, Whether the libel was published with a view, by the wife, of fairly finding out a fact respecting her husband, in which she was materially interested. If it was so, the publication is not a libel; and the defendant is entitled to a verdict.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1851. 10 C. B. 583, 84 R. R. 709.)

This was an action upon the case for slander. The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant, in a certain discourse had of and concerning the plaintiff, in the presence and hearing of John Jones and Thomas Williams, the defendant's servants, and of divers other persons, falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff, the false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory words following, that is to say:

"I discharged that man for robbing me. He is a thief: and if ever you (meaning the said John Jones and Thomas Williams) speak to him again, or have anything to do with him, I shall consider you as bad as him, and shall discharge you."

* * * The defendant pleaded not guilty, and a justification on the ground that the plaintiff had, whilst in the defendant's employ, stolen certain articles the property of the defendant. Upon these pleas issue was joined.

The cause was tried before Wilde, C. J., at the sittings in London after Hilary Term, 1848. It appeared, that the plaintiff had been in the service of the defendant, and had been dismissed on a Thursday, in consequence of some articles being missed, which he was suspected of having stolen; and that, when he went to the defendant's shop on the following Saturday to receive the wages due to him, the defendant called Jones and Williams, the other two servants, into the counting house, and, speaking of the plaintiff, said to them—"I have dismissed that man for robbing me: do not speak to him any more, in public or private, or I shall think you as bad as him."

For the defendant, it was submitted that this was a privileged communication.

On the other hand it was insisted that the act complained of was perfectly gratuitous, not like a communication made to a confidential person, or a matter that the other servants had any interest in; and that it was a question for the jury, whether the statement was made under circumstances which indicated malice.

The Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that this was a privileged communication, and that there was no evidence of malice, and consequently that the defendant was entitled to a verdict on the first issue. He, however, offered to go on and try the issue on the justification. This the plaintiff declined. His Lordship thereupon directed a nonsuit to be entered.

The plaintiff obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.

E. James, in support of the rule.—The communication in question clearly was not privileged. A statement to the prejudice of a third person, to justify it, must be made in pursuance of some duty, legal or moral, or in answer to an inquiry bona fide made by some person having an interest in making it. [MAULE, J.—That is narrowing the rule too much: there are many cases in which volunteer statements have been held to be privileged, when made bonâ fide. The question here is, whether the statement was privileged, assuming the defendant to have acted bonâ fide and without malice.

MAULE, J. * * * We think that the case falls within the class of privileged communications, which is not so restricted as it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff. It comprehends all cases of communications made bona fide, in performance of a duty, or with a fair and reasonable purpose of protecting the interest of the party using the words. In this case, supposing the defendant himself to believe the charge,—a supposition always to be made when the question is whether the communication be privileged or not,—it was the duty of the defendant, and also his interest, to prevent his servants from associating with a person of such a character as the words imputed to the plaintiff; as such association might reasonably be apprehended to be likely to be followed by injurious consequences, both to the servants and to the defendant himself.

We think, therefore, the communication in question was privileged, i. e., it was made under circumstances which rebut the presumption of malice, which would otherwise arise from the nature of the words used. That presumption being rebutted, it was for the plaintiff to show affirmatively that the words were spoken maliciously; for, the question, being one the affirmative of which lies on the plaintiff, must, in the absence of evidence, be determined in favour of the defendant.

On considering the evidence in this case, we cannot see that the jury would have been justified in finding that the defendant acted maliciously. It is true that the facts proved are consistent with the presence of malice, as well as with its absence. But this is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to have the question of malice left to the jury; for, the existence of malice is consistent with the evidence in all cases except those in which something inconsistent with malice is shown in the evidence: so that, to say, that, in all cases where the evidence was consistent with malice, it ought to be left to the jury, would be in effect to say that the jury might find malice in any case in which it was not disproved,—which would be inconsistent with the admitted rule, that, in cases of privileged communication, malice must be proved, and therefore its absence must be presumed until such proof is given.

It is certainly not necessary, in order to enable a plaintiff to have the question of malice submitted to the jury, that the evidence should be such as necessarily leads to the conclusion that malice existed, or that it should be inconsistent with the non-existence of malice; but it is necessary that the evidence should raise a probability of malice, and be more consistent with its existence than with its non-existence.

In the present case, the evidence, as it appears to us, does not raise any probability of malice; and is quite as consistent with its absence as with its presence: and considering, as we have before observed, that the mere possibility of malice which is found in this case, and in all cases where it is not disproved, would not be sufficient to justify a jury in finding for the plaintiff, we think the Lord Chief Justice was right in not leaving the question to them, and consequently that this rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.[39]

(c) Other Excuses for Defamatory Charges Confessedly Untrue

McPHERSON v. DANIELS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1829. 10 Barn. & C. 263, 34 R. R. 397, 109 Reprint, 448.)

In an action for slander, for words imputing insolvency spoken of the plaintiff in his trade, the defendant pleaded that these same words, which he set out in his plea, had been spoken of the plaintiff and to the defendant by one T. W. Woor, of Swaffham, in the County of Norfolk, and that when he, the defendant, spoke and published the said words he also declared, in the hearing of those to whom the words were spoken, that he, the defendant, had heard and been told the same by the said T. W. Woor of Swaffham, in the county of Norfolk. General demurrer. The Court called on Platt, to support the plea: It is a sufficient justification to an action for slanderous words first spoken by a third person, for the defendant to shew that at the time he repeated them he mentioned the name of that person. In the fourth resolution of Lord Northampton's case, this is said: "In a private action for slander of a common person, if J. S. publish that he hath heard J. N. say that J. G. was a traitor or thief; in action of the case, if the truth be such, he may justify. But if J. S. publish that he hath heard generally, without a certain author, that J. G. was a traitor or thief, there an action sur le case lieth against J. S. for this, that he hath not given to the party grieved any cause of action against any, but against himself, who published the words, although that in truth he might hear them; for otherwise this might tend to great slander of an innocent."

Bayley, J. * * * Upon the great point, viz. whether it is a good defence to an action for slander, for a defendant to shew he heard it from another, and at the time named the author, I am of opinion that it is not. Lord Northampton's case was undoubtedly mentioned without disapprobation by Lord Kenyon, a man of a very powerful mind, acute discrimination, and great learning. But whatever respect I may feel for the memory of that noble and learned Judge, I cannot carry that respect so far as to surrender my own judgment. Look at the terms of the resolution and try it by the plain principles of reason and common sense.

"It was resolved, that if A. say to B., did you not hear that C. is guilty of treason, &c.? this is tantamount to a scandalous publication: and in a private action for slander of a common person, if J. S. publish that he hath heard J. N. say that J. G. was a traitor or a thief; in an action on the case, if the truth be such, he may justify."

Now, assuming that it is not there stated, as a qualified proposition, that a person may justify if he believes the slander to be true, and repeats it on a justifiable occasion; but as a general proposition, if he in truth heard the report, from another, and named that other at the time he uttered the slander, that that is in all cases a justification, I think that is a proposition which cannot be supported. At present I have very great doubts whether the repetition of slander is in any case lawful, unless the party believe it to be true. By repeating slander, a person, although he state at the time that he heard it from another, gives it a degree of credit; for the repetition of it, imports a degree of belief in the truth of the slander. If I hear another say that A. is a thief, and that B., though a person of bad character, told him so, I am induced to think, that the person who repeats it gives some credit to the statement. It seems to me, therefore, that a person cannot be justified in repeating slander, unless he believes it to be true. But that alone is not sufficient. I think it can only be repeated upon a justifiable occasion. Every publication of slanderous matter is prima facie a violation of the right which every individual has to his good name and reputation. The law, upon grounds of public policy and convenience, permits, under certain circumstances, the publication of slanderous matter, although it be injurious to another. But such act being prima facie wrongful, it lies upon the person charged with uttering slander, whether he were the first utterer or not, to shew that he uttered it upon some lawful occasion. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that a man cannot by law justify the repetition of slander by merely naming the person who first uttered it; he must also shew that he repeated it on a justifiable occasion, and believed it to be true.[40]

COOK v. WARD.

Libel. The declaration stated that, before the committing of the grievances by the defendant as thereinafter mentioned, one Corder, who had been tried and convicted of murder at Bury, was about to be hanged; it then alleged, with the customary innuendos, that the defendant, Ward, proprietor of the Colchester Gazette, had caused the [40] The statement of the pleadings is abridged. The concurring opinions of Littledale and Parke, JJ., and a part of the opinion of Bayley, J., are omitted. The three judges were at one also in regarding the latter part of the fourth resolution in Lord Northampton's Case (1613) 12 Co. Rep. 134, as not law.

In 1829, also, Best, C. J., in De Crespigny v. Wellesley, 5 Bing. 392, 401, declined to recognize the fourth resolution of Lord Northampton's Case as applying to libel. And see 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 664, note (n).

In America, the doctrine of Lord Northampton's Case has found an echo or two in slander suits. Tatlow v. Jaquett (1834) 1 Har. (Del.) 333, 26 Am. Dec. 399: ("Where a man hears a slander he may repeat it if he does so in the same words, and gives his author at the time.") Jarnigan v. Fleming (1870) 43 Miss. 710, 5 Am. Rep. 514. But the great weight of American authority, in actions for slander, is the other way. Haines v. Welling (1835), 7 Ohio, 253, 256, pt. 1: (approving McPherson v. Daniels as "consistent with policy, right, justice and common sense.") And see 25 Cyc. 364.

In America as in England the doctrine of Lord Northampton's Case appears to have had no support in libel cases. See the remarks of Kent, C. J., in Dole v. Lyon (1813) 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 447, 6 Am. Dec. 346; 25 Cyc. 363, note 77. The contrary, however, was urged, without causing any change in the doctrine, in Walling v. Commercial Advertiser (1915) 165 App. Div. 26, 150 N. Y. Supp. 906.

Compare Branstetter v. Dorrough (1882) 81 Ind. 527, 531: (D. retailed to S. a slanderous charge against P., "for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of S. whether D. should or should not inform P. of the charge against her.")

Tidman v. Ainslie (1854) 10 Ex. 63, 102 R. R. 478: (The plea, in an action for libel, alleged a repetition on stated authority and "that the defendant then believed all the statements made in the said letter, and particularly the said words of the said letter so published as aforesaid, to be true." To this the plaintiff demurred.)

following defamatory statement to be published of the plaintiff, Cook, in the Gazette:

"The following ludicrous occurrence took place at Bury shortly after the conclusion of the trial of Corder. A respectable deputy overseer, not two miles from the parish of St. Mary's in this town, like many other Gents, had the curiosity to hear Corder's trial. Accordingly, he went to Bury and got admission into court; and the trial being ended he adjourned to an inn (not of the highest class) to take some porter, amidst a dozen others, who were perhaps as risky as himself. His appearance, which we suppose must have been singular, struck the company that he must be a man 'out of the common way.' Accordingly, the question was whispered amongst them, who he could be: at length, after a deal of pro and con, it was decided that he could be no other personage than Jack Ketch. After a short pause, one of them emphatically said to him, 'Pray, Sir, aren't you the gemman that's come down to hang Corder?' Of course such a question was the means of his bidding them a respectful farewell.

The stupid elves mistook him by his look,
'Stead of the Jack, he proved to be the Cook.'"

* * * It appeared that before the publication in the newspaper the plaintiff had told the story of himself to a party of his acquaintances at a public-house in Colchester.

The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff, with £10 damages. A rule nisi was obtained on the defendant's motion.

TINDAL, C. J. * * * It is urged, however, that the plaintiff could have no claim to damages, because he had told the story of himself. If it could have been shown that he had authorized the publication of the story, the Court would have granted a new trial. But there is a great difference between a man's telling a ludicrous story of himself to a circle of his own acquaintance, and a publication of it to all the world through the medium of a newspaper. The rule must be discharged.

RICHARDSON v. GUNBY.

BENSON, J.[42] This is an action to recover damages for an alleged libel. Mr. Neal of Indianapolis, Ind., addressed a letter to the Altoona State Bank asking for information concerning the Altoona Portland Cement Company and its officers. The letter stated that the company was bidding for investors. Responding to this inquiry, the appellee, who was president of the bank, wrote a letter to Mr. Neal, in which it was stated that the cement company had been characterized as a paper concern by the state bank examiner; that none of its stock had been placed locally, because "no one locally has any faith in the integrity or ability of its officers. Its secretary is regarded as one of the most tricky men in this community and a good man to leave strictly alone, and all of his projects." The letter otherwise reflected upon the credit and standing of the company and closed with the statement, "The above information is submitted in confidence and in reply to your inquiry for same and if of any value to you we will expect such information so treated," and was signed "J. F. Gunby, President." The appellant was the secretary of the company. The language of the letter contained within the quotation was held to be actionable per se in Schreiber v. Gunby, 81 Kan. 459, 106 Pac. 276. * * * For a separate defense it was alleged that the letter of inquiry was written at the instance of the plaintiff as a decoy to induce the defendant to make some statement upon which to predicate an action. A demurrer filed to this defense was overruled. The verdict and judgment were for the defendant. * * *

Whatever may be the rule in criminal cases, where the object is punishment for a public offense, in a civil action a party cannot be allowed to recover damages for a libel which he procured or instigated to be published against himself for the purpose of laying the foundation of a lawsuit for his own pecuniary gain. It would be contrary to the principles declared in analogous cases to sustain such an action. It follows that the demurrer to the defense referred to was properly overruled.[43]

Another feature of the case closely related to this remains to be considered. In the tenth instruction the court, referring to the defense last considered, said: "If this letter written by Mr. Neal was the result of a decoy letter sent to Mr. Gunby at the instance and request of Mr. Richardson, plaintiff cannot recover, for the reason that it would [43] See King v. Waring (1803) 5 Esp. 13, 14 R. R. 751, Smith v. Wood (1813) 3 Camp. 323, and the examination and adoption of these cases in Gordon v. Spencer (1829) 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 286, 287.

"The question [whether a plaintiff who has procured the defamatory utterance, in order to found an action upon it, can maintain his action] has been discussed and passed upon in many cases in the United States, and among them in Gordon v. Spencer (1829) 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 286, 288; Yeates v. Reed (1838) 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 463, 465, 32 Am. Dec. 43; Jones v. Chapman (1839) 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 88; Haynes v. Newcomb (1898) 25 App. Div. 397, 401, 49 N. Y. Supp. 704; O'Donnell v. Nee (C. C., 1898) 86 Fed. 96; Railroad v. Delaney (1899) 102 Tenn. 289, 294, 295, 52 S. W. 151, 45 L. R. A. 600, and Shinglemeyer v. Wright (1900) 124 Mich. 230, 240, 82 N. W. 887, 50 L. R. A. 129. See also 25 Cyc. pp. 370, 371. In most of these cases the supposed ruling of Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Smith v. Wood, and the opinion expressed by Lord Alvanley, C. J., in King v. Waring were recognized as correct statements of the law, and followed." Per Meredith, C. J., delivering the opinion of the Ontario Divisional Court in Rudd v. Cameron (1912) 4 D. L. R. 567, 571. This court, however, distinguishes King v. Waring and Smith v. Wood, and follows Duke of Brunswick v. Harmer (1849) 14 Q. B. 185. See also Rudd v. Cameron (1914) 8 D. L. R. 622, C. A.

place the plaintiff in the situation of publishing a libel against himself —a thing which the law will not tolerate." This statement lacks an important qualification. The reason why a person cannot recover in such a case, where he instigates or invites the libel, is that he does it, as charged in the reply, for the purpose of predicating an action for damages upon it. He may not thus assist in building up a cause of action for the purpose of gathering the fruitage to himself. If, however, the plaintiff instigated or set on foot the inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether the defendant, or the bank of which he was president, was disseminating evil reports concerning the cement company or its officers, in order that such influences might be counteracted, or for any other proper purpose, and not for the purpose of predicating an action for damages in his own behalf, he was not estopped from maintaining an action. * * *[44]

Following the instruction last quoted, if the jury found from the evidence that the so-called decoy letter was written at the instance and request of appellant, they were precluded from giving him a verdict, regardless of his purpose or motive in causing the inquiry. This was an error affecting his substantial rights, and for this the judgment is reversed, with directions to grant a new trial.

[44] Benson, J., here quoted the dictum of Lord Alvanley in King v. Waring (1803) 5 Esp. 13. See also Rudd v. Cameron (1912) 8 D. L. R. 622, C. A.: (Finding that slanders concerning him in his business as a building contractor were being circulated, but not knowing who was responsible, P. placed the matter in the hands of a detective agency, who sent two detectives to investigate. They were not told or asked by P. to go to D. The detectives, having made the acquaintance of D., told him that they were going to erect a club house and that P. wished to get the contract. This ruse brought out from D. a repetition of the slander already in circulation. In P.'s action, based upon this statement, D. contended that he had been induced to utter the slanderous words by detectives employed by P. for that purpose, and that it was as if D. had spoken the words to P. himself and at his request. But a judgment for P. was sustained in the Divisional Court and in the Ontario Court of Appeal. "If the plaintiff," said Meredith, J. A., "had by subterfuge induced the defendant to speak defamatory words of him merely for the purpose of having an action for damages, I cannot think that such an action would lie. * * * That which one procures another to do for him, may be said, very properly, to be done by himself, in fishing for actions as well as in other things. But that is not this case; it was the case referred to by Lord Avanley in his ruling in King v. Waring [1803] 5 Esp. 15. It is quite a different thing for one who has been defamed by a secret enemy, and who in honest and not unusual or unreasonable endeavours to discover the wrongdoer, is again defamed—by one whom he suspected of the secret defamation—to bring such an action as this—even though the new slanders were published only to detectives employed by him and under false statements made by them in such an endeavour. And that is this case: and was very like the case of Duke of Brunswick v. Harmer [1849] 14 Q. B. 185; see also Griffiths v. Lewis [1845] 7 Q. B. 61. The plaintiff was not seeking a new defamation of his character with a view to recovering damages because of it; he was seeking knowledge with a view to putting a stop to the secret slanders which he neither desired nor had induced: and so, in this action, is not taking advantage of his own wrong, or answered by a defence of leave and license.")

POUCHAN v. GODEAU.

(Supreme Court of California, 1914. 167 Cal. 692, 140 Pac. 952.)

PER CURIAM.[45] This case was transferred from the District Court of Appeal of the First District by reason of a disagreement of the justices. MR. JUSTICE HALL was in favor of a reversal of the judgment and order, and this court agrees with the view which he took. He said:

"Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant, in an action for slander, in the sum of $1,500. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

"The only grounds relied upon for a reversal are alleged errors committed by the court in giving and refusing certain instructions and in its rulings upon certain objections to testimony.

"The language which it is charged that defendant used with regard to plaintiff was spoken in the French tongue at the entrance of a hall, wherein a meeting of French people was about to be held, to consider matters concerning the French Hospital and the election of officers thereof. The language charged to have been used is set out in the complaint, together with its translation into English. It is charged that defendant intercepted plaintiff at the doorway of said hall, and in the presence and hearing of divers persons said to him, 'Thieves are not allowed in here,' to which plaintiff responded, 'Then you call me a thief,' to which the defendant replied, 'Yes, you are a thief.' The evidence amply sustains the charge as it is set forth in the complaint.

"The defendant requested the court to give to the jury two instructions, as follows:

"'I charge you that if you believe or if you find that the words alleged to have been uttered by the defendant, as set forth in plaintiff's complaint, were in reply to a question or questions propounded by defendant to plaintiff, then said replies are privileged, and that you may not assess any damages against defendant.' And: 'I charge you that if you find the publication was proved at the trial, and that it was brought about by the plaintiff's own contrivance, this does not constitute sufficient evidence of publication, and your verdict must then be for the defendant.'

"The court refused to give either of said instructions.

"Each and every witness who testified to the use of the language complained of testified to the effect that defendant intercepted and barred the entrance of plaintiff to the hall, and at the same time opened the conversation by saying to him, 'Thieves are not allowed in here.' This language, under the circumstances of its use, clearly in itself and without further explanation prima facie carries the inference that plaintiff was a thief, or that defendant so charged.

"The fact that plaintiff, by a question, drew out a reiteration in more direct language of the charge already made, in the presence of the same people, does not bring the case within the rule of 'Volenti non fit injuria,' relied upon by defendant in support of his request for the rejected instructions.

"Where a defendant, not in the presence or hearing of third persons, makes a slanderous statement about a plaintiff, and thereafter, at the request of the plaintiff, repeats the statement in the presence and hearing of third persons, such repetition cannot be made the basis of an action for slander. Such a case is within the rule now invoked by defendant.[46] * * *

"But under no phase of the evidence in the case at bar does it appear that the language complained of and proven to have been used was but a repetition, at the request of plaintiff, of language previously used but not in the presence of third persons. All the evidence that tends to show the use of the language complained of shows that it was used under the circumstances above detailed, and that the first remark was made by defendant to plaintiff, as above stated, under such circumstances as of itself to carry the meaning that plaintiff was a thief.

"The witnesses for the defendant denied that the language complained of or any part of it was used at all by the defendant. Under this condition of the evidence, there was nothing to justify the giving of either of the refused instructions. * * *

WILLIAMS et al. v. NEW YORK HERALD CO.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1915. 165 App. Div. 529, 150 N. Y. Supp. 838.)

The action was by Williams and another against the New York Herald Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

[46] The Court here cited Patterson v. Frazer (Tex. Civ. App., 1904) 79 S. W. 1082; O'Donnell v. Nee (C. C., 1898) 86 Fed. 96; (P. said to S.: "The watchman [D.] has accused me of hiding brass to steal." S., turning to D., said: "Is that so?" Thereupon D. said "Yes.") Heller v. Howard (1882) 11 Ill. App. 554; (A defamatory statement made to the plaintiff alone was afterwards repeated at plaintiff's request in the hearing of a third person. "The repetition was at her special request, and the maxim volenti non fit injuria will apply." Per McAllister, J.) Shinglemeyer v. Wright (1900) 124 Mich. 230, 82 N. W. 887, 50 L. R. A. 129; (P. had sent for a police officer for the purpose of having D. repeat in his hearing the false charge of theft which D. had made to P. alone.)

See also Sutton v. Smith (1850) 13 Mo. 120; (P. put "an apron full of her own corn" into D.'s corn crib, and afterwards, when D. is watching her, throws it out in a successful attempt to "devil" him into a charge of theft.) Dig. §§ 131, 132, 154; Dec. Dig. Key-No. § 47.

SCOTT, J.[47] The action is for libel. The defendant is the publisher of a newspaper. The plaintiffs, under the name of the Lambert Dairy Company, carry on the business of selling and supplying milk and cream to their customers in the city of New York. The libel complained of consists of an article accusing the Lambert Dairy Company of selling watered and adulterated milk. This article was a fairly accurate summary of the allegations contained in a complaint in an action by the French-American Stores Company against the plaintiffs and others. This complaint was filed in the office of the county clerk, but up to the time of the publishing of the libel it had never been presented to the court, nor had any application, based upon it, been made to the court for any preliminary or provisional order or process. It developed upon the trial that plaintiffs had never filed the certificate required by law to enable them to carry on business under the name Lambert Dairy Company, which they had adopted and used. Hence, while the business they were conducting was a perfectly lawful and legitimate one, the manner of conducting it was unlawful and constituted a misdemeanor. Penal Law, §§ 440, 924; Partnership Law, § 22. The damages claimed in the complaint were those claimed to have been suffered by plaintiffs in their business. The amount recovered was not excessive, if they are entitled, as a matter of law, to recover at all.

The appellant urges two reasons why, as it is claimed, the judgment should not stand: First. It claims a qualified privilege in that the article complained of was a fair and true report of a judicial proceeding or of a paper duly filed in the course of such a proceeding. Second. Because the plaintiffs were engaged in a criminal undertaking in carrying on their business as they did, and consequently cannot claim damages in respect thereto. * * *

The defendant's second objection to the judgment rests, in our opinion, on a sounder foundation. The damages claimed are for injury to the business in which the plaintiffs are engaged, and it certainly seems anomalous that one may recover for injury to a business, the carrying on of which is unlawful and criminal. Plaintiff's claim is that the libel injured the fair fame and reputation, and consequently the business value of the Lambert Dairy Company, a name which they had unlawfully appropriated and used. In principle the case is not unlike Marsh v. Davison, 9 Paige, 580, wherein the slander sued for was that the plaintiff had killed a woman by the use of misapplied remedies. It was pleaded in defense that the plaintiff had not registered as a medical practitioner. The court said: "It is doubtful whether the words charged to have been spoken by him are actionable. For it appears by the bill itself that Davison was not a regular physician or surgeon; nor was he licensed to practice as such according to the laws of this state. And as he cannot, therefore, recover any compensation for his services under the provision of the Revised Statutes (1 R. S. [2d Ed.] 451, § 24), he cannot maintain an action of slander for charging him with malpractice in a profession which he cannot legally exercise." [48]

So in the present case it must, we think, be said that plaintiffs cannot recover for damages to a business which they could not lawfully carry on in the manner in which they did carry it on. When this case was before us on demurrer, the present question was not presented, for it did not appear that plaintiff's use of this fictitious name was unlawful. For aught that appeared, they might have taken the necessary steps to render the use of the name lawful. Fry v. Bennett, 28 N. Y. 324; Trimmer v. Hiscock, 27 Hun, 364. If plaintiffs were suing for damages to themselves as individuals, a different question would be presented, with which we are not now called upon to deal.

Our conclusion is that, for the reason above assigned, the defendant was entitled to a dismissal of the complaint at the trial. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed, and the complaint dismissed, with costs to the appellant in all courts. All concur.

[48] Accord: Collins v. Carnegie (1834) 1 Ad. & E. 695, 110 Reprint, 1373: ("The statute imposes no penalty on unlicensed practitioners, but the prohibitory words are strong enough to make the practice unlawful. This action cannot, therefore, be maintained for slander of the plaintiff in a profession which by law he could not exercise." Per Lord Denman, C. J.)

Hargan v. Purdy (1892) 93 Ky. 424, 20 S. W. 432: ("As defamatory words, either spoken or written, of a person in respect to his office or employment, as to say of a physician 'He is an empiric' or 'a quack,' are actionable per se, the petition would have contained, prima facie, a cause of action if appellant had been contented to state the simple fact that he was a regular physician duly and legally authorized to practice that profession, and being so employed the words mentioned were spoken of him. But he undertook to state how and by what authority he was entitled to practice as a physician; and thus is presented the question, to be considered on general demurrer, whether he was, at the time the alleged slanderous words were published, legally authorized to practice the medical profession. For if he was then undertaking to practice medicine in violation of the statute of the State, he could not, in contemplation of law, have been injured or sustained damage from being called an empiric or quack; or, at all events, he could not be heard in a court of justice to complain that words had been spoken or written of him having the simple effect to disable or deter him from violating a penal law." Per Lewis, J.)

For a distinction when the libel "reflects on the plaintiff in his private character" and not merely as a practitioner, see the remarks of Tindal, C. J., in Long v. Chubb (1831) 5 C. & P. 431. Here the plaintiff had declared for a libel published "of and concerning him, and of and concerning him as a medical practitioner."

SIR JOHN CARR, Knt., v. HOOD et al.

(London Sittings, after Trinity Term, 1808. 1 Camp. 355, note, 10 R. R. 701, note.)

The declaration stated that the plaintiff, before the publishing of any of the libels thereinafter mentioned, was the author of a certain book entitled "The Stranger in France," a certain other book entitled "A Northern Summer," a certain other book entitled "The Stranger in Ireland," which said books had been respectively published in 4to, yet that defendant, intending to bring upon plaintiff great contempt, laughter and ridicule, falsely and maliciously published a certain false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel, in the form of a book, of and concerning the said books, of which the said Sir John was the author as aforesaid, which same libel was entitled "My Pocket Book, or Hints for a Ryghte Merrie and Conceited Tour," in quarto, to be called, 'The Stranger in Ireland in 1805' (thereby alluding to the said book of the said Sir John, thirdly above mentioned), by a Knight Errant (thereby alluding to the said Sir John), and which same libel contained therein a certain false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory print, of and concerning the said Sir John, and of and concerning the said books of the said Sir John, 1st and 2ndly above mentioned, therein called "Frontispiece," and entitled "The Knight (meaning the said Sir John) Leaving Ireland with Regret," and containing and representing in the said print, a certain false, scandalous, and malicious, defamatory, and ridiculous representation of the said Sir John, in the form of a man of ludicrous and ridiculous appearance, holding a pocket handkerchief to his face and appearing to be weeping, and also containing therein, a certain false, malicious, and ridiculous representation of a man of ludicrous and ridiculous appearance, following the said representation of the said Sir John, and representing a man loaded with, and bending under the weight of, three large books, one of them having the word "Baltic," printed on the back thereof, &c. and a pocket handkerchief appearing to be held in one of the hands of the said representation of a man, and the corners thereof appearing to be held or tied together, as if containing something therein, with the printed word "Wardrobe" depending therefrom (thereby falsely, scandalously and maliciously meaning and intending to represent, for the purpose of rendering the said Sir John ridiculous, and exposing him to laughter, ridicule and contempt, that one copy of the said 1st mentioned book of the said Sir John, and two copies of the said book of the said Sir John 2ndly above mentioned, were so heavy as to cause a man to bend under the weight thereof, and that his the said Sir John's wardrobe was very small, and capable of being contained in a pocket handkerchief.

The declaration concluded by laying as special damage that the plaintiff had been prevented and hindered from selling to Sir Richard Philips, Knt., for £600, the copyright of a certain book of which the plaintiff was the author, containing an account of a tour by him through part of Scotland. Plea, Not guilty.

Lord Ellenborough, as the trial was proceeding, intimated an opinion, that if the book published by the defendants only ridiculed the plaintiff as an author, the action could not be maintained.

Garrow for the plaintiff allowed, that when his client came forward as an author, he subjected himself to the criticism of all who might be disposed to discuss the merits of his works; but that criticism must be fair and liberal; its object ought to be to enlighten the public, and to guard them against the supposed bad tendency of a particular publication presented to them, not to wound the feelings and to ruin the prospects of an individual. If ridicule was employed it should have some bounds. While a liberty was granted of analyzing literary productions, and pointing out their defects, still he must be considered as a libeller whose only object was to hold up an author to the laughter and contempt of mankind. A man with a wen upon his neck perhaps could not complain if a surgeon in a scientific work should minutely describe it, and consider its nature and the means of dispersing it; but surely he might support an action for damages against any one who should publish a book to make him ridiculous on account of this infirmity, with a caricature print as a frontispiece. The object of the book published by the defendants clearly was, by means of immoderate ridicule to prevent the sale of the plaintiff's works, and entirely destroy him as an author. In the late case of Tabart v. Tipper [49] his Lordship had held that a publication by no means so offensive or prejudicial to the object of it, was libellous and actionable.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. In that case the defendant had falsely accused the plaintiff of publishing what he had never published. Here the supposed libel has only attacked those works of which Sir John Carr is the avowed author; and one writer in exposing the follies and errors of another may make use of ridicule however poignant. Ridicule is often the fittest weapon that can be employed for such a purpose. If the reputation or pecuniary interests of the person ridiculed suffer, it is damnum absque injuria. Where is the liberty

[49] 1 Camp. 350, 10 R. R. 698. In this case, the defendant had published in a periodical called "The Satirist or Monthly Meteor" an article reflecting upon the plaintiff as a publisher of children's books and imputing to him the following "magnificent poem":

"There was a little maid, and she was afraid,
Her sweetheart would come to her,
She bound up her head when she went to bed
And she fastened her door with a skewer."

On the trial the defendant "allowed that the plaintiff had not published the poem imputed to him." Lord Ellenborough remarked that "liberty of criticism must be allowed, or we should neither have purity of taste nor of morals. Fair discussion is essentially necessary to the truth of history and the advancement of science. That publication therefore I shall never consider as a libel, which has for its object, not to injure the reputation of any individual, but to correct misrepresentations of fact, to refute sophistical reasoning, to expose a vicious taste in literature, or to censure what is hostile to morality." But after the evidence was in, his Lordship informed the jury, that "it was certainly actionable gravely to impute to a bookseller having published a poem of this sort, to which he was a stranger; as the evident tendency of the unfounded imputation was to hurt him in his business."

of the press if an action can be maintained on such principles? Perhaps the plaintiff's "Tour through Scotland" is now unsaleable; but is he to be indemnified by receiving a compensation in damages from the person who may have opened the eyes of the public to the bad taste and inanity of his compositions? Who would have bought the works of Sir Robert Filmer after he had been refuted by Mr. Locke? But shall it be said that he might have sustained an action for defamation against that great philosopher, who was labouring to enlighten and ameliorate mankind? We really must not cramp observations upon authors and their works. They should be liable to criticism, to exposure, and even to ridicule, if their compositions be ridiculous; otherwise the first who writes a book on any subject will maintain a monopoly of sentiment and opinion respecting it. This would tend to the perpetuity of error. Reflection on personal character is another thing. Shew me an attack on the moral character of this plaintiff, or any attack upon his character unconnected with his authorship, and I shall be as ready as any judge who ever sate here to protect him; but I cannot hear of malice on account of turning his works into ridicule.

The counsel for the plaintiff still complaining of the unfairness of this publication, and particularly of the print affixed to it, the trial proceeded.

Lord Ellenborough said: Every man who publishes a book commits himself to the judgment of the public, and any one may comment upon his performance. If the commentator does not step aside from the work, or introduce fiction for the purpose of condemnation, he exercises a fair and legitimate right. In the present case, had the party writing the criticism followed the plaintiff into domestic life for the purposes of slander, that would have been libellous; but no passage of this sort has been produced, and even the caricature does not affect the plaintiff, except as the author of the book which is ridiculed. The works of this gentleman may be, for aught I know, very valuable; but whatever their merits, others have a right to pass their judgment upon them—to censure them if they be censurable, and to turn them into ridicule if they be ridiculous. The critic does a great service to the public, who writes down any vapid or useless publication, such as ought never to have appeared. He checks the dissemination of bad taste, and prevents people from wasting both their time and money upon trash. I speak of fair and candid criticism; and this every one has a right to publish, although the author may suffer a loss from it. Such a loss the law does not consider as an injury; because it is a loss which the party ought to sustain. It is in short the loss of fame and profits to which he was never entitled. Nothing can be conceived more threatening to the liberty of the press than the species of action before the Court. We ought to resist an attempt against free and liberal criticism at the threshold.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE concluded by directing the jury, that if the writer of the publication complained of had not travelled out of the work he criticised for the purpose of slander, the action would not lie; but if they could discover in it any thing personally slanderous against the plaintiff, unconnected with the works he had given to the public, in that case he had a good cause of action, and they would award him damages accordingly.

Verdict for the defendants.

POST PUB. CO. v. HALLAM.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Sixth Circuit, 1893. 59 Fed. 530, 8 C. C. A. 201.)

Action by Hallam against the Post Publishing Company for libel. Verdict for plaintiff. Motion for a new trial denied, and judgment for plaintiff on the verdict. The defendant brings error. The petition set forth the publication by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff, in the Cincinnati Post, of the following article:

The Berry-Hallam congressional fight in the Sixth Kentucky district is still on,—that is to say, Banquo's ghost bobs up now and then, to the annoyance of the congressional nominee, Berry, and the mortification of the defeated candidate, Theo. F. Hallam. The Boone County Recorder delivers a broadside at the Kenton county delegates, and naively asks: "Why don't they come out and tell the truth about what induced them to go to Berry? The world knows." Yes, the world knows, and you may say Mars and the planets know it also. Proprietor Roth, of the St. Nicholas Hotel, has an inside cinch on this inside information. Everyone knows Colonel Berry. * * * Hallam is a successful lawyer at Covington; but legal eminence does not mean the fat incomes that are its synonyms on this side of the Ohio. Hallam is one of the bhoys, loves ward politics for the fun, if not the emoluments, and is about as poor as a church mouse. In fact, he owes several hundred dollars for taxes. The two counties, Kenton and Campbell, threw out their hooks for the congressional nomination. Kenton swore by Hallam, while Campbell vowed that * * * Albert S. Berry, should be the nominee. The fight waxed hot. The convention was held at Warsaw, commencing on September 27th, and ending September 30th. The Kenton boys prepared for the fray. The principal preparation consisted in engaging the steamer Henrietta to carry the delegates to Warsaw, and the carte blanche orders of Mr. Roth, of the St. Nicholas hostelry, to fill her up from truck to keelson with the best the cellar and the larder of the house afforded. * * * Hallam and his crowd did all the feasting and the drinking. The Campbell county men were not in it. But the bill was made out to Colonel A. S. Berry. Here is the bill: "St. Nicholas. Edward N. Roth. Cincinnati, October 10, 1892. Colonel A. S. Berry, per Theodore F. Hallam, to the St. Nicholas Hotel Company, Dr.: For meals, service, wine, and cigars served on board the steamer Henrietta, $865.15." Then again: At Warsaw the battle raged four days. On the last day Colonel Berry and Lawyer Hallam were seen to go arm in arm to the rear of the courthouse, where the convention was held. They had a quiet and confidential chat. At its conclusion Hallam called his warriors about him, and spoke to them in whispers. Immediately thereafter the whole Kenton county delegation cast its vote for Colonel Berry, and he received the nomination. Is Colonel Berry carrying out all and every one of the promises he made? Ah, there's the rub. Mr. Roth, of the St. Nicholas, has sent a bill of $865.15 to Colonel A. S. Berry. That bill is for "dry" and "wet" provisions ordered by Hallam, and disposed of by Hallam's supporters. Such generosity on the part of the victor to the vanquished is truly touching.

The defendant's answer admitted the publication of the article, but denied the other allegations in the petition. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that the charge or insinuation that he had received any consideration for influencing his supporters to transfer their votes to Berry was unfounded.[50]

TAFT, Circuit Judge. * * * Finally, we come to those assignments of error which are based on the charge of the court in regard to privileged communications. The court in effect told the jury that the article in question, relating, as it did, to a matter of public interest, came within a class of communications that were conditionally privileged; that the public acts of public men (and candidates for office were public men) could be lawfully made the subject of comment and criticism,[51] not only by the press, but also by all members of the public, for the press had no higher rights than the individual; but that while criticism and comment, however severe, if in good faith, were privileged, false allegations of fact, as, for instance, that the candidate had committed disgraceful acts, were not privileged, and that, if the charges were false, good faith and probable cause were no defense, though they might mitigate damages. Counsel for the plaintiff in error and the defendant below has argued with great vigor and an array of authorities that we ought not to adopt the view of the circuit court upon this important question, but should hold that the privilege extends to statements of fact as well as comment.

The argument is this: Privileged communications comprehend all bona fide statements in performance of any duty, whether legal, moral, or social, even though of imperfect obligation, when made with a fair and reasonable purpose of protecting the interest of the person making them, or the interest of the person to whom they are made. Townsh. Sland. & L. § 209. It is of the deepest interest to the public that they should know facts showing that a candidate for office is unfit to be chosen. Therefore, every one who has reasonable ground for believing, and does believe, that such a candidate has committed disgraceful acts affecting his fitness for the office he seeks, should have the right to give the public the benefit of his information, without making himself liable in damages for untrue statements, unless malice is shown. Though of imperfect obligation, it is said to be the highest duty of the daily newspaper to keep the public informed of facts concerning those who are seeking their suffrages and confidence. Can it be possible, it is asked, that public policy will make privileged an unfounded charge of dishonesty or criminality against one seeking private service, when made to the private individual with whom service is sought, and yet will not extend the same protection to him who in good faith informs the public of charges against applicants for service with them? Is it not, at least, as important that the high functions of public office should be well discharged, as that those in private service should be faithful and honest?

[50] The statement of the case is abridged and parts of the opinion are omitted. For the case below, see Hallam v. Post Publishing Co. (C. C., 1893) 55 Fed. 456.

[51] Compare Walsh v. Pulitzer Pub. Co. (1913) 250 Mo. 142, 157 S. W. 327, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 985: (A newspaper published by D. stated of P., who was a lawyer extensively engaged for the defense in criminal prosecutions and at the time was a candidate for the office of district attorney, that "the mere candidacy of such a person should fill the city with alarm. He has no qualifications for the office.")

The a fortiori step in this reasoning is only apparent. It is not real. The existence and extent of privilege in communications are determined by balancing the needs and good of society against the right of an individual to enjoy a good reputation when he has done nothing which ought to injure it. The privilege should always cease where the sacrifice of the individual right becomes so great that the public good to be derived from it is outweighed. Where conditional privilege is extended to cover a statement of disgraceful fact to a master concerning a servant or one applying for service, the privilege covers a bona fide statement, on reasonable ground, to the master only, and the injury done to the servant's reputation is with the master only. This is the extent of the sacrifice which the rule compels the servant to suffer in what was thought to be, when the rule became law, a most important interest of society. But, if the privilege is to extend to cases like that at bar, then a man who offers himself as a candidate must submit uncomplainingly to the loss of his reputation, not with a single person or a small class of persons, but with every member of the public, whenever an untrue charge of disgraceful conduct is made against him, if only his accuser honestly believes the charge upon reasonable ground. We think that not only is such a sacrifice not required of every one who consents to become a candidate for office, but that to sanction such a doctrine would do the public more harm than good.

We are aware that public officers and candidates for public office are often corrupt, when it is impossible to make legal proof thereof, and of course it would be well if the public could be given to know, in such a case, what lies hidden by concealment and perjury from judicial investigation. But the danger that honorable and worthy men may be driven from politics and public service by allowing too great latitude in attacks upon their characters outweighs any benefit that might occasionally accrue to the public from charges of corruption that are true in fact, but are incapable of legal proof. The freedom of the press is not in danger from the enforcement of the rule we uphold. No one reading the newspaper of the present day can be impressed with the idea that statements of fact concerning public men, and charges against them, are unduly guarded or restricted; and yet the rule complained of is the law in many of the states of the Union and in England.

In Davis v. Shepstone, 11 App. Cas. 187, Lord Chancellor Herschell delivered the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in an appeal from a judgment for libel recovered in the supreme court of Natal. The plaintiff below was a resident commissioner of Great Britain in Zululand, and the alleged libel charged him with having committed unprovoked and altogether indefensible assaults upon certain Zulu chiefs. The publication was made in the colony of Natal, where the conduct of the resident commissioner in Zululand was of great public interest. It was claimed that the article was conditionally privileged, and that the plaintiff ought to have succeeded only on proof of express malice. This claim was denied. The Lord Chancellor thus stated the law:

"There is no doubt that the public acts of a public man may lawfully be made the subject of fair comment or criticism, not only by the press, but by all members of the public. But the distinction cannot be too clearly borne in mind between comment or criticism and allegations of fact, such as that disgraceful acts have been committed or discreditable language used. It is one thing to comment upon or criticise, even with severity, the acknowledged or approved acts of a public man, and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct. In the present case the appellants, in the passages which were complained of as libelous, charged the respondent, as now appears, without foundation, with having been guilty of specific acts of misconduct, and then proceeded, on the assumption that the charges were true, to comment upon his proceedings in language in the highest degree offensive and injurious. Not only so, but they themselves vouched for the statements by asserting that, though some doubt had been thrown upon the truth of the story, the closest investigation would prove it to be correct. In their lordships' opinion there is no warrant for the doctrine that defamatory matter thus published is regarded by the law as the subject of any privilege."

Other English cases laying down the same doctrine are Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 Fost. & F. 421, 432, affirmed 3 Best & S. 769, and Popham v. Pickburn, 7 Hurl. & N. 891, 898. The latest American case, and the most satisfactory, is that of Burt v. Newspaper Co., [1891] 154 Mass. 238, 242, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L. R. A. 97, where Justice Holmes discusses the question, and quotes with approval the foregoing passage from the judgment in Davis v. Shepstone.[52] * * *

W. 463, 467: ("It is sometimes said that fair and honest criticism in matters of public concern are privileged, but there is a manifest difference between fair and honest criticism of public events and privileged communications. In the latter case the words may be defamatory, but the defamation is excused or justified by reason of the occasion, while in the former case the words are not defamatory of the plaintiff, and are not libelous—the stricture or criticism is not upon the person himself, but upon his work. In other words, it is impersonal. Bearce v. Bass [1894] 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446; Burt v. Advertising Co. [1891] 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L. R. A. 97. (1913) 181 Ala. 439, 61 South. 345, 350: ("The privilege [of fair comment] is limited to comment or criticism, and must be with reference to admitted or proven facts or conduct." Per Somerville, J.)

So it was remarked by Cockburn, C. J., in the Queen v. Carden (1879) 5 Q. B. D. 1, 8: "It is true that a comment upon given facts, which would otherwise be libellous, may assume a privileged character, because, though unjust and injurious, yet being founded on facts not in themselves libellous, it is a comment which any one is entitled to make upon a public man. For instance, suppose that any one states facts not in themselves libellous of a candidate for election to parliament, and on them bases the conclusion that he is not an honest politician. The comment may be injurious, but it may be privileged as a fair comment on the facts, if not malicious, because made on a public man. On the other hand, to say that you may first libel a man, and then comment upon him, is obviously absurd."

And in Digby v. Financial News [1907] 1 K. B. 502, 507, it was remarked by Collins, M. R., in the Court of Appeal: "Comment, in order to be fair, one does so fairly, with an honest purpose, and not intemperately and maliciously, although the publication is made to the general public by means of a newspaper, yet what is privileged is criticism, not other defamatory statements; and, if a person takes upon himself to allege matters otherwise actionable, he will not be privileged, however honest his motives, if those allegations are not true. When a publisher goes beyond the limits of fair criticism, his language passes into the region of libel, and the question whether those limits have been transcended may become a question of law, but ordinarily presents a question for the jury. Fay v. Harrington, 176 Mass. 270, 57 N. E. 369. It is true that an author, when he places his work before the public, invites criticism; and, however hostile it may be, the critic is not liable for libel, provided he makes no misstatements of material facts contained in the writing, and does not go out of his way to attack the author. The critic must, however, confine himself to criticism, and not make it the veil for personal censure, nor allow himself to run into reckless and unfair attacks merely for the purpose of exercising his power of denunciation. If, under the pretext of criticising a literary production or the acts of one occupying a public position, the critic takes an opportunity to attack the author or occupant, he will be liable in an action for libel. Cooper v. Stone, 24 Wend. 434; Mattice v. Wilcox, 71 Hun, 485, 488, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1060, affirmed 147 N. Y. 624, 42 N. E. 270; Hamilton v. Eno, 81 N. Y. 116. Moreover, it is difficult to perceive how this privilege can be tried on demurrer, as the question whether the criticism was fair and just, or willfully assailed the reputation of the plaintiff, would be for the jury. In this case it is obvious that the articles complained of go far beyond the field of fair and honest criticism, and are attempts to portray the plaintiff in a ridiculous light.

must be based upon facts, and if a defendant cannot shew that his comments contain no misstatements of fact, he cannot prove a defense of fair comment. The usual way to begin such a plea is by asserting that the facts on which the comment is based are true, that is, that the defendant has made no misstatements in formulating the materials upon which he has commented. If the defendant makes a misstatement of any of the facts upon which he comments, it at once negatives the possibility of his comment being fair. It is therefore a necessary part of a plea of fair comment to shew that there has been no misstatement of facts in the statement of the materials upon which the comment was based."

But see Cleveland Leader Printing Co. v. Nethersole (1911) 84 Ohio, 118, 95 N. E. 735, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 978. The plaintiff, an actress and producer of plays upon the stage, sued for an alleged libel in an article published in the defendant's newspaper. This article, referring to a play called "The Labyrinth," in which the plaintiff had just appeared in Cleveland, contained this statement: "Cleveland received it frigidly, as is the American way when displeased or disgusted, but when it was produced in London it was hissed so soundly that Miss Nethersole had hysterics." The two statements as to the London production were false. A judgment for the plaintiff, who asserted no special damage, was reversed by the Supreme Court, apparently on two grounds, that the defendant was within the protection of fair comment, and that the false statements were not a "libel upon the person," but only a "libel upon the play." See an interesting note on this case in 10 Mich. Law Rev. 44 (1911).

As was in effect said by the learned judge in the dissenting opinion below: The articles complained of represent the plaintiff as illiterate, uncultivated, coarse, and vulgar, and his ideas as sensational, absurd, and foolish. They also represent him as egotistical and conceited in the extreme, and convey the impression that he makes himself ridiculous both in his method of instruction and by his public lectures. They also ridicule his private life, by charging that he was unable to select a name for his baby until after a year of solemn deliberation. In short, they effect to represent him as a presumptuous literary freak. These representations concerning his personal characteristics were not within the bounds of fair and honest criticism, and are clearly libelous per se.

It is likewise claimed by the respondent that these articles were written in jest, and hence that it is not liable to the plaintiff for the injury he has sustained. It is, perhaps, possible that the defendant published the articles in question as a jest, yet they do not disclose that, but are a scathing denunciation, ridiculing the plaintiff. If, however, they can be regarded as having been published as a jest, then it should be said that, however desirable it may be that the readers of, and the writers for, the public prints shall be amused, it is manifest that neither such readers nor writers should be furnished such amusement at the expense of the reputation or business of another. In the language of Joy, C. B.: "The principle is clear that a person shall not be allowed to murder another's reputation in jest;" or, in the words of Smith, B., in the same case: "If a man in jest conveys a serious imputation, he jests at his peril." Donoghue v. Hayes [1831], Hayes, Irish Exchequer, 265, 266. We are of the opinion that one assaulting the reputation or business of another in a public newspaper cannot justify it upon the ground that it was a mere jest, unless it is perfectly manifest from the language employed that it could in no respect be regarded as an attack upon the reputation or business of the person to whom it related.

The single purpose of the rule permitting fair and honest criticism is that it promotes the public good, enables the people to discern right from wrong, encourages merit, and firmly condemns and exposes the charlatan and the cheat, and hence is based upon public policy. The distinction between criticism and defamation is that criticism deals only with such things as invite public attention or call for public comment, and does not follow a public man into his private life, or pry into his domestic concerns. It never attacks the individual, but only his work. A true critic never indulges in personalities, but confines himself to the merits of the subject-matter, and never takes advantage of the occasion to attain any other object beyond the fair discussion of matters of public interest, and the judicious guidance of the public taste. The articles in question come far short of falling within the line of true criticism, but are clearly defamatory in character, and are libelous per se. * * *

(E) Defeating a Prima Facie Justification or Excuse in Defamation: Malice, Excess

(a) As a Reply to the Plea of Justification

PERRY v. PORTER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1878. 124 Mass. 338.)

Tort, with a count for libel and thirteen counts for slander. After the former decision, reported 121 Mass. 522, the case was tried in this court, before Soule, J., who, after a verdict for the defendant, allowed a bill of exceptions.

MORTON, J. * * * In regard to the count for libel, the vital question is as to the correctness of the ruling of the court, that, if the jury found the matter contained in the publication charged as libellous to be true, this was a complete defence to the action.

The plaintiff relied upon the Gen. Sts. c. 129, § 77, and contended that the truth was not a justification and defence, if it was proved that the article was published with express malice. But the court ruled that the exception in the statute was not applicable to a civil action, and that proof of the truth was not of itself a defence.

At common law, in private actions for libel or slander, proof of the truth is a justification. But in public prosecutions the rule was otherwise, and it was accordingly held, in Commonwealth v. Blanding, 3 Pick. 304, 15 Am. Dec. 214, that on an indictment for libel the truth of the matter published was not admissible in evidence. Probably in consequence of this decision, the Legislature enacted in 1827 that in every prosecution for libel the defendant might give in evidence in his defence the truth of the matter charged to be libellous, but that such evidence should not be a justification unless it was made to appear that such matter was published with good motives and for justifiable ends. St. 1826, c. 107, 1.

This was re-enacted in the Rev. Sts. c. 133, § 6, and remained the law until 1855 when it was provided that "in every prosecution, and in every civil action for writing or for publishing a libel, the defendant may give in evidence, in his defence upon the trial, the truth of the matter contained in the publication charged as libellous; and such evidence shall be deemed a sufficient justification, unless malicious intention shall be proved." St. 1855, c. 396, § 1.

This provision was without change incorporated in the Gen. Sts. c. 129, § 77. It is true that all the prior legislation had been, not in the direction of limiting the effect of proof of the truth in civil actions, but in the direction of enlarging its effect in favour of the defendant in a criminal prosecution. The St. of 1826 for the first time permitted the truth to be given in evidence as a justification in criminal prosecutions. Under its provisions the burden of proof was upon the defendant to show not only the truth of the matter charged to be libellous, but also that it was published with good motives and for justifiable ends. Commonwealth v. Bonner, 9 Metc. 410.

The St. of 1855 goes further in favor of the defendants in criminal prosecutions and throws the burden on the government, if the defendant establishes the truth, of proving that the publication was made with malicious intention. In this respect, it accords with the general tendency of modern legislation to make the proof of the truth more effective in the defence of a prosecution for libel.

These considerations, and the further argument that, if the Legislature had intended to make so important a change in the law of libel in civil suits, it would have done so in direct affirmative language, afford some ground for the inference that it was not intended that the exception in the concluding words of the St. of 1855 should apply to civil actions.

But, on the other hand, we must construe the words of the statute "according to the common and approved usage of the language" unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the Legislature. Gen. Sts. c. 3, § 7, cl. 1.

This statute in its terms is made applicable "in every prosecution and in every civil action for writing or for publishing a libel." The provisions that the truth may be given in evidence, and if proved shall be sufficient justification, undoubtedly were intended to apply to civil and criminal proceedings. According to the common and approved usage of the language, the exception or qualification contained in the words, "unless malicious intention shall be proved," also applies to civil actions as well as to criminal prosecutions; and we are not able to see either in the context or in the history of previous legislation upon the subject, sufficient evidence of a manifest intent of the Legislature that it should be limited to criminal prosecutions.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the court erroneously ruled at the trial that the exception in the statute did not apply to a civil action, and that the proof of the truth was of itself a defence. But, as this error affected only the count for libel, and as the plaintiff has fully tried his counts for slander, we are of opinion that a new trial should be granted only upon the count for libel.

[55] Part of the opinion is omitted.

Compare: Conner v. Standard Pub. Co. (1903) 183 Mass. 474, 67 N. E. 596: (Certain testimony in an action for libel had been admitted "on the question of whether the article was written honestly and in good faith." Said Loring, J., delivering the opinion: "At common law, the truth of the statement complained of is an absolute defense to an action of libel, and such evidence is not admissible because it does not tend to prove the truth of the facts charged. This is the ground upon which Shaw, C. J., rests his opinion in Sheckell v. Jackson [1852] 10 Cush. 25. But an act was passed in 1855 [St. 1855, p. 782, c. 396] which provided that the truth of the matter should not be a defense if a malicious intention was proved. It was held in Perry v. Porter [1878] 124 Mass. 338, that the burden of proving malice was

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1909. 75 N. H. 215, 72 Atl. 689, 31 L. R. A. [N. S.] 132.)

Case, by Hutchins against Page, for an alleged libel. In opening his case the plaintiff's counsel stated that he expected to prove that the defendant, being tax-collector for the city of Portsmouth and having an overdue tax against the plaintiff, advertised the property for sale by posting the notices required by the statute and also by publishing like notices in two newspapers. These publications were alleged to have been made maliciously and for no purpose except to injure the plaintiff. Upon this statement a nonsuit was ordered, subject to exception.

PEASLEE, J. However the law may be elsewhere,[56] it is well settled in this state that the truth is not always a defense to an action on the case to recover damages for the publication of a libel. State v. Burnham, 9 N. H. 34, 31 Am. Dec. 217. The rule there suggested, that if the occasion be lawful the motive for the publication is immaterial, if the truth of the charge be established, was materially modified when a case arose in which the question was directly in issue. "It seems to us that in order to settle whether the occasion was lawful we must generally inquire into the motives of the publisher. There may be some cases where the occasion renders, not only the motive, but the truth, of the communication immaterial. Thus it may be the better rule that no relevant statement made by a witness or by counsel in the course of a trial is actionable, even though false and malicious. See Revis v. Smith, 18 Com. Bench, 126. But in the great majority of instances, and certainly in the present case, the lawfulness of the occasion depends upon the good faith and real purpose of the publisher. Most of what are called 'privileged communications' are 'conditionally,' not 'absolutely' privileged. 'The question is one of good faith,' or motive, and can be settled only by a jury. A court cannot rule that a communication is privileged without assuming the conditions on which it is held to be privileged, namely, that it was made in good on the plaintiff; and in Brown v. Mass. Title Ins. Co. [1890] 151 Mass. 127, 23 N. E. 733, and Fay v. Harrington [1900] 176 Mass. 270, 57 N. E. 369, that by "malicious intention" was meant malice, in the popular sense of hatred or ill will. In pursuance of the latter case, the words "actual malice" have been substituted in the act for the original words, "malicious intention." Rev. Laws, c. 173, § 91. * * * We are of opinion that this evidence was admissible in the issue of "actual malice.")

See, also, Pierce v. Rodliff (1901) 95 Me. 346, 50 Atl. 32, and 25 Cyc. 414.

[56] Compare: Foss v. Hildreth (1865), 10 Allen (Mass.) 76. The defendant requested an instruction that the truth is not a defence to an action of slander, if the words were spoken maliciously or without any reason on the part of the defendant to believe they were true. "But in respect to verbal slander the law has always been otherwise. A special plea in justification sets forth the truth of the words merely. 3 Chit. Pl. 1031." Per Chapman, J. See, also, 25 Cyc. 414, note 25.

faith, for a justifiable purpose, and with a belief, founded on reasonable grounds, of its truth." Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 217, 97 Am. Dec. 605; Carpenter v. Bailey, 53 N. H. 590, 594; Id., 56 N. H. 283, 290.

Under this rule the plaintiff states a case. While it was the defendant's duty to publish the fact that the plaintiff had failed to pay the taxes assessed against him, "by posting advertisements thereof in two or more public places in the town" (Pub. St. 1901, c. 60, § 14), it was not his duty to otherwise publish the fact unless he thought such publication was essential to the success of the tax sale. If he did not so believe, but, on the contrary, used this occasion to maliciously proclaim in a public manner that the plaintiff had not paid his taxes, there is neither legal nor ethical reason why an action should not lie for the damage caused by the malicious and unwarranted act.[57]

The claim that the defendant is exonerated by the provision that he shall not be liable "for any cause whatever except his own official misconduct" (Pub. St. 1901, c. 60, § 16) cannot be sustained. The misconduct here charged is "his own." He can no more use the statutory power to advertise as a cloak for a malicious assault upon the plaintiff's character than he could make the power to arrest a commission for the infliction of bodily chastisement.

Exception sustained. All concurred.

SCOTT v. STANSFIELD.

(Court of Exchequer, 1868. L. R. 3 Exch. 220.)

[See ante, p. 660, for a report of the case.]

This was an action for a libel, tried before Brett, J. The facts were as follows: The plaintiff was employed as assistant in the shop of the defendant, a shoemaker, at Leicester. The defendant having accused the plaintiff of robbing him of money, sent two post-office telegrams to her father, who resided in London, to inform him of his suspicions. The first telegram was to this effect: "Come at once to Leicester, if you wish to save your child from appearing before a magistrate." The second was as follows: "Your child will be given in charge of the police unless you reply and come to-day. She has taken money out of the till."

The charge was persisted in down to the trial; but there was no evidence to support it. It did not appear that, beyond the officials of the post-office, through whose hands the telegrams passed, they had come to the knowledge of any other persons than the father, mother, and brother of the plaintiff.

On the part of the defendant it was contended that the messages if sent in sealed letters would clearly have been privileged communications, and that they did not lose this privilege by being transmitted by telegraph. The learned judge told the jury that, although the statements, if made bona fide and without malice, would have been privileged if they had been contained in letters addressed to the father, they might be if libellous, deprived of that privilege by being sent by telegraph. And he left it to the jury to say whether the statements were libellous, and whether it was reasonable to transmit them by telegraph rather than by post.

The jury found that the statements were libellous, and that it was not reasonable to send them by telegraph, and they returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £100.

BRETT, J. I reserved the point because I thought it was a very important one. It is whether, where a communication is to be made to a relative of a person against whom a charge is preferred, which communication would be privileged if sent by letter in the ordinary way, the privilege is not lost by sending it in the form of a telegram,—whether a communication in that form can be said to be made to one person, when in point of fact it passes through several hands before it reaches its ultimate destination. Privilege is not wanted unless the publication is libellous. The question then is whether the character of an innocent person is to be destroyed because the libeller thinks fit to send the libel in this shape rather than in a sealed letter. I do not mean to say that there was malice in fact here. But I agree with my Lord that sending the messages by telegraph when they might have been sent by letter was evidence of malice. I desire, however, to put this higher. I think that a communication which would be privileged if made by letter becomes unprivileged if sent through the telegraph office, because it is necessarily communicated to all the clerks through whose hands it passes. It is like the case of a libel contained on the back of a post-card. It was never meant by the legislature that these facilities for postal and telegraphic communication should be used for the purpose of more easily disseminating libels. Where there is such a publication, it avoids the privilege, because it is communicated through unprivileged persons.[58] As to the damages, I am not at all [58] Accord: Brown v. Croome (1817) 2 Starkie, 297, 19 R. R. 727: (D. published in a newspaper an advertisement for a meeting of the creditors of P., a bankrupt. The advertisement contained defamatory statements. Lord Ellenborough, ruling against a claim of privilege, remarked: "The defend-

ODDY v. LORD GEORGE PAULET.

(At Nisi Prius, 1865. 4 Fost. & F. 1009, 142 R. R. 743.)

Slander upon a trader in the way of his business. The first count laid the words to be: "You and your family are all a set of rogues, and you have robbed me ever since I have dealt with you." Plea, not guilty.

The plaintiff was a corn dealer, and the defendant had dealt with him. The orders were given by servants, and there was a book in the usual way in which supplies were entered. The defendant had gone to the plaintiff's shop on several occasions in one week, and had—as was proved by the plaintiff and his son, and a third person who happened to be in hearing—spoken the words complained of in evident heat and anger. The son of the plaintiff was in the shop on one of the occasions, and the third person who was in hearing on another occasion was a traveller, who was in a parlour at the back of the shop, and, as he swore, heard the words uttered. It was also sworn on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant spoke the words very loudly,

A communication sufficient for the purpose might have been made in measured language. The want of proper caution had rendered the publication actionable, as being published to the world at large.")

Sheftall v. Central of Georgia Ry. (1905) 123 Ga. 589, 51 S. E. 649: (P., a conductor on the defendant railway, had been discharged. He had in his possession, as part of his conductor equipment, certain unused tickets. These he failed to turn in. The railway company sent out a circular describing the tickets as "lost and scalped" and requiring the conductors to decline to honor them if presented for transportation. This circular, in which P. was named as failing to surrender the tickets, was sent to all the defendant's conductors, and posted for ten days on bulletin boards in public places.)

Bingham v. Gaynor (1911) 203 N. Y. 27, 96 N. Before the delivery of this letter to S., it was, through D.'s act, published in newspapers in the city.)

Compare: Ashcroft v. Hammond (1910) 197 N. Y. 488, 90 N. E. 1117: (D., in reply to a telegram from S., who with D. was interested in the proper management of a corporation, and the settlement of a controversy over the validity of an election of its board of directors, sent a telegram reflecting upon the competency of P., who had been manager of the corporation and was active in the pending controversy. The telegram from S., drafted by P. and sent with his knowledge, asked D. to "telegraph reply" to a certain address.) and so as to be heard by every one standing by, and, moreover, that he had stood outside and repeated the words loudly, so that he could be heard by persons passing by; and that some persons were passing by at the time and might have heard it. At the close of the case for the plaintiff, Coleridge submitted that the words were privileged, because spoken to a trader by a customer, and as words of remonstrance and complaint.

LUSH, J. No doubt a customer may complain to a tradesman with whom he deals of what he deems irregular or dishonest; but if he does so outside the door of the tradesman's shop—so as to be heard by the public—or if even inside the shop, he speaks slanderous words unnecessarily in the presence of third parties, or to third parties, and uses language which is extreme and beyond the occasion—all this, with the tone and manner in which the words were spoken, will be evidence for the jury to consider whether in the law the words were spoken maliciously and without excuse. The case, therefore, cannot be withdrawn from the jury.

Coleridge thereupon yielded to an apology.

TOOGOOD v. SPYRING.

(Court of Exchequer, 1834. 1 Cromp., M. & R. 181, 40 R. R. 523.)

This was an action of slander for words alleged to have been spoken of the plaintiff as a journeyman carpenter, by the defendant on three different occasions. The declaration, the facts of which sufficiently appear in the opinion, was in five counts. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and, in two special pleas, the truth of the charge. The plaintiff replied to the special pleas with a de injuria. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a nonsuit or a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.[59]

PARKE, B. * * * The defendant, who was a tenant of the Earl of Devon, required some work to be done on the premises occupied by him under the Earl, and the plaintiff, who was generally employed by Brinsdon, the Earl's agent, as a journeyman, was sent by him to do the work. He did it, but in a negligent manner; and, during the progress of the work, got drunk; and some circumstances occurred which induced the defendant to believe that he had broken open the cellar door, and so obtained access to his cider. The defendant a day or two afterwards met the plaintiff in the presence of a person named Taylor, and charged him with having broken open his cellar door with a chisel, and also with having got drunk. The plaintiff denied the charges. The defendant then said he would have it cleared up, and went to look for Brinsdon; he afterwards returned and spoke to Taylor, in the absence of the plaintiff; and, in answer to a question of Taylor's, said he was confident that the plaintiff had broken open the door. On the same day the defendant saw Brinsdon, and complained to him that the plaintiff had been negligent in his work, had got drunk, and he thought he had broken open the door, and requested him to go with him in order to examine it.

Upon the trial it was objected, that these were what are usually termed "privileged communications." The learned Judge thought that the statement to Brinsdon might be so, but not the charge made in the presence of Taylor; and in respect of that charge, and of what was afterwards said to Taylor, both which statements formed the subject of the action, the plaintiff had a verdict. We agree in his opinion, that the communication to Brinsdon was protected, and that the statement, upon the second meeting, to Taylor, in the plaintiff's absence, was not; but we think, upon consideration, that the statement made to the plaintiff, though in the presence of Taylor, falls within the class of communications ordinarily called privileged; that is, cases where the occasion of the publication affords a defence in the absence of express malice. In general, an action lies for malicious publication of statements which are false in fact, and injurious to the character of another (within the well-known limits as to verbal slander), and the law considers such publication as malicious, unless it is fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned. In such cases, the occasion prevents the inference of malice, which the law draws from unauthorized communications, and affords a qualified defence depending upon the absence of actual malice. If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society; and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits.

Among the many cases which have been reported on this subject, one precisely in point has not, I believe, occurred; but one of the most ordinary and common instances in which the principle has been applied in practice is, that of a former master giving the character of a discharged servant; and I am not aware that it was ever deemed essential to the protection of such a communication that it should be made to some person interested in the inquiry, alone, and not in the presence of a third person. If made with honesty of purpose to a party who has any interest in the inquiry (and that has been very liberally construed, Child v. Affleck, 33 R. R. 216, 9 B. & C. 403, 4 Man. & Ry. 338), the simple fact that there has been some casual bystander cannot alter the nature of the transaction. The business of life could not be well carried on if such restraints were imposed upon this and similar communications, and if, on every occasion in which they were made, they were not protected unless strictly private. In this class of communications is, no doubt, comprehended the right of a master bona fide to charge his servant for any supposed misconduct in his service, and to give him admonition and blame; and we think that the simple circumstance of the master exercising that right in the presence of another, does by no means of necessity take away from it the protection which the law would otherwise afford. Where, indeed, an opportunity is sought for making such a charge before third persons, which might have been made in private, it would afford strong evidence of a malicious intention, and thus deprive it of that immunity which the law allows to such a statement, when made with honesty of purpose; but the mere fact of a third person being present does not render the communication absolutely unauthorized, though it may be a circumstance to be left with others, including the style and character of the language used, to the consideration of the jury, who are to determine whether the defendant has acted bona fide in making the charge, or been influenced by malicious motives. In the present case, the defendant stood in such a relation with respect to the plaintiff, though not strictly that of master, as to authorize him to impute blame to him, provided it was done fairly and honestly for any supposed misconduct in the course of his employment; and we think that the fact that the imputation was made in Taylor's presence, does not, of itself, render the communication unwarranted and officious, but at most is a circumstance to be left to the consideration of the jury.

We agree with the learned Judge, that the statement to Taylor, in the plaintiff's absence, was unauthorized and officious, and therefore not protected, although made in the belief of its truth, if it were, in point of fact, false; but, inasmuch as no damages have been separately given upon this part of the charge alone, to which the fourth count is adapted, we cannot support a general verdict, if the learned Judge was wrong in his opinion as to the statement to the plaintiff in Taylor's presence; and, as we think that at all events it should have been left to the jury whether the defendant acted maliciously or not on that occasion, there must be a new trial.

Rule absolute for a new trial.

DUNCOMBE v. DANIELL.

(Adjourned Sittings at Westminster after Michaelmas Term, 1837. 8 Car. & P. 222.)

Libel. The declaration was upon two letters written by the defendant, who was a barrister and an elector of the borough of Finsbury, and published in the "Morning Post" newspaper, addressed to the plaintiff, Mr. Duncombe, who had been member of parliament for, and at the time of the publication was a candidate for the representation of, that borough. Plea—Not guilty; and three pleas of justification, stating in substance that the matters contained in the letters were true. Verdict for the defendant, damages £100.

In the ensuing term, Sir W. Follett for the defendant applied for a new trial upon several grounds, the last of which was that it was justifiable for an elector bona fide to communicate to the constituency any matter respecting a candidate which he believed to be true, and believed to be material to the election.

COLERIDGE, J. You must go further than that, and make out that the elector is entitled to publish it to all the world. This publication was in a newspaper.

Sir W. Follett submitted that if no more was done than was necessary to make the matters known to the electors the publication was privileged, and that whether or not any thing more was done was a question for the jury.

LORD DENMAN, C. J. However large the privilege of electors may be, it is extravagant to suppose that it can justify the publication to all the world of facts injurious to a person who happens to stand in the situation of a candidate.

Rule refused on the last ground, and granted on the others.[60]

BURCH, J. In August, 1904, the plaintiff held the office of Attorney General of the state and was a candidate for re-election at the general election, which occurred in the following November. By virtue of his office, he was a member of the commission charged with the management and control of the state school fund. The defendant was the owner and publisher of the Topeka State Journal, a newspaper published at Topeka, and circulated both within and without the state. In the issue of the date mentioned appeared an article purporting to state facts relating to the plaintiff's official conduct in connection with a school fund transaction, making comment upon them and drawing inferences from them. Deeming the article to be libelous, the plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendant, alleging that the matter published concerning him was false and defamatory, and that its publication was the fruit of malice. Among other defenses the defendant pleaded facts which he claimed rendered the article and its publication privileged. * * *

The plaintiff argues that the defense of privilege was destroyed by the fact that copies of the defendant's newspaper circulated in other states, complains of the instructions given upon the subject, and insists that the instruction offered by him should have been given. The instruction given was correct and follows the rule announced by this court in Redgate v. Roush, 61 Kan. 480, 59 Pac. 1050, 48 L. R. A. 236. There a matter of interest to communicants of a church was published in the church papers in Indiana, Ohio, Texas, and Nebraska. It was inevitable that they should be read by people of other denominations. The syllabus reads: "Where the publication appears to have been made in good faith and for the members of the denomination alone, the fact that it incidentally may have been brought to the attention of others than members of the church will not take away its privileged character." This accords with the general rule stated in 25 Cyc. 387. See, also, Hatch v. Lane, 105 Mass. 394; Mertens v. Bee Publishing Co., 5 Neb. (Unof.) 592, 99 N. W. 847.

In the cases of State of Iowa v. Haskins, 109 Iowa, 656, 80 N. W. 1063, 47 L. R. A. 223, 77 Am. St. Rep. 560, Buckstaff v. Hicks, 94 Wis. 34, 68 N. W. 403, 59 Am. St. Rep. 853, and Sheftall v. Central Railway Co., 123 Ga. 589, 51 S. E. 646, language is used from which it might be inferred that privilege will be destroyed if the communication should reach the eyes of others than persons interested. This would be the end of privilege for all newspapers having circulation and influence. Generally the publication must be no wider than will meet the requirements of the moral or social duty to publish. If it be designedly or unnecessarily or negligently excessive, privilege is lost. But, if a state newspaper published primarily for a state constituency have a small circulation elsewhere, it is not deprived of its privilege in the discussion of matters of state-wide concern because of that fact.[61] * * *

SAVAGE v. STOVER.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1914. 92 Atl. 284.)

Savage brought an action against Stover for libel and had judgment below. The defendant appeals.

PARKER, J. This is a libel suit coming up from the district court of Hoboken. The plaintiff is the president and, as claimed, the virtual owner of a bread-baking concern, and the defendant is an attorney at law who had two claims against the corporation on behalf of former employés who had deposited $100 each as security for the faithful performance of their duties, and after their dismissal or resignation were able to get only part of it back. The corporation was represented by the counsel for the present plaintiff, and the libel consisted in a letter written by the defendant Stover, in which, among other things, he spoke of the plaintiff, Savage, as follows, after declining to make a settlement in the two cases:

"Your client is one of the most cold-blooded of men I have ever met. Not only did I see his actions in the Townsend matter where he provoked an assault and battery, but he sent me a very insulting letter when I wrote him in a friendly way in spite of the fact that my folks bought his bread. I have a good mind to tell my folks to discontinue buying his bread. He treats his men laborers like dogs. Not only does this contract exemplify that, but I have heard tales from drivers and from men close to you and him how he insults and squeezes them. Personally if I were you I would not lend myself to do the work of that fellow Savage. How can he expect to build up a business on the reputation he is getting throughout the county? I would ship him long ago were he my client. I would not want his reputation to redound on my shoulders. Kindly let me know at once whether you will try or settle it."

This was sent to Mr. Burtis in the usual course. The case was tried by a judge without a jury, and he found a verdict for $75 damages and costs, which is the judgment now complained of.

A. 406: (At a meeting of the stockholders of a railway company, D., a stockholder, made to the other stockholders a statement which was defamatory of the general manager of the corporation, in his official capacity. Three attorneys, who were not stockholders, were present on invitation from officers of the road.)

Conrad v. Roberts (Kan. 1915) 147 Pac. 795: (In an action for slander D. pleaded that the words were spoken by her in a conversation with her husband, S., at a time when she understood that he was in danger of arrest for his conduct with P. and another woman where he lived, that this would bring disgrace upon the family of D. and S., and that she desired to warn S. in his own interest, as well as in that of the family. The court in substance charged the jury that if a third person overheard the defamatory remark concerning P. which D. made to S. on this occasion, the remark was not privileged unless such third person was a mere eavesdropper. But, said the reviewing court, "it was privileged, though a third person, without being an eavesdropper, heard it, provided it was made in good faith. 'Where the presence of bystanders is a mere casual incident, not in any sense sought for by the defendant, he will not be deprived of his privilege.'" Per Porter, J., referring to 18 Am. & E. Encyc. of L. 1047, and cases there cited.

It is now claimed that the court should have entered a nonsuit or directed a verdict (there was no jury) on several grounds, the principal of which is that the letter was privileged. No doubt it was privileged as to what it said about Savage in connection with the two cases that were then pending, but it is very far from confining itself to those matters. It is rather a general personal admonition from one attorney to another that the client of the latter is not fit to be regarded as a client and ought to be sent about his business. This was clearly outside the scope of the business under discussion between the two attorneys, and raised the question whether the letter was privileged as to such surplus matter. The authorities appear to be in some conflict on this point. 25 Cyc. 386, 387. In Fahr v. Hayes, 50 N. J. Law, 275, 280, 13 Atl. 261, 263, a slander suit, the defendant on a privileged occasion used strong language, but this court held that his motive "did not betray the defendant into any expression beyond what was pertinent to the subject of * * * (the) inquiry, and was honestly believed by the defendant, and therefore was legalized by the privileged occasion and motive." The inference is open that, if the language used had been "beyond what was pertinent to the subject of * * * (the) inquiry," another view of defendant's liability would have been taken. In the case at bar the language was not spoken, but written; and was not in response to any inquiry, confidential or otherwise, but was manifestly volunteered. Hence it clearly exceeded the demands of the occasion; and in such case we think the true rule is that such excessive language is not covered by the privilege.

If, however, the rule be otherwise, the judgment below is not necessarily erroneous. The burden of showing privilege is on the defendant, and if he sustains it the plaintiff may still hold him liable by showing express malice. Fahr v. Hayes, supra. This might appear from the very language used. Id.; 25 Cyc. 387. As we read this letter, its very language was evidence justifying the jury, or the court sitting as a jury, in finding the existence of express malice.

The other points made are insignificant. * * *[62] Judgment affirmed.

JENOURE v. DELMEGE.

(Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. (1891] A. C. 73.)

On appeal from the Supreme Court of Jamaica.

This was an action of libel brought by the respondent Delmege against the appellant Jenoure. Delmege was a Government medical officer. Jenoure was a justice of the peace, residing in the same parish. The libel was contained in the following letter signed by Jenoure as justice of the peace and sent by him to the inspector of constabulary for the district:

"Sir—I have been informed on good authority that Dr. Delmege, of Manchioneal was called by one Lindsay (who, I believe, is his servant) to attend a woman in labour named Zipporah Henry, of Manchioneal, on Sunday, 8th January; that, although implored by Lindsay to attend the woman, the doctor refused to do so without the fee, and that consequently the woman died on Monday morning from want of medical attendance. I shall be obliged in the interest of humanity, especially as I am informed it is by no means an uncommon occurrence for Doctor Delmege to refuse to attend such cases, if you will inquire into this matter and if the facts prove to be as stated, that you will report the case to the proper authority, as such wilful neglect cannot be allowed."

The appellant pleaded that the statements contained in the letter were true in substance and in fact, and that the occasion of the publication was privileged. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff with £50 damages, and judgment was entered accordingly.

A motion for a new trial was granted on the ground of misdirection with regard to the question of privilege. But on argument, the Court unanimously confirmed the judgment. The appellant subsequently obtained special leave from Her Majesty in Council to prefer an appeal. In the Privy Council the judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD MACNAGHTEN.[63] * * * The Chief Justice told the jury that it was the duty of the appellant, as a justice of the peace, to bring circumstances such as those mentioned in his letter to the notice of the proper authorities. Their Lordships may observe in passing that, in their opinion, nothing turns on the position of the appellant as a justice of the peace. To protect those who are not able to protect themselves is a duty which every one owes to society. The Chief Justice went on to tell the jury that the proper authority to whom such a complaint should have been submitted was the superintending medical officer; but he also told them that, if they thought that the appellant had addressed the letter to the inspector of constabulary by an honest unintentional mistake as to the proper authority to deal with the complaint, then the communication would not be deprived of any privilege to which it would have been entitled had it been addressed to the superintending medical officer. So far the summing up seems to be open to no objection.

The Chief Justice then proceeded to explain to the jury that the existence of privilege was contingent on whether in their opinion, the appellant honestly believed the statements contained in the letter to be true. The meaning of the Chief Justice is made perfectly clear by what follows. After referring to the cases where the alleged defamatory matter was spoken or written by masters with reference to the characters of servants, he points out that, in such cases, "no question as to the bona fides of the defendant arises as preliminary to the existence of privilege." Where, however, "it is alleged that the defamatory communication was made in discharge of a duty," his view was that the defendant must "satisfy the jury that he made the communication with a belief in its truth." "No doubt," he adds, "the dicta of some of the judges in the masters and servants cases cited seem to extend to all classes of privileged communications; but no case was cited, and I have been able to find none, where, when privilege was claimed on the ground that the communication was made in discharge of a duty, it has been held that the plaintiff, to support his action, must prove express malice. In the one case there can be no room for doubt that, if the defendant established the relation which existed between him and the plaintiff, a privilege arises which can only be overcome by proof of express malice. In the other, the authorities already cited shew that, where a defendant claims privilege in respect of a charge of misconduct volunteered by him, he must satisfy the jury that he acted bona fide before the question of privilege arises for the determination of the judge."

There can be no doubt, therefore, that the learned Chief Justice gave the jury to understand that it lay upon the appellant to prove affirmatively that he honestly believed the statements contained in the alleged libel to be true, and that, unless and until that was made out by him to their satisfaction, it was not incumbent on the respondent to prove express malice.

Curran, J., took the same view of the authorities, and Northcote, J., concurred.

Notwithstanding some dicta which, taken by themselves and apart from the special circumstances of the cases in which they are to be found, may seem to support the view of the Chief Justice, their Lordships are of opinion that no distinction can be drawn between one class of privileged communications and another, and that precisely the same considerations apply to all cases of qualified privilege. "The proper meaning of a privileged communication," as Parke, B., observes, Wright v. Woodgate, 2 C., M. & R. 577, "is only this: that the occasion on which the communication was made rebuts the inference prima facie arising from a statement prejudicial to the character of the plaintiff, and puts it upon him to prove that there was malice in fact—that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made." There is no reason why any greater protection should be given to a communication made in answer to an inquiry with reference to a servant's character than to any other communication made from a sense of duty, legal, moral, or social. The privilege would be worth very little if a person making a communication on a privileged occasion were to be required, in the first place, and as a condition of immunity, to prove affirmatively that he honestly believed the statement to be true. In such a case bona fides is always to be presumed.

Their Lordships consider the law so well settled that it is not in their opinion necessary to review the authorities cited by the Chief Justice. The last case on the subject is Clark v. Molyneux, 3 Q. B. D. 237, to which, unfortunately, the attention of the Supreme Court was not called. That was a case, not of master and servant, but of a communication volunteered from a sense of duty. A verdict was found for the plaintiff. But it was set aside by the Court of Appeal on the ground of misdirection. In giving his judgment, Cotton, L. J., used the following language, every word of which is applicable to the present case. "The burden of proof," he says, "lay upon the plaintiff to shew that the defendant was actuated by malice; but the learned judge told the jury that the defendant might defend himself by the fact that these communications were privileged, but that the defendant must satisfy the jury that what he did he did bona fide, and in the honest belief that he was making statements which were true. It is clear that it was not for the defendant to prove that he was acting from a sense of duty, but for the plaintiff to satisfy the jury that the defendant was acting from some other motive than a sense of duty." [64]

Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that there was a misdirection on a material point, which may have led to a miscarriage. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the jury could have done anything but find for the plaintiff, having regard to the way in which the question was presented to them. The jury were told that it was for the defendant to prove that he honestly believed the statements in his letter to be true; whereas the letter itself put these statements forward, not as matters of the truth of which the writer has satisfied himself, but as matters calling for inquiry and consideration by the proper authorities.

[64] Compare: Henry v. Moberly (1893) 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981: A complaint in an action for libel alleged that the defendant, who with two others constituted a board of school trustees before whom the plaintiff's application for employment as a teacher was pending, filed his protest before this board, objecting in "false, malicious, and libelous language" to plaintiff's employment. The defendant's charge was that the plaintiff "had claimed wages not due her" and to obtain them "had made statements which in my opinion she knew to be false." The complaint was held demurrable. "In her complaint appellee avers that appellant published the 'malicious' language quoted. This expression, without explanation, would be equivalent to saying that he so published the words without sufficient excuse. In the same connection, however, in the complaint, the facts are stated which disclose a legal excuse, unless he was prompted by express or actual malice. Inasmuch as she has stated these facts, it appears to us, on reason and analogy, that it was incumbent on her to allege that he acted maliciously. If he was in fact prompted by malicious motives, instead of a desire to discharge the duties of his office, in publishing the defamatory matter recited in his protest, he is, under the authorities, undoubtedly liable; but when appellee concedes, as she does in her complaint, the privilege under which appellant was acting on the only occasion of which she complains, it is then incumbent on her to aver facts sufficient to negative the rights which accrue to him on account of such privilege." Per Davis, J. And see Henry v. Moberly (1899) 23 Ind. App. 305, 51 N. E. 497. See also the opinion of Collins, M. R., in Thomas v. Bradbury, Agnew & Co., [1906] 2 K. B. 627, given in text infra.

Their Lordships think that the verdict cannot stand; that the judgment entered thereon, and the orders of the 26th of July, 1888, and the 5th of September, 1888, ought to be discharged, and that there ought to be a new trial; but only on the terms that the plea of justification is not to be raised again. It seems to their Lordships that that issue has been finally disposed of. * * *

BAVINGTON v. ROBINSON.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1914. 124 Md. 85, 91 Atl. 777.)

This was an action, by Bavington against Robinson, for slander. Under the instructions of the court below, a verdict was rendered for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment thereon. The declaration, framed in several counts, alleged the following defamatory statements by the defendant of the plaintiff:

"Don't you know you are stealing my corn? Well, you are." "Don't you know you are criminally liable? You are." "I (meaning the defendant) am going to see the state's attorney; you (meaning the plaintiff) have been robbing me long enough."

* * * The defendant pleaded the general issue, and filed a special plea of justification to the second count. At the conclusion of the testimony for the plaintiff the court directed a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the alleged slanderous words were privileged and the plaintiff had failed to offer any proof of express malice; and it is from that ruling that the only question in this appeal arises. * * *

From the testimony it appears that the appellant is a young man engaged in farming, and has canned tomatoes since 1906 in his home county, Harford. * * * The appellee is a canner and canned goods broker. The canning operations of the appellant had been financed since their beginning by the appellee until the difficulty which gave rise to this suit. The business of the appellant did not prosper, * * * and, in 1908, he gave to the appellee a bill of sale to cover his indebtedness to him of $2,000. * * * The property under this bill of sale included 250 barrels of corn, then in the field unhusked, the number of barrels being estimated, as well as a lot of farming machinery and some live stock, all of which remained in the possession of the appellant. On the 18th of December, 1909, the appellee loaned the appellant $700 on the joint note of the appellant and his father, payable two months after date. The appellant agreed with the appellee at this time that the corn that was covered by the bill of sale should be hauled and sold by him and the proceeds therefrom applied to the payment of the note. It was not agreed, however, that it should be hauled at once, but in several conversations it was agreed that it should be held until it advanced to $4 a barrel. On February 21, 1910, the appellant was standing in the corridor of the Bel Air courthouse, talking with some people, when the appelleee called to him. After the appellant had walked over to him the appellee said to him: "How about that corn, have you hauled any of it out?" Appellant told him he had hauled out about 35 barrels. Upon the appellee demanding the money the appellant told him he had part of it to his credit in bank, a part his father, with whom he lived, had, and a part of the corn had not been paid for, and that since he had not the weights with him he could not tell how much he had received, and, therefore, could not pay him that day. Whereupon, shaking his finger at him, the appellee in a loud voice spoke the words set out in the declaration. Several persons, who were in the corridor of the courthouse, testified as to the use of these words and the manner of the appellee.

The only question presented, is, should the court have ruled, upon this state of facts, that the appellee was entitled to the protection of a privileged communication? The law upon the subject of privilege is too well settled to admit of serious controversy. The statement of the testimony shows that if this is to be classed as a privileged communication, it is of course a qualified privilege. Malice is the essential of the action of slander, but it is not necessary that it be proved; when once the slanderous words are proved, malice is presumed. However, when the words alleged to be slanderous are embraced in the class of privileged communications, the plaintiff is bound to prove the existence of malice as the real motive of the defendant's language. * * *

It is a question for the court to decide, in the first instance, whether words alleged to have been slanderous were privileged by the occasion, assuming them to have been spoken in good faith, without malice, and in the belief that they were true; and, if so privileged, then the plaintiff must show express malice in order to recover. And if there is any evidence tending to prove express malice, that question should be submitted to the jury. Brow v. Hathaway, 13 Allen (Mass.) 239; Fresh v. Cutter, 73 Md. 87, 20 Atl. 774, 10 L. R. A. 67, 25 Am. St. Rep. 575. But it is proper for the court, where the facts are controverted, to instruct the jury as to what facts amount to privilege, and leave it to the jury to determine whether those facts are proved. Brinsfield v. Howeth, 107 Md. 278, 68 Atl. 566, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 583. "But the plaintiff has the right, notwithstanding the privileged character of the communication, to go to the jury, if there be evidence tending to show actual malice, as when the words unreasonably impute crime, or the occasion of their utterance is such as to indicate, by its unnecessary publicity or otherwise, a purpose wrongfully to defame the plaintiff. * * * Expressions in excess of what the occasion warrants do not per se take away the privilege, but such excess may be evidence of malice." Fresh v. Cutter, supra.

Applying the above principles to the facts of the present case, it is plain that the occasion of the utterance of the slanderous words was such as to throw upon the appellant the burden of showing express malice. We are also of the opinion that the court was in error in ruling that there was no evidence tending to show the existence of malice.

Could the appellee have believed, from the facts known to him, that the appellant was guilty of crime? It is true he had a bill of sale upon the corn, but from the testimony it was a bill of sale in form only. It was clearly a mortgage. The only evidence in the case shows he had directed the appellant to sell the corn. When the appellant was in the act of carrying out this direction he was accused of a crime. Therefore, if the jury should find from the evidence that the accuser did not believe the accusation he had made was true, there would be a fact from which they could infer malice. The use of the words, "You have been robbing me long enough," might also tend to show malice, if the jury should think they were in excess of what the occasion demanded. Did not the facts tend to show, in the light of the knowledge the appellant had, that it was an unreasonable imputation of crime? If, then, the jury could have found from them malice, it was not for the court to pass its judgment upon them, but to have left that question to be determined by the jury, with proper instructions from the court.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded, with costs to the appellant.[65]

(King's Bench Division. [1913] 3 K. B. 764.)

The defendant the Reverend Canon G. S. Streatfeild wrote a pamphlet containing defamatory statements of the plaintiff and employed the other defendants, the Robert Spennell Press, a firm of printers, to print and publish it. The pamphlet was circulated only among those who had a common interest with the defendant Canon Streatfeild in the contents. As regards him a qualified privilege was admitted. The Court was of opinion that as it was a natural and proper course to print the pamphlet in order to get it published to those having a common interest in its contents, the privilege extended to the printers also. The jury found that Canon Streatfeild was actuated by malice in publishing the pamphlet, but that the printers were not.

McCardie, for the defendants the Robert Spennell Press. These defendants are entitled to judgment. The evidence must shew that the defendants themselves were actuated by malice; otherwise the plaintiff cannot recover against them. It is not enough to shew that some one else was so affected: Hennessy v. Wright (1888) 24 Q. B. D.

445, n. In an action against the publisher of a magazine evidence of the writer's personal malice is inadmissible: Robertson v. Wylde (1838) 2 Moo. & R. 101.

Further, these defendants having printed and published the pamphlet in the ordinary course of business may claim a privilege separate and distinct from that of their co-defendant. Where matter is published on a privileged occasion all incidental acts such as printing or copying, if done in the ordinary course of business, are privileged also: Baker v. Garrick (1894) 1 Q. B. 838.

Sir F. Low, in reply. There is no authority for the position that printers can claim privilege on the ground that printing was in the ordinary course of their business and incidental to the publication of the matter complained of. The words of Lord Macnaghten in Macintosh v. Dun, [1908] A. C. 390, at p. 400, apply most aptly to these defendants: "What is their motive? Is it a sense of duty? Certainly not. It is a matter of business with them. Their motive is self-interest. They carry on their trade, just as other traders do, in the hope and expectation of making a profit." They admit the printing and publication of a libel. The only way in which they can set up a privilege is by sheltering themselves behind their co-defendant. His privilege does not cover him and consequently they stand unprotected.

BANKES, J. * * * It remains only to consider the proposition contended for by Mr. McCardie that the printers are entitled to judgment, as the jury have negatived any malice on their part. Mr. McCardie's contention in substance amounted to this, namely, that his clients' privilege was what he called an incidental privilege—that is to say, that, though it arose out of the same facts as constituted the privilege of Canon Streatfeild, it was independent of it in the sense that his clients were entitled to the protection of the privilege even though Canon Streatfeild might have disentitled himself to any protection. It appears to me that Mr. McCardie's argument fails, whether the question is regarded from the point of view of the law applicable to privilege, or of the law applicable to the case of joint tortfeasors.

To take the last first: the publication here complained of was a joint publication—that is to say, a single publication to each rural dean for which both defendants were jointly responsible. This publication was admitted by the printers. The finding of the jury establishes the fact that the defendant Canon Streatfeild was a tortfeasor as regards this publication. It necessarily follows, in my opinion, that the printers are joint tortfeasors with him. The ordinary rule of law is that each tortfeasor is liable for all the consequences of the joint tort. In Clark v. Newsam (1847) 1 Ex. 131, Rolfe, B., states the rule thus: "When two persons have so conducted themselves as to be liable to be jointly sued, each is responsible for the injury sustained by their common act." In my opinion it follows from this rule of law that in the case of a joint publication of a libel each tortfeasor is liable for the malice of the other. It may very well be that in assessing damages the jury may take into account the fact that one of the two persons jointly responsible for the publication of the libel may be morally blameless, and may consequently refuse to give anything in the nature of vindictive damages in a verdict which will affect him, but this does not affect his liability for the publication.

The same result, in my opinion, follows if the matter is looked at from the point of view of privilege. The principle upon which the law of qualified privilege rests is, I think, this: that where words are published which are both false and defamatory the law presumes malice on the part of the person who publishes them. The publication may, however, take place under circumstances which create a qualified privilege. If so, the presumption of malice is rebutted by the privilege, and in an action for libel or slander founded on a publication upon a privileged occasion the plaintiff has to prove express malice on the part of the person responsible for the publication. The effect of proving express malice is sometimes spoken of as defeating the privilege. This is a convenient expression, and conveys in a single word a correct idea of what has really happened, namely, that although the occasion remains a privileged occasion, the privilege afforded by the occasion ceases to be an effective weapon of defence. The reason for this is obvious. Qualified privilege is a defence only to the extent that it throws on the plaintiff the burden of proving express malice. Directly the plaintiff succeeds in doing this the defence vanishes, and it becomes immaterial that the publication was on a privileged occasion. Qualified privilege in one sense may be said to be the privilege of the individual, in that it arises out of the circumstances in which the individual is placed, but as a defence it is attached to the publication. Where therefore, as here, the plaintiff is complaining of a joint publication, if the defence of privilege as to that publication fails because of the proof of express malice, it fails, in my opinion, altogether, and the plaintiff establishes his right to succeed in respect of that particular publication.

From whichever point of view, therefore, Mr. McCardie's contention is approached, the result is, in my opinion, the same, and his clients cannot derive any benefit, so far as liability for the publication of the libel is concerned, from the fact that the jury have negatived any express malice on their part. In the result, therefore, I give judgment against both defendants for £50 damages.

THOMAS v. BRADBURY, AGNEW & CO., Limited, et al.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1906] 2 K. B. 627.)

The plaintiff was a journalist, and the author of a book entitled "Fifty Years of Fleet Street, being the Life and Recollections of Sir John R. Robinson." The defendants Bradbury, Agnew & Co. were the proprietors and publishers of "Punch," to which the other defendant, Henry W. Lucy, contributed articles under the pseudonym of "Toby, M. P." Sir John Robinson was a journalist who had been at one time the editor and for many years the manager of the "Daily News," until his retirement in 1901. He died in 1903. The plaintiff had been his private secretary. The alleged libel was in the following review, published in "Punch":

"Mangled Remains.

"Extract from the Recess Diary of Toby, M. P.

"Been reading 'Fifty Years of Fleet Street,' just issued by Macmillan. Purports to be the 'Life and Recollections of Sir John Robinson,' the man who made, and for a quarter of a century maintained at high level, the Daily News. The story is written by Mr. F. M. Thomas, who has added a new terror to death. There are biographies of sorts ranging in value with the personality of the subject and the skill of the compiler. The former occasionally suffers from the incapacity of the latter. But at least his individuality is scrupulously observed. Like Don José, what he has said he has said, his observations and written memoranda not being mixed up with what his biographer thinks he himself thought, uttered and recorded. Mr. Thomas goes about the biographer's business in fresh fashion, complacently announced by way of introduction to the volume. 'I have not thought it necessary or desirable,' he writes, 'to indicate in all cases what is his (Sir John Robinson's) and what is my own. If there is anything amusing or entertaining in these pages, I am quite content that my dear old chief should have the credit of it. The dulness I take upon myself.' Here is generosity! Here is magnanimity! It is true that in the performance of his task Mr. Thomas occasionally falls from his high estate. More than once he airily alludes to 'our diary'—'our notes,' as if he had prepared them in collaboration with his chief. Possibly conscious for a moment of this indiscretion, and reverting to a more generous mood, he, approaching a particular narrative, introduces it with the remark, 'the incident may be given in the diarist's own words.' The procedure is perhaps not unusual with the earlier biographers. With Mr. Thomas the lapse is rare. When he does let the hapless subject speak for himself, he is relegated to small type. For the rest it is Mr. Thomas who loquitur, retelling poor Robinson's cherished stories as if they were his own, sometimes with heavy hand brushing off the bloom. Even in these depressing circumstances there is no mistaking Robinson's sly humor, his gift of graphic characterization. The worst of it is that, happening in the very same page upon some banal remark, some pompous platitude, the alarmed reader, recognizing Mr. Thomas, hastily turns over half a dozen pages, and possibly misses a handful of the genuine ore. These are hard lines, unjust to Robinson, unfair to the public. It is plain to see from the few unmutilated extracts from Robinson's manuscript which illuminate the book, that the materials at hand for a delightful biography were abundant. For nearly forty years the manager of the Daily News lived in the very heart of things. He was behind most scenes of public life, was more or less intimately acquainted with the principal personages figuring in it. His sympathies were bountifully wide, his observation alert, his sense of humor keen. He loved his newspaper work with almost passionate affection. For him fifty years of Fleet Street was worth a cycle of Cathay. That he habitually made notes of what he saw and heard with a view to publication in biographical form is undoubted; Mr. Thomas, impregnable in the chain armor of complacency, positively admits it. 'Robinson' he says, 'did leave some diaries —our diaries—more or less fragmentary, and a number of thick, closely written volumes of jottings in his own handwriting, descriptive of events of which he had been an eye-witness, and people he had seen and known.' Where is this treasure trove? Presumably portions the biographer was good enough to regard as worth adapting are filtered through the wordy pages of larger type. Happily the material is so good, its original literary form so excellent, that even this unparalled atrocity cannot quite spoil the book. We who knew Robinson on his throne on Bouverie Street and at the well known table in the dining room of the Reform Club, rich in the recollections of William Black, Payn, and Sala; who watched him enjoying himself like a boy at theatre first nights; who recognized his rare capacity as a newspaper man; who knew the kind heart hidden behind a studiously cultured severity of manner in business relations—we, perhaps, jealously cherish his memory, and regret the surprising chance that has made possible this slight upon it."

The plaintiff claimed damages for libel in respect of this review. The defendants pleaded that the words complained of were incapable of a defamatory meaning; and further, that they were written and published as a criticism and fair comment upon the plaintiff's book without any malice towards the plaintiff, and were a fair and bona fide criticism upon the book which was a matter of public interest.

At the trial the plaintiff's case was first, that the language of the review itself was such as to furnish evidence that the writer was not in truth criticizing the book, but was maliciously attacking the author; and, secondly, that there was evidence outside the review that the defendant Lucy, in writing the criticism, was actuated by malice towards the plaintiff. As extrinsic evidence of malice the plaintiff relied upon the strained relations between Lucy and himself before the criticism was published; on the fact that the criticism was published as a separate article under the heading "Mangled Remains," and was not included in that part of the journal usually devoted to the reviews of books under the heading "Our Booking Office"; and on the answers and demeanour of Lucy in the witness box at the trial. At the close of the plaintiff's case counsel for the defendants submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, upon the grounds that the article was incapable of defamatory meaning, and that there was no evidence that it exceeded the limits of fair comment. The judge declined to withdraw the case from the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff with £300 damages. The defendants appealed.[67]

COLLINS, M. R. * * * The defendants do not complain of misdirection other than that involved in holding that there was any evidence fit for the consideration of a jury. They ask for judgment on the ground that there was nothing in the article which any reasonable jury could find to fall outside the limits of fair comment, or in the alternative they ask for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. * * *

I have already said that extrinsic evidence of malice, which I have attempted to summarize, was allowed to go to the jury. The defendants contended that this evidence amounted to nothing, that no reasonable jury could act upon it, but they also raised a contention, which alone, as it seems to me, gives any importance to this case. Their point was that if the article itself, apart from the extrinsic evidence, did not raise a case for the jury that the bounds of fair comment had been overstepped, proof of actual malice on the part of the writer could not affect the question or disturb his immunity. This is a formidable contention. It involves the assertion that fair comment is absolute, not relative, and must be measured by an abstract standard; that it is a thing quite apart from the opinions and motives of its author and his personal relations towards the writer of the thing criticized. It involves the position also that an action based on a criticism is wholly outside the ordinary law of libel, of which malice, express or implied, has always been considered to be the gist.

The basis of this contention, such as it is, appears to be a misconception of the effect of the gloss, if I may so phrase it, first put upon the law of libel in relation to fair comment in the dicta of Crompton, J., and Blackburn, J., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 B. & S. 769, at pp. 778, 780, decided in 1863, and subsequently approved in Merivale v. Carson, 20 Q. B. D. 275, decided in 1887. * * *[68] In cases of [68] "What is the principle upon which the defence [of fair comment] is founded, and what are the limits of its application?

"As to the first point there are two rival theories. The one is that expounded by the Court of Common Pleas (Willes, Byles, and Brett, JJ.) in Henwood v. Harrison (1872) L. R. 7 C. P. 606. The Court there says (at p. 622): 'The principle upon which these cases are founded is an universal one, that the public convenience is to be preferred to private interests, and that communications which the interests of society require to be unfettered may freely be made by persons acting honestly without actual malice, notwithstanding that they involve relevant comments condemnatory of individuals.' And the Court therefore came to the conclusion (at p. 625) 'that the fair and honest discussion of, or comments upon, a matter of public interest is in point of law privileged, and that it is not the subject of an action, unless the plaintiff can establish malice.' In other words, the Court in that case held that the defence of 'fair comment' is merely a branch of the defence of 'qualified privilege' in the ordinary sense.

"The rival view was first expounded by Blackburn and Crompton, JJ., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode (1863) 3 B. & S. 769, 32 L. J. Q. B. 185, and has since received the adhesion of the Court of Appeal in Merivale v. Carson (1887) 20 Q. B. D. 275. In the first of these cases, Blackburn, J., puts the matter thus: 'I think it of considerable consequence to bear in mind that the case is not one of privilege, properly so called, but the question is whether the article complained of is a libel or not.' And Crompton, J., says: 'The first question is libel or no libel, which is for the jury; and they have to say whether the writing complained of goes beyond fair comment: if it does not it is no libel.' * * *

"What then would be the logical solution of the matter? That the true basis of the defence of 'fair comment' is that laid down in Henwood v. Harrison, and not that laid down in Campbell v. Spottiswoode and Merivale v. Carson. Both Blackburn, J., in the former case, and Bowen, L. J., in the privilege, properly so called, nothing that falls outside the privilege is protected by it, and if defamatory it must be otherwise justified. The occasion being privileged, the extent of the privilege may vary according to the nature of the case and the limits of the right or duty which is the basis of the privilege. But this is precisely the position in the case where the right exercised is one shared by the rest of the public, and not one limited to an individual or a class. The extent of the right has to be ascertained, and in respect of any communication which falls within it the immunity, if it be not absolute, can be displaced only by proof of malice. In the case of comment on literary works the occasion is created by the publication, and a right then arises to criticize honestly, however adversely. No such occasion arises in respect of a private unpublished letter. If a writer were to get hold of a private letter of a well known author and publish a damnatory article on the author's literary style and taste, as evidenced by the letter, it seems to me that he would have no immunity from the ordinary law in respect of defamatory writings. The only difference then, in the legal incidents of ordinary privilege, limited to individuals on the one hand and the right in the public to criticize on the other, would seem to me that one might, with somewhat less latitude than the other, though not perhaps, with perfect accuracy, be described as "privilege." * * *

latter, distinguish the defence of 'fair comment' from that of 'privilege,' properly so called, by saying that the latter is the peculiar right of a particular individual under particular conditions, a true privilegium; while 'fair comment' is the right of every member of the public. With the greatest deference to the opinion of these two great lawyers, is that distinction sound? It may possibly be correct as regards what is known as 'absolute privilege'—the privilege of a Member of Parliament, a Judge upon the Bench, and the like. But is not 'qualified privilege' the equal right of all the world? It is the occasion which is privileged and not the man. Every one has an equal right to use defamatory language in giving the character of a servant, in making complaint of a subordinate to his superior, and the like. It does not depend upon his position in life, or upon his being a member of any particular class. It is based solely upon public utility. It is hard to see any logical distinction between the defence of 'fair comment' and that of 'qualified privilege' in the ordinary sense. It is to the public advantage that public matters and the actions of public men should be fully and freely discussed, and, therefore, although in such discussion defamatory language may be used, it is privileged. The 'occasion' which gives rise to the 'privilege' is the discussion of matters of public importance, and of those alone: in which sense the privilege is limited by the 'occasion' just as any other kind of 'qualified privilege.' The true view would therefore seem to be that the decision in Henwood v. Harrison is right—that 'fair comment' is only a form of 'qualified privilege,' and that proof of actual malice will do away with the protection which would otherwise prevail. But how? Surely not by importing a kind of defamatory flavour into that which would otherwise not be defamatory, but on a different principle. Certain occasions justify the use of defamatory words, but on public grounds alone. If a man tries to make use of the occasion as a 'cloke of maliciousness,' he forfeits the special protection which he would otherwise enjoy, because the raison d'être of his defamatory statement is not a bona fide exercise of a public right, but a desire to gratify his private spite."

Mr. Francis R. Y. Radcliffe, 23 Law Quart. Rev. 97 (1907).

If the analysis be strictly carried out it will be found that the two rights, whatever name they are called by, are governed by precisely the same rules. The only practical difference is, that in an action based on a criticism of a published work the transaction begins, by the admission on the part of the plaintiff, implied from the averment by him of publication of the work criticized, that the comment came into existence on a protected occasion. He is placed, therefore, in precisely the same position as he would have been in had he sued in respect of a defamatory writing prima facie unprotected and therefore actionable, but had gone on to aver facts which created a privilege strictly so called.[69] Beginning thus at this stage in the transaction he would have accepted the onus of proving malice in fact. If he had veiled the fact that the writing criticized had become matter of public interest by publication it would have been prima facie libellous, and the defendant would have had to plead such a publication as would let in the right to comment on a matter of public interest in order to bring himself within the protection. * * *

It is of course possible for a person to have a spite against another and yet to bring a perfectly dispassionate judgment to bear upon his literary merits; but, given the existence of malice, it must be for the jury to say whether it has warped his judgment. Comment distorted by malice cannot in my opinion be fair on the part of the person who makes it. I am of opinion, therefore, that evidence of malice actuating the defendant was admissible, that the learned judge was right in letting the evidence in this case go to the jury.

But I am also of opinion on a close examination of the alleged libel that, apart from the extrinsic evidence of malice, the learned judge could not have withdrawn the case from the jury. One point made by the plaintiff would, I think, of itself suffice to establish this position. The defendant Lucy says in the alleged libel "it is plain to see from the few unmutilated extracts * * * that the materials at hand for a delightful biography were abundant." This statement was described by the plaintiff in a letter to the editor of "Punch" as "simply untrue." A short statement was thereupon published in the issue of December 7, in which the defendant, while accepting the plaintiff's statement as to the paucity of materials, quotes a passage from the preface to the book dealing with the existence of materials, and concludes thus: "Toby, M. P., had at the time of writing no knowledge of the subject beyond the definite statements quoted in the biographer's own words. He regrets that, accepting them in their ordinary sense, he received and conveyed an impression of Mr. Thomas's literary methods which turns out to have been erroneous." He is thus in the difficulty of having to admit a misstatement of fact in respect of which, to put it at the lowest, a question must arise for the jury whether the passage he relied upon justifies the statement. I think also that the learned judge could not have properly held that there was no evidence fit for the consideration of the jury as to some of the innuendoes averring imputations of discreditable motives. I am of opinion, therefore, that we could not direct judgment for the defendants without usurping the functions of the jury. Neither can we say that the evidence is so slight as to justify us in ordering a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence.

A point was made by the defendants' counsel that the plaintiff had admitted that he did not rely upon evidence of malice outside that which was to be inferred from the article itself. Some thing to this effect certainly appears in the Times report, but it has not found its way into the judge's note, and the point of personal spite was forcibly put by the plaintiff's counsel throughout the whole case, which the judge refused to withdraw from the jury without any limitation as to any of the evidence given. I think, therefore, that we should not be justified in treating this answer as excluding all extrinsic evidence of malice from the discussion. Libel or no libel, I need hardly add, is pre-eminently a question for the jury where there is any evidence fit for their consideration.[70]

VI. Other Acts at Peril

(A) Keeping His Fire

ANONYMOUS.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1583. Cro. Eliz. 10, 78 Reprint, 276.)

Snagg moved this case, and demanded the opinion of the Judges in it. J. S. with a gun at the door of his house shoots at a fowl, and by this fireth his own house, and the house of his neighbour; upon which he brings an action on the case generally, and doth not declare upon the custom of the realm, as 2 Hen. 4, viz. for negligently keeping his fire.

The question was, if this action doth lie? And all the Court held it did, for the injury is the same, although this mischance was not by a common negligence, but by misadventure:[71] and if he had counted upon the custom of the realm, as 2 Hen. 4, the action had not been well brought; yet "consuetudo regni est communis lex."

[70] Cozens-Hardy, L. J., and Sir Gorell Barnes, President, agreed with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

Case on the custom of the realm quare negligenter custodivit ignem suum in clauso suo, ita quod per flammas blada quer. in quodam clauso ipsius quer. combusta fuerunt. After verdict pro quer. it was objected, the custom extends only to fire in his house, or curtilage (like goods of guests), which are in his power. Non alloc. For the fire in his field is his fire as well as that in his house; he made it, and must see it does no harm, and answer the damage if it does. Every man must use his own so as not to hurt another; but if a sudden storm had risen which he could not stop, it was matter of evidence, and he should have shewed it. And Holt, Rokesby, and Eyre against the opinion of Turton, who went upon the difference between fire in an house which is in a man's custody and power, and fire in a field which is not properly so; and it would discourage husbandry, it being usual for farmers to burn stubble, etc. But the plaintiff had judgment according to the opinion of the other three.*

FAHN v. REICHART.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1859. 8 Wis. 255, 76 Am. Dec. 237.)

The complaint averred that the defendant on the 1st of April, 1858, carelessly set fire to a large log pile on his own lands and about three feet from the boundary of the plaintiff's lands; that the fire continued to burn for three days, when the wind blew hard, and blew the sparks

* "The short name of the action ('for negligent garder son feue') is a misleading one; it means merely 'for failing to keep in his fire,' and the responsibility was absolute." John H. Ten years after Tubervil v. Stamp, the Statute of 6 Anne, c. 31, § 6, provided that for the space of three years no action should be maintained "against any person in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin." This temporary act was declared in 1711 to "have been found useful and beneficial" and was then made perpetual. In 1774, the exemption from liability for accidental fires was extended to the person "in whose house, chamber, stable, barn, or other building, or on whose estate any fire shall accidentally begin." Stat. 14 Geo. III, c. 78, § 86.

and fire from the log pile, about twelve rods, to a straw stack of the plaintiff's, close to the plaintiff's barn, and so burnt the stack and barn with its contents. The answer denied the complaint. The verdict was for the defendant, and the plaintiff sued out this writ of error. The only point complained of was whether the instruction of the court was proper or not.[72]

COLE, J. We do not think that the plaintiff in error could have been prejudiced by the charge of the circuit court. For suppose the evidence had been clear and incontestible, that the defendant in error by himself or servants, had set fire to the logs and brush upon his own land, and that the fire had been communicated to the plaintiff's barn, and destroyed it; still the action might not be sustained. A man may burn logs and brush upon his own land. The act is not unlawful or necessarily attended with injurious consequences to his neighbors. So the jury would not only have to find that the defendant caused the fire to be set there, but also that there was negligence or carelessness in putting the fire at that place at the time. An action will not lie for any injury resulting from doing a lawful act in a lawful manner. "A possible damage to another in the cautious and prudent exercise of a lawful right is not to be regarded, and if a loss is the consequence, it is damnum absque injuria." Clark v. Foot, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 421; Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 92, 8 Am. Dec. 369; Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 220, 7 Am. Dec. 57.

The defendant could not be held answerable in damages for the reasonable and proper exercise of a lawful right, attended by a cautious regard for the rights of others, when there is no negligence, unskillfulness or malice in the act done. The charge seems to be predicated upon the idea that the defendant would be liable if he set on fire the brush and log heaps upon his own land, and the plaintiff's barn was burned from the sparks and cinders from this fire thus existing. But if the defendant was not guilty of negligence in the care and management of the fire set by him, he would not be liable. * * *

SECKERSON v. SINCLAIR.

(Supreme Court of North Dakota, 1913. 24 N. D. 625, 140 N. W. 239.)

Appeal from a judgment for $1,528.73 and interest thereon from the time of the injury, in all $1,664, for damages occasioned by a fire alleged in one count of the complaint to have been negligently set by the defendant, and in another to have been negligently allowed by him to spread from his land to that of the plaintiff.

BRUCE, J. * * *[74] The proposed instruction was also erroneous in that in it the court was requested to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover—

"unless the jury found that the fire was set by the defendant to the stubble, and negligently permitted to escape from the stubble to the prairie, and thence to and over and upon the lands of the plaintiffs, or any of them, and that it destroyed the alleged property."

This proposed instruction told the jury that, if the defendant set the fire, he was not liable unless he negligently permitted it to escape. This is not the law. Setting fire to prairie land in the month of March renders the one who does so absolutely liable. It is not even necessary, indeed, that it should have been done with any negligent or malicious purpose. Section 2061, R. C. 1905; 19 Cyc. 981; Thoburn v. Campbell, 80 Iowa, 338, 45 N. W. 769; Conn v. May, 36 Iowa, 241; Dunleavy v. Stockwell, 45 Ill. App. 230. We know that counsel contends that section 2061 does not specify straw stacks, but it does specify grass or stubble lands. To say that setting fire to a straw stack, which is in the midst of stubble, and, in turn, sets fire thereto, is not setting fire to the stubble itself is an absurdity. Kelley v. Anderson, 15 S. D. 107, 87 N. W. 579." * * *

Judgment for plaintiff, if interest remitted from date of injury to the verdict.[75]

[74] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point.

[75] Compare: St. Louis & San Francisco Ry. v. Mathews (1897) 165 U. S. 1, 22, 17 Sup. Ct. 243, 251 (41 L. Ed. 611). The question was whether a statute which made a railway company absolutely liable for damages by fire communicated by its locomotives to the property of others was constitutional. Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion, remarked:

"The learning and diligence of counsel have failed to discover an instance in which a statute, making railroad companies absolutely liable for damages by fire communicated from their locomotive engines to the property of others, has been adjudged to be unconstitutional, as to companies incorporated before or since its enactment. This review of the authorities leads to the following conclusions: First. The law of England, from the earliest times, held any one lighting a fire upon his own premises to the strictest accountability for damages caused by its spreading to the property of others. Second. The earliest statute which declared railroad corporations to be absolutely responsible, independently of negligence, for damages by fire communicated from their locomotive engines to property of others, was passed in Massachusetts in 1840, soon after such engines had become common. Third. In England, at the time of the passage of that statute, it was undetermined whether a railroad corporation, without negligence, was liable to a civil action, as at common law, for damages to property of others by fire from its locomotive engines; and the result that it was not so liable was subsequently reached after some conflict of judicial opinion, and only when the acts of Parliament had expressly authorized the corporation to use locomotive engines upon its railroad, and had not declared it to be responsible for such damages. Fourth. From the time of the passage of the Massachusetts statute of 1840 to the present time, a period of more than half a century, the validity of that and similar statutes has been constantly upheld in the courts of every State of the Union in which the question has arisen.

Trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close. Plea, the general issue.

The plaintiff proved that towards night, on June 27, the defendant's cow was grazing on the plaintiff's land. The defendant offered to

"In this court, the constitutionality of such a statute has never been directly drawn into judgment. But it appears to have been assumed in Grand Trunk Railway v. Richardson (1875) 91 U. S. 454, 472, 23 L. Ed. 356, and it rests upon principles often affirmed here. * * * The motives which have induced, and the reasons which justify, the legislation now in question, may be summed up thus: Fire, while necessary for many uses of civilized man, is a dangerous, volatile and destructive element, which often escapes in the form of sparks, capable of being wafted afar through the air, and of destroying any combustible property on which they fall; and which, when it has once gained headway, can hardly be arrested or controlled. Railroad corporations, in order the better to carry out the public object of their creation, the sure and prompt transportation of passengers and goods, have been authorized by statute to use locomotive engines propelled by steam generated by fires lighted upon those engines. It is within the authority of the Legislature to make adequate provision for protecting the property of others against loss or injury by sparks from such engines. The right of the citizen not to have his property burned without compensation is no less to be regarded than the right of the corporation to set it on fire. To require the utmost care and diligence of the railroad corporations in taking precautions against the escape of fire from their engines might not afford sufficient protection to the owners of property in the neighborhood of the railroads. When both parties are equally faultless, the Legislature may properly consider it to be just that the duty of insuring private property against loss or injury caused by the use of dangerous instruments should rest upon the railroad company, which employs the instruments and creates the peril for its own profit, rather than upon the owner of the property, who has no control over or interest in those instruments. The very statute now in question, which makes the railroad company liable to damages for property so destroyed, gives it, for its protection against such damages, an insurable interest in the property in danger of destruction, and the right to obtain insurance thereon in its own behalf; and it may obtain insurance upon all such property generally, without specifying any particular property. Eastern Railroad v. Relief Ins. Co. (1868) 98 Mass. 420. The statute is not a penal one, imposing punishment for a violation of law; but it is purely remedial, making the party, doing a lawful act for its own profit, liable in damages to the innocent party injured thereby, and giving to that party the whole damages, measured by the injury suffered. Grand Trunk Railway v. Richardson (1875) 91 U. S. 454, 472, 23 L. Ed. 356; Huntington v. Attrill (1892) 146 U. S. 657, 13 Sup. Ct. 224, 36 L. Ed. 1123. The statute is a constitutional and valid exercise of the legislative power of the State, and applies to all railroad corporations alike." prove that on June 27 he pastured this cow in a certain pasture, and that one Heath then pastured his cow in the same pasture; that on the evening in question, when Heath drove his cow home, he let the defendant's cow also out of pasture; that he did this without any authority, or the defendant's knowledge or assent; and that Heath drove the cow some distance from the pasture to a cross-roads, about 200 feet from the plaintiff's land, when she strayed along the road and into the plaintiff's land, which was unfenced.

On these facts, the defendant contended that he was not a trespasser merely because he owned the cow; that he had done no wrongful act; that Heath's act, being without the plaintiff's knowledge or assent, and without his authority, could not make him liable in trespass; that if there was any trespass, the action should have been against Heath.

There was no dispute as to the facts. The court ruled that the action could not be maintained, and a verdict was taken for the defendant.[76]

WOODS, C. J. "A man is answerable for not only his own trespass, but that of his cattle also; for if by his negligent keeping they stray upon the land of another (and much more if he permits or drives them on), and they there tread down his neighbor's herbage, and spoil his corn or his trees, this is a trespass for which the owner must answer in damages." 3 Black. Com. 211. Such is the law as stated in the words of the author of the Commentaries, which are themselves very high authority on such subjects, and such has been the uniform practice and understanding of the law in all times, so far as the books show, and it is therefore too late to inquire whether the remedy by an action of trespass is founded upon the strictest logical propriety,[77] where the cause of the damage is the negligence, and not the wilful act of the owner of the mischievous beasts.

It is hardly necessary to remark, but for the course of the defendant's argument, that the proposition quoted from Blackstone relates to the case in which the beasts "stray upon the land of another," and not to the case in which they are driven upon it by a stranger; for then the stranger is the author of the wrong, and the horse that he rides, or drives, is the mere passive instrument in his hands, and the owner of it, unless he have lent it for the purpose of the wrong, is as wholly guiltless as any other person. For in that case, the beast does not by the owner's negligent keeping stray upon the land of his neighbors.

It is substantially upon this ground that Tewksbury v. Bucklin, 7 N. H. 518, was decided; in which it was held that a party having the custody of the cattle was answerable for the trespass which they committed by straying upon another's inclosure.

[76] The statement of the case is slightly abridged.

[77] See Salmond on Torts (2d Ed.) 164, note 13; Id. 197, note 10.

The case finds that the cow "strayed along the road," and committed the act complained of. It would not be just to hold the party to the strict meaning of a single word, if it appeared by the context to have been used inaccurately; but it appears distinctly that the animal, although driven by Heath some distance from the pasture in the direction of the locus in quo, was not driven upon it so as to be in his hands a mere instrument for committing a trespass. Heath's trespass was upon the chattel of the defendant, but not upon the soil of the plaintiff. He abandoned the cow, and she being no longer in his custody, "strayed," and involved the owner in the consequences ordinarily incident to permitting beasts to stray into the inclosures of others.

When Heath abandoned the cow, she was about twelve rods from the lands of the plaintiff. From that period she was no longer under the control of Heath, but was again in the legal possession of the defendant, and under his general custody and control; and like other owners having the care and custody of their beasts at the time, he is answerable in trespass for her act in straying upon the close in question, and grazing there. * * *[78]

BROWN, Esq., v. GILES.

(At Nisi Prius, 1823. 1 Car. & P. 118, 28 R. R. 769.)

This was an action against the defendant, for breaking the plaintiff's close with dogs, &c., and trampling down his grass in a certain close, called Bryant's close, in the parish of A., on divers days. The defendant pleaded the general issue.

The usual notice not to trespass was proved; and a witness proved, that, after the notice, he saw the defendant walking down the turnpike road, and his dog jumped into the field, called Bryant's close.

PARK, J., was decidedly of opinion, that the dog jumping into the field, without the consent of its master, not only was not a wilful trespass, but was no trespass at all, on which an action could be maintained; he should therefore nonsuit the plaintiff.

MASON v. KEELING.

(Court of King's Bench, 1699. 12 Mod. 332, 88 Reprint. 1359.)

Action on the case; in which the plaintiff declared that on the twentieth of June, in the eleventh of the King, the defendant quendam canem molossum valde ferocem did keep, and let him go loose unmuzzled per publica compita, so that pro defectu curæ of the defendant the plaintiff was bit and worried by the said dog, as he was peaceably going about his business in such a street. There was another count, in which it was laid that the defendant knew the dog ad mordend. assuet. To the first count there was a demurrer, and to the second not guilty.

And it was strongly insisted, that the laying it to be canem valde ferocem, and suffered to go about the streets unmuzzled, and pro defecto curæ, supplied the want of sciens, &c., for it was said to be part of the excellency of the law of England, that it leaves no man without a remedy, that has suffered a wrong through the fault of another.[79] * * *

GOULD, J. No doubt but in the case of sheep there ought to be a sciens, because that is an accidental quality, and not in the nature of a dog. And as to property of a dog, the books distinguish; for a man has a property in a dog that is a mastiff or spaniel, for the one is for the guard of his house, the other for his pleasure; but this here is a mongrel, and laid to be valde ferocem, and that must be an innate fierceness, and not accidental; and if a dog be assuet. to bite cows and the master know it, that will not be sufficient knowledge to make him liable for his biting sheep. Besides, this case is distinguishable in respect of the place, for the law takes notice of highway, and is a security for passengers; and it would be dangerous to keep such dogs near the highway, where all sorts of people pass at all hours; and to maintain this issue, they must give a natural fierceness in evidence.

HOLT, C. J. If it had been said, that the defendant knew the dog to be ferox, I should think it enough. The difference is between things in which the party has a valuable property, for he shall answer for all damages done by them; but of things in which he has no valuable property, if they are such as are naturally mischievous in their kind, he shall answer for hurt done by them without any notice; but if they are of a tame nature, there must be notice of the ill quality; and the law takes notice that a dog is not of a fierce nature, but rather the contrary; and the presumption is against the plaintiff; for can it be imagined a man would keep a fierce dog in his family wittingly? If any beast in which I have a valuable property do damage in another's soil, in treading his grass, trespass will lie for it; but if my dog go into another man's soil, no action will lie. See the case of Millan v. Hawtree, 1 Jones, 131, that scienter is the gît of the action; and so is 1 Cro., where it was doubted whether the scienter should go to the keeping or quality; nor does it appear here but it was an accidental fierceness, or suppose it were an innate one to this dog particularly; and it had been given to the owner but an hour before, shall he take notice of all the qualities of his dog at his peril, or shall he have his action against the giver for bestowing him a naughty dog? In case a dog bites pigs, which almost all dogs will do, a scienter is necessary. 1 Cro. 255. And I do not doubt but if it be generally laid that a dog was used to bite animalia, and the defendant knew of it, it will be enough to charge him for biting of sheep, &c.; and by animalia shall not be intended frogs or mice, but such in which the plaintiff has property.

And judgment was given for the defendant by HOLT, Chief Justice, and TURTON, Justice; GOULD, Justice, mutante opinionem suam.[80]

MAY et ux. v. BURDETT.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1846. 9 Q. B. 101, 115 Reprint, 1213.)

LORD DENMAN, C. J., now delivered the judgment of the Court.[81]

This was a motion to arrest the judgment in an action on the case for keeping a monkey which the defendant knew to be accustomed to bite people, and which bit the female plaintiff. The declaration stated that the defendant wrongfully kept a monkey, well knowing that it was of a mischievous and ferocious nature and used and accustomed to attack and bite mankind, and that it was dangerous to allow it to be at large; and that the monkey, whilst the defendant kept the same as aforesaid, did attack, bite, and injure the female plaintiff, whereby, &c.

It was objected on the part of the defendant that the declaration was bad for not alleging negligence or some default of the defendant in not properly or securely keeping the animal; and it was said that, consistently with this declaration, the monkey might have been kept with due and proper caution, and that the injury might have been entirely occasioned by the carelessness and want of caution of the plaintiff herself.

[80] In the report of this case in 1 Ld. Raym. 606, 608, it is stated that the case was adjourned, and that afterwards the parties agreed, "and therefore no judgment was given."

On opinion of Holt, C. J., as reported in 1 Ld. Raym. 608, see the comment of Willes, J., in Cox v. Burbidge (1863) 13 C. B. N. S. 430, 440. And see 2 Cyc. 370, 371, note 84.

[81] The elaborate arguments of counsel are omitted. The declaration stated that the defendant "before and at the time of the damage and injury hereinafter mentioned to the said Sophia the wife of the said Stephen May, wrongfully and injuriously kept a certain monkey, he the defendant well knowing that the said monkey was of a mischievous and ferocious nature and was used and accustomed to attack and bite mankind, and that it was dangerous and improper to allow the said monkey to be at large and unconfined: which said monkey, whilst the defendant kept the same as aforesaid, heretofore and before the commencement of this suit, to wit on the 2nd of September 1844, did attack, bite, wound, lacerate and injure the said Sophia, then and still being the wife of said Stephen May, whereby the said Sophia became and was greatly terrified and alarmed, and became and was sick, sore, lame and disordered, and so remained and continued for a long time, to wit from the day and year last aforesaid to the time of the commencement of this suit; whereby, and in consequence of the alarm and fright occasioned by the said monkey so attacking, biting, wounding, lacerating and injuring her as aforesaid, the said Sophia has been greatly injured in her health," etc. This case was tried on the issue raised by a plea of not guilty.

A great many cases and precedents were cited upon the argument; and the conclusion to be drawn from them appears to us to be that the declaration is good upon the face of it; and that whoever keeps an animal accustomed to attack and bite mankind, with knowledge that it is so accustomed, is prima facie liable in an action on the case at the suit of any person attacked and injured by the animal, without any averment of negligence or default in the securing or taking care of it. The gist of the action is the keeping the animal after knowledge of its mischievous propensities.

The precedents, both ancient and modern, with scarcely an exception, merely state the ferocity of the animal and the knowledge of the defendant, without any allegation of negligence or want of care. A great many were referred to upon the argument, commencing with the Register and ending with Thomas v. Morgan, 2 C. M. & R. 496, 5 Tyr. 1085; and all in the same form, or nearly so. In the Register, 110, 111, two precedents of writs are given, one for keeping a dog accustomed to bite sheep, and the other for keeping a boar accustomed to attack and wound other animals. The cause of action, as stated in both these precedents, is the propensity of the animals, the knowledge of the defendant, and the injury to the plaintiff; but there is no allegation of negligence or want of care. In the case of Mason v. Keeling, 1 Ld. Ray. [606], and 12 Mod. [332], much relied upon on the part of the defendant, want of due care was alleged, but the scienter was omitted; and the question was, not whether the declaration would be good without the allegation of want of care, but whether it was good without the allegation of knowledge, which it was held that it was not. No case was cited in which it had been decided that a declaration stating the ferocity of the animal and the knowledge of the defendant was bad for not averring negligence also; but various dicta in the books were cited to show that this is an action founded on negligence, and therefore not maintainable unless some negligence or want of care is alleged.

In Comyns' Digest, tit. "Action upon the Case for Negligence" (A 5), it is said that "an action upon the case lies for a neglect in taking care of his cattle, dog, &c;" and passages were cited from the older authorities, and also from some cases at nisi prius, in which expressions were used showing that, if persons suffered animals to go at large, knowing them to be disposed to do mischief, they were liable in case any mischief actually was done; and it was attempted to be inferred from this that the liability only attached in case they were suffered to go at large or to be otherwise ill secured. But the conclusion to be drawn from an examination of all the authorities appears to us to be this: that a person keeping a mischievous animal with knowledge of its propensities is bound to keep it secure at his peril, and that if it does mischief, negligence is presumed, without express averment. The precedents as well as the authorities fully warrant this conclusion. The negligence is in keeping such an animal after notice. The case of Smith v. Pelah, 2 Stra. 1264, and a passage in 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 430,[82] put the liability on the true ground. It may be that if the injury was solely occasioned by the wilfulness of the plaintiff after warning, that may be a ground of defence, by plea in confession and avoidance; but it is unnecessary to give any opinion as to this; for we think that the declaration is good upon the face of it, and shows a prima facie liability in the defendant.

It was said, indeed, further, on the part of the defendant, that, the monkey being an animal feræ naturæ, he would not be answerable for injuries committed by it if it escaped and went at large without any default on the part of the defendant, during the time it had so escaped and was at large, because at that time it would not be in his keeping nor under his control; but we cannot allow any weight to this objection; for, in the first place, there is no statement in the declaration that the monkey had escaped, and it is expressly averred that the injury occurred whilst the defendant kept it: we are besides of opinion, as already stated, that the defendant, if he would keep it, was bound to keep it secure at all events.

The rule [to show cause why judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff with £50 damages should not be arrested] will therefore be discharged.

FILBURN v. PEOPLE'S PALACE & AQUARIUM CO., Limited.

(In the Court of Appeal, 1890. 25 Q. B. Div. 258.)

The action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff by his being attacked by an elephant, which was the property of the defendants, and was being exhibited by them. The learned judge left three questions to the jury: whether the elephant was an animal dangerous to man; whether the defendant knew the elephant to be dangerous; and whether the plaintiff brought the attack on himself. The jury answered all three questions in the negative. The learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiff for a sum agreed upon in case the plaintiff should be entitled to recover.

[82] After stating that "if a man have a beast, as a bull, cow, horse, or dog, used to hurt people, if the owner know not his quality, he is not punishable," etc. Hale adds (citing authorities) that "these things seem to be agreeable to law: (1) If the owner have notice of the quality of his beast, and it doth any body hurt, he is chargeable with an action for it. (2) Though he have no particular notice, that he did any such thing before, yet if it be a beast that is feræ naturæ, as a lion, a bear, a wolf, yea an ape or monkey, if he get loose and do harm to any person, the owner is liable to an action for the damage, and so I knew it adjudged in Andrew Baker's case, whose child was bit by a monkey, that broke his chain and got loose. (3) And therefore in case of such a wild beast, or in case of a bull or cow, that doth damage, where the owner knows of it, he must at his peril keep him up safe from doing hurt, for though he use his diligence to keep him up, if he escape and do harm, the owner is liable to answer damages." 1 Hale's P. C. 439, part 1, c. 33, as quoted in 9 Q. B. 112, note (b).

The defendants appealed.[83]

LORD ESHER, M. R. The only difficulty I feel in the decision of this case is whether it is possible to enunciate any formula under which this and similar cases may be classified. The law of England recognizes two distinct classes of animals; and as to one of those classes, it cannot be doubted that a person who keeps an animal belonging to that class must prevent it from doing injury, and it is immaterial whether he knows it to be dangerous or not. As to another class, the law assumes that animals belonging to it are not of a dangerous nature, and any one who keeps an animal of this kind is not liable for the damage it may do, unless he knew that it was dangerous. What, then, is the best way of dealing generally with these different cases? I suppose there can be no dispute that there are some animals that every one must recognize as not being dangerous on account of their nature. Whether they are feræ naturæ so far as rights of property are concerned is not the question; they certainly are not so in the sense that they are dangerous. There is another set of animals that the law has recognized in England as not being of a dangerous nature, such as sheep, horses, oxen, dogs, and others that I will not attempt to enumerate. I take it this recognition has come about from the fact that years ago, and continuously to the present time, the progeny of these classes has been found by experience to be harmless, and so the law assumes the result of this experience to be correct without further proof. Unless an animal is brought within one of these two descriptions,—that is, unless it is shown to be either harmless by its very nature, or to belong to a class that has become so by what may be called cultivation,—it falls within the class of animals as to which the rule is, that a man who keeps one must take the responsibility of keeping it safe. It cannot possibly be said that an elephant comes within the class of animals known to be harmless by nature, or within that shewn by experience to be harmless in this country, and consequently it falls within the class of animals that a man keeps at his peril, and which he must prevent from doing injury under any circumstances, unless the person to whom the injury is done brings it on himself. It was, therefore, immaterial in this case whether the particular animal was a dangerous one, or whether the defendants had any knowledge that it was so. The judgment entered was in these circumstances right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The last case of this kind discussed was May v. Burdett,[84] but there the monkey which did the mischief was said to be accustomed to attack mankind, to the knowledge of the person who kept it. That does not decide this case. We have had no case cited to us, nor any evidence, to shew that elephants in this country are not as a class dangerous; nor are they commonly known here to belong to the class of domesticated animals. Therefore a person who keeps one is liable, though he does not know that the particular one that he keeps is mischievous. Applying that principle to this case, it appears that the judgment for the plaintiff was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

[83] The argument in support of the appeal is omitted.

[84] (1846) 9 Q. B. 101.

BOWEN, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The broad principle that governs this case is that laid down in Fletcher v. Rylands,[85] that a person who brings upon his land anything that would not naturally come upon it, and which is in itself dangerous, must take care that it is kept under proper control. The question of liability for damage done by mischievous animals is a branch of that law which has been applied in the same way from the times of Lord Holt [86] and of Hale until now. People must not be wiser than the experience of mankind. If from the experience of mankind a particular class of animals is dangerous, though individuals may be tamed, a person who keeps one of the class takes the risk of any damage it may do. If, on the other hand, the animal kept belongs to a class which, according to the experience of mankind, is not dangerous, and not likely to do mischief, and if the class is dealt with by mankind on that footing, a person may safely keep such an animal, unless he knows that the particular animal that he keeps is likely to do mischief. It cannot be doubted that elephants as a class have not been reduced to a state of subjection; they still remain wild and untamed, though individuals are brought to a degree of tameness which amounts to domestication. A person, therefore, who keeps an elephant, does so at his own risk, and an action can be maintained for any injury done by it, although the owner had no knowledge of its mischievous propensities. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

(C) Extra-Hazardous Use

RYLANDS et al. v. FLETCHER.

This was a proceeding in error against a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, which had reversed a previous judgment of the Court of Exchequer.

In November, 1861, Fletcher brought an action against Rylands & Horrocks, to recover damages for an injury caused to his mines by water overflowing into them from a reservoir which the defendants had constructed. The declaration contained three counts, and each count alleged negligence on the part of the defendants, but in this House the case was ultimately treated upon the principle of determining the relative rights of the parties independently of any question of personal negligence by the defendants in the exercise of them.

The cause came on for trial at the Liverpool Summer Assizes of 1862, when it was referred to an arbitrator, who was afterwards directed, instead of making an award, to prepare a special case for the consideration of the Judges. This was done, and the case was argued in the Court of Exchequer in Trinity Term, 1865. The material facts of the case were these:

The plaintiff was the lessee of certain coal mines known as the Red House Colliery, under the Earl of Wilton. He had also obtained from two other persons, Mr. Hulton and Mr. Whitehead, leave to work for coal under their lands. The positions of the various properties were these: There was a turnpike road leading from Bury to Bolton, which formed a southern boundary to the properties of these different persons. A parish road, called the Old Wood Lane, formed their northern boundary. These roads might be described as forming two sides of a square, of which the other two sides were formed by the lands of Mr. Whitehead on the east and Lord Wilton on the west. The defendants' grounds lay along the turnpike road, or southern boundary, stretching from its centre westward. On these grounds were a mill and a small old reservoir. The proper grounds of the Red House Colliery also lay, in part, along the southern boundary, stretching from its centre eastward. Immediately north of the defendants' land lay the land of Mr. Hulton, and still farther north that of Lord Wilton. On this land of Lord Wilton the defendants, in 1860, constructed (with his Lordship's permission) a new reservoir, the water from which would pass almost in a southerly direction across a part of the land of Lord Wilton and the land of Mr. Hulton, and so reach the defendant's mill. The line of direction from this new reservoir to the Red Colliery mine was nearly southeast.

The plaintiff, under his lease from Lord Wilton, and under his agreements with Messrs. Hulton and Whitehead, worked the mines under their respective lands. In the course of doing so, he came upon old shafts and passages of mines formerly worked, but of which the workings had long ceased; the origin and the existence of these shafts and passages were unknown. The shafts were vertical, the passages horizontal, and the former especially seemed filled with marl and rubbish.

Defendants employed for the purpose of constructing their new reservoir persons who were admitted to be competent as engineers and contractors to perform the work, and there was no charge of negligence made against the defendants personally. But in the course of excavating the bed of the new reservoir, five old shafts, running vertically downwards, were met with in the portion of the land selected for its site. The case found that "on the part of the defendants there was no personal negligence or default whatever in or about, or in relation to, the selection of the said site, or in or about the planning or construction of the said reservoir; but, in point of fact, reasonable and proper care and skill were not exercised by, or on the part of, the persons so employed by them, with reference to the shafts so met with as aforesaid, to provide for the sufficiency of the said reservoir to bear the pressure of water which, when filled to the height proposed, it would have to bear."

The reservoir was completed at the beginning of December, 1860, and on the morning of the 11th of that month the reservoir, being then partially filled with water, one of the aforesaid vertical shafts gave way, and burst downwards, in consequence of which the water of the reservoir flowed into the old passages and coalworkings underneath, and by means of the underground communications then existing between them and the plaintiff's workings in the Red House Colliery, the colliery was flooded and the workings thereof stopped.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages by reason of the matters hereinbefore stated. The Court of Exchequer, Mr. Baron Bramwell dissenting, gave judgment for the defendants.[87] That judgment was afterwards reversed in the Court of Exchequer Chamber.[88] The case was then brought on error to this House.[89]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD CAIRNS). My Lords, in this case the plaintiff (I may use the description of the parties in the action) is the occupier of a mine and works under a close of land. The defendants are the owners of a mill in his neighbourhood, and they propose to make a reservoir for the purpose of keeping and storing water to be used about their mill upon another close of land, which, for the purposes of this case, may be taken as being adjoining to the close of the plaintiff, although, in point of fact, some intervening land lay between the two. Underneath the close of land of the defendants on which they proposed to construct their reservoir there were certain old and disused mining passages and works. There were five vertical shafts, and some horizontal shafts communicating with them. The vertical shafts had been filled up with soil and rubbish, and it does not appear that any person was aware of the existence either of the vertical shafts or of the horizontal works communicating with them. In the course of the working by the plaintiff of his mine, he had gradually worked through the seams of coal underneath the close, and had come into contact with the old and disused works underneath the close of the defendants.

In that state of things the reservoir of the defendants was constructed. It was constructed by them through the agency and inspection of an engineer and contractor. Personally, the defendants appear to have taken no part in the works, or to have been aware of any want of security connected with them. As regards the engineer and the contractor, we must take it from the case that they did not exercise, as far as they were concerned, that reasonable care and caution which they might have exercised, taking notice, as they appear to have taken notice, of the vertical shafts filled up in the manner which I have mentioned. However, my Lords, when the reservoir was constructed and filled, or partly filled, with water, the weight of the water bearing upon the disused and imperfectly filled-up vertical shafts, broke through those shafts. The water passed down them and into the horizontal workings, and from the horizontal workings under the close of the defendants it passed on into the workings under the close of the plaintiff, and flooded his mine, causing considerable damage, for which this action was brought.

[89] The argument of counsel is omitted.

The Court of Exchequer, when the special case stating the facts to which I have referred was argued, was of opinion that the plaintiff had established no cause of action. The Court of Exchequer Chamber, before which an appeal from this judgment was argued, was of a contrary opinion, and the judges there unanimously arrived at the conclusion that there was a cause of action, and that the plaintiff was entitled to damages.

My Lords, the principles on which this case must be determined appear to me to be extremely simple. The defendants, treating them as the owners or occupiers of the close on which the reservoir was constructed, might lawfully have used that close for any purpose for which it might in the ordinary course of the enjoyment of land be used; and if, in what I may term the natural user of that land, there had been any accumulation of water, either on the surface or underground, and if, by the operation of the laws of nature, that accumulation of water had passed off into the close occupied by the plaintiff, the plaintiff could not have complained that that result had taken place. If he had desired to guard himself against it, it would have lain upon him to have done so by leaving, or by interposing, some barrier between his close and the close of the defendants in order to have prevented that operation of the laws of nature.

As an illustration of that principle, I may refer to a case which was cited in the argument before your Lordships, the case of Smith v. Kenrick, in the Court of Common Pleas, 7 C. B. 515.

On the other hand, if the defendants, not stopping at the natural use of their close, had desired to use it for any purpose which I may term a non-natural use, for the purpose of introducing into the close that which in its natural condition was not in or upon it, for the purpose of introducing water either above or below ground in quantities and in a manner not the result of any work or operation on or under the land; and if in consequence of their doing so, or in consequence of any imperfection in the mode of their doing so, the water came to escape and to pass off into the close of the plaintiff, then it appears to me that that which the defendants were doing they were doing at their own peril; and if in the course of their doing it the evil arose to which I have referred, the evil, namely, of the escape of the water and its passing away to the close of the plaintiff and injuring the plaintiff, then for the consequence of that, in my opinion, the defendants would be liable. As the case of Smith v. Kenrick is an illustration of the first principle to which I have referred, so also the second principle to which I have referred is well illustrated by another case in the same Court, the case of Baird v. Williamson, 15 C. B. N. S. 317, which was also cited in the argument at the Bar.

My Lords, these simple principles, if they are well founded, as it appears to me they are, really dispose of this case.

The same result is arrived at on the principles referred to by Mr.

Justice Blackburn in his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber,[90] where he states the opinion of that Court as to the law in these words: "We think that the true rule of law is that the person who, for his own purposes, brings on his land and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril; and if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by shewing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default; or, perhaps, that the escape was the consequence of vis major, or the act of God; but as nothing of this sort exists here, it is unnecessary to inquire what excuse would be sufficient. The general rule, as above stated, seems on principle just. The person whose grass or corn is eaten down by the escaping cattle of his neighbour, or whose mine is flooded by the water from his neighbour's reservoir, or whose cellar is invaded by the filth of his neighbour's privy, or whose habitation is made unhealthy by the fumes and noisome vapors of his neighbour's alkali works, is damnified without any fault of his own; and it seems but reasonable and just that the neighbour who has brought something on his own property (which was not naturally there), harmless to others so long as it is confined to his own property, but which he knows will be mischievous if it gets on his neighbour's, should be obliged to make good the damage which ensues if he does not succeed in confining it to his own property. But for his act in bringing it there no mischief could have accrued, and it seems but just that he should at his peril keep it there, so that no mischief may accrue, or answer for the natural and anticipated consequence. And upon authority this [90] In his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, Mr. Justice Blackburn introduced his statement of this "true rule of law" with these remarks:

"The plaintiff, though free from all blame on his part, must bear the loss, unless he can establish that it was the consequence of some default for which the defendants are responsible. The question of law therefore arises, what is the obligation which the law casts on a person who, like the defendants, lawfully brings on his land something which, though harmless whilst it remains there, will naturally do mischief if it escape out of his land. It is agreed on all hands that he must take care to keep in that which he has brought on the land and keeps there, in order that it may not escape and damage his neighbors; but the question arises whether the duty which the law casts upon him, under such circumstances, is an absolute duty to keep it in at his peril, or is, as the majority of the Court of Exchequer have thought, merely a duty to take all reasonable and prudent precautions in order to keep it in, but no more. If the first be the law, the person who has brought on his land and kept there something dangerous, and failed to keep it in, is responsible for all the natural consequences of its escape. If the second be the limit of his duty, he would not be answerable except on proof of negligence, and consequently would not be answerable for escape arising from any latent defect which ordinary prudence and skill could not detect.

"Supposing the second to be the correct view of the law, a further question arises subsidiary to the first, viz., whether the defendants are not so far identified with the contractors whom they employed as to be responsible for the consequences of their want of care and skill in making the reservoir in fact insufficient with reference to the old shafts, of the existence of which they were aware, though they had not ascertained where the shafts went to."

we think is established to be the law, whether the things so brought be beasts, or water, or filth, or stenches." [91]

My Lords, in that opinion I must say I entirely concur. Therefore, I have to move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber be affirmed, and that the present appeal be dismissed with costs.

[91] Having thus stated his "true rule of law," Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the Exchequer Chamber, remarked as follows:

"The case that has most commonly occurred and which is most frequently to be found in the books is as to the obligation of the owner of cattle which he has brought on his land to prevent their escaping and doing mischief. The law as to them seems to be perfectly settled from early times; the owner must keep them in at his peril, or he will be answerable for the natural consequences of their escape; that is, with regard to tame beasts, for the grass they eat and trample upon, though not for any injury to the person of others, for our ancestors have settled that it is not the general nature of horses to kick, or bulls to gore; but if the owner knows that the beast has a vicious propensity to attack man, he will be answerable for that too.

"As early as the Year Book, 20 Ed. 4, 11, placitum 10, Brian, C. J., lays down the doctrine in terms very much resembling those used by Lord Holt in Tenant v. Goldwin [1703] 2 Ld. Raym. 1089, 1 Salk. 360, which will be referred to afterwards. It was trespass with cattle. Plea, that the defendant's land adjoined a place where defendant had common, that the cattle strayed from the common, and defendant drove them back as soon as he could. It was held a bad plea. Brian, C. J., says: 'It behoves him to use his common so that he shall do no hurt to another man, and if the land in which he has common be not enclosed, it behoves him to keep the beasts in the common and out of the land of any other.' He adds, when it was proposed to amend by pleading that they were driven out of the common by dogs, that although that might give a right of action against the master of the dogs, it was no defence to the action of trespass by the person on whose land the cattle went. In the recent case of Cox v. Burbidge [1863] 13 C. B. N. S. 438, 134 R. R. 586, 32 L. J. C. P. 89, Williams, J., says: 'I apprehend the law to be perfectly plain. If I am the owner of an animal in which by law the right of property can exist, I am bound to take care that it does not stray into the land of my neighbor, and I am liable for any trespass it may commit, and for the ordinary consequences of that trespass. Whether or not the escape of the animal is due to my negligence is altogether immaterial.' So in May v. Burdett (1846) 9 Q. B. 112, 72 R. R. 189, the Court, after an elaborate examination of the old precedents and authorities, came to the conclusion that 'a person keeping a mischievous animal, with knowledge of its propensities, is bound to keep it secure at his peril.' * * *

"As has been already said, there does not appear to be any difference in principle between the extent of the duty cast on him who brings cattle on his land to keep them in, and the extent of the duty imposed on him who brings on his land water, filth, or stenches, or any other thing which will, if it escape, naturally do damage, to prevent their escaping and injuring his neighbor; and the case of Tenant v. Goldwin, supra, is an express authority that the duty is the same, and is, to keep them in at his peril."

On the historical bearings of Mr. Justice Blackburn's statement of the principle, see Professor Wigmore's remarks in "Tortious Responsibility," 7 Harv. Law Rev. 454, 3 Select Essays, 518.

See also Sir Frederick Pollock's comment on Rylands v. Fletcher, in 143 R. R. v, vi, and his reminder "that in many common law jurisdictions the rule of unqualified liability declared by the House of Lords is not approved. The latest important text-writer, Mr. Salmond, now Solicitor-General of New Zealand, states the rule with evident reluctance and seems to regard it as an illegitimate extension of the medieval doctrine as to damage done by escaping cattle." LORD CRANWORTH. My Lords, I concur with my noble and learned friend in thinking that the rule of law was correctly stated by Mr. Justice Blackburn in delivering the opinion of the Exchequer Chamber. If a person brings, or accumulates, on his land anything which, if it should escape, may cause damage to his neighbor, he does so at his peril. If it does escape and cause damage, he is responsible, however careful he may have been, and whatever precautions he may have taken to prevent the damage.

In considering whether a defendant is liable to a plaintiff for damage which the plaintiff may have sustained, the question in general is not whether the defendant has acted with due care and caution, but whether his acts have occasioned the damage. This is all well explained in the old case of Lambert v. Bessey, reported by Sir Thomas Raymond. And the doctrine is founded on good sense. For when one person, in managing his own affairs, causes, however innocently, damage to another, it is obviously only just that he should be the party to suffer. He is bound sic uti suo ut non lædat alienum. This is the principle of law applicable to cases like the present, and I do not discover in the authorities which were cited anything conflicting with it.

The doctrine appears to me to be well illustrated by the two modern cases in the Court of Common Pleas referred to by my noble and learned friend. I allude to the two cases of Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. 564, and Baird v. Williamson, 15 C. B. N. S. 376. In the former the owner of a coal mine on the higher level worked out the whole of his coal, leaving no barrier between his mine and the mine on the lower level, so that the water percolating through the upper mine flowed into the lower mine, and obstructed the owner of it in getting his coal. It was held that the owner of the lower mine had no ground of complaint. The defendant, the owner of the upper mine, had a right to remove all his coal. The damage sustained by the plaintiff was occasioned by the natural flow or percolation of water from the upper strata. There was no obligation on the defendant to protect the plaintiff against this. It was his business to erect or leave a sufficient barrier to keep out the water, or to adopt proper means for so conducting the water as that it should not impede him in his workings. The water in that case was only left by the defendant to flow in its natural course.

But in the later case of Baird v. Williamson, the defendant, the owner of the upper mine, did not merely suffer the water to flow through his mine without leaving a barrier between it and the mine below, but in order to work his own mine beneficially he pumped up quantities of water which passed into the plaintiff's mine in addition to that which would have naturally reached it, and so occasioned him damage. Though this was done without negligence and in the due working of his own mine, yet he was held to be responsible for the damage so occasioned. It was in consequence of his act, whether skillfully or unskillfully performed, that the plaintiff had been damaged, and he was therefore held liable for the consequences. The damage in the former case may be treated as having arisen from the act of God; in the latter, from the act of the defendant.

Applying the principle of these decisions to the case now before the House, I come without hesitation to the conclusion that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was right. The plaintiff had a right to work his coal through the lands of Mr. Whitehead and up to the old workings. If water naturally rising in the defendants' land (we may treat the land as the land of the defendants for the purpose of this case) had by percolation found its way down to the plaintiff's mine through the old workings, and so had impeded his operations, that would not have afforded him any ground of complaint. Even if all the old workings had been made by the plaintiff, he would have done no more than he was entitled to do; for, according to the principle acted on in Smith v. Kenrick, the person working the mine under the close in which the reservoir was made had a right to win and carry away all the coal without leaving any wall or barrier against Whitehead's land. But that is not the real state of the case. The defendants, in order to effect an object of their own, brought on to their land, or on to land which for this purpose may be treated as being theirs, a large accumulated mass of water, and stored it up in a reservoir. The consequence of this was damage to the plaintiff, and for that damage, however skillfully and carefully the accumulation was made, the defendants, according to the principles and authorities to which I have adverted, were certainly responsible.

I concur, therefore, with my noble and learned friend in thinking that the judgment below must be affirmed, and that there must be judgment for the defendant in error.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed.

CHARING CROSS ELECTRICITY SUPPLY CO. v. HYDRAULIC POWER CO.

Appeal from a decision by Scrutton, J., reported [1913] 3 K. B. 442.

The plaintiffs were a company supplying electricity in the city of London under a provisional order by authority of which they had placed their cables in certain public streets. The defendants were the owners of hydraulic mains containing water at a high pressure used to supply hydraulic power. These mains had been laid in the same streets, also under statutory authority. The action was brought for damage to the plaintiffs' cables in four different streets, Water Lane, Upper Thames Street, Cannon Street, and St. Swithin's Lane, caused by the bursting of the defendants' mains. Two of the mains which so burst had been laid under a private Act which did not contain the usual clause providing that nothing in the Act should exempt the company from liability for nuisance. The other two had been laid under a later Act which did contain such a clause. This later Act provided also that the two Acts should be "read and construed together." The judge, in an elaborate finding of facts, found:

> That the defendants were not guilty of any negligence either in the manner of laying their mains or in respect of the materials of which the mains were constructed, and that they could not by any reasonable care have detected the subsidences [which caused the breaks] before the bursts occurred.

Scrutton, J., held: (1) that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher applied not only to cases in which the dangerous thing had escaped from the defendant's land on to the plaintiff's land and done damage there, but also to cases in which the site of the plaintiff's injury was occupied by him only under a licence and not under any right of property in the soil, and that in the absence of statutory authorization of the nuisance the defendants were liable for the damage caused by the bursts in their mains, notwithstanding that they had been guilty of no negligence; and (2) that the effect of the two Acts being read together as one Act was to take away the privilege which, down to the passing of the later Act, the defendants had enjoyed, in respect of the two first-mentioned mains, for not being liable for damage done by their bursting in the absence of negligence, and that consequently in the case of all four of the mains the defendants were liable as for a nuisance.

Bray, J. I am of the same opinion.[92] Treating this case, first of all, without regard to the statutory authority which the defendants have, it seems to me quite clear that it comes within the principles of Rylands v. Fletcher. It was said that it was not within those principles because Rylands v. Fletcher, is the case of the owners of adjoining closes of land, but, in my opinion, that is not so. The headnote of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, as reported in the House of Lords, is this, and I may say that I have looked through the speeches of the Lord Chancellor and the other learned Lords and it is abundantly justified by what is said there:

> "Where the owner of land, without wilfulness or negligence, uses his land in the ordinary manner of its use, though mischief should thereby be occasioned to his neighbour, he will not be liable in damages. But if he brings upon his land anything which would not naturally come upon it, and which is in itself dangerous, and may become mischievous if not kept under proper control, though in so doing he may act without personal wilfulness or negligence, he will be liable in damages for any mischief thereby occasioned."

"For any mischief thereby occasioned," that is to say, not mischief necessarily occasioned to the owner of the adjoining land, but any mischief thereby occasioned. Now in the earlier part of that, it deals with the case where he brings it upon his land. It seems to me it does not matter whether it is upon his land; if he has a right, as the defendants have here, to occupy this land for a certain purpose, namely, for these pipes, it is equally his for the purpose of testing this principle. Therefore I think that Rylands v. Fletcher applies, and, if it applies, then the defendants undoubtedly have brought upon their land, or land which they are permitted to occupy, something which would not have naturally come upon it and which is in itself dangerous and probably mischievous if not kept under proper control. * * *[93]

NICHOLS v. MARSLAND.

The plaintiff sued as the surveyor for the County of Chester of bridges repairable at the expense of the county.

The first count of the declaration alleged that the defendant was possessed of lands and of artificial pools constructed thereon for receiving and holding, and wherein were kept, large quantities of water, yet the defendant took so little and such bad care of the pools and the water therein that large quantities of water escaped from the pools and destroyed four county bridges, whereby the inhabitants of the county incurred expense in repairing and rebuilding them. The second count alleged that the defendant was possessed of large quantities of water collected and contained in three artificial pools of the defendant near to four county bridges, and stated the breach as in the first count. Plea, not guilty, and issue thereon.

At the trial before Cockburn, C. J., at the Chester Summer Assizes, 1874, the plaintiff's witnesses gave evidence to the following effect:

The defendant occupied a mansion-house and grounds at Henbury, in the County of Chester. A natural stream called Bagbrook, which rose in higher lands, ran through the defendant's grounds, and after leaving them flowed under the four county bridges in question. After entering the defendant's grounds the stream was diverted and dammed up by an artificial embankment into a pool of three acres in area called "the upper pool," from which it escaped over a weir in the embankment, and was again similarly dammed up by an artificial embankment into the "middle pool," which was between one and two acres in area. Escaping over a weir in the embankment, it was again dammed up into "the lower pool," which was between eight and nine acres in area, and from which the stream escaped into its natural and original course.

[93] On this point of the case, also, the view of Scrutton, J., was upheld. "When the Legislature gave them [the defendants] these authorities, they did not take away from the right of the owner of that surrounding land any of the rights which he otherwise had." Per Bray, J.

About five o'clock p. m. on the 18th of June, 1872, occurred a terrible thunder storm, accompanied by heavy rain, which continued till about three o'clock a. m. on the 19th. The rainfall was greater and more violent than any within the memory of the witnesses, and swelled the stream both above and in the defendant's grounds. On the morning of the 19th it was found that during the night the violence and volume of the water had carried away the artificial embankments of the three pools, the accumulated water in which, being thus suddenly let loose, had swelled the stream below the pools so that it carried away and destroyed the county bridges mentioned in the declaration. At the pools were paddles for letting off the water, but for several years they had been out of working order.

Some engineers and other witnesses gave evidence that in their opinion the weir in the upper pool was far too small for a pool of that size, and that the mischief happened through the insufficiency of the means for carrying off the water. It was not proved when these ornamental pools were constructed, but it appeared that they had existed before the defendant began to occupy the property, and that no similar accident had ever occurred within the knowledge of the witnesses.

After hearing the address of the defendant's counsel, the jury said they did not wish to hear his witnesses, and that in their opinion the accident was caused by vis major. In answer to Cockburn, C. J., they found that there was no negligence in the construction or maintenance of the works, and that the rain was most excessive. Cockburn, C. J., being of opinion that the rainfall, though extraordinary and unprecedented, did not amount to vis major or excuse the defendant from liability, entered the verdict for the plaintiff for £4092, the agreed amount, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter it for her if the Court (who were to draw inferences of fact) should be of opinion that the rainfall amounted to vis major, and so distinguished the case from Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330.

A rule nisi having been accordingly obtained to enter the verdict for the defendant on the ground that there was no proof of liability, the plaintiff on showing cause to be at liberty to contend that a new trial should be granted on the ground that the finding of the jury was against the weight of evidence.

McIntyre, Q. C., for the plaintiff, showed cause. The defendant, having for her own purposes and advantage stored a dangerous element on her premises, is liable if that element escapes and injures the property of another, even though the escape be caused by an earthquake or any form of vis major. [CLEASBY, B. Was not the flood brought on to the defendant's land by vis major?] The pools were made by those through whom the defendant claims, and if there had been no pools the water of the natural stream would have escaped without doing injury. The case falls within the rule laid down by the judgment in Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Ex. 265, 279, delivered by Blackburn, J.: "We think that the true rule of law is, that the person who for his own purposes brings on his lands, and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and if he does not do so is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by showing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default, or perhaps that the escape was the consequence of vis major, or the act of God." This passage was cited with approval by Lord Cairns, C., and Lord Cranworth on appeal. L. R. 3 H. L. 330, 339, 340. [CLEASBY, B. There the defendant brought the water on to his own land. Not so here.] The intimation that vis major would perhaps be an excuse is not confirmed by any decision or any other dictum. But the facts here do not amount to vis major. If the weirs had been larger, or the banks stronger, the mischief would not have happened. Vis major means something which cannot be foreseen or resisted, as an earthquake or an act of the Queen's enemies.[94]

June 12. The judgment of the Court (KELLY, C. B., and BRAMWELL, and CLEASBY, BB.) was read by BRAMWELL, B. In this case I understand the jury to have found that all reasonable care had been taken by the defendant, that the banks were fit for all events to be anticipated, and the weirs broad enough; that the storm was of such violence as to be properly called the act of God, or vis major. No doubt, as was said by Mr. McIntyre, a shower is the act of God as much as a storm; so is an earthquake in this country: yet every one understands that a storm, supernatural in one sense, may properly, like an earthquake in this country, be called the act of God, or vis major. No doubt not the act of God or a vis major in the sense that it was physically impossible to resist it, but in the sense that it was practically impossible to do so. Had the banks been twice as strong, or if that would not do, ten times, and ten times as high, and the weir ten times as wide, the mischief might not have happened. But those are not practical conditions, they are such that to enforce them would prevent the reasonable use of property in the way most beneficial to the community.

So understanding the finding of the jury, I am of opinion the defendant is not liable. What has the defendant done wrong? What right of the plaintiff has she infringed? She has done nothing wrong, she has infringed no right. It is not the defendant who let loose the water and sent it to destroy the bridges. She did indeed store it, and store it in such quantities that, if it was let loose, it would do, as it did, mischief. But suppose a stranger let it loose, would the defendant be liable? If so, then if a mischievous boy bored a hole in a cistern in any London house, and the water did mischief to a neighbor, the occupier of the house would be liable. That cannot be. Then why is the defendant liable if some agent over which she has no control lets the water out? Mr. McIntyre contended that she would be in all cases of the water being let out, whether by a stranger or the Queen's enemies, or by natural causes, as lightning or an earthquake. Why? What is the difference between a reservoir and a stack of chimneys for such a question as this? Here the defendant stored a lot of water for her own purposes; in the case of the chimneys some one has put a ton of bricks fifty feet high for his own purposes; both equally harmless if they stay where placed, and equally mischievous if they do not. The water is no more a wild or savage animal than the bricks while at rest, nor more so when in motion: both have the same property of obeying the law of gravitation. Could it be said that no one could have a stack of chimneys except on the terms of being liable for any damage done by their being overthrown by a hurricane or an earthquake? If so, it would be dangerous to have a tree, for a wind might come so strong as to blow it out of the ground into a neighbor's land and cause it to do damage; or a field of ripe wheat, which might be fired by lightning and do mischief.

I admit that it is not a question of negligence. A man may use all care to keep the water in, or the stack of chimneys standing, but would be liable if through any defect, though latent, the water escaped or the bricks fell. But here the act is that of an agent he cannot control.

This case differs wholly from Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Ex. 265, 279. There the defendant poured the water into the plaintiff's mine. He did not know he was doing so; but he did it as much as though he had poured it into an open channel which led to the mine without his knowing it. Here the defendant merely brought it to a place whence another agent let it loose. I am by no means sure that the likeness of a wild animal is exact. I am by no means sure that if a man kept a tiger, and lightning broke his chain, and he got loose and did mischief, that the man who kept him would not be liable. But this case and the case I put of the chimneys, are not cases of keeping a dangerous beast for amusement, but of a reasonable use of property in a way beneficial to the community. I think this analogy has made some of the difficulty in this case. Water stored in a reservoir may be the only practical mode of supplying a district and so adapting it for habitation. I refer to my judgment in Fletcher v. Rylands,[95] and I repeat that here the plaintiff had no right that has been infringed, and the defendant has done no wrong. The plaintiff's right is to say to the defendant, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, and that the defendant has done, and no more.

The Chief Baron and my Brother Cleasby agree in this judgment. * * *

Rule absolute.

[In the Court of Appeal.]

Appeal from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B., and Bramwell and Cleasby, BB.) making absolute a rule to enter the verdict for the defendant.

The judgment of the Court (Cockburn, C. J., James and Mellish, L. JJ., and Baggallay, J. A.) was read by [95] See (1865) 3 Hurl. & C. 788, 34 L. J. Exch. 181.

MELLISH, L. J. * * * The appellant relied upon the decision in the case of Rylands v. Fletcher. In that case the rule of law on which the case was decided was thus laid down by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the Exchequer Chamber: "We think the true rule of law is that the person who for his own purposes brings on his lands and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by showing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default; or perhaps that the escape was the consequence of vis major, or the act of God; but as nothing of the sort exists here it is unnecessary to inquire what excuse would be sufficient." It appears to us that we have two questions to consider: First, the question of law, which was left undecided in Rylands v. Fletcher,—Can the defendant excuse herself by showing that the escape of the water was owing to vis major, or, as it is termed in the law books, the "act of God?" And, secondly, if she can, did she in fact make out that the escape was so occasioned?

Now, with respect to the first question, the ordinary rule of law is that when the law creates a duty and the party is disabled from performing it without any default of his own, by the act of God, or the King's enemies, the law will excuse him; but when a party by his own contract creates a duty, he is bound to make it good notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity. We can see no good reason why that rule should not be applied to the case before us. The duty of keeping the water in and preventing its escape is a duty imposed by the law, and not one created by contract. If, indeed, the making a reservoir was a wrongful act in itself, it might be right to hold that a person could not escape from the consequences of his own wrongful act. But it seems to us absurd to hold that the making or the keeping a reservoir is a wrongful act in itself. The wrongful act is not the making or keeping the reservoir, but the allowing or causing the water to escape. If, indeed, the damages were occasioned by the act of the party without more—as where a man accumulates water on his own land, but, owing to the peculiar nature or condition of the soil, the water escapes and does damage to his neighbor—the case of Rylands v. Fletcher, establishes that he must be held liable. The accumulation of water in a reservoir is not in itself wrongful; but the making it and suffering the water to escape, if damage ensue, constitute a wrong. But the present case is distinguished from that of Rylands v. Fletcher, in this, that it is not the act of the defendant in keeping this reservoir, an act in itself lawful, which alone leads to the escape of the water, and so renders wrongful that which but for such escape would have been lawful. It is the supervening vis major of the water caused by the flood, which, superadded to the water in the reservoir (which of itself would have been innocuous), causes the disaster. A defendant cannot, in our opinion, be properly said to have caused or allowed the water to escape, if the act of God or the Queen's enemies was the real cause of its escaping without any fault on the part of the defendant. If a reservoir was destroyed by an earthquake, or the Queen's enemies destroyed it in conducting some warlike operation, it would be contrary to all reason and justice to hold the owner of the reservoir liable for any damage that might be done by the escape of the water. We are of opinion, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to excuse herself by proving that the water escaped through the act of God.

The remaining question is, did the defendant make out that the escape of the water was owing to the act of God? Now the jury have distinctly found, not only that there was no negligence in the construction or the maintenance of the reservoirs, but that the flood was so great that it could not reasonably have been anticipated, although, if it had been anticipated, the effect might have been prevented; and this seems to us in substance a finding that the escape of the water was owing to the act of God. However great the flood had been, if it had not been greater than floods that had happened before and might be expected to occur again, the defendant might not have made out that she was free from fault; but we think she ought not to be held liable because she did not prevent the effect of an extraordinary act of nature, which she could not anticipate. In the late case of Nugent v. Smith, 1 C. P. D. 423, we held that a carrier might be protected from liability for a loss occasioned by the act of God, if the loss by no reasonable precaution could be prevented, although it was not absolutely impossible to prevent it.

It was indeed ingeniously argued for the appellant that at any rate the escape of the water was not owing solely to the act of God, because the weight of the water originally in the reservoirs must have contributed to break down the dams, as well as the extraordinary water brought in by the flood. We think, however, that the extraordinary quantity of water brought in by the flood is in point of law the sole proximate cause of the escape of the water. It is the last drop which makes the cup overflow.

On the whole we are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.[96]

[96] Part of the opinion is omitted.

BOX v. JUBB et al.

(High Court of Justice, Exchequer Division, 1879. 4 Exch. Div. 76.)

Case stated in an action brought in the county court of Yorkshire, to recover damages by reason of the overflowing of the defendants' reservoir. The case as stated, but slightly abridged, was as follows:

1. The defendants are the owners of a mill, and for its necessary supply of water have a reservoir, which has been so used for many years. 2. The plaintiff is the tenant of premises adjoining the reservoir. 3. The reservoir is supplied with water from, and discharges its surplus water into, a main drain or watercourse. The inlet and the outlet have proper doors or sluices, so as (when required) to close the communication between the reservoir and the water course. 4. The defendants have the right to use this water course by obtaining a supply of water from it and discharging their surplus water into it, but have otherwise no control over the watercourse, which does not belong to them. 5. In December, 1877, the plaintiff's premises were flooded by reason of the overflowing of the defendants' reservoir. 6. This overflowing was caused by the emptying of a large quantity of water from a reservoir, the property of a third party, into the main drain or watercourse at a point considerably above the defendants' premises, and by an obstruction in the watercourse below the outlet of the defendants' reservoir, whereby the water from the watercourse was forced through the doors or sluices (which were closed at the time) into the defendants' reservoir. 7. This obstruction was caused by circumstances over which the defendants had no control, and without their knowledge; and had it not been for such obstruction the overflowing of the reservoir would not have happened. 8. The defendants' reservoir, and the communications between it and the main drain or watercourse, and the doors or sluices, are constructed and maintained in a proper manner, so as to prevent the overflowing of the reservoir under all ordinary circumstances. 9. No negligence or wrongful act is attributable to either party.

Under the circumstances the judge of the county court was of opinion that the defendants were liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff, and accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The question for the opinion of the Court, having regard to the facts set out in the case, was whether the defendants were liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the flooding of his premises, such flooding being caused by water from a reservoir belonging to a third party, over which the defendants had no control, and without any knowledge or negligence on defendants' part, the overflowing of the defendants' reservoir being occasioned by the act of a third party, over whom the defendants had no control, and no wrongful act or negligence being attributable to the defendants, and the direct cause of the damage being the obstruction in the main drain or watercourse, which was caused by circumstances over which the defendants had no control and without their knowledge.

KELLY, C. B. I think this judgment must be reversed. * * * The case is abundantly clear on this, proving beyond a doubt that the defendants had no control over the causes of the overflow, and no knowledge of the existence of the obstruction. The matters complained of took place through no default or breach of duty of the defendants, but were caused by a stranger over whom and at a spot where they had no control. It seems to me to be immaterial whether this is called vis major or the unlawful act of a stranger; it is sufficient to say that the defendants had no means of preventing the occurrence. I think the defendants could not possibly have been expected to anticipate that which happened here, and the law does not require them to construct their reservoir and the sluices and gates leading to it to meet any amount of pressure which the wrongful act of a third person may impose. The judgment must be entered for the defendants.

POLLOCK, B. I also think the defendants are entitled to judgment. Looking at the facts stated, that the defendants had no control over the main drain, and no knowledge of or control over the obstruction, apart from the cases, what wrong have the defendants done for which they should be held liable? The case of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, is quite distinguishable. The case of Nichols v. Marsland, L. R. 10 Ex. 255, 14 Eng. R. 538, is more in point. The illustrations put in that case clearly go to show that if the person who has collected the water has done all that skill and judgment can do he is not liable for damage by acts over which he has no control. In the judgment of the Court of Appeal, 2 Ex. D. 1, at p. 5, Mellish, L. J., adopts the principle laid down by this Court. He says: "If indeed the damages were occasioned by the act of the party without more—as where a man accumulates water on his own land, but owing to the peculiar nature or condition of the soil the water escapes and does damage to his neighbor —the case of Rylands v. Fletcher, establishes that he must be held liable." Here this water has not been accumulated by the defendants, but has come from elsewhere and added to that which was properly and safely there. For this the defendants, in my opinion, both on principle and authority, cannot be held liable.

Judgment for the defendants.[97]

BAKER v. SNELL.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1908] 2 K. B. 825.)

The plaintiff was a housemaid in the employment of the defendant, a licensed victualler. The defendant kept upon his premises a dog which was known by him to be savage. It was the duty of the defendant's potman to let the dog out early in the morning, and then chain it up again before the plaintiff and the barmaids came downstairs. On the occasion in question the potman brought the dog into the kitchen where the plaintiff and the barmaids were at breakfast, and said, "I will bet the dog will not bite any one in the room." He then let the dog go and said, "Go it, Bob." The dog then flew at the plaintiff and bit her. It had previously bitten the plaintiff and other persons to the defendant's knowledge. The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action for damages in the Bow County Court. The county court judge held that the act of the potman was in fact an assault, for which the defendant was not liable, and he accordingly nonsuited the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed, and the Divisional Court ordered a new trial; Channell, J., on the ground that it was a question for the jury whether the potman was acting within the scope of his employment, and Sutton, J., on the ground that the owner of an animal known to him to be savage keeps it at his peril and is liable for any injury done by it, even though the injury is directly brought about by the wilful act of a third person.[98]

The defendant appealed.

FARWELL, L. J. I take the same view as Channell, J., did as regards the potman's authority, but I do not agree with him in thinking that the liability of the keeper of a savage animal does not extend to damage directly brought about by the intervening voluntary act of a third party. Sutton, J., also did not agree with him, because he bases his judgment upon May v. Burdett, 9 Q. B. 101. The cases, in my opinion, establish that the law recognizes two classes of animals—animals feræ naturæ and animals mansuetæ naturæ. Any animal of the latter class when known to its owner to be dangerous falls within the former class, and any one who keeps an animal of that nature does a wrongful act and is liable for the consequences under whatever circumstances arising, except where the plaintiff by his own conduct has brought the injury upon himself. That is laid down in Jackson v. Smithson, 15 L. J. (Ex.) 311. The exact point of that decision was that an action for injury caused by a ram known to its owner to be dangerous would lie without any averment of negligence, because the wrongful act was keeping a savage beast. The same principle was laid down by Lord Denman in May v. Burdett, 9 Q. B. 101. Lord Denman in his judgment refers with approval to a passage in Hale's Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 430b, which concludes as follows: "And therefore in case of such a wild beast, or in case of a bull or cow, that doth damage, where the owner knows of it, he must at his peril keep him safe from doing hurt, for though he use his diligence to keep him up, if he escape and do harm, the owner is liable to answer damages." It appears to me to be absolutely immaterial if the keeper of a dangerous animal keeps it at his own peril in all circumstances whether the injury arises from the actual negligence of the owner or from the act of a third person. The wrong is in keeping the fierce beast, and the person who keeps it is prima facie responsible for the injury arising from his wrongful act, and such prima facie responsibility can be got rid of only in the manner pointed out by Blackburn, J., namely, by shewing that the escape was due to the plaintiff's own default, or perhaps was caused by vis major or the act of God. The wrongful act of a third person is no defence.

KENNEDY, L. J. This case I agree should go down for a new trial. But I desire to add, in regard to certain other points which have been dealt with both here and in the Court below, that, as at present advised, I agree with the view of Channell, J., which I think is in accordance with the authorities. There is no doubt that the keeper of a ferocious dog, if he knows it to be ferocious, is in exactly the same category as the keeper of a naturally wild animal. That appears from the judgment of Bowen, L. J., in Filburn v. People's Palace and Aquarium Co., 25 Q. B. D. 258. He says: "If from the experience of mankind a particular class of animals is dangerous, though individuals may be tamed, a person who keeps one of the class takes the risk of any damage it may do. If, on the other hand, the animal kept belongs to a class which according to the experience of mankind, is not dangerous, and not likely to do mischief, and if the class is dealt with by mankind on that footing, a person may safely keep such an animal, unless he knows that the particular animal that he keeps is likely to do mischief." I infer from that that a dog known by its owner to be dangerous is exactly in the same position as an animal feræ naturæ. But there is nothing culpable or wrong in keeping an animal feræ naturæ. That appears from Jackson v. Smithson, 15 L. J. (Ex.) 311. Platt, B., there says: "No doubt a man has a right to keep an animal which is feræ naturæ and no one has a right to interfere with him until some mischief happens." But then it is said that directly the animal does do mischief the person who keeps him is liable, and I do not doubt that that is true in this sense, that it does not lie on the injured party to allege and prove affirmatively any want of care on the part of the keeper. The gist of the action is the scienter, and in Jackson v. Smithson it was held a good declaration that an animal known by the defendant to be ferocious was kept by him and did damage. The same thing was decided in May v. Burdett. There also the declaration was held good although there was no allegation of negligence. But the very language of Lord Denman which has been referred to by the Master of the Rolls appears to me to be in favour of the view of the law expressed by my Brother Channell, because he (Lord Denman) states the result of the authorities to be "that whoever keeps an animal accustomed to attack and bite mankind, with knowledge that it is so accustomed, is prima facie liable in an action on the case at the suit of any person attacked and injured by the animal without any averment of negligence or default in the securing or taking care of it." The very introduction of the term "prima facie" shews that, in the opinion of Lord Denman, there may be an answer to the action; that the keeping of such an animal with knowledge of its propensities is not conclusive, although the keeper is prima facie liable. Those words could not, in my opinion, be properly used if the view is correct that whatever happens the owner is liable—if, for example, to use Channell, J.'s, illustration, the animal was set on by a thief to bite a policeman who was following him. That being so, upon the whole, as at present advised, I am inclined to agree with my Brother Channell in declining to accept the view intimated by Bramwell, B., in Nichols v. Marsland, L. R. 10 Ex. 255, that the liability of the keeper of a savage animal extends to damage directly brought about through the intervening voluntary act of a third person. * * * [99]

Granted that it is not unlawful for a man to keep an animal feræ naturæ, but, if it injures his neighbour, the keeper of the animal is prima facie liable for the result, the question here is whether the intervening criminal act of a third person is one of those things which, if proved by the defendant to have been the direct cause of the injury, would absolve the owner from his prima facie liability. The inclination of my own opinion is that it would. It is not necessary to decide the point in this case, but speaking for myself, with great deference to the other members of the Court, I should have thought that not only on grounds of justice, but according to the law as stated by Lord Denman and Blackburn, J., if it could be shewn that it was the criminal act of a third party which made the animal dangerous, and the injury, to the plaintiff was the direct result of that act, the keeper of the animal would have a good defence to an action such as the present.

RICKARDS v. LOTHIAN.

(Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. [1913] A. C. 263.)

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

LORD MOULTON (after stating the facts and delivering the judgment of their Lordships on the plaintiff's contention that the defendant ought to have foreseen the probability of the malicious act and taken precautions against it).[1] * * * The principal contention,

[100] For comments on Baker v. Snell, see the article by Mr. Beven in 22 Harvard Law Rev. 465 (1909), the remarks of Sir Frederick Pollock in 25 Law Quarterly Rev. 317 (1909), "The Dog and the Potman: or 'Go it, Bob,'" and of Mr. Salmond, Torts (2d Ed.) 388, note (1910).

[1] The facts and the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are set forth in the report of this case in its relation to the doctrine of legal cause. See p. 877, infra.

however, on behalf of the plaintiff was based on the doctrine customarily associated with the case of Fletcher v. Rylands.[2] It was contended that it was the defendant's duty to prevent an overflow from the lavatory basin, however caused, and that he was liable in damages for not having so done, whether the overflow was due to any negligent act on his part or to the malicious act of a third person.

The legal principle that underlies the decision in Fletcher v. Rylands was well known in English law from a very early period, but it was explained and formulated in a strikingly clear and authoritative manner in that case and therefore is usually referred to by that name. It is nothing other than an application of the old maxim "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas."[3] * * *

The argument [in Fletcher v. Rylands] took place on a special case stated by an arbitrator setting forth the facts and the contentions of the parties. It was heard in the first instance before the Court of Exchequer, which by a majority decided in favour of the defendants, Bramwell, B., dissenting. Error was brought from this judgment, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber (consisting of Willes, Blackburn, Keating, Mellor, Montague Smith, and Lush, JJ.) reversed the decision of the Court of Exchequer by a unanimous judgment which was read by Blackburn, J. On appeal to the House of Lords the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was affirmed; both Cairns, L. C., and Lord Cranworth (who delivered the judgments on the hearing of the appeal) expressly approving of Blackburn, J.'s, statement of the law on the subject in the judgment appealed from. The formulation of the principle which is to be found in that judgment is therefore of the highest authority as well from the fact that it received the express approval of the ultimate tribunal as from the eminence to the judges who took part in the decision.

So far as is necessary for the present case the law on the point is thus laid down by Blackburn, J.:

"We think that the true rule of the law is that the person who, for his own purposes, brings on his land and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril; and if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by showing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default; or, perhaps, that the escape was the consequence of vis major, or the act of God; but as nothing of this sort exists here, it is unnecessary to inquire what excuse would be sufficient."

It will be seen that Blackburn, J., with characteristic carefulness, indicates that exceptions to the general rule may arise where the escape is in consequence of vis major, or the act of God, but declines to deal further with that question because it was unnecessary for the decision of the case then before him. A few years later the question of law thus left undecided in Fletcher v. Rylands came up for decision in a case arising out of somewhat similar circumstances.[4] * * *

Their Lordships agree with the law as laid down in the judgments above cited,[5] and are of opinion that a defendant is not liable on the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands for the damage caused by the wrongful acts of third persons.

But there is another ground upon which their Lordships are of opinion that the present case does not come within the principle laid down in Fletcher v. Rylands. It is not every use to which land is put that brings into play that principle. It must be some special use bringing with it increased danger to others and must not merely be the ordinary use of the land or such a use as is proper for the general benefit of the community. To use the language of Lord Robertson in Eastern and South African Telegraph Co. v. Cape Town Tramways Companies, [1902] A. C. 393, the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands "subjects to a high liability the owner who uses his property for purposes other than those which are natural." This is more fully expressed by Wright, J., in his judgment in Blake v. Woolf, [1898] 2 Q. B. 426. In that case the plaintiff was the occupier of the lower floors of the defendant's house, the upper floors being occupied by the defendant himself. A leak occurred in the cistern at the top of the house which without any negligence on the part of the defendant caused the plaintiff's premises to be flooded. In giving judgment for the defendant Wright, J., says: "The general rule as laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher is that prima facie a person occupying land has an absolute right not to have his premises invaded by injurious matter, such as large quantities of water which his neighbour keeps upon his land. That general rule is, however, qualified by some exceptions, one of which is that, where a person is using his land in the ordinary way and damage happens to the adjoining property without any default or negligence on his part, no liability attaches to him. The bringing of water on to such premises as these and the maintaining a cistern in the usual way seems to me to be an ordinary and reasonable user of such premises as these were; and, therefore, if the water escapes without any negligence or default on the part of the person bringing the water in and owning the cistern, I do not think that he is liable for any damage that may ensue." *

[4] His Lordship here stated, first, the case of Nichols v. Marsland (1876) 2 Ex. D. 1, and then Box v. Jubb (1879) 4 Ex. D. 76, and quoted at some length from their judgments.

[5] The reference is to Nichols v. Marsland and Box v. Jubb. See ante.

*In Blake v. Woolf, [1898] 2 Q. B. 426, the defendant was the landlord of premises which were let out in flats, and had a cistern on the fourth floor; the plaintiff became tenant of the ground floor and took his supply of water from the defendant. A leakage from this cistern was noticed by the plaintiff, who informed the defendant. The latter sent an independent plumber to put the cistern to rights. The plumber was competent, but through his negligence there was an escape of water from the cistern which damaged plaintiff's goods on the ground floor.

This is entirely in agreement with the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Ross v. Fedden (1872) L. R. 7 Q. B. 661. In that case the defendants were the occupiers of the upper floor of a house of which the plaintiff occupied the lower floor. The supply and overflow pipes of a water-closet which was situated in the defendants' premises and was for their use and convenience got out of order and caused the plaintiff's premises to be flooded. Negligence was negatived. In giving judgment in favour of the defendants Blackburn, J., says: "I think it is impossible to say that defendants as occupiers of the upper story of a house were liable to the plaintiff under the circumstances in the case. The water-closet and the supply pipe are for their convenience and use, but I cannot think there is any obligation on them at all hazards to keep the pipe from bursting or otherwise getting out of order. The cause of the overflow was the valve of the supply pipe getting out of order and the escape pipe being choked with paper, and the judge has expressly found that there was no negligence; and the only ground taken by the plaintiff is that the plaintiff and defendants being occupiers under the same landlord, the defendants being the occupiers of the upper story contracted an obligation binding them in favour of the plaintiff, the occupier of the lower story, to keep the water in at their peril. I do not agree to that; I do not think the maxim, 'Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas' applies. Negligence is negatived; and probably, if the defendants had got notice of the state of the pipe and valve and had done nothing, there might have been ground for the argument that they were liable for the consequences; but I do not think the law casts on the defendants any such obligation as the plaintiff contends for."

Their Lordships are in entire sympathy with these views. The provision of a proper supply of water to the various parts of a house is not only reasonable, but has become, in accordance with modern sanitary views, an almost necessary feature of town life. It is recognized as being so desirable in the interests of the community that in some form or other it is usually made obligatory in civilized countries. Such a supply cannot be installed without causing some concurrent danger of leakage or overflow. It would be unreasonable for the law to regard those who install or maintain such a system of supply as doing so at their own peril, with an absolute liability for any damage resulting from its presence even when there has been no negligence.

It would be still more unreasonable if, as the respondent contends, such liability were to be held to extend to the consequences of malicious acts on the part of third persons. In such matters as the domestic supply of water or gas it is essential that the mode of supply should be such as to permit ready access for the purpose of use, and hence it is impossible to guard against wilful mischief. Taps may be turned on, ball-cocks fastened open, supply pipes cut, and waste-pipes blocked. Against such acts no precaution can prevail. It would be wholly unreasonable to hold an occupier responsible for the consequences of such acts which he is powerless to prevent, when the provision of the supply is not only a reasonable act on his part, but probably a duty. Such a doctrine would, for example, make a householder liable for the consequences of an explosion caused by a burglar breaking into his house during the night and leaving a gas tap open. There is, in their Lordships' opinion, no support either in reason or authority for any such view of the liability of a landlord or occupier. In having on his premises such means of supply he is only using those premises in an ordinary and proper manner, and, although he is bound to exercise all reasonable care, he is not responsible for damage not due to his own default, whether that damage be caused by inevitable accident or the wrongful acts of third persons.[6]

[6] For the conclusion of this judgment, see the report of this case in connection with the doctrine of legal cause, infra, p. 883.

PART II

CAUSAL RELATION

CHAPTER I

THE EXISTENCE OF A CAUSAL RELATION, AND ITS AFFIRMATIVE SHOWING AS PART OF THE PLAINTIFF'S PRIMA FACIE CASE

It would be obviously opposed to any possible conception of justice that any one should be required to answer for a harm unless he had actually caused it. It is therefore always a vital prerequisite to recovery to establish that the plaintiff's harm was caused by the defendant's alleged misconduct.

Francis H. Bohlen, "Contributory Negligence," 21 Harv. Law Rev. 234 (1907)

When the wrongful act of the defendant is actionable per se, the rule of remoteness determines the measure of liability, though not the existence of it. When, on the other hand, the wrong is not actionable without proof of actual damage, the rule of remoteness determines not merely the measure of damages, but also the existence of the cause of action. If all the damage proved is too remote, the defendant is under no liability at all.

John W. Salmond, Law of Torts (2d Ed.) 105 (1910).

Now, the word "cause" has various meanings, and shades of meaning. Philosophically speaking, the sum of all the antecedents of any event, constitutes its cause. Ordinarily however, we consider each separate antecedent of an event as a cause for such event, provided however that the event could not have happened except for such antecedent. Taking this view of cause and effect, there may be many causes conjointly and consecutively contributing to produce one and the same final result. And these causes may differ vastly in their proximity or remoteness to or from such final result. But still, any one of them may, as we think, be selected as the responsible cause for such final result, provided it be selected in accordance with the rules of law settled and established by the numerous adjudications of the courts. * * *

In the burning of prairie grass, like the case at bar, the number of causes and effects that may intervene between the first cause and the final result is illimitable. Each blade of grass is a separate and distinct entity, and the burning of each blade is both an effect and a cause. It is the effect of the burning of the blades immediately preceding it, and the cause, along with other blades, of the burning of the blades immediately succeeding it. And yet all these causes and effects are so intimately interlinked and blended with each other that we look upon the whole of them as constituting but one grand, united, continuous and single whole. We look upon the whole fire as only one fire, and the whole of these separate causes as merely one cause.

Valentine, J., in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Bales (1876) 16 Kan. 252, 256, 258.

FOGG v. INHABITANTS OF NAHANT.
MAY v. SAME.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1868. 98 Mass. 578.)

Two actions of tort; for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff Fogg, and for injury of a carriage owned by the plaintiff May, alleged to have been caused by a defect in a highway which the defendants were bound to keep in repair. These actions were tried together in the superior court, before Putnam, J., who refused a request for a ruling that the evidence was not sufficient to support them, and, after verdicts for the plaintiffs, reported the cases, with all the evidence, to this court, new trials to be granted if the ruling requested should have been given.

HOAR, J. * * * The place where the accident happened was at the foot of a hill, where the road, which was narrow, made a sharp curve, and with a gutter and stones near to the travelled path. Whether the road, by reason of its steepness, narrowness, and the turn which it made, and the position and depth of the gutter, was reasonably safe and convenient for travellers, or whether persons using due care would be exposed to danger in passing over it, we think was properly left to the jury as a question of fact, and that their finding upon it is not open for revision upon this report. There was certainly some evidence, proper for the consideration of the jury, which tended to support the plaintiffs' case.

But, upon another point in the case, after mature and careful consideration, and with all the aid which the very able arguments of counsel have afforded us, we are unable to satisfy ourselves that the verdict is consistent with the law applicable to the evidence.

The liability of the town for an injury to a traveller, occasioned by a defect or want of repair in a highway, depends upon proof that the defect caused the injury. If a want of due care on the part of the person injured contribute to cause the injury, he cannot recover. And if, without fault or negligence on his part, his horses have escaped from his control, and have run away or become wholly unmanageable, so that no care can be exercised by him in respect to them; and this condition of things is not produced by a defect in the way; the town is not responsible for what may happen in consequence, even if the carriage upsets at a place where the way is defective.

By the uncontradicted evidence offered by the plaintiffs, it appeared that, at the time the accident happened, which it is alleged was caused by the defect in the way, the horses were, and for some time had been, out of the control of their driver; and there was nothing in the evidence to show that, but for this fact, the accident would have happened.

The plaintiffs' first witness testified that one of the horses driven at the time of the accident had the habit of throwing his tail over the rein, and, when doing it, would make a little start and quicken his pace a short distance, and then slacken off and relieve the rein. The plaintiff Fogg, who was also examined as a witness, made the same statement in substance, and said that he usually let the horse take his own course when he threw his tail over the rein. Both of these witnesses testified, in effect, that at the time of the accident the horse threw his tail over the rein as they were approaching the top of the hill; that the driver stooped forward and took hold of the tail, and tried to lift it and extricate the rein, but in so doing bent down the dasher of the carriage so that he was obliged to desist, and did not get the rein out; that the horses quickened their pace, the one with the rein under his tail galloping; that they went over the top of the hill, and about twenty rods down on the other side, to the point where the road turned to the right, the driver and the plaintiff Fogg both pulling on the right hand rein, in order to turn the horses round the curve; but that, in spite of their united efforts, the horses bore to the left, the wheels went into the gutter, and the carriage upset. * * *

Assuming, therefore, as the plaintiffs' counsel contends, that the horses, though spirited, were safe and proper horses to drive, it appears that by misfortune they were, at the time when the accident happened, entirely freed from any efficient control or guidance of their driver; that in this condition they went at a rapid rate and for a considerable distance, down a steep and narrow road; that the attempt to regain the mastery of the rein was unavailing; and that the efforts of two men were not sufficient to keep them in the path. Whether, at the moment of the upset, the rein had become freed from the horse's tail, was immaterial. There was no proof or pretence that the driver had regained his control of it in season to obtain any control of the horses, or to have any power to guide them.

These facts bring the case within the rule laid down in Davis v. Dudley, 4 Allen, 557, which we have had recently occasion to reconsider and apply in Titus v. Northbridge, 97 Mass. 258, 93 Am. Dec. 91, and Horton v. Taunton, 97 Mass. 266, note.

New trials granted.[1]

SOWLES v. MOORE et al.

TYLER, J. This was an action of trespass on the case, brought to recover the value of a pair of horses which were drowned in Lake Champlain through the alleged negligence of the defendants in not properly guarding an opening in the lake, where they had been taking ice, near a line of public travel. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that his son had occasion to drive onto the lake on the day of the accident; that the wind was blowing, and the ice was glare; that in turning the team around the sled slewed, and brought the pole against the horses' legs, frightening them; that they escaped from the driver, and ran rapidly from 40 to 60 rods, and into the opening, which was 20 or 30 feet long by 40 to 60 feet wide, and but little guarded. The statute (R. L. § 4321) does not prescribe the manner in which such openings shall be guarded. It imposes a fine upon persons who, in localities where people are accustomed to travel, make openings, and do not place suitable guards around them. The jury found, by special verdicts, that the opening was not properly guarded, and that the plaintiff's servant was in the exercise of due care in respect to the team, and the management of it.

The errors assigned were in the court's submitting to the jury to find whether the horses would not have run into the opening if it had been properly guarded; whether the guards would have stopped them, considering their fright, and the speed with which they were running; and in the instructions that the plaintiff must make out that the horses were drowned by reason of the failure of the defendants to properly guard the opening; that if the guards would not have prevented the casualty the plaintiff could not recover, although he was in the exercise of due care, and the defendants were negligent; that if the jury were satisfied, by a fair balance of evidence, that the horses would have been turned away by a suitable guard, then the defendants' negligence caused the damage.

These instructions did not contain a new proposition of law. It is a general rule that negligence must not only be alleged and proved, but it must also be shown that it caused the injury complained of. When injury on the part of the plaintiff and negligence on the part of the defendant concur, the plaintiff cannot, nevertheless, recover, if the defendant could not, by the exercise of due care, have prevented the accident from occurring. Shear. & R. Neg. § 8. In cases that arose under our former statute, rendering towns liable for injuries caused by defective highways, it was not sufficient to prove the existence of defects. It must also have been shown that the defects caused the injuries alleged. Lester v. Pittsford, 7 Vt. 158. Were the horses in such fright, and running at such speed, that they would have been turned from their course by such guards as reasonably prudent men would have erected? This was a material question of fact for the jury to decide before they could say whether or not the defendants' negligence in respect to a guard was the cause of the casualty. Both questions were involved in the instruction that the plaintiff must make out "that the horses were drowned by reason of the failure of the defendants to properly guard the hole." Suppose damages were claimed of a town, caused by an alleged defective railing upon a bridge. Could the question be excluded from the consideration of a jury, upon proper evidence, whether, from the nature of the accident, a suitable railing could have prevented it? We think not. In Titcomb v. Railroad Co., 12 Allen (Mass.) 254, the negligence alleged was the want of railings to the approaches to a highway bridge which the defendant was bound to maintain over its railroad at a crossing. Among other things the court instructed the jury that, if they were satisfied that the injury to the plaintiff would not have occurred if the fence or railing had been sufficient, they must find a verdict for her. In considering this subject the supreme court said: "So far as such a fence would be effectual to guard against injury from the frightening of a horse about to enter upon the bridge, by the approach of a train of cars passing under the bridge, the plaintiff was entitled to that protection. Not that the defendant was bound to maintain a barrier that would in all cases stop the progress of a frightened horse about to enter upon the bridge, but it was bound to maintain and keep in repair a suitable and proper fence at the place; and if the discharge of this duty would have prevented the occurrence of the present injury, and the plaintiff is shown to have been without fault on her part, the railroad company may properly be charged in the present action. The fact whether such a fence would have prevented the occurrence of the injury may be a difficult one for the jury to find, but the burden is on the plaintiff to show this, and if she can establish it the defendant may be held liable for the injuries sustained. The case of a horse being frightened is one of the cases of casualty which may and often does occur, and is entirely consistent with a reasonable degree of care and prudence on the part of the traveler. Such traveler has a right, in case of such occurrence, to the protection which such a fence as the law requires the railroad company to maintain would have given. If such a fence would have been unavailing, and the injury would still have occurred, the traveler cannot say his injury was occasioned by any neglect of the railroad company, and he must bear the loss; but, if otherwise, the liability attaches to the party bound to maintain the fence as an appendage to the bridge." In Wilson v. Atlanta, 60 Ga. 473, it was alleged that an injury was caused by the defendant's negligence in not providing a railing upon a street. An instruction was held proper, that the questions whether or not there was negligence in putting up the railing, and whether such negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff, might be tested by the inquiry whether the plaintiff would not have been injured even if the railing had been constructed. In Ilfrey v. Railway Co., 76 Tex. 63, 13 S. W. 165, the plaintiff sought to charge the defendant with liability by reason of its maintaining an embankment which, as alleged, caused the destruction of the plaintiff's house by water. It was held competent for the trial court to consider evidence tending to show that the house would have been swept away by the storm, regardless of the embankment; to find that fact from a preponderance of the evidence; and that the embankment was not the proximate cause of the destruction. In Railroad Co. v. Bailey, 11 Ohio St. 333, it was alleged that the defendant negligently ran its train so as to kill the plaintiff's horses. It was held error for the court to refuse an instruction to the jury that, though the defendant was negligent, the plaintiff must fail in his action if the jury believed from the evidence that due care, had it been used, would not have prevented the injury. A corresponding proposition was contained in Judge Steele's charge in Walker v. Westfield, 39 Vt. 246, which was construed by this court to mean that, though the plaintiffs were not in the exercise of due care, if "such want of care did not contribute to the accident, then it is of no consequence in the case, and will not prevent a recovery." We find the instructions fully sustained, both by reason and authority. * * *[2]

Action to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, Arthur Weeks, through the alleged negligence of the defendants. The declaration alleged that the defendants were the owners and proprietors of the Hotel Knox, a public inn in the city of Knoxville, and had negligently permitted this hotel to be in an unsafe condition. More specifically, it was alleged, in a second count of the declaration, that the defendant had failed to provide fire escapes, as ordered by an ordinance of the city of Knoxville, or other reasonable means of escape from the building. The defendants pleaded not guilty. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

It appeared that on the evening of April 7, 1897, Arthur Weeks, a travelling salesman from Rochester, New York, reached Knoxville, registered at the Hotel Knox, and was assigned to Room 49 on the third floor. About 3 o'clock in the morning following, Hotel Knox was destroyed by fire, and Weeks perished in the flames. The fire was first discovered by the night watchman of the hotel, who immediately gave the alarm, ascended the stairway leading to the second and third floors, knocked upon the doors, and made every effort to arouse the guests. All the guests escaped, excepting Weeks and one other. One of the guests, as he passed out, heard some one in 49 pounding at the door, and noticed that he had kicked out one of the panels. It is also shown that persons occupying rooms on the same floor with Weeks, immediately contiguous, and across the hall in opposite and diagonal directions, all received the alarm, and succeeded in making their escape. The building was provided with a front and a rear stairway, but had no fire escapes. South of the Hotel Knox, and immediately adjoining, was the banking house of the Third National Bank, only one story in height; and several of the guests leaped upon its roof from the burning hotel building. This mode of escape was accessible to deceased, since his window overlooked the roof, but it was not shown that he had knowledge of it.

McALISTER, J. * * * The fourth assignment is that the court erred in excluding the ordinance of the city of Knoxville requiring the owners and keepers of hotels to erect fire escapes thereon. The objection offered to this testimony was that the ordinance in question contemplated that notice to erect fire escapes must be given to the owner of the property by the board of public works, and that no such notice was given to the owner and proprietor of Hotel Knox. The declaration, as already observed, alleged that the defendants had failed to provide fire escapes for Hotel Knox, "as ordered by an ordinance of the city of Knoxville." * * *

We do not however decide the effect of the breach of the ordinance in fixing civil liability, nor do we adjudicate the proper construction of the ordinance offered in evidence, since neither question is necessarily involved in this case, for the following reason, namely: There is no proof in the record even tending to show that the deceased lost his life in consequence of the failure to construct fire escapes as provided by the city ordinance. The principle is recognized in all the cases that a liability cannot be predicated alone upon the breach of an ordinance, but it must affirmatively appear that the injury sustained resulted proximately from said breach. * * *

After a very attentive reading of the record in this cause, we have failed to discover any causal connection between the death of plaintiff's intestate and the failure of defendants in error to erect fire escapes, as required by the ordinance. It is not shown that deceased was at a window, or in any position where a fire escape would have afforded him any benefit whatever. There is evidence tending to show that deceased had locked himself in his room, and was heard beating on his door, trying to make his escape. It is shown that one of the windows of his room overlooked the Third National Bank Building, and that deceased could, and with entire safety to himself, have escaped by leaping to the roof of that building, as many others similarly situated successfully did escape. As already stated, it is not shown that deceased knew of this avenue of escape, and we cannot perceive how he would have benefited by fire escapes under the circumstances surrounding him. We are therefore of opinion that if the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error in respect of the proper construction of this ordinance were correct, and that its breach would constitute actionable negligence, these questions are mere abstractions in this case, since no causal connection between the violation of the ordinance and the injuries sustained by the plaintiff is shown. * * *

No reversible error. Affirmed.[3]

AIKEN v. CITY OF COLUMBUS.

GILLETT, J. By appellant's complaint in this action appellee was sought to be charged with negligence in the management of its public lighting system, whereby appellant's intestate was killed, on his own premises, by coming in contact with a live wire, belonging to appellee, which had fallen from its electric light pole in the adjoining street. A demurrer was sustained to the complaint, and from the judgment which followed appellant appeals.

It is contended by counsel for appellee that, as it does not appear that the city made any use of said system other than for the purpose of lighting its streets, it was acting in a governmental capacity, and is therefore not to be held liable for the negligence of its employés and servants in the management of the property. * * *

We are satisfied that we are within the authorities in holding, as we do, that a city or town is answerable ex delicto for any direct invasion of the rights of third persons in the management of its public lighting system. While the doctrine of immunity of municipal corporations in matters purely governmental is too well established upon the authorities to be shaken, yet we are of opinion that public policy requires that the doctrine should be kept strictly within limits, to the end that so far as possible corporate liability may prompt those charged with responsibility in the government of cities and towns to be alert to prevent wrongs to third persons in the maintenance of municipal property.

The point is made, however, that although it appears that the fall of the wire was the proximate cause of the death of appellant's intestate, and that said wire had become weak and rotten, in which respect appellee is charged with negligence, yet it is not alleged that the wire fell by reason of such defective condition. Although it is clear from a reading of the complaint that this was an assumed fact, yet the omission of the allegation renders the complaint insufficient, and an affirmance must follow. * * *

Judgment affirmed.[4]

WILLIAMS v. GREAT WESTERN RY. CO.

Action to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff through the defendants' negligence.

The case was tried before Keating, J., at the Denbighshire Summer Assizes, 1873, and the following facts appeared: At the place where the accident occurred the defendants' line ran for some distance on the level across a piece of open ground, and for a space of 150 yards was wholly unfenced. At a point in this unfenced part it was crossed by a public carriage road on the level, and at another point about thirty yards off, by a public foot path, also on the level, which struck off from the road some little distance before it reached the line.

On the 22d of December, 1871, the plaintiff, a child of four and a half years old, was found lying on the rails by the foot path, with one foot severed from his body. There was no evidence to show how the child had come there beyond this, that he had been sent on an errand a few minutes before from the cottage where he lived, which lay by the roadside, at about 300 yards distance from the railway, and farther from it than the point where the foot path diverged from the road. It was suggested on the part of the defendants that he had gone along the road, and then, reaching the railway, had strayed down the line; and on the part of the plaintiff, that he had gone along the open foot path, and was crossing the line when he was knocked down and injured by the passing train. The learned judge thought there was no evidence to go to the jury of liability on the defendants, and nonsuited the plaintiff, reserving leave to him to move to enter a verdict for £250, the amount at which the jury had, by consent, assessed the damages, if there was any evidence for the jury in support of the declaration.

POLLOCK, B. The question in this case is whether there was any evidence that ought to have been left with the jury. I should be sorry to think that we were extending the rule on the subject of negligence which was laid down by Willes, J., in the case of Daniel v. Metropolitan Ry. Co. (Law Rep. 3 C. P. 216, at page 222), in terms which were approved of in the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords (Law Rep. 3 C. P. 591; Id. 5 H. L. 45), although the decision itself was reversed. "It is not enough for the plaintiff to shew that there has been an accident upon the defendants' line, and thence to argue that the company are liable even prima facie. It is necessary for the plaintiff to establish by evidence circumstances from which it may fairly be inferred that there is reasonable probability that the accident resulted from the want of some precaution which the defendants might and ought to have resorted to; and I go further and say that the plaintiff should also shew with reasonable certainty what particular precautions should have been taken."

Compare: City of Crawfordsville v. Van Cleave (1906) 39 Ind. App. 574, 77 N. E. 1119, where a causal connection which counsel had assumed to be too clear for words was held to be not shown for the purpose of the demurrer.

Can we, consistently with the rule so laid down, hold that there was evidence which might have been submitted to the jury? Now as to there being a non-performance of what was enjoined by the Act of Parliament, there is no doubt about it; and it is not for us to speculate on what was the precise intention of the legislature when they required that there should be a gate or stile on a footpath crossing on a level. It is sufficient to say that the defendants have neglected to comply with the enactment.

Then can it be inferred with reasonable probability that the accident occurred by reason of this negligence, so as to make this a question for the jury? I was at first impressed with the view that this was like the case in which it has been held that where there is an even balance of the evidence, so that no inference can be properly drawn one way more than the other, the judge must not leave the question to the jury. The real question is, whether the negligence can reasonably be so connected with the accident as to allow of a jury saying that it did in fact give occasion to it. Upon the whole, I think that there was evidence which might be left to the jury, and the rule must therefore be made absolute.

AMPHLETT, B. My opinion has fluctuated during the argument, but I have come to a conclusion satisfactory to my own mind that the verdict should be entered for the plaintiff. We start with the fact that the defendants have failed to comply with the express provisions of the statute, and this is an act of gross negligence. I think nothing turns on the neglect at the carriage way. But the child was in fact found upon the foot way, and the proper presumption is that it met with the accident on the footway, and whilst it was crossing the line. Then the child being lawfully on the foot way, and the defendants being guilty of a breach of duty, the only question is whether there is reasonable ground for connecting this breach of duty with the accident. It is not necessary to decide this as a jury; it is enough to say that I think it was clearly a case which ought to be submitted to a jury. There are many supposable circumstances under which the accident may have happened, and which would connect the accident with the neglect. If the child was merely wandering about, and he had met with a stile he would probably have been turned back; and one at least of the objects for which a gate or a stile is required is to warn people of what is before them, and to make them pause before reaching a dangerous place like a railroad. The rule must be made absolute.

[5] In Hayes v. Michigan Cent. R. R. Co. (1884) 111 U. S. 228, 4 Sup. Ct. 369, 28 L. Ed. 410, the facts were as follows: An eight year old boy, bright and well grown, but deaf and dumb, had been run over by a train of the defendant railway company. There was no contributory negligence in the boy. The particular negligence charged against the defendant was its omission to build a fence along its right of way through a city park, as required by a city ordinance. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant. On error, this judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court, where Mr. Justice Mathews, delivering the opinion, remarked:

"It is further argued that the direction of the court below was right, because the want of a fence could not reasonably be alleged as the cause of the injury. In the sense of an efficient cause, causa causans, this is, no doubt, strictly true; but that is not the sense in which the law uses the term in this connection. The question is, was it causa sine qua non: a cause, which if it had not existed, the injury would not have taken place, an occasional cause, and that is a question of fact, unless the causal connection is evidently not proximate. Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co. v. Kellogg (1876) 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256. The rule laid down by Willes, J., in Daniel v. Metropolitan R. Co. (1868) L. R. 3 C. P. 216, 222, and approved by the Exchequer Chamber (1868) L. R. 3 C. P. 591, and by the House of Lords (1871) L. R. 5 H. L. 45, was this: 'It is necessary for the plaintiff to establish by evidence, circumstances from which it may be fairly inferred that there is a reasonable probability that the accident resulted from the want of some precaution which the defendants might and ought to have resorted to;' and in the case of Williams v. Great Western R. Co. (1874) L. R. 9 Exch. 157, where that rule was applied to a case similar to the present, it was said, page 162: 'There are many supposable circumstances under which the accident may have happened and which would connect the accident with the neglect. If the child was merely wandering about and he had met with a stile, he would probably have been turned back; and one at least of the objects for which a gate or stile is required, is to warn people of what is before them and make them pause before reaching a dangerous place like a railroad.'

"The evidence of the circumstances, showing negligence on the part of the defendant, which may have been the legal cause of the injury to the plaintiff, according to the rule established in Railroad Co. v. Stout (1873) 17 Wall. 657 (84 U. S.) 21 L. Ed. 745, and Randall v. B. & O. R. R. Co. (1883) 109 U. S. 478, 3 Sup. Ct. 322, 27 L. Ed. 1003, should have been submitted to the jury; and for the error of the Circuit Court in directing a verdict for the defendant, the judgment is reversed and a new trial awarded."

CHAPTER II

THE TESTS OF LEGAL CAUSE

SECTION 1.—THE "PROXIMATE CAUSE"

"In jure non remota causa, sed proxima, spectatur:" It were infinite for the law to judge the causes of causes, and their impulsions one of another: therefore, it contenteth itself with the immediate cause; and judgeth of acts by that, without looking to any further degree.

Francis Bacon, The Maxims of the Law, Reg. 1 (1596).[1]

Guesswork perhaps would have taught us that barbarians will not trace the chain of causation beyond its nearest link, and that, for example, they will not impute one man's death to another unless that other has struck a blow which laid a corpse at his feet. All the evidence however points the other way: I have slain a man if but for some act of mine he might perhaps be yet alive. Very instructive is a formula which was still in use in the England of the thirteenth century; one who was accused of homicide and was going to battle was expected to swear that he had done nothing whereby the dead man was "further from life or nearer to death." Damages which the modern English lawyer would assuredly describe as "too remote"

[1] 14 Bacon's Works (Spedding Ed.) 189.

"This maxim, with its gloss, is frequently cited as 'an all-sufficient statement of the reasons for every decision upon a question of legal cause.' Indeed the expression 'proximate cause' is generally used instead of 'legal cause,' and it is often under the former head that one must look in digest for authorities on causation. This use of the maxim as a universal solvent of difficulties has been productive of infinite confusion and error. Taking the words in their natural signification, the maxim is not a correct statement of the law. Taken literally, the maxim would be understood as implying that the antecedent which is nearest in space or time is invariably to be regarded as the legal cause; and it might also be understood as putting material antecedents, forces of nature, on an equal footing with voluntary and responsible human actors. But it is a mistake to suppose that contiguity in space or nearness in time are legal tests of the existence of causal relation. No doubt these elements are often important to be considered in determining the question of fact as to the existence of such relation: but lack of contiguity or nearness would not, as matter of law, conclusively establish that the defendant's tort was not the cause of the damage. Bacon's language has repeatedly been criticized." Professor Jeremiah Smith, "Legal Cause in Actions of Tort." 25 Harv. Law Rev. 106.

were not too remote for the author of the Leges Henrici. At your request I accompany you when you are about your own affairs; my enemies fall upon and kill me; you must pay for my death. You take me to see a wild-beast show or that interesting spectacle a madman; beast or madman kills me; you must pay. You hang up your sword; some one else knocks it down so that it cuts me; you must pay. In none of these cases can you honestly swear that you did nothing that helped to bring about death or wound.

2 Pollock and Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.) 470.

We have, then, to deal with the primitive notion which instinctively visits liability on the visible offending source, whatever it be, of a visible evil result. The notion, as applied to persons, is that of the schaedliche Mann, a person from whom some evil result has proceeded. * * * An example showing an exceptionally late survival of these ideas, and at the same time the transition to different standards [is found in the following instance, drawn from Frisian Chronicles of 1439]:

"Owen Alwerk was brewing beer. During his absence the child of Swein Pons came in and stood by the kettle. The kettle slipped from its hook, and the liquid burned the child so that it died on the third day. The relatives of the child pursued Alwerk, who fled to the house of a friend for refuge. The master of the house opposed the entrance of the pursuers, and an affray ensued, in which the master by inadvertence killed his own nephew. The affair was laid before six men as judges; and they decided at first that Alwerk must pay the head money for the dead child and for the dead nephew, and must besides make a pilgrimage to Rome. But Alwerk opposed the judgment, and to such a good purpose that they altered it to this effect,—that he should be absolved without more from the child's death, and from the nephew's if he swore that he did not urge on the master of the house to fight."

John H. Wigmore, "Responsibility for Tortious Acts." [2]

[2] In 3 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, 483, reprinted from 7 Harv. Law Rev. 319 (1894).

An instance of the "but-for" rule in legal causation, affirmatively applied in modern law, is found in Gilman v. Noyes (1876) 57 N. H. 627: The bars into P.'s pasture had been negligently left down by D. As a result, P.'s sheep got out of the pasture. They were never found. The evidence tended to show that they had been devoured by bears. The jury were instructed that if the sheep escaped in consequence of the bars being left down by D., and would not have been killed but for this act by D., he was liable. The reviewing court held this instruction erroneous. See infra, "Intervening Agency as a Test of Legal Cause." See also Professor Bohlen's remarks in 21 Harv. Law Rev. 234–235 (1908).

Although Lord Bacon, long ago, referred to this question of remoteness, it has been left in very great vagueness as to what constitutes the limitation. * * * It is a vague rule, and as Bramwell, B., said, it is something like having to draw a line between night and day; there is a great duration of twilight when it is neither night nor day.

Blackburn, J., in Hobbs v. London & Southwestern Railway Co. (1875) L. R. 10 Q. B. 111, 121.

Lord Bacon, in interpreting this maxim, says: "It were infinite for the law to consider the causes of causes, and their impulsion of each other; therefore it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that, without looking to any farther degree." Maxims of Law, 1. The law indeed is not to inquire into the causes of causes, but it is anxiously to inquire for the true cause, and to distinguish between the cause and that which is ordinarily incidental to it. Some idea of what Lord Bacon means is furnished by the first case which he gives in illustration. An annuity was granted pro consilio impenso et impendendo. The grantee was committed for treason, so that the grantor could not have access to him for counsel. It was held that the annuity was not determined, the involuntary, compulsory imprisonment being a sufficient excuse, into the cause of which the law would not inquire.

So a familiar illustration may be found in an indictment for homicide, where the defence is insanity. If the insanity be shown, the law will not inquire as to the cause of the insanity, to show that it had its origin in the misconduct of the defendant.

So if a building insured were destroyed by fire resulting from the negligence of the owner's servants, it would not be competent to show that their habits of negligence were the result of the inattention and lax discipline of the master.

That is to say, a distinct substantive cause being shown, the law will not go behind it and inquire as to its cause. It does not "consider the causes of causes." And this is the meaning and the extent of meaning of this familiar maxim of causa proxima. It is certainly true, that it is not always easy to determine what is the efficient, procuring cause. But the difficulty is not in the rule, but because our conclusions are drawn always with imperfect instruments, and often from an imperfect view of the facts. It is also true that, philosophically, we know little of the relation of cause and effect. But it is equally true that, in all the highest practical affairs of life, we recognize and act upon this relation; and that, when so acting, we seek the true, efficient, procuring cause, and not that nearest in point of time or space.

SECTION 2.—PROBABILITY OF RESULT AS A TEST OF LEGAL CAUSE

GREENLAND v. CHAPLIN.

(Court of Exchequer, 1850. 5 Exch. 243, 82 R. R. 655.)

Case for negligence in navigating the defendant's steam-boat, whereby it struck against another steam-boat, on which the plaintiff was a passenger, and, in consequence, his leg was broken. Plea, Not guilty.

At the trial, before Pollock, C. B., at the Middlesex sittings after last Michaelmas Term, it appeared that the plaintiff was a passenger on board a steam-boat called the "Sons of the Thames," which was going from Westminster to London Bridge. The defendant's steam-boat, called the "Bachelor," was going the same way, and as the vessels approached the Adelphi Pier, the "Bachelor" struck the "Sons of the Thames" on the bow, where the anchor was carried, and, in consequence, it fell upon and broke the plaintiff's leg. There was conflicting evidence as to the degree of negligence attributable to the respective steam-boats, and especially as to the propriety of the mode in which the anchor on board the "Sons of the Thames" was carried in the bow of the vessel. The learned Judge told the jury, that if they were of opinion that the collision was owing to the bad navigation of the "Bachelor," they should find a verdict for the plaintiff; but if they thought that there was any negligence, either in the stowage of the anchor, or in the plaintiff putting himself in the place where he was, on board the "Sons of the Thames," they should find for the defendant. The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, with £200 damages,

Shee, Serjt., in last Hilary Term obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict, as against evidence, no objection being taken as to the mode in which the question was left to the jury.[4]

POLLOCK, C. B. (after holding on other grounds that the rule should be discharged). But here I may again state,[5] that it occurs to me there is considerable doubt,—and at present I guard myself against [4] The argument of counsel is omitted, and only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point.

[5] In the course of the argument Pollock, C. B., had asked this question of counsel: "Can it be said that a person guilty of negligence is responsible for all the possible consequences, which he could never have foreseen, and which no one would have anticipated? For instance, if a person chooses to walk in a crowded street with an open knife under his coat, and another person negligently runs against him, is that other person to be responsible for all the injury which the knife may inflict on the person who carries it?" The answer was a reference to Flower v. Adam (1810) 2 Taunt. 314, 11 R. R. 591.

being supposed to decide with reference to any case which may hereafter arise; but, at the same time, I am desirous that it may be understood that I entertain considerable doubt,—whether a person who is guilty of negligence is responsible for all the consequences which may under any circumstances arise, and in respect of mischief which could by no possibility have been foreseen, and which no reasonable person would have anticipated. Whenever that case shall arise, I shall certainly desire to hear it argued, and to consider whether the rule of law be not this: that a person is expected to anticipate and guard against all reasonable consequences, but that he is not, by the law of England, expected to anticipate and guard against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur. I beg to say that, in expressing this doubt whether the responsibility for consequential damage extends to the extreme case to which I have adverted, I am expressing my own opinion only, and not that of the rest of the Court.[6]

ETEN v. LUYSTER.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1875. 60 N. Y. 252.)

ALLEN, J.[7] The plaintiff was, at the time of the forcible entry by the defendants, and the commission of the wrongs complained of, in possession of the premises, as the tenant of one Morrison, under a hiring for a term which had not expired. Morrison was the immediate lessee of the owner (to whose title, in fee, the defendants had succeeded), under a hiring for a year, by written lease, containing a covenant, by the lessee, to vacate the premises on having two months' notice, in writing, and being paid $200, as an equivalent for moving and giving up the lease.

By an instrument under seal, * * * Morrison, in consideration of $300, canceled the lease to him, and waived any further notice to quit, and agreed to vacate the premises on or before the 1st day of July, 1868. On the first or second day of August, the defendants

[6] In Rigby v. Hewitt (1850) 5 Ex. 240, 82 R. R. 652, 653, Pollock, C. B., had remarked: "I am disposed not quite to acquiesce to the full extent in the proposition, that a person is responsible for all the possible consequences of his negligence. I wish to guard against laying down the proposition so universally; but of this I am quite clear, that every person who does a wrong, is at least responsible for all the mischievous consequences that may reasonably be expected to result, under ordinary circumstances, from such misconduct."

Referring to these two cases, Sir Frederick Pollock remarked, in 1905: "In Rigby v. Hewitt and Greenland v. Chaplin, we have, it is believed, the first clear statement of the rule as to consequential damage which is now generally accepted, namely 'that a person is expected to anticipate and guard against all reasonable consequences, but that he is not, by the law of England, expected to anticipate and guard against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur.'" See Preface to 82 R. R. v–vi.

entered upon the premises occupied by the plaintiff, tore down and ruined a building which the plaintiff had erected thereon, and removed his chattels and personal property. There being no prohibition against subletting in the lease to Morrison, he had a right to sublet the whole or any part of the premises. Jackson v. Silvernail, 15 Johns. 278; Same v. Harrison, 17 Johns. 66; Roosevelt v. Hopkins, 33 N. Y. 81. The plaintiff, the sublessee, by the contract of hiring, acquired a valid term in and a right to the possession of the part of the demised premises let to him for the time agreed upon, subject, only to be defeated by the expiration of the term of Morrison, or a re-entry by the owner of the fee, and supreme landlord, for some condition of the demise broken. He held the premises, subject to the conditions of the original lease to Morrison, and the conditions of his own hiring, and, with these limitations, his right to hold for the term granted to him was perfect.

As landlords, the defendants had no right of entry, and their forcible dispossession of the plaintiff was a trespass for which the plaintiff had an action; and the proceedings for his removal by summary process, under the landlord and tenant act, having been reversed, the warrant furnished no protection to them, and constituted no defence to the action. 2 R. S. 516, § 49; Hayden v. Florence Sewing Machine Co., 54 N. Y. 221. The statute expressly gives an action to the tenant in such case.

The plaintiff was only entitled to recover such damages as were the direct consequences of the acts of the defendants, and those acting under their direction and by their authority. This would exclude from the consideration of the jury all damages resulting from the acts of, or want of proper care of the property by, the plaintiff. The act complained of was the wrongful removal and destruction of the plaintiff's property in his absence, and there was no evidence that any part of the loss was caused by his act, or could have been prevented by him. The question of contributory negligence is not in the case. The plaintiff owed no duty to the defendants, and was not called upon to gather up the fragments of his scattered and broken chattels, but was at liberty to leave them where the defendants left them, and look to the latter for their value. They were out of his possession by the tortious act of the defendants, by whom, and whose acts, they were lost or destroyed. The plaintiff complains of the pulling down and destruction of his building, and the taking and conversion of his personal property, as well as the damages sustained by a loss of his business.[8] The latter claim was excluded from the consideration of the jury by the court, but evidence of the other items of loss and damage were clearly within the allegations of the complaint, and admissible.

[8] It appeared in the case that "part of this house had been used by plaintiff as a stable, and his evidence tended to show that he kept, in a tin box, inside a feed box, in the stable, a sum of money, about $2,000. This was lost in the removal." And see Eisele v. Oddie (C. C. 1904) 128 Fed. 941, 949.

For all loss occasioned by the trespass, whether in the destruction of the chattels or the loss of money that was kept upon the premises, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. That the money was kept in an unusual place did not take it out of the protection of the law, or affect the liability of the defendants for their tort. They acted at their peril, and must respond for the consequences. The loss of the money, although the defendants may not have suspected its presence, was the direct and necessary consequence of the acts of the defendants. * * *

All concur; RAPALLO, J., expresses no opinion as to the right of the plaintiff to recover for the money lost, but concurs in opinion in all other respects.

Judgment [for the plaintiff] affirmed.

SMITH v. LONDON & S. W. RY. CO.

(Court of Common Pleas, Hilary Term, 1870. L. R. 5 C. P. 98. In the Exchequer Chamber, Michaelmas Term, 1870. L. R. 6 C. P. 14.)

This was an action for negligence, and the declaration contained three counts, of which the second and only material one was as follows:

"That the time of the committing by the defendants of the grievances in this count mentioned, the plaintiff was possessed of a cottage and premises, and the defendants were possessed of and had the care and management of a railway running near the said cottage and premises, with banks belonging thereto, and part of the said railway, and were possessed of locomotive engines containing burning substances, which were used by the defendants for conveying carriages along this railway. Yet, by the negligence and improper conduct of the defendants, and the want of due care on the part of the defendants in the keeping and management of their said railway engines and banks, quantities of cut grass and hedge trimmings were heaped up on the said railway and banks, and became and were ignited, and a fire was occasioned which spread over and along a stubble-field, near the said railway unto the said cottage and premises, and set fire to the same, and thereby the same and the plaintiff's furniture, &c., then being in and near the said cottage and premises, were burnt and destroyed, and the plaintiff lost the use and enjoyment of the same."

The defendants pleaded not guilty, and issue was joined thereon.

The case was tried before Keating, J., at the Dorchester summer assizes in 1869, when it appeared that about fourteen days previous to the 3d of August, 1868, the defendants' servants, after cutting the grass and trimming the banks and hedges at the sides of the line, had raked the cut grass and hedge-trimmings into heaps near the line and there left them, and that owing to the extreme heat of the weather these heaps had become very dry and inflammable. On the 3d of August, at about 1 p. m., two trains (an up train and a down train) belonging to the defendants, passed the spot in question, and immediately afterwards the heaps were on fire; and, in consequence of a high wind prevailing at the time, the fire consumed the adjoining hedge, and, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the company's servants and others to subdue it, passed over a stubble-field and a public road, and communicated to the plaintiff's cottage, which was about 200 yards from the line, and destroyed it with the furniture therein. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff stated that at the time referred to there were fires all about the country; but whether he meant on the sides of the railway or not, did not clearly appear. There was no evidence to show that the company's engines were improperly constructed, or that they were negligently or improperly worked.

On the part of the plaintiff it was contended that there was evidence from which the jury might fairly assume that the fire was caused by sparks or burning cinders from one of the engines which had just before passed the spot; and that there was negligence on the part of the company's servants in allowing such inflammable material to remain on the banks of their railway for so long a time in so dry a season, and therefore they were responsible for the damage resulting from it.

For the defendants it was contended, on the authority of Vaughan v. Taff Vale Ry. Co., 3 H. & N. 743, 28 L. J. Ex. 41, in error 5 H. & N. 679, 29 L. J. Ex. 247, that the defendants were not responsible for damage resulting from the cause suggested, in the absence of evidence to show that their engines were improperly constructed or had been negligently or improperly worked; and that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury.

The learned judge declined to nonsuit; and a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the sum claimed, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them, or a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that there was no evidence of negligence which ought to have been submitted to the jury,—the Court to be at liberty to draw inferences, and to amend the pleadings.

Kingdon, Q. C., in Michaelmas Term last, obtained a rule nisi.

BRETT, J. I am of opinion that there was no evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the defendants. I cannot help feeling that great difficulty is thrown upon the judges who are called upon to determine questions of this sort, which make them too much judges of facts. I take the rule of law in these cases to be that which is laid down by Alderson, B., in Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Company, 11 Ex. 784, 25 L. J. Ex. 213: "Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. The defendants might have been liable for negligence, if, unintentionally, they omitted to do that which a reasonable person would have done, or did that which a person taking reasonable precautions would not have done. A reasonable man would act with reference to average circumstances in ordinary years." That being the rule, the question here is whether the defendants by their servants have done or omitted to do something which reasonable men placed under such circumstances as they were placed in would have done or omitted to do. The case of the plaintiff, as put by Mr. Cole on moving, and also in his argument to-day, is this: Conceding that there is no ground for saying that the defendants' engines were not of the best possible construction, or that there was negligence in the mode of working them, they were bound to take notice that such engines do emit sparks and burning cinders; and, as they were driving them through the country in an exceptionally dry season, they ought not to have permitted such combustible materials as rummage or hedge-trimmings to remain on the banks of their railway; they ought, as reasonable men, to have contemplated that sparks from their engines might set them on fire, and that, if they did, the fire might extend to the plaintiff's property. I quite agree that the defendants ought to have anticipated that sparks might be emitted from their engines, notwithstanding they are of the best construction, and were worked without negligence; and that they might reasonably have anticipated that the rummage and hedge-trimmings allowed to accumulate might be thereby set on fire. But I am of opinion that no reasonable man could have foreseen that the fire would consume the hedge and pass across a stubblefield, and so get to the plaintiff's cottage at the distance of 200 yards from the railway, crossing a road in its passage. It seems to me that no duty was cast upon the defendants, in relation to the plaintiff's property, because it was not shown that that property was of such a nature and so situate that the defendants ought to have known that by permitting the rummage and hedge-trimmings to remain on the banks of the railway they placed it in undue peril. If that had been shown, I should have thought that the case fell within the principle laid down by Cockburn, C. J., in Vaughan v. Taff Vale Ry. Co., 5 H. & N. 679, 685, 29 L. J. Ex. 247, for then the defendants must have been taken to have known that the course which was pursued by their servants was calculated to endanger the adjoining property. But, bringing one's knowledge of ordinary English country life to bear upon the subject, I am of opinion, as matter of fact, that no reasonable man could suppose,—or at least eight out of ten would fail to suppose,—that, if by any means the rummage and hedge-trimmings on the side of the railway were set on fire, the fire would extend to a stubble-field adjoining, and so proceed to a cottage at the distance before mentioned. We read of such fires in the American prairies; but it would never occur, as it seems to me, to the mind of the most prudent person that such an extraordinary conflagration could be caused in this country in the manner here spoken of by the witnesses. I think the defendants cannot reasonably be held responsible for not having contemplated such an extraordinary combination of circumstances, or such a result. For these reasons I am of opinion that there was no such evidence of negligence on their part as could properly be left to the jury.

The Common Pleas having discharged the rule to enter a verdict for the defendant or a non-suit, an appeal was brought.

[In the Exchequer Chamber]

KELLY, C. B. I certainly entertained some doubts during the argument as to whether the judgment of the Court below could be sustained; but when I consider the facts, I cannot but feel that it is a case in which there was some evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, and negligence which caused the injury complained of. It appears that about the time that the spot in question was passed by an engine which, as we know, would emit sparks which would fall on the adjoining ground, a fire was discovered on the defendants' ground adjoining the line. It appears that it had been a dry summer and the hot weather had continued for many weeks before the occurrence: and probably with a view to prevent mischief, the defendants had caused the grass that grew by the line and the fence to be cut, and the cuttings of the grass and hedge were placed in small heaps on the ground between the rails and the hedge. On the other side of the hedge was a stubble-field of a considerable extent which would be extremely dry, and at a distance of two hundred yards across a road was the cottage belonging to the plaintiff. This was the state of facts. The trimmings caught fire, there was a strong south-east wind blowing; and though we have no proof of the exact progress of the fire, because the company's servants who had seen it were not called, it appears to have extended to and through the hedge and across the field to the plaintiff's cottage which was burnt. The question for us is, how all this occurred. There is some doubt how the fire originated, but there was ample evidence for the jury, which would have been rightly left to them, that it originated from sparks from the engine falling on the dry heaps of trimmings, and thence extending to the hedge and stubblefield. If that was so, the question arises whether there was any negligence in the defendants.

Now it can scarcely be doubted that the defendants were bound in such a summer, knowing that trains were passing from which sparks might fall upon them, to remove these heaps of trimmings; and, at any rate, it was a question for the jury whether it was not negligent of them not to do so. I think, therefore, there was a case for the jury on which they might reasonably have found that the defendants were negligent in not removing the trimmings as soon as possible, and that this was the cause of the injury. Then comes the question raised by Brett, J., to which at first I was inclined to give some weight. He puts it thus: "I quite agree that the defendants ought to have anticipated that sparks might be emitted from their engines, notwithstanding that they were of the best construction, and were worked without negligence, and that they might reasonably have anticipated that the rummage and hedge-trimmings allowed to accumulate might be thereby set on fire. But I am of opinion that no reasonable man would have foreseen that the fire would consume the hedge and pass across a stubble-field, and so get to the plaintiff's cottage at the distance of 200 yards from the railway, crossing a road in its passage." It is because I thought, and still think, the proposition is true that any reasonable man might well have failed to anticipate such a concurrence of circumstances as is here described that I felt pressed at first by this view of the question; but on consideration I do not feel that that is a true test of the liability of the defendants in this case. It may be that they did not anticipate, and were not bound to anticipate, that the plaintiff's cottage would be burnt as a result of their negligence; but I think the law is, that if they were aware that these heaps were lying by the side of the rails, and that it was a hot season, and that therefore by being left there the heaps were likely to catch fire, the defendants were bound to provide against all circumstances which might result from this, and were responsible for all the natural consequences of it. I think, then, there was negligence in the defendants in not removing these trimmings, and that they thus became responsible for all the consequences of their conduct, and that the mere fact of the distance of this cottage from the point where the fire broke out does not affect their liability, and that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

CHANNELL, B. I am of the same opinion. I quite agree that where there is no direct evidence of negligence, the question what a reasonable man might foresee is of importance in considering the question whether there is evidence for the jury of negligence or not, and this is what was meant by Bramwell, B., in his judgment in Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Co., 11 Ex. 781; 25 L. J. (Ex.) 212, referred to by Mr. Kingdon; but when it has been once determined that there is evidence of negligence, the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not.

BLACKBURN, J. I also agree that what the defendants might reasonably anticipate is, as my Brother CHANNELL has said, only material with reference to the question whether the defendants were negligent or not, and cannot alter their liability if they were guilty of negligence. I have still some doubts whether there was any evidence that they were negligent, but as all the other judges are of opinion that there was evidence that they were, I am quite content that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. I do not dissent, but I have some doubt * * * if there was evidence of negligence; if the negligence were once established, it would be no answer that it did much more damage than was expected. If a man fires a gun across a road where he may reasonably anticipate that persons will be passing, and hits some one, he is guilty of negligence, and liable for the injury he has caused; but if he fires in his own wood, where he cannot reasonably anticipate that any one will be, he is not liable to any one whom he shoots, which shows that what a person may reasonably anticipate is important in considering whether he has been negligent; but if a person fires across a road when it is dangerous to do so and kills a man who is in receipt of a large income, he will be liable for the whole damage, however great, that may have resulted to his family, and cannot set up that he could not have reasonably expected to have injured any one but a laborer.*

Judgment affirmed.

MILWAUKEE & ST. P. RY. CO. v. KELLOGG.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1876. 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256.)

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

MR. JUSTICE STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action to recover compensation for the destruction by fire of the plaintiff's saw-mill and a quantity of lumber, situated and lying in the State of Iowa, and on the banks of the river Mississippi. That the property was destroyed by fire was uncontroverted. From the bill of exceptions, it appears:

> That the "plaintiff alleged the fire was negligently communicated from the defendants' steamboat 'Jennie Brown' to an elevator built of pine lumber, and one hundred and twenty feet high, owned by the defendants, and standing on the bank of the river, and from the elevator to the plaintiff's saw-mill and lumber piles, while an unusually strong wind was blowing from the elevator towards the mill and lumber. On the trial, it was admitted that the defendants owned the steamboat and elevator: that the mill was five hundred and thirty-eight feet from the elevator, and that the nearest of the plaintiff's piles of lumber was three hundred and eighty-eight feet distant from it. * * *"

The verdict of the jury was:

> 1st, that the elevator was burned from the steamer "Jennie Brown"; 2d, that such burning was caused by not using ordinary care and prudence in landing at the elevator, under circumstances existing at that particular time; and, 3d, that the burning of the mill and lumber was the unavoidable consequence of the burning of the elevator.

The only reasonable construction of the verdict is, that the fault of the defendants—in other words, their want of ordinary care and prudence—consisted in landing the steamer at the elevator in the circumstances then existing, when a gale of wind was blowing towards it, when the elevator was so combustible and so tall. If this is not the meaning of the verdict, no act of negligence, of want of care, or of fault has been found. And this is one of the faults charged in the declaration. It averred, that, while the wind was blowing a gale from the steamboat towards and in the direction of the elevator, the defendants carelessly and negligently allowed, permitted, and counselled (or, as stated in another count, "directed") the steamboat to approach and lie alongside of or in close proximity to the said elevator. This is something more than nonfeasance: it is positive action, the result, consequence, or outworking, as the jury have found it, of the want of such care as should have been exercised. * * *

The next exception is to the refusal of the Court to instruct the jury as requested, that "if they believed the sparks from the 'Jennie Brown' set fire to the elevator through the negligence of the defendants, and the distance of the elevator from the nearest lumber pile was three hundred and eighty-eight feet, and from the mill five hundred and twenty-eight feet, then the proximate cause of the burning of the mill and lumber was the burning of the elevator, and the injury was too remote from the negligence to afford a ground for a recovery." This proposition the Court declined to affirm, and in lieu thereof submitted to the jury to find whether the burning of the mill and lumber was the result naturally and reasonably to be expected from the burning of the elevator; whether it was a result which, under the circumstances, would naturally follow from the burning of the elevator; and whether it was the result of the continued effect of the sparks from the steamboat, without the aid of other causes not reasonably to be expected. All this is alleged to have been erroneous. The assignment presents the oft-embarrassing question, what is and what is not the proximate cause of an injury. The point propounded to the Court assumed that it was a question of law in this case; and in its support the two cases of Ryan v. New York Central Railroad Co., 35 N. Y. 210, 91 Am. Dec. 49, and Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Kerr, 62 Pa. 353, 1 Am. Rep. 431, are relied upon. Those cases have been the subject of much criticism since they were decided; and it may, perhaps, be doubted whether they have always been quite understood. If they were intended to assert the doctrine that when a building has been set on fire through the negligence of a party, and a second building has been fired from the first, it is a conclusion of law that the owner of the second has no recourse to the negligent wrong-doer, they have not been accepted as authority for such a doctrine, even in the States where the decisions were made. Webb v. Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Co., 49 N. Y. 420, 10 Am. Rep. 389 and Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Hope, 80 Pa. 373, 21 Am. Rep. 100. And certainly they are in conflict with numerous other decided cases. Kellogg v. Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Co., 26 Wis. 224, 7 Am. Rep. 69; Perley v. Eastern Railroad Co., 98 Mass. 414, 96 Am. Dec. 645; Higgins v. Dewey, 107 Mass. 494, 9 Am. Rep. 63; Fent v. Toledo, Peoria & Warsaw Railroad Co., 59 Ill. 349, 14 Am. Rep. 13.

The true rule is, that what is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury. It is not a question of science or of legal knowledge. It is to be determined as a fact, in view of the circumstances of fact attending it. The primary cause may be the proximate cause of a disaster, though it may operate through successive instruments, as an article at the end of a chain may be moved by a force applied to the other end, that force being the proximate cause of the movement, or as in the oft-cited case of the squib thrown in the market-place, 2 Bl. Rep. 892. The question always is, Was there an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury, a continuous operation? Did the facts constitute a continuous succession of events, so linked together as to make a natural whole, or was there some new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury? It is admitted that the rule is difficult of application. But it is generally held, that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances. These circumstances, in a case like the present, are the strength and direction of the wind, the combustible character of the elevator, its great height, and the proximity and combustible nature of the saw-mill and the piles of lumber.

Most of these circumstances were ignored in the request for instruction to the jury. Yet it is obvious that the immediate and inseparable consequences of negligently firing the elevator would have been very different if the wind had been less, if the elevator had been a low building constructed of stone, if the season had been wet, or if the lumber and the mill had been less combustible. And the defendants might well have anticipated or regarded the probable consequences of their negligence as much more far-reaching than would have been natural or probable in other circumstances. We do not say that even the natural and probable consequences of a wrongful act or omission are in all cases to be chargeable to the misfeasance or nonfeasance. They are not when there is a sufficient and independent cause operating between the wrong and the injury. In such a case the resort of the sufferer must be to the originator of the intermediate cause. But when there is no intermediate efficient cause, the original wrong must be considered as reaching to the effect, and proximate to it. The inquiry must, therefore, always be whether there was any intermediate cause disconnected from the primary fault, and self-operating, which produced the injury. Here lies the difficulty. But the inquiry must be answered in accordance with common understanding. In a succession of dependent events an interval may always be seen by an acute mind between a cause and its effect, though it may be so imperceptible as to be overlooked by a common mind. Thus, if a building be set on fire by negligence, and an adjoining building be destroyed without any negligence of the occupants of the first, no one would doubt that the destruction of the second was due to the negligence that caused the burning of the first. Yet in truth, in a very legiti-mate sense, the immediate cause of the burning of the second was the burning of the first. The same might be said of the burning of the furniture in the first. Such refinements are too minute for rules of social conduct. In the nature of things, there is in every transaction a succession of events, more or less dependent upon those preceding, and it is the province of a jury to look at this succession of events or facts, and ascertain whether they are naturally and probably connected with each other by a continuous sequence, or are dissevered by new and independent agencies, and this must be determined in view of the circumstances existing at the time.

If we are not mistaken in these opinions, the Circuit Court was correct in refusing to affirm the defendants' proposition, and in submitting to the jury to find whether the burning of the mill and lumber was a result naturally and reasonably to be expected from the burning of the elevator, under the circumstances, and whether it was the result of the continued influence or effect of the sparks from the boat, without the aid or concurrence of other causes not reasonably to have been expected. The jury found, in substance, that the burning of the mill and lumber was caused by the negligent burning of the elevator, and that it was the unavoidable consequence of that burning. This, in effect, was finding that there was no intervening and independent cause between the negligent conduct of the defendants and the injury to the plaintiff. The judgment must, therefore, be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.[9]

WOOD v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1896. 177 Pa. 306, 35 Atl. 699, 35 L. R. A. 199, 55 Am. St. Rep. 728.)

The action was against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The facts as stated by the court below were as follows:

On the 26th of October, 1893, the plaintiff, having bought a return ticket, went as a passenger upon the railroad of the defendant company from Frankford to Holmesburg. After spending the day there, attending to some matters of business, he concluded to come back upon a way train, due at Holmesburg at 5 minutes after 6 in the evening. While waiting for this train, the plaintiff stood on the platform of the station, which was on the north side of the tracks, at the eastern end of the platform, with his back against the wall at the corner. To the eastward of the station, a street crosses the railroad at grade. How far this crossing is from the station does not appear from the evidence. It was not so far away, however, but that persons on the platform could see objects at the crossing. For at least 150 yards to the eastward of the crossing the railroad is straight, and then curves to the right. About 6 o'clock an express train coming from the east upon the north track passed the station, and the plaintiff, while standing in the position described, was struck upon the leg by what proved to be the dead body of a woman, and was injured. The headlight of the approaching locomotive disclosed to one of the witnesses who stood on the platform two women in front of the train at the street crossing, going from the south to the north side of the tracks. One succeeded in getting across in safety, and the other was struck just as she reached the north rail. How the woman came to be upon the track there is nothing in the evidence to show. There was evidence that no bell was rung or whistle blown upon the train which struck the woman before it came to the crossing, and some evidence that it was running at the rate of from 50 to 60 miles an hour.

Upon this state of facts, the trial judge entered a nonsuit. The court in banc having afterwards refused to take off the nonsuit, the case was appealed from the Common Pleas of Philadelphia County.

DEAN, J. (after stating the facts). Was the negligence of defendant the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury? Judge Pennypacker, delivering the opinion of a majority of the court below, concluded it was not, and refused to take off the nonsuit. Applying the rule in Hoag v. Railroad Co., 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653, to these facts, the question on which the case turns is: "Was the injury the natural and probable consequence of the negligence,—such a consequence as, under the surrounding circumstances, might and ought to have been foreseen by the wrongdoer as likely to flow from his act?" As concerns the situation of plaintiff at the time of his injury, and the relation of that fact to the cause, whether near or remote, we do not consider it important. He was where he had a right to be,—on the platform of the station. That he had purchased a ticket for passage on defendant's road, and was waiting on its platform for his train, has no particular bearing on the question. The duty of defendant to him at that time was to provide a platform and station, safe structures, for him and others who desired to travel. In this particular its duty was performed. The injury is not in the remotest degree attributable to the platform or the station. It is sufficient to say, when there, he was not a trespasser on defendant's property, and therefore his action does not fall for that reason; but he is in no more favorable situation as a suitor than if he had been walking alongside the railroad, on the public highway, or at any other place where he had a right to be.

The rule quoted in Hoag v. Railroad Co., supra, is, in substance, the conclusion of Lord Bacon, and the one given in Broom's Legal Maxims. It is not only the well-settled rule of this state, but is, generally, that of the United States. Prof. Jaggard, in his valuable work on Torts, after a reference to very many of the cases decided in a large number of the states, among them Hoag v. Railroad Co., comes to this conclusion: "It is admitted that the rule is difficult of application. But it is generally held that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is a proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances." Jag. Torts, c. 5. Judge Cooley states the rule thus: "If the original act was wrongful, and would naturally, according to the ordinary course of events, prove injurious to some others, and result, and does actually result, in injury, through the intervention of other causes not wrongful, the injury shall be referred to the wrongful cause, passing through those which were innocent." Cooley, Torts, 69. This, also, is in substance the rule of Hoag v. Railroad Co. All the speculations and refinements of the philosophers on the exact relation of cause and effect help us very little in the determination of rules of social conduct. The juridical cause, in such a case, as we have held over and over, is best ascertained in the practical affairs of life by the application to the facts of the rule in Hoag v. Railroad Co.

Adopting that rule as the test of defendant's liability, how do we determine the natural and probable consequences, which must be foreseen, of this act? We answer in this and all like cases: from common experience and observation. The probable consequence of crossing a railroad in front of a near and approaching train is death, or serious injury. Therefore, acting from an impulse to self-preservation, or on the reflection that prompts to self-preservation, we are deterred from crossing. Our conduct is controlled by the natural and probable consequence of what our experience enables us to foresee. True, a small number of those who have occasion to cross railroads are reckless, and, either blind to or disregardful of consequences, cross, and are injured, killed, or barely escape. But this recklessness of the very few in no degree disproves the foreseeableness of the consequences by mankind generally. Again, the competent railroad engineer knows from his own experience and that of others in like employment that to approach a grade highway crossing with a rapidly moving train without warning is dangerous to the lives and limbs of the public using the crossing. He knows death and injury are the probable consequences of his neglect of duty; therefore he gives warning. But does any one believe the natural and probable consequence of standing 50 feet from a crossing, to the one side of a railroad, when a train is approaching, either with or without warning, is death or injury? Do not the most prudent, as well as the public generally, all over the land, do just this thing every day, without fear of danger? The crowded platforms and grounds of railroad stations, generally located at crossings, alongside of approaching, departing, and swiftly passing trains, prove that the public, from experience and observation, do not, in that situation, foresee any danger from trains. They are there because, in their judgment, although it is possible a train may strike an object, animate or inanimate, on the track, and hurl it against them, such a consequence is so highly improbable that it suggests no sense of danger. They feel as secure as if in their homes. To them it is no more probable than that a train at that point will jump the track and run over them. If such a consequence as here resulted was not natural, probable, or foreseeable to anybody else, should defendant, under the rule laid down in Hoag v. Railroad Co., be chargeable with the consequence? Clearly, it was not the natural and probable consequence of its neglect to give warning, and therefore was not one which it was bound to foresee. The injury, at most, was remotely possible, as distinguished from the natural and probable consequences of the neglect to give warning. As is said in Railroad Co. v. Trich, 117 Pa. 399, 11 Atl. 627, 2 Am. St. Rep. 672: "Responsibility does not extend to every consequence which may possibly result from negligence."

What we have said thus far is on the assumption the accident was caused solely by the negligence of defendant, or by the concurring negligence of defendant and the one killed going upon the track with a locomotive in full view. This being an action by an innocent third person, he cannot be deprived of his remedy because his injury resulted from the concurrent negligence of two others. He fails because his injury was a consequence so remote that defendant could not reasonably foresee it. * * *

Accord: Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Welch (1900) 25 Ind. App. 308, 58 N. E. 88, 81 Am. The impact of the locomotive hurled the body of S. through the air and against P., who was standing on the platform of the station waiting for a train. Said Henley, J., delivering the opinion: "It is possible that persons may be injured in the manner in which appellee received his injury. Sufficient proof of this is the fact that appellee was so injured. But such an injury cannot be said to be one which the most prudent man would have anticipated. The manner in which appellee was injured was unusual and extraordinary and contrary to common experience. It was such an injury as could not have been foreseen or reasonably anticipated as the probable result of appellant's negligent acts. Under such circumstances there is no liability.) Richards v. But see Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Chapman (1887) 80 Ala. 615, 2 South. 738: (The defendant's train, running through a town too fast to be stopped promptly, struck a cow on an embankment. The body of the cow was hurled off the track by the impact of the locomotive, hit the ground, bounced, and hit the plaintiff, who was walking along a footpath at the bottom of the embankment. Said Clopton, J., delivering the opinion: It is insisted that the act of the defendant was only the remote cause of the injury. When the cow was thrown by the engine, it struck the ground, bounced, and fell against plaintiff. The bounce and fall of the cow was the immediate cause, but it was merely incidental, and was not an independent agency, which had no connection with the act of the defendant. The direct cause was put in operation by the force of the engine, which continued until the injury; and injuries, directly produced by instrumentalities thus put in operation and continued, are

CHRISTIANSON v. CHICAGO, ST. P., M. & O. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1896. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640.)

The action was by Christianson against the railway company, to recover for personal injuries caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant's servants. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. From an order refusing a new trial the defendant appealed.

MITCHELL, J. * * * [11] The plaintiff was in defendant's employ as a section hand. On the day in question, he and two other sectionmen started easterly on a hand car, to meet their section foreman. In the meantime, another section crew, with plaintiff's section foreman, had started westerly from another point, on another hand car. When the two cars came within a short distance of each other, those on the westbound signaled those on the east-bound car to go back. Thereupon those on the latter car turned back, and both cars proceeded westerly, the car on which plaintiff was going ahead, and the other car following. It appears from the evidence that those on the rear car had, before starting out that morning, imbibed several drinks of whisky; and that, while both cars were going westerly, some of them once or twice signaled to those on the forward car as if wanting them to go faster. The only significance of this is that it may in part, at least, account for the conduct of those on the rear car. This part of the railroad was a downgrade of from 52 to 58 feet to the mile, and the track was wet and somewhat slippery. The cars were running down this grade at a rate of speed variously estimated at from 10 to 20 miles an hour. The front car, on which plaintiff was, was of old style, not capable of as great a rate of speed as the rear car; and, owing to the nature of its gearing, the handles attached to the lever moved very rapidly; so much so that it was difficult for one standing on the car to hold on to them. Plaintiff was standing on the rear end of the car, with nothing to hold on to except these handles. The other two men were on the front end of the car where the brake was. The usual distance at which hand cars kept apart, according to the rules of the company, was "three telegraph poles," which would be 540 feet. At the rate of speed at which it was going, the rear car could not have been brought to a stop by the application of the brake in less than 100 feet. The cars had traveled in this way about a mile and a quarter, the rear proximate consequences of the primary act, though they may not have been contemplated or foreseen. The relation of cause and effect between the primary cause and the injury is established by the connection and succession of the intervening circumstances. If the cow was thrown from the track by the negligence of defendant, the injury cannot be regarded as a purely accidental occurrence for which no action lies.) East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. car gaining on the forward one, until it got within 60 feet of it. The plaintiff testified that at this point he looked back, and, seeing the other car so near, and going so fast, became dizzy, lost his balance, and fell off. It is perhaps unimportant whether his fall was the result of fright caused by seeing the other rapidly moving car so near, or whether he accidentally lost his hold on the handle of the lever, and lost his balance. The fact is undisputed that he did fall off. We think the evidence shows that, after the men on the rear car saw him fall, they did all they could to stop their car; but going, as they were, at so great a rate of speed, and being within 60 feet of the front car, it was impossible for them to avoid colliding with the plaintiff. The result was that the car ran upon him while lying on the track, and inflicted very severe injuries. * * *

That, under the evidence, the question of the negligence of those on the rear car was for the jury, we have no doubt. The usual practice, in accordance with the rules of the company, for hand cars, when going in the same direction, to maintain a distance between them of "three telegraph poles," was founded upon the plainest dictates of common prudence. The faster the cars were going, and the greater the distance required to stop the rear car, the greater was the necessity for the observance of this rule, so as to avoid injury in case of accident to the front car or those riding upon it. But in this case, although the cars were going at a high rate of speed on the downgrade and a slippery track, those on the rear car allowed it to come within only a little over half the distance of the front car in which they could have stopped had any accident befallen the front car or its occupants. The jury were amply justified in finding that, in so doing, the occupants of the rear car were guilty of negligence.

The main contention, however, of defendant's counsel, is that, conceding that those on the rear car were negligent, yet plaintiff's injuries were not the proximate result of such negligence; or, perhaps to state their position more accurately, that it is not enough to entitle plaintiff to recover that his injuries were the natural consequence of this negligence, but that it must also appear that, under all the circumstances, it might have been reasonably anticipated that such injury would result. With this legal premise assumed, counsel argues that those on the rear car could not have reasonably anticipated that plaintiff would fall from the car. It is laid down in many cases and by some text-writers that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence (not wanton) is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligent act, and that it (the injury) was such as might or ought, in the light of attending circumstances, to have been anticipated. Such or similar statements of law have been inadvertently borrowed and repeated in some of the decisions of this court, but never, we think, where the precise point now under consideration was involved. Hence such statements are mere obiter. The doctrine contended for by counsel would establish practically the same rule of damages resulting from tort as is applied to damages resulting from breach of contract, under the familiar doctrine of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341. This mode of stating the law is misleading, if not positively inaccurate. It confounds and mixes the definition of "negligence" with that of "proximate cause." What a man may reasonably anticipate is important, and may be decisive, in determining whether an act is negligent, but is not at all decisive in determining whether that act is the proximate cause of an injury which ensues. If a person had no reasonable ground to anticipate that a particular act would or might result in any injury to anybody, then, of course, the act would not be negligent at all; but, if the act itself is negligent, then the person guilty of it is equally liable for all its natural and proximate consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not. Otherwise expressed, the law is that if the act is one which the party ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have anticipated was liable to result in injury to others, then he is liable for any injury proximately resulting from it, although he could not have anticipated the particular injury which did happen. Consequences which follow in unbroken sequence, without an intervening efficient cause, from the original negligent act, are natural and proximate; and for such consequences the original wrongdoer is responsible, even though he could not have foreseen the particular results which did follow. Bevan, Neg. p. 97; Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251; Smith v. Railway Co., L. R. 6 C. P. 14. For citation of cases on this question, see 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 436 et seq.; also, Shear. & R. Neg. § 28 et seq. Tested by this rule, we think that it is clear that the negligence of those on the rear car was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries; at least, that the evidence justified the jury in so finding. Counsel admitted on the argument that if, by derailment or other accident, the front car had been suddenly stopped, and a collision and consequent injuries to plaintiff had resulted, the negligence of those on the rear car would have been the proximate cause. But we can see no difference in principle between the case supposed and the present case. The causal connection between the negligent act and the resulting injury would be the same in both cases. The only possible difference is that it might be anticipated that the sudden stoppage of the car was more likely to happen than the falling of one of its occupants upon the track.† * * *

†Compare Wilson v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co. (1915, N. D.) 153 N. W. 429: (A prairie fire negligently started by the railway company, threatened the destruction of Wilson's homestead. His wife, acting in his absence, and using reasonable efforts to save the property, overexerted herself and thereby suffered a serious injury.)

McCAHILL v. NEW YORK TRANSP. CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1911. 201 N. Y. 221, 94 N. E. 616, 48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 131, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 961.)

The administratrix of John McCahill, deceased, sued the New York Transportation Company for his death, and obtained judgment in the trial court. The judgment was affirmed in the Appellate Division, and the defendant appeals to this court.

HISCOCK, J. One of the appellant's taxicabs struck respondent's intestate on Broadway, in the city of New York, in the nighttime under circumstances which, as detailed by the most favorable evidence, permitted the jury to find that the former was guilty of negligence and the latter free from contributory negligence. As a result of the accident the intestate was thrown about 20 feet, his thigh broken and his knee injured. He immediately became unconscious, and was shortly removed to a hospital, where he died on the second day thereafter of delirium tremens. A physician testified that the patient when brought to the hospital "was unconscious or irrational rather than unconscious. * * * He rapidly developed delirium tremens. * * * I should say with reasonable certainty the injury precipitated his attack of delirium tremens, and understand I mean precipitated, not induced." And, again, that in his opinion "the injury to the leg and the knee hurried up the delirium tremens." He also stated: "He might have had it (delirium tremens) anyway. Nobody can tell that." Of course it is undisputed that the injuries could not have led to delirium tremens except for the pre-existing alcoholic condition of the intestate, and under these circumstances the debatable question in the case has been whether appellant's negligence was, legally speaking, the proximate cause of intestate's death. It seems to me that it was, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

In determining this question, it will be unnecessary to quote definitions of proximate cause which might be useful in testing an obscure, involved, or apparently distant relationship between an act and its alleged results, for the relationship here is perfectly simple and obvious. The appellant's automobile struck and injured the traveler. The injuries precipitated, hastened, and developed delirium tremens, and these caused death. There can be no doubt that the negligent act directly set in motion the sequence of events which caused death at the time it occurred. Closer analysis shows that the real proposition urged by the appellant is that it should not be held liable for the results which followed its negligence, either, first, because those results would not have occurred if intestate had been in a normal condition; or, secondly, because his alcoholism might have caused delirium tremens and death at a later date even though appellant had not injured him. This proposition cannot be maintained in either of its branches which are somewhat akin.

The principle has become familiar in many phases that a negligent person is responsible for the direct effects of his acts, even if more serious, in cases of the sick and infirm as well as in those of healthy and robust people, and its application to the present case is not made less certain because the facts are somewhat unusual and the intestate's prior disorder of a discreditable character. Tice v. Munn, 94 N. Y. 621; Crank v. Forty-Second Street, M. & St. N. Ave. Ry. Co., 53 Hun, 425, 6 N. Y. Supp. 229, affirmed 127 N. Y. 648, 27 N. E. 856; Allison v. C. & N. W. R. R. Co., 42 Iowa, 274; Owens v. K. C. & C. Ry. Co., 95 Mo. 169, 182, 8 S. W. 350, 6 Am. St. Rep. 39. The principle is also true, although less familiar, that one who has negligently forwarded a diseased condition, and thereby hastened and prematurely caused death, cannot escape responsibility, even though the disease probably would have resulted in death at a later time without his agency. It is easily seen that the probability of later death from existing causes for which a defendant was not responsible would probably be an important element in fixing damages, but it is not a defense.

Turner v. Nassau Electric R. R. Co., 41 App. Div. 213, 58 N. Y. Supp. 490, was a case singularly similar to this one, except that there the physician ventured the opinion that delirium tremens would not have ensued except for the accident resulting from defendant's negligence, whereas in the present case there is no opinion on this point. I think, however, that no presumption can be indulged in for the benefit of the present appellant that delirium tremens would have occurred without its agency. In that case a judgment in favor of the intestate's representative was sustained on the ground that the accident precipitated the delirium tremens which resulted in the death.

In Louisville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Jones, 83 Ala. 376, 382, 3 South. 902, 904, it was said that if an intestate "had pneumonia or incipient pneumonia at the time she received the injury, and it could be known that she would ultimately die of that disease, this would not necessarily, and as a matter of law, relieve the railroad of all responsibility. If the injury was caused by the negligence of the railroad company, * * * and if it contributed to and hastened her death, then the corporation would not be guiltless."

In Jeffersonville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Riley, 39 Ind. 568, it was said with reference to a request to charge made by the defendant and denied: "If it was intended to have the court say to the jury that when a person has a tendency to insanity or disease, and receives an injury which produces death, but which would not have produced death in a well person (the plaintiff cannot recover), the charge was rightly refused. If death was the result of the pre-existing circumstances, and the injury had nothing to do with producing or accelerating the result, then the injury would not be the cause of death." See, also, Owens v. K. C. & C. Ry. Co., 95 Mo. 169, 182, 8 S. W. 350, 6 Am. St. Rep. 39; Foley v. Pioneer, etc., Co., 144 Ala. 178, 183, 40 South. 273.

The responsibility of a person accelerating the death of another already suffering from a disorder which at a later period of itself might have caused death has been considered in criminal cases and determined in a manner which is adverse to the contention of the appellant here. * * *[12]

I think the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

VANN, J.[13] I concur because so far as appears the decedent might be living yet if he had not been injured by the negligence of the defendant. * * *

The injuries were of a very serious nature, and he died on the third day after he was hurt, but still the physicians who saw him at the hospital were of the opinion that he would have recovered if delirium tremens had not set in on the day following the accident. They testified, in substance, that he died from that disease, precipitated or hastened by the injuries he had sustained. One of them swore that he might have died from delirium tremens even if he had not been injured, and the jury could have found from the evidence that he would not have had that disease at all but for the injuries. Hence they could properly find, as they are presumed to have found, that the injuries were a proximate cause of his death, because otherwise he would not have died when he did, but might have lived for months or for years. Non constat, he might be living still. Even if he had the seeds of a fatal disease in his system, yet would have continued to live for a longer or shorter period if he had not been injured, and the injuries caused the disease to develop prematurely and result in death sooner than it otherwise would, his death was caused by the accident within the meaning of the statute. The acceleration of death causes death according to both the civil and the criminal law. Clover, Clayton & Co. v. Hughes, L. R. (App. Cas. 1910) 242; Hopkins v. Commonwealth, 117 Ky. 941, 80 S. In Clover, Clayton & Co. v. Hughes, recently decided by the House of Lords, a workman suffering from serious aneurism, or abnormal dilitation of an artery, was engaged in tightening a nut when he fell dead from rupture of the aneurism, and it was held a death resulting from accident, because it was caused by a strain operating upon a condition of body which was such as to make the strain fatal.

[13] Parts of the opinion of Vann, J., are omitted.

In People v. Moan the court said: "If a patient is lying in the last stages of consumption, with a tenure upon life that cannot possibly continue for a day, it is homicide to administer a poison to him by which his life is ended almost immediately. So in the case we are now considering, if Finck, by excessive indulgence in intoxicating drinks, had reduced himself to a wreck and brought his life to the brink of the grave, it was a wrongful act for the defendant to accelerate his death by violence. Perhaps blows delivered with equal force on the head of a strong man in the enjoyment of robust health would not have been attended by any serious consequences; but upon a life impaired as Finck's was by self-abuse they may have accelerated his death; and but for the blows the man would not have died, at least not at the time he did. This makes the defendant criminally responsible." * * *

A person with an incurable disease may be so injured as to aggravate the trouble and hasten it to a fatal result. In such a case death is owing to two concurring causes, disease and violence, neither of which would have caused death when it occurred without aid from the other. One cause may be more efficient than the other, yet, unless acting alone, it would have resulted in death, not in the future, but, when death actually came, it is not of itself the proximate cause. While in this case delirium tremens was not caused by the accident, it was set in motion by the accident and thus became an effective agency of death, the same as if the decedent had had heart disease, but would have continued to live a while longer had it not been set in motion and hurried to a fatal end by violence.

The judgment should be affirmed.[14]

Judgment affirmed.

SCHEFFER v. RAILROAD CO.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1881. 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. Ed. 1070.)

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia.

MR. JUSTICE MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs, executors of Charles Scheffer, deceased, brought this action to recover of the Washington City, Virginia Midland, and Great Southern Railroad Company damages for his death, which they allege resulted from the negligence of the company while carrying him on its road. The defendant's demurrer to their declaration was sustained, and to reverse the judgment rendered thereon they sued out this writ of error.

The statute of Virginia under which the action was brought is, as to the question raised on the demurrer, identical with those of all the other States, giving the right of recovery when the death is caused by such default or neglect as would have entitled the party injured to recover damages if death had not ensued.

The declaration, after alleging the carelessness of the officers of the company, by which a collision occurred between the train on which Scheffer was and another train, on the seventh day of December, 1874, proceeds as follows:

"Whereby said sleeping-car was rent, broken, torn, and shattered, and by means whereof the said Charles Scheffer was cut, bruised, maimed, and disfigured, wounded, lamed, and injured about his head, face, neck, back, and spine, and by reason whereof the said Charles Scheffer became and was sick, sore, lame, and disordered in mind and body, and in his brain and spine, and by means whereof phantasms, illusions, and forebodings of unendurable evils to come upon him, the said Charles Scheffer, were produced and caused upon the brain and mind of him, the said Charles Scheffer, which disease, so produced as aforesaid, baffled all medical skill, and continued constantly to disturb, harass, annoy, and prostrate the nervous system of him, the said Charles Scheffer, to wit, from the seventh day of December, A. D. 1874, to the eighth day of August, 1875, when said phantasms, illusions, and forebodings, produced as aforesaid, overcame and prostrated all his reasoning powers, and induced him, the said Charles Scheffer, to take his life in an effort to avoid said phantasms, illusions, and forebodings, which he then and there did, whereby and by means of the careless, unskilful, and negligent acts of the said defendant aforesaid, the said Charles Scheffer, to wit, on the eighth day of August, 1875, lost his life and died, leaving him surviving a wife and children."

The Circuit Court sustained the demurrer on the ground that the death of Scheffer was not due to the negligence of the company in the judicial sense which made it liable under the statute. That the relation of such negligence was too remote as a cause of the death to justify recovery, the proximate cause being the suicide of the decedent,—his death by his own immediate act. In this opinion we concur.

Two cases are cited by counsel, decided in this Court, on the subject of the remote and proximate causes of acts where the liability of the party sued depends on whether the act is held to be the one or the other; and, though relied on by plaintiffs, we think they both sustain the judgment of the Circuit Court.

The first of these is Insurance Company v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. Ed. 65. In that case a policy of fire insurance contained the usual clause of exception from liability for any loss which might occur "by means of any invasion, insurrection, riot, or civil commotion, or any military or usurped power, explosion, earthquake, or hurricane." An explosion took place in the Marshall warehouse, which threw down the walls of the Alabama warehouse,—the one insured, situated across the street from Marshall warehouse,—and by this means, and by the sparks from the Eagle Mill, also fired by the explosion, facilitated by the direction of the wind, the Alabama warehouse was burned. This Court held that the explosion was the proximate cause of the loss of the Alabama warehouse, because the fire extended at once from the Marshall warehouse, where the explosion occurred. The Court said that no new or intervening cause occurred between the explosion and the burning of the Alabama warehouse. That if a new force or power had intervened, sufficient of itself to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote.

This case went to the verge of the sound doctrine in holding the explosion to be the proximate cause of the loss of the Alabama warehouse; but it rested on the ground that no other proximate cause was found.

In Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256, the sparks from a steam ferryboat had, through the negligence of its owner, the defendant, set fire to an elevator. * * *[15]

Bringing the case before us to the test of these principles, it presents no difficulty. The proximate cause of the death of Scheffer was his own act of self-destruction. It was within the rule in both these cases a new cause, and a sufficient cause of death.

The argument is not sound which seeks to trace this immediate cause of the death through the previous stages of mental aberration, physical suffering, and eight months' disease and medical treatment to the original accident on the railroad. Such a course of possible or even logical argument would lead back to that "great first cause least understood," in which the train of all causation ends.

The suicide of Scheffer was not a result naturally and reasonably to be expected from the injury received on the train. It was not the natural and probable consequence, and could not have been foreseen in the light of the circumstances attending the negligence of the officers in charge of the train.

His insanity, as a cause of his final destruction, was as little the natural or probable result of the negligence of the railway officials, as his suicide, and each of these are casual or unexpected causes, intervening between the act which injured him, and his death.[16]

Judgment affirmed.

[15] Mr. Justice Miller here stated the facts in Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Kellogg and quoted part of the opinion. Reference was made also to McDonald v. Snelling (1867) 14 Allen (Mass.) 290, 92 Am. Dec. 768, as being to the same effect.

[16] Compare Daniels v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1903) 183 Mass. 393, 67 N. E. 424, 62 L. R. A. 751: (The succession was as follows: August 12, a blow on the head in a railway accident caused by the negligence of the defendant railway company; some weeks later, insomnia, melancholy, and delirium; on October 3d, suicide through a planned act. The testimony tended to establish insanity resulting from the blow on the head. A recovery was denied. Said Knowlton, C. J.: "All agree that death self caused in an uncontrollable frenzy, without knowledge or appreciation of the physical nature of the act, would not be death by suicide, or by one's own hand, within the meaning of such a provision in a policy (of insurance). * * * An act of suicide resulting from a moderately intelligent power of choice, even though the choice is determined by a disordered mind, should be deemed a new and independent, efficient cause of the death that immediately ensues. We are of opinion that the term 'rational volition,' used in the charge, was understood by the jury to mean volition attended by the powers of reason, to

BROWN v. AMERICAN STEEL & WIRE CO.

MYERS, J. Appellant brought this action against appellee to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of William Cruse, appellant's intestate. From the amended complaint, which was in one paragraph, it appears that on January 27, 1903, appellee was engaged in the manufacture of nails, and other metal goods, at Anderson, Ind., and on that day said decedent was in its employ as a helper in and about one of its nail machines, the cogs, gearing, belting, etc., of which machine appellee had negligently and carelessly failed and omitted to guard; that while said machine was being operated, said decedent was caught by said unguarded cogs, etc., and thereby greatly and seriously injured; "that such described injuries so received by said decedent through and by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant in the manner aforesaid did cause and produce the death of the said William Cruse, decedent, on or about October 30, 1903." The sufficiency of the complaint is not before us. Appellee answered the complaint in two paragraphs; one in denial; the other averring a compromise and settlement with the decedent for all claims by reason of the injuries so sustained by him. * * * [17]

In the case at bar the facts are undisputed. * * * While the decedent was working about said machine, he was caught in said unguarded cogs. His right arm from near his wrist up to a little below his shoulder was severely cut and mashed. He received a cut about three inches long, triangular shaped, on top of his head, a cut on the side of his head near his temple, and a cut on his back just below the right shoulder, about three inches wide and four inches long, and deep enough to expose a rib and his spinal column. His hips were severely bruised and injured. Immediately after the accident he was taken to a hospital, where his wounds were dressed by surgeons, and consider and judge of the act in all its relations,—moral as well as physical,—and that the charge was in this respect too favorable to the plaintiff. The burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the death was caused by the collision. All the evidence tended to show that the deceased, with deliberate purpose, planned to take his own life; that he closed the door, and locked it, with a view to exclude others and prevent interruption; and that he then took the napkin, and used it effectively to strangle himself. All this points to an understanding of the physical nature and effect of his act, and to a willful and intelligent purpose to accomplish it. That he was insane, so as to be free from moral responsibility, is not enough to make the defendant liable. We are unable to discover any evidence that he was acting without volition, under an uncontrollable impulse, or that he did not understand the physical nature of his act. In the absence of any affirmative evidence for the plaintiff on this point, the jury should have been instructed to render a verdict for the defendant.") where he remained until the latter part of August. From the hospital he went to a private boarding house in Anderson, and about the middle of September he went to the home of his father at Nora, Ind., and remained there until the day of his death, October 31st. For five years continuously and immediately prior to said accident the decedent was strong and healthy, and from the time of the accident until his death was physically weak and unable to do any work. It appears that on the same day, and shortly after the accident, he became unconscious, and remained in that condition for several hours; that at times during the two weeks next following the day of the injury he would become insensible, and did not recognize his son. At intervals thereafter, until he died, he was unable to recognize members of his own family. After the accident, and after he had gained consciousness, and when in his best physical and mental condition, he would continually complain of pain in his head; that the side of his head was heavy, and at times complained of being dizzy. At times he complained about not knowing what he was doing. He was melancholy. His talk was incoherent. Occasionally he would start a sentence directed to one subject and close it with reference to some other subject. He was constantly rubbing his head. He frequently could not remember the names of his children. The undisputed evidence is that at the time of his death he was a person of unsound mind. It was agreed by the parties:

"That on the 31st day of October, 1903, in the evening of that day, Mr. Cruse, the decedent in this case, left his father's home in Nora, situated in Marion county, Ind., and was not heard of or seen for three weeks from that date, at which time he was found near Nora in a corn field, lying between two corn rows, with his coat and vest removed and lying close to him, with his own pocket knife open in or near to his hand, and with his throat cut, severing the jugular vein, with some three cuts in the throat, and that his property, a watch and some money, was intact in his pocket, and that he was dead. It is further agreed that he took his own life, and died from the effects of the knife wounds, self-inflicted."

Appellant's authority to bring and maintain this action rests solely upon the statute (section 285, Burns' Ann. St. 1908), which provides that: "When the death of one is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, the personal representatives of the former may maintain an action therefor against the latter, if the former might have maintained an action, had he or she (as the case may be) lived, against the latter for an injury for the same act or omission." Under this statute the death must have been "caused by the wrongful act or omission of another." * * *[18]

From the cases bearing upon the subject now being considered the rule seems to be that an action under the statute may be maintained when the death is self-inflicted, only where it is the result of an uncontrollable influence, or is accomplished in delirium or frenzy, caused by the defendant's negligent act or omission, and without conscious volition of a purpose to take life; for then the act would be that of an irresponsible agent. Daniels v. New York, etc., R. Co., 183 Mass. 393, 67 N. E. 424, 62 L. R. A. 751; Scheffer v. Railroad Company, 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. Ed. 1070; Goodlander Mill Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 63 Fed. 400, 405, 11 C. C. A. 253, 27 L. R. A. 583; Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Elliott, 55 Fed. 949, 951, 5 C. C. A. 347, 20 L. R. A. 582; Ronker v. St. John, 21 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 39; Maguire v. Sheehan, 117 Fed. 819, 54 C. C. A. 642, 59 L. R. A. 496. While the rule is general that an intervening responsible agent cuts off the line of causation from the original negligence, yet we are not unmindful of "the qualification that, if the intervening act is such as might reasonably have been foreseen or anticipated as the natural and probable result of the original negligence, the original negligence will, notwithstanding such intervening act, be regarded as the proximate cause of the injury." Nickey v. Steuder, 164 Ind. 189, 73 N. E. 117. The burden was on appellant to prove that decedent's death was caused by the neglect of appellee to guard the cogwheels. It is not enough to show negligence and the injury, but in addition appellant must also show that appellee's negligence proximately caused Cruse's death. The decedent's right to damages, had he lived, was a common-law right, limited to the damage sustained, attributable to the negligence of appellee. Appellant's right to recover, being statutory, depends upon whether her decedent could have maintained an action, had he lived, against appellee for a self-inflicted injury, as the active, operative, continuing, and the probable and natural sequence of the original injury.

In actions of this character the evidence must be such as to warrant the jury in finding that the decedent in taking his life acted "without volition, under an uncontrollable impulse, or that he did not understand the physical nature of his act." Daniels v. New York, etc., R. Co., 183 Mass. 393, 67 N. E. 424, 62 L. R. A. 751. Turning again to the record in this case, we find no evidence as to the decedent's strength of mind during a few weeks immediately prior to his death, but, assuming that his improved condition in that respect a few weeks before the day of the suicide continued, taken in connection with the agreed facts heretofore set out in this opinion, instead of showing a want of conscious volition, strongly indicates that the decedent had a mind capable of conceiving a purpose of taking his life, as well as a knowledge of the means which would certainly carry his purpose into effect. This conclusion from the evidence leaves an essential fact to support a verdict for plaintiff unsustained by the evidence; and, this being true, the trial court did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant. SECTION 3.—INTERVENING AGENCY AS A TEST OF LEGAL CAUSE

WOOLLEY v. SCOVELL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1828. 3 Man. & R. 105, 32 R. R. 716.)

Case for negligence in throwing a bag of wool from a lofty warehouse into a yard, whereby the wool fell upon the plaintiff, who was in the yard, and injured him. Plea, not guilty. At the trial before Lord Tenterden, C. J., at the sittings at Guildhall after last Term, the following facts appeared:

The defendant was the occupier of a warehouse the windows of which opened into a yard. Having occasion to remove a bag of wool from an upper floor of the warehouse, the defendant, for the purpose of saving time and expense, directed his servants to throw the wool out of the window of the warehouse. Before the bag was dropped from the window, one of the defendant's servants called out to warn passengers. The plaintiff, who happened to be in the yard, looked up and saw the wool as it was thrust out of the window; he then ran across the yard, thinking, as he afterwards said, that he should have time to escape. The wool, however, fell upon him, and he sustained a considerable injury. The learned Judge told the jury, that if they were of opinion that the plaintiff ran wantonly or carelessly into danger, they ought to find a verdict for the defendant; but that if they thought the plaintiff had lost his presence of mind by the act of the defendant, and in the confusion produced by the situation in which he found himself, had run into the danger, they ought to give their verdict for the plaintiff.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £150.

Sir J. Scarlett now moved to set aside the verdict, on the ground of misdirection: The rule laid down by the learned Judge was very humane, but it is submitted that it was not founded in law. The law should not vary according to the nerves of parties. It is true that with respect to ships, the loss must be borne by the party who was first in the wrong; but there the other party has not the entire control over the motions of his vessel, which depend upon the winds and waves. (BAYLEY, J. You complain of that part of the direction in which the jury were told, that if the plaintiff was deprived of his presence of mind by the wrongful act of the defendant, he was entitled to their verdict; not that the facts of the case did not warrant such an inference.)

LORD TENTERDEN, C. J. The first fault was the throwing of the wool from the window instead of lowering it by the usual mode, by a crane. This, the defendant admitted, he did to save time.

BAYLEY, J. I think the direction was right. Whether the plaintiff was deprived of his presence of mind by the act of the defendant, was a question for the jury.

LITTLEDALE, J. I have no doubt whatever that the direction was right. It is not surprising that the plaintiff should have been alarmed, and should thereby have lost his self-possession; and this alarm was occasioned by the wrongful act of the defendant.

Rule refused.

MUNSEY v. WEBB.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1913. 231 U. S. 150, 34 Sup. Ct. 44, 58 L. Ed. 162.)

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought against the owner of a building for causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate in an elevator in which the deceased was being carried to his place of employment. Negligent construction and negligent management of the elevator are alleged. The plaintiff had a verdict against a request by the defendant that one be directed for him, the judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals (37 App. D. C. 185), and the defendant brought the case here.

The elevator car did not quite fill the well, or shaft, and the bottom of the floor that it was approaching projected at right angles into the well about 3½ inches. The car was equipped with a collapsible door, which was open at the time of the accident, and the boy in charge did not have his arm across the space as he had been instructed to do. Between the fourth and fifth floors the deceased fell, and his head was caught between the projecting bottom of the fifth floor and the floor of the car and was crushed. The negligence relied upon is the leaving of the door open and failure to guard the space; the not having a flange or piece of metal inclining from the projecting floor to the shaft wall, and the failure to use an emergency switch, the quickest means of stopping the car, the boy in charge not having been instructed in the use of it.

The plaintiff in error argued at some length that there was no negligence, because the fall of deceased was something wholly out of the ordinary course, and not to be foreseen; or that, if there was negligence in any sense, it was not the proximate cause of the death, but merely a passive condition made harmful by the fall. Neither argument can be maintained. It is true that it was not to be anticipated specifically that a man should drop from internal causes into the open door of the car. But the possibility and the danger that in some way one in the car should get some part of his person outside the car while it was in motion was obvious, and was shown to have been anticipated by the door being there. In some circumstances, at least, it was a danger that ought to be and was guarded against. It is said that the danger was manifest only when the car was crowded, and that the door was needed only for that. If the duty to have the car shut on all sides had been created with reference only to conditions different in kind from those of the accident, it may be that the plaintiff could not avail himself of a requirement imposed alio intuitu. The Eugene F. Moran, 212 U. S. 466, 476, 53 L. Ed. 600, 604, 29 Sup. Ct. 339. But the accident was similar in kind to those against which the door was provided, and we are not prepared to say, contrary to the finding of the jury, that the duty to keep it shut or to guard the space with the arm did not exist in favor of all travelers in an elevator having the structure that we have described. It was not necessary that the defendant should have had notice of the particular method in which an accident would occur, if the possibility of an accident was clear to the ordinarily prudent eye. Washington & G. R. Co. v. Hickey, 166 U. S. 521, 526, 527, 41 L. Ed. 1101–1103, 17 Sup. Ct. 661, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 758.

If there was negligence, it very properly could be found to have been the proximate cause of the death. See Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256. Even if it were true that the neglect was merely a passive omission, the deceased was invited into the elevator, and the principle of the trap cases would apply. Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. N. S. 556, 563, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 318, 4 Jur. N. S. 512, 6 Week. Rep. 575; Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 368, 374, 87 Am. Dec. 644. But that is not the case. The defendant is sued for having crushed the head of the deceased by forces that he put in motion. He replies that it would not have happened but for the unforeseen fall of the deceased without the defendant's fault, and to this the plaintiff rejoins and the jury has found that the defendant was bound to take the easy precaution which he had provided against any and all ways by which a passenger's body could get outside the car while it was going up. Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co., 111 U. S. 228, 241, 28 L. Ed. 410, 415, 4 Sup. Ct. 369; Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Holloway, 191 U. S. 334, 339, 48 L. Ed. 207, 210, 24 Sup. Ct. 102. The whole question comes down to whether we are prepared to say as matter of law, against the finding of the jury, that, in an elevator constructed as this was, with a special source of danger in the shaft outside the car, to require the defendant to guard the door space in transitu, at his peril, is too strict a rule. We cannot go so far. McDonald v. Toledo Consol. Street R. Co., 20 C. C. A. 322, 43 U. S. App. 79, 74 Fed. 104, 109.

There was, perhaps, evidence sufficient to warrant a finding that there was negligence in not stopping the car after the fall and before the harm was done, and a finding on that ground would not open the questions that have been discussed; but we have preferred to deal with the case on the matters principally argued, as they seem to offer the most obvious reasons for the verdict, and therefore have assumed that the jury found the facts and standard of conduct to be as we have supposed.

Judgment affirmed.

TUTTLE et ux. v. ATLANTIC CITY R. CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1901. 66 N. J. Law, 327, 49 Atl. 450, 54 L. R. A. 582, 88 Am. St. Rep. 491.)

This action was by Samuel Tuttle and his wife against the Atlantic City Railroad Company to recover damages because of a personal injury sustained by Mrs. Tuttle through the alleged negligence of the defendant. The judgment below was for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. The facts were as follows:

The defendant maintained a freight yard on the south side of Mechanic Street, in the city of Camden. A flying drill was being made in this yard, and a car was derailed and dashed across Mechanic Street, and broke through the front of the house opposite, belonging to a Mrs. Brennan. At this time, Mrs. Tuttle was on the sidewalk near the Brennan house, and saw the car coming across the street at full speed. Becoming frightened, she started to run, and when three or four doors below, fell and injured her left knee.[19]

At the close of the plaintiff's case, a motion for a nonsuit was made, upon the ground that if any negligent conduct had been proved on the part of the defendant, by reason of this car getting away from where it belonged, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in going away from a place of safety to a place of insecurity; that she was at a safe distance from the car, and there was no occasion for her to remove from it. This motion was denied.

VROOM, J. (after stating the facts). The testimony of the plaintiff was that she was in front of Mrs. Brennan's door, or had just passed it, when she saw the car coming over; and it was further disclosed by the testimony that this car, in coming across the street, was not running on any track. Is it reasonable, even, to suppose that the plaintiff could have had any means of knowing the direction the car would take? She was rightfully on the street, and the unusual sight of a car crashing across the street at full speed precluded any possibility of reflection as to the best thing to do. Acting under the impulse of fear, she ran, and, just as the car crashed into the Brennan house, she fell.

The real question in issue in the case and to be determined by the jury was whether the plaintiff (Mrs. Tuttle), seeing the car approaching at great speed across this street, was justified in running to escape from what she supposed was an imminent danger.

In the case of Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. Ed. 115, which was an action brought to recover damages sustained by the wife of the plaintiff by the upsetting of a stage coach in which she was a passenger, the question was whether the stage was upset by the negligence of the driver or by the act of the plaintiff and his wife in rashly and improperly springing from it. The court held that "if the want of proper skill or care of the driver placed the passengers in a state of peril, and they had at that time a reasonable ground for supposing that the stage would upset, or that the driver was incapable of managing his horses, the plaintiff was entitled to recover; although the jury may believe, from the position in which the stage was placed from the negligence of the driver, the attempt of the plaintiff and his wife to escape may have increased the peril or even caused the stage to upset, and although they also find that the plaintiff and his wife would probably have sustained little or no injury if they had remained in the stage."

And in the case of Jones v. Boyce, 1 Stark. 493, which was an action against a coach proprietor for so negligently conducting the coach that the plaintiff, an outside passenger, was obliged to jump off the coach, in consequence of which his leg was broken, Lord Ellenborough held: "To enable the plaintiff to sustain the action it is not necessary that he should have been thrown off the coach; it is sufficient if he was placed, by the misconduct of the defendant, in such a situation as obliged him to adopt the alternative of a dangerous leap, or to remain at a certain peril. On the other hand, if the plaintiff's act resulted from a rash apprehension of danger, which did not exist, and the injury he sustained is to be attributed to rashness and imprudence, he is not entitled to recover."

The doctrine is concisely stated in 1 Shearm. & R. Negl. *89: "If one is placed, by the negligence of another, in such a position that he is compelled to choose instantly, in the face of grave and apparent peril, between two hazards, and he makes such a choice as a person of ordinary prudence placed in such a position might make, the fact that if he had chosen the other hazard he would have escaped injury, is of no importance."

The contention of the defendant company was that the plaintiff was in a safe place, and that, while it was true that the sight of a car coming as this one did was unusual, still that there was nothing attendant upon it which should lead one in a safe position precipitately to leave it. The counsel for the defendant at the trial requested the judge to charge that, "if the jury believe that Mrs. Tuttle was at a safe location before the injury complained of, and was afterwards injured by removing from such safe place, she cannot recover"; but this matter was correctly disposed of in the charge that "safe place" is a term which is not easy to define. To charge that in this case she was "in a safe place" would be to charge that the circumstances which brought about this fright and terror under which she seems to have acted were not sufficient to warrant her in removing from that spot, and seeking another, which, in her judgment,—and perhaps a mistaken judgment,—she might have deemed safer. There is hardly enough evidence in this case to know whether it was exactly safe where she stood. It turned out afterwards to have been a safe place. But who could tell beforehand how many splinters from this car would fly in all directions, how many cobblestones or other things would fly around? You do not know, when you see a car coming, just what the end will be, and would naturally seek, possibly, a safer place than you think you occupy, although, after it is all over, you may find that where you stood was a safe place." This is not a case involving the question whether an action can be sustained for mental anguish or injury unaccompanied by injury to the person. That this would not afford a ground of action is well settled.[20]

In the case under consideration the negligence of the defendant in permitting the derailing and escape of the car is too plain for argument, and it was such negligence as caused the plaintiff in terror to attempt to escape the peril by running, and in so doing she fell, and was injured. The true rule governing cases of this character may be stated as follows: That if a defendant, by negligence, puts the plaintiff under a reasonable apprehension of personal physical injury, and plaintiff, in a reasonable effort to escape, sustains physical injury, a right of action arises to recover for the physical injury and the mental disorder naturally incident to its occurrence. The case below was properly submitted to the jury, and the judgment below should be affirmed.

JACKSON v. WISCONSIN TELEPHONE CO.

Action against the telephone company to recover damages for a barn and its contents, burned, as plaintiff claims, by reason of defendant's negligence.

Near the city of Eau Claire there is a plateau about eighty feet above the level of the surrounding country. In August, 1889, two large frame buildings, about 325 feet distant from each other, stood upon this plateau, one being a county fair building known as Floral Hall, and the other being the barn of the plaintiff. These buildings were about the same height, and upon the top or ridge of each there stood a flagpole or mast twenty to thirty feet in height. Prior to the year 1888 the defendant had constructed a telephone line from the highway running past the fair grounds. In September, 1888, the defendant placed a telephone in Floral Hall, and connected it with No. 12 wire with its telephone line on the highway. This connecting wire ran from the highway first to the flagpole upon the plaintiff's barn, and was there tied to the pole; from thence it ran directly to Floral [20] The opinion on this point is omitted.

Hall. The plaintiff gave no permission to attach the wire to his barn, and testified that he had no knowledge that it was so attached. A ground wire from the telephone in the interior of Floral Hall ran up to the flagstaff, and thence a distance of about 376 feet to the ground, where it was attached to an iron water pipe. Some time in the fall of 1888 the defendant took out the telephone from Floral Hall, together with the insulated wire in the interior of the building. The ground wire was left intact, and so was the wire from Floral Hall to the barn. The wire from the highway to Jackson's barn was taken down, but it was claimed by the plaintiff's witnesses that a considerable piece of said wire at the barn end thereof was left resting upon the roof of the barn.

On the night of August 20th, 1889, there was considerable rain. At about 4 o'clock in the morning there was a flash of lightning, which was described by the witnesses as a blinding flash, and which was thought by them to have descended upon Floral Hall. In a few minutes the roof of plaintiff's barn was in flames, and the barn and its contents were destroyed. The plaintiff's claim is that the lightning struck Floral Hall, and was conducted by the wire to plaintiff's barn, and set it on fire, and that the defendant was negligent in leaving the wire thus attached to the barn. Much expert evidence was adduced on both sides as to the probability of lightning passing over such a wire and destroying the barn. A motion for a nonsuit was overruled, as was also a motion to direct a verdict for defendant.

The jury returned a special verdict, finding:

(1) That the defendant connected the plaintiff's barn with Floral Hall by means of a telephone wire attached to the flagstaff of the barn and to the flagstaff on Floral Hall, without any intermediate attachment; (2) that the defendant left the wire so located on the plaintiff's barn that a portion of the same rested on the roof; (3) that the barn was thereby subjected to danger of being destroyed by fire caused by lightning electricity passing over such wire from Floral Hall to the barn; (4) that the fire was caused by lightning electricity so passing over said wire; (5) that in so leaving the barn connected with Floral Hall the defendant's servants were guilty of want of ordinary care; (6) that such want of ordinary care was the proximate cause of the fire; (7) that this result was one which a person reasonably well skilled in the defendant's business might reasonably have expected would probably occur; (8) that the plaintiff did not give defendant permission to attach the wire to his barn; (9) that plaintiff did not know, before the fire, that his barn was connected with Floral Hall by the wire; (10) that he did not know of the danger before the fire; (11) that the plaintiff's damages were $9,258. [21]

From a judgment for the plaintiff upon this verdict the defendant appeals.

WINSLOW, J. It was strenuously and ably argued by the appellant's counsel that the evidence did not show that the negligent act of defendant was the proximate cause of the burning of plaintiff's barn. The rule is well settled in this state that, in order to render a negligent act the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear [21] The statement of the case is slightly abridged, and a part of Mr. Justice Winslow's opinion is omitted.

"that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances." Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co., 60 Wis. 141, 156, 18 N. W. 764, 50 Am. Rep. 352; Marvin v. C., M. & St. P. R. Co., 79 Wis. 140, 47 N. W. 1123, 11 L. R. A. 506. The jury found all the elements necessary to constitute the negligent act of the defendant the proximate cause of the burning of the barn within this rule, and the question is whether the evidence justifies such finding.

It is said that the striking of a building by lightning is a very infrequent occurrence, and that it could not be reasonably anticipated by any one. It is true that the number of buildings which are struck by lightning, as compared with the whole number of buildings in any given locality, is very small; but this fact by no means seems to us to be the final or controlling test of the question of probability. In this case there was a building situated upon a high plateau from eighty to ninety feet above the level of the surrounding country, with a flagpole upon the roof about twenty-five feet in height. Now, there are some facts of common knowledge known to every reasonable person who has passed the age of childhood. Among these facts are that in this latitude there are at certain seasons of the year frequent and violent thunderstorms; that at such times the clouds are heavily charged with electricity, which constantly finds its way to the earth in what we call strokes of lightning; that these lightning strokes, in the great majority of cases, strike prominent objects, such as trees, poles, and high buildings, and follow them to the ground; that fire is frequently the result of such strokes. These facts are well known to all persons, and no proof of them by expert evidence is necessary. Can we say, as matter of law, in view of these well-known facts, that it was entirely improbable that a building situated, as Floral Hall was, upon the highest ground in the vicinity, with a flagpole upon it, should be struck by a discharge of lightning, simply because many buildings in such situations escape the stroke for years? We think not.

But it is said that it was simply a matter of conjecture whether the bolt which struck Floral Hall and shattered the flagpole was the bolt which set the fire, or whether the barn was fired by an independent stroke of lightning descending upon the barn at or about the same time that Floral Hall was struck. In considering this question, reference to the evidence is necessary. The evidence seems very conclusive that the barn was fired by a stroke of lightning, and that Floral Hall was struck by lightning and its flagpole shattered a very few minutes—perhaps only seconds—before the blaze broke out on the roof of the barn. These two facts are not open to doubt under the evidence. There were two witnesses sleeping in buildings on the fair grounds within a few hundred feet of the hall. Both testify that they were awake and saw the flash of lightning, and that it was right in the direction of Floral Hall. They immediately went out, found the barn burning and the flagpole on Floral Hall shattered, while the flagpole on the barn was uninjured. These witnesses, as well as several others who claim to have seen the flash, say that there was but one flash, one report, one "straight streak of lightning," "like a streak of hot iron." There was also evidence that the flagpole was only shattered down to about the place where the wire leading to the barn was fastened, and that the ground wire, which seems to have been attached to the flagpole just below the barn wire, was burned for a distance of four or five feet from the pole. No damage was done to Floral Hall beyond the shattering of the pole. If these facts were all true, it would seem that they pointed pretty satisfactorily to the conclusion that the bolt which struck Floral Hall was the same bolt which fired the barn. Certainly a verdict to that effect, based on the evidence establishing these facts, could not be said to be based on conjecture.

It is, however, argued that it is entirely improbable, if not well-nigh impossible, that a bolt of lightning striking one building could be conducted by a telephone wire over a span of 300 feet to another building, at least in sufficient quantity to fire the second building. This raises a scientific question, necessarily depending largely upon the opinions of expert witnesses. A considerable number of such witnesses were examined on both sides. The experts called by the plaintiff testified that if the loose end of the wire was left resting on the roof of the barn, and the roof and sides were wet with rain, the wire and wet barn would form a relatively good conductor of electricity; that such a wire would carry sufficient electricity to start a fire, and would form, under the circumstances, a good path to the ground; that a part, at least, of the bolt would probably follow this path to the ground; and that all these facts have been known for years, and the danger to the barn resulting therefrom was reasonably to be anticipated. On the other hand, an equal number of experts upon the other side were of opinion that it would be very improbable, if not impossible, for such a wire, under the circumstances, to carry sufficient lightning to set the barn on fire, and that the lightning would undoubtedly seek some shorter path to the earth. We cannot undertake to compare and decide which class of experts were the best qualified to speak authoritatively upon this scientific question. They all qualified themselves so as to make their testimony admissible as expert evidence. Nor can we undertake to decide this question of science ourselves. It was properly a question for the jury after having heard the circumstances of the case and the opinions of the experts, and we cannot say that the jury have decided wrongly upon the question.

The further argument is made that the stroke of lightning was the "act of God," for which no one is responsible. Certainly a stroke of lightning is an "act of God;" but that is not the question here presented, or rather another element—i. e. the negligence of man—is added to the question, which materially alters its scope. If I, owning a high mast or building, which I know is so situated as to be very likely to be struck by lightning, construct an attractive path for the lightning to my neighbor's roof, so that his house is destroyed by a bolt which strikes my mast or building, shall I escape liability for my negligent or wrongful act by pleading that the lightning was the act of God? Certainly not. I invited the stroke of one of the most destructive powers of nature, and negligently turned its course to my neighbor's property. The principle is the same as that involved in the case of Borchardt v. Wausau Boom Co., 54 Wis. 107, 11 N. W. 440, 41 Am. Rep. 12. The lightning stroke is in no greater degree the act of God than the usual freshets occurring in a river.

Our conclusion is that the court properly refused to grant a nonsuit, and also properly refused to direct a verdict for the defendant. * * *

BY THE COURT. Judgment affirmed.

NEWMAN, J. The cause of damages is proximate only when it might reasonably have been expected by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence that such damages would result from that cause. Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co., 60 Wis. 141, 18 N. W. 764, 50 Am. Rep. 352. The damages, as a consequence of the negligent act or omission, must be both natural and probable. Barton v. Pepin Co. Agr. Society, 83 Wis. 19, 52 N. W. 1129. It cannot be said of any particular building that it is probable that it will be struck by lightning. The chances are very largely against it. It could not have been foreseen as likely to happen that either Floral Hall or the plaintiff's barn would be struck by lightning. That might be, in the course of nature, but could not be anticipated as probable. The neglect of the defendant to remove the wire did not increase the danger or probability that either building would be struck. At most, it only rendered it possible that, in case either was struck, fire might be communicated to the other. It could not be the cause of either building being struck. It was a condition, rather than the cause, of the damages. If a cause at all, it was a remote cause.

PINNEY, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion by Mr. Justice NEWMAN.

E. T. & H. K. IDE v. BOSTON & M. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1909. 83 Vt. 66, 74 Atl. 401.)

Action to recover damages for the destruction by fire of a gristmill and outbuildings. The verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff. The fire was alleged to have been communicated by a locomotive engine on a railroad operated by the defendant as lessee. The statute which governs reads as follows: "A person or corporation owning or operating a railroad shall be responsible in damages for a building or other property injured by fire communicated by a locomotive engine on such road, unless due caution and diligence are used and suitable expedients employed to prevent such injury. Said person or corporation shall have an insurable interest in the property along its route, and may procure insurance thereon."

HASELTON, J. * * * Under the statute, the burden was on the plaintiff to show by a fair balance of proof that the fire was "communicated" by one of the defendant's engines, and, if that fact was established, the plaintiff was entitled to recover unless the defendant showed affirmatively by the same measure of proof that it used "due caution and diligence" and employed "suitable expedients" to prevent the injury. Cleaveland v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 42 Vt. 449; Farrington v. Rutland R. Co., 72 Vt. 24, 47 Atl. 171. * * *

The fire was first seen on the roof of an old blacksmith shop owned by the plaintiff standing on the easterly side of the railroad track and, to about one-third of its extent, on the right of way of the railroad. * * *

After this fire was so far overcome that, as some of the evidence tended to show, it was thought to have been put out, it started up again, and the wind, which had been blowing towards the east, changed its course and blew strongly towards the west, carrying fire to a shed on the west side of the track, and thence to a storehouse and factory of the Cushman & Rankin Company, and thence to the gristmill and outbuildings of the plaintiff above referred to. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the fire on the roof of the blacksmith shop was communicated to it from one of the defendant's locomotives, and, all questions of negligence on the part of both parties and of intervening causes being for the time left out of consideration, the entire conflagration stands as an integral effect of the cause which started the fire on the roof of the blacksmith shop. Isham v. Dow's Estate, 70 Vt. 588, 41 Atl. 585, 45 L. R. A. 87, 67 Am. St. Rep. 691. The defendant quotes from Ryan v. New York Central R. Co., 35 N. Y. 210, 91 Am. Dec. 49, and also cites Pennsylvania R. R. v. Kerr, 62 Pa. 353, 1 Am. Rep. 431. These cases, however, are pretty generally discredited. See with regard to them Milwaukee, etc., Ry. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 474, 24 L. Ed. 256, and what is said of them in Isham v. Dow's Estate, 70 Vt. 588, 41 Atl. 585, 45 L. R. A. 87, 67 Am. St. Rep. 691. As appears from the Isham Case, these cases are not followed here.

We do not understand, considering the argument of the defendant as a whole, that the doctrine of these cases is relied on. The defendant's real claim in this regard, as appears from the brief in its behalf, is that there were intervening causes in view of which the fire which started the blaze on the blacksmith shop cannot be regarded as the proximate cause of the loss for which recovery is sought. The claim is that there were two intervening causes: One, the conduct of the plaintiff in its doings and omissions in respect to the blacksmith shop after the fire had been practically subdued; and the other the change of the wind and the increase in its velocity. The sudden change in the force and direction of the wind cannot be regarded as an intervening agency. On the question of whether or not one's conduct in setting a fire is or is not negligent, the condition of the grounds and premises, as to dryness or wetness, the time of starting the fire, whether in the evening or morning, the condition of the air, whether still or windy, and, if there is a wind, the direction in which it is blowing, may sometimes be proper matters for consideration. But when negligence in setting out a fire is established, as in the discussion of this point we are to assume it to have been here, changes in the direction and force of the wind and in other conditions may carry the result of the negligence further than it would otherwise have gone, and yet liability attach for the consequent injuries, although entirely unforeseen. The distinction is clearly made in Isham v. Dow's Estate, 70 Vt. 588, 591, 41 Atl. 585, 586, 45 L. R. A. 87, 67 Am. St. Rep. 691. It is there said: "On the question of what is negligence, it is material to consider what a prudent man might reasonably anticipate; but, when negligence is once established, that consideration is entirely immaterial on the question of how far that negligence imposes liability." Gilson v. Canal Co., 65 Vt. 213, 26 Atl. 70, 36 Am. St. Rep. 802, is to the same effect. So is Stevens v. Dudley, 56 Vt. 158.

Among the cases cited in Gilson v. Canal Co., 65 Vt. 213, 26 Atl. 70, 36 Am. St. Rep. 802, is the case of Smith v. London & Southwestern Ry. Co., L. R. 6 C. P. 14. That was a case of fire communicated from a locomotive engine. The fire broke out between the rails and a hedge, from thence spread to a stubble field beyond, and from the stubble field was carried by a high wind over a road to the plaintiff's cottage, which was burned. The cottage was 200 yards from the place where the fire started. Notwithstanding a concurrence of circumstances which, as the court recognized, no one could have been expected to foresee, the court held that, since the fire was negligently set, the railway company was liable, since, after all, the injury proceeded from the original fire through the operation of natural causes. Doubtless such an extraordinary phenomenon in nature as in legal acceptation is an act of God would be an intervening cause. Stevens v. Dudley, 56 Vt. 158, 167. But in this latitude we know no winds which can be counted on to blow for any length of time with a force and direction practically unvaried except for some extraordinary violence of nature. Such winds as we ordinarily know, such winds as the evidence here relates to, are not intervening agents. Milwaukee, etc., Ry. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Lesh, 158 Ind. 423, 63 N. E. 794; Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. McCollum, 2 Kan. App. 319, 43 Pac. 97; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v.

ISHAM v. DOW'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1898. 70 Vt. 588, 41 Atl. 585, 45 L. R. A. 87, 67 Am. St. Rep. 691.)

Action by Charity Isham against the estate of Isaiah Dow. On request, the plaintiff stated what her evidence would tend to prove; and the court ruled that such facts, if established, would not entitle plaintiff to recover and excluded the evidence, and directed a verdict for the defendant.

ROWELL, J. Dow, the intestate, a poor gunner, as he knew, with eyesight much impaired, knowing that the plaintiff and her children were alone in her husband's house, unlawfully, wantonly, and maliciously shot at and wounded her husband's dog, lying peaceably in close proximity to the house, on the land of a third person, whereupon the dog sprang up, rushed wildly and rapidly towards the house, entered it through an open door into the room where the plaintiff was, ran violently and forcibly against her, knocking her down and injuring her; and the question is whether the estate is liable for it.

The defendant says that, in order to recover, the plaintiff must establish two things, namely, negligence on the part of Dow, and that her injury resulted proximately therefrom, and that the case shows neither, as it does not show that Dow owed her any legal duty, nor that his act was the proximate cause of her injury.

But we cannot adopt this view. The intestate unlawfully, wantonly, and maliciously shot at the dog, intending, we will assume, to kill it, but not knowing whether he would or not, and not knowing what would happen if he did not; and by his wanton act the dog was set wildly in motion, and that motion, thus caused, continued, without the intervention of any other agency, and without power on his part to control it, until the plaintiff's injury resulted therefrom. In these circumstances the law treats the act of intestate as the proximate cause of the injury, whether the injury was, or could have been foreseen, or not, or was or not the probable consequence of the act; for the necessary relation of cause and effect between the act and the injury is established by the continuous and connected succession of the intervening events. This is the universal rule when the injurious act is wanton. In 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 434, the true principle is said to be that he who does such an act is liable for all the consequences, however remote, because the act is quasi criminal in its character, and the law conclusively presumes that all the consequences were foreseen and intended.

But it is not necessary, in this state, certainly, that the act should be wanton, in order to impose liability for all the injurious consequences. If it is voluntary, and not obligatory, it is enough. In Vincent v. Stinehour, 7 Vt. 66, 29 Am. Dec. 145, it is said that for such an act the doer is answerable for any injury that may happen by reason thereof, whether by accident or carelessness. In Wright v. Clark, 50 Vt. 130, 28 Am. Rep. 496, the defendant shot at a fox that the plaintiff's dog had driven to cover, and accidentally hit the dog; and he was held liable, because the shooting at the fox was voluntary, and furnished no excuse for hitting the dog, though he did not intend to hit him. The same rule was applied at nisi prius, without exception, in Taylor v. Hayes, 63 Vt. 475, 21 Atl. 610, where the defendant shot at a partridge, and accidentally hit a cow. So, in Bradley v. Andrews, 51 Vt. 530, the defendant voluntarily discharged an explosive missile into a crowd, and hurt the plaintiff; and it was held that, as the act was voluntary and wrongful, the defendant was liable, and that his youth and inexperience did not excuse him. The rule is the same here in negligence cases, and may be formulated thus: When negligence is established, it imposes liability for all the injurious consequences that flow therefrom, whatever they are, until the intervention of some diverting force that makes the injury its own, or until the force set in motion by the negligent act has so far spent itself as to be too small for the law's notice. But, in administering this rule, care must be taken to distinguish between what is negligence, and what the liability for its injurious consequences. On the question of what is negligence, it is material to consider what a prudent man might reasonably have anticipated; but, when negligence is once established, that consideration is entirely immaterial on the question of how far that negligence imposes liability.

This is all well shown by Stevens v. Dudley, 56 Vt. 158, and Gilson v. Canal Co., 65 Vt. 213, 26 Atl. 70, 36 Am. St. Rep. 802. The rule is the same in England, as will be seen by referring to the leading case of Smith v. Railway Co., L. R. 6 C. P. 14, in the Exchequer Chamber. In Sneesby v. Railway Co., 1 Q. B. Div. 42, a herd of plaintiff's cattle were being driven along an occupation road to some fields. The road crosses a siding of the defendant's railway on a level, and when the cattle were crossing the siding the defendant's servants negligently sent some trucks down the siding among them, which separated them from the drovers, and so frightened them that a few rushed away from the control of the drovers, fled along the occupation road to a garden some distance off, got into the garden through a defective fence, and thence on to another track of the defendant's railway, and were killed; and the question was whether their death was not too remote from the negligence to impose liability. The court said: That the result of the negligence was twofold: First, that the trucks separated the cattle; and, second, that the cattle were frightened, and became infuriated, and were driven to act as they would not have done in their natural state. That everything that occurred or was done after that must be taken to have occurred or been done continuously. And that it was no answer to say that the fence was imperfect, for the question would have been the same, had there been no fence there. There liability was made to depend, not on the nearness of the wrongful act, but on the want of power to divert or avert its consequences, and it continued until the first impulse spent itself in the death of the cattle. See Ricker v. Freeman, 50 N. H. 420, 9 Am. Rep. 267; Railroad Co. v. Chapman, 80 Ala. 615, 2 South. 738.

Ellis v. Cleveland, 55 Vt. 358, is not in conflict with the Vermont cases above cited, as is supposed; for there there was no causal connection between the wrongful act and the injury complained of, and so there could be no recovery. As illustrative of nonliability for damage flowing from an intermediate and independent cause operating between the wrongful act and the injury, see Holmes v. Fuller, 68 Vt. 207, 34 Atl. 699.

Ryan v. Railroad Co., 35 N. Y. 210, 91 Am. Dec. 49, is relied on by the defendant. Railroad Co. v. Kerr, 62 Pa. 353, 1 Am. Rep. 431, is a similar case. It is said in Railroad Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 474, 24 L. Ed. 256, that these cases have been much criticised; that if they were intended to hold that when a building has been negligently set on fire and a second building is fired from the first, it is a conclusion of law that the owner of the second has no remedy against the negligent wrongdoer, they have not been accepted as authority for such a doctrine even in the states where they were made, and are in conflict with numerous cases in other jurisdictions. * * *

SCOTT v. SHEPHERD.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1772. 2 W. Bl. 892, 3 Wils. 403.)

[See ante, p. 56, for a report of the case.]

VANDENBURGH v. TRUAX.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1847. 4 Denio, 464, 47 Am. Dec. 268.)

A negro boy, about 16 or 18 years old, was the plaintiff's ostler; the boy was seen in the street at Schenectady, near the plaintiff's store, approaching the defendant with a stone in his hand, and appearing, as the witness said, to be very angry; the defendant not appearing, to the witness, to be angry. The negro did not attempt to throw, or strike with the stone. The defendant took hold of the negro, and told him to throw the stone down; and it may be inferred from the case that he did throw it down, though the fact is not expressly stated. The boy got loose from the defendant and ran away. The defendant took up a pick-axe and followed the boy, who fled into the plaintiff's store, and the defendant pursued him there, with the pick-axe in his hand. The back door of the store was shut, so that the boy could not get out there without being overtaken; and he ran behind the counter, as the witness believed, to save himself from being struck with the pick-axe. In fleeing behind the counter, the boy knocked out the cock, or faucet, from a cask of wine, and about two gallons of the liquor, of the value of $4, were spilt and lost. For that injury the action was brought. The justice gave judgment for the plaintiff for $4 damages, which was affirmed by the Common Pleas. The defendant brings error.

BRONSON, C. J. * * * In the case of the lighted squib which was thrown into the market house, the debate was upon the form of the remedy. The question was whether the plaintiff could maintain trespass vi et armis, or whether he should not have brought an action on the case. His right to recover in some form, seems not to have been disputed. Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892; s. c., 3 Wils. 403. In that case, the impulse was given to inanimate matter; while here, a living and rational being was moved by fear. But still, there is in some respects a striking analogy between the two cases. There the force which the defendant gave to the squib was spent when it fell upon the standing of Yates; and it was afterwards twice put in motion and in new directions, first by Willis and then by Ryall, before it struck the plaintiff and put out his eye. But as the throwing of the squib was a mischievous act, which was likely to do harm to some one; and as the two men who gave the new impulses to the missile acted from terror and in self-defense, the defendant was held answerable as a trespasser for the injury which resulted to the plaintiff. Now here, although the negro boy may have been wrong at the first, yet when he had thrown down the stone, and was endeavoring to get away from the difficulty into which he had brought himself, the defendant was clearly wrong in following up the quarrel. When the boy ran upon the cask of wine, he was moved with terror produced by the illegal act of the defendant; he was fleeing for his life, from a man in hot pursuit, armed with a deadly weapon. The injury which the plaintiff sustained was not the necessary consequence of the wrong done by the defendant; nor was it so in the case of the lighted squib. But, in both instances, the wrong was of such a nature that it might very naturally result in an injury to some third person. It is true that the boy might have gone elsewhere, instead of entering the plaintiff's store; and it is equally true that Willis and Ryall might have thrown the squib out of the market house, which was open on both sides and at one end, instead of tossing it across the market house among the people there assembled. But in the one case as well as in the other, the innocent agents were moved by fear, and had no time to reflect upon the most prudent course of conduct. It was quite natural, however, that the boy should flee to his employer for protection. And finally, the proximate cause of the injury was, in both cases, an intelligent agent.

In Guille v. Swan, 19 Johns. 381, 10 Am. Dec. 234, the immediate actors in the wrong which was done to the plaintiff, were moved by their sympathy for the defendant, who had brought himself into a perilous condition by ascending in a balloon. The balloon descended into the plaintiff's garden, which was near where it had gone up, and a crowd of the people, seeing the defendant hanging out of the car in great peril, rushed into the garden to relieve him, and in doing so trod down the plaintiff's vegetables and flowers. For the wrong done by the crowd, as well as for the injury done by himself, the defendant was held answerable as a trespasser. Although the ascent was not an illegal it was a foolish act, and the defendant ought to have foreseen that injurious consequences might follow. The case seems not to have been put upon the ground of a concert of action between the defendant and the multitude; but on the ground that the defendant's descent, under such circumstances, would ordinarily and naturally draw a crowd of people about him, either from curiosity, or for the purpose of rescuing him from a perilous situation. It was added, however, that if the defendant had beckoned to the crowd to come to his assistance, they would all have been cotrespassers; and the situation in which the defendant had voluntarily and designedly placed himself was equivalent to a direct request to the crowd to follow him.

If the cases of the squib and the balloon have not gone beyond the limits of the law, the defendant is answerable for the injury which he has brought upon the plaintiff. And there is nearly as much reason for holding him liable for driving the boy against the wine cask, and thus destroying the plaintiff's property, as there would be if he had produced the same result by throwing the boy upon the cask, in which case his liability could not have been questioned. * * *

GIBNEY v. STATE.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1893. 137 N. Y. 1, 33 N. E. 142, 19 L. R. A. 365, 33 Am. St. Rep. 690.)

The plaintiff with her husband and child were crossing a bridge over the Erie Canal. They met an acquaintance on the bridge, and the parents stopped to talk with him. The child remained within a few feet of them and suddenly fell through an opening in the railing of the bridge into the canal below. The father plunged into the canal to recover the child, and both father and son were drowned. A claim was presented to the Board of Claims for damages for the death of the husband, and a judgment in favor of the claimant was entered. There was an appeal by the State.[25]

ANDREWS, C. J. We have decided on the appeal brought for award of damages for the death of the infant son of the plaintiff, that the evidence authorized a finding of negligence on the part of the state authorities in permitting the opening in the bridge, through which the boy fell into the canal, to remain unguarded, and also the further finding that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the parents of the child, and we therefore affirmed the award. The present appeal is from an award made for damages sustained by the widow and next of kin, arising from the drowning of the plaintiff's husband and the father of the child, in an attempt to rescue the child from the canal, into which the child had fallen. * * *

It is contended by the attorney-general that the negligence of the state in permitting the bridge to remain in an unsafe condition, while it may have been the cause of the death of the boy, cannot be regarded as the cause of the death of the father, although it occurred in an attempt to save the life of the child. It is doubtless true that except for the peril of the child, occasioned by his falling through the bridge into the canal, there would have been no connection between the negligence of the state and the drowning of the father. But the peril to which the child was exposed was, as has been found, the result of the negligence of the state, and the peril to which the father exposed himself was the natural consequence of the situation. It would have been in contradiction of the most common facts in human experience if the father had not plunged into the canal to save his child. But while the immediate cause of the peril to which the father exposed himself was the peril of the child, for the purpose of administering legal remedies, the cause of the peril in both cases may be attributed to the culpable negligence of the state in leaving the bridge in a dangerous condition.

There is great difficulty in many cases in fixing the responsible cause of an injury. When there is a break in the chain of causes by the intervention of a new agency, and then an injury happens, is it to be attributed to the new element, and is this to be treated as the originating cause to the exclusion of the antecedent one, without which no occasion would have arisen for the introduction of a new element? It is impossible to formulate a rule on the subject capable of definite and easy application.

The general rule is that only the natural and proximate results of a wrong are those of which the law can take notice. But where a consequence is to be deemed proximate within the rule is the point of difficulty. In this case these elements are present: Culpable negligence on the part of the state; the falling of the child into the canal through the opening which the state negligently left in the bridge; the natural and instinctive act of the father in plunging into the canal to rescue the child; the drowning of both; the fact that such an accident as that which befell the child might reasonably have been anticipated as the result of the condition of the bridge, and the further consideration that a parent or other person on seeing the child in the water would incur every reasonable hazard for its rescue. We think it may be justly said that the death both of the child and parent was the consequence of the negligence of the state, and that the unsafe bridge was in a legal and juridical sense the cause of the drowning of both.

We can see no sound distinction between this case and the Eckert Case, 43 N. Y. 502, 3 Am. Rep. 721. In that case a railroad train was being propelled at a dangerous speed. The negligence was active. In this case it consisted of an omission; that is, in the failure to originally construct the bridge properly, or permitting it to become dangerous. We do not perceive how the difference in the circumstances of the negligence affects the question of proximateness between the cause and the result so as to distinguish in this respect the two cases.

The Balloon Case, 19 Johns. 381, 10 Am. Dec. 234, and the case of Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, give support to our conclusion.

The judgment should be affirmed.[26]

BINFORD v. JOHNSTON.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1882. 82 Ind. 426, 42 Am. Rep. 508.)

ELLIOTT, J. The case made by the appellee's complaint, briefly stated, is this:

Two sons of appellee, Allen and Todd, aged twelve and ten years respectively, bought of the appellant, a dealer in such articles, pistol cartridges loaded with powder and ball. The boys purchased the cartridges for use in a toy pistol, and were instructed by appellant how to make use of them in this pistol; the appellant knew the dangerous character of the cartridges, knew the hazard of using them as the boys proposed, and that the lads were unfit to be entrusted with articles of such a character; shortly after the sale, the toy pistol, loaded with one of the cartridges, was left by Allen and Todd lying on the floor of their home. It was picked up by their brother Bertie, who was six years of age, and discharged, the ball striking Todd and inflicting a wound from which he died.

A man who places in the hands of a child an article of a dangerous character and one likely to cause injury to the child itself or to others, is guilty of an actionable wrong. If a dealer should sell to a child dynamite, or other explosives of a similar character, nobody would doubt that he had committed a wrong for which he should answer, in case injury resulted. So, if a druggist should sell to a child a deadly drug, likely to cause harm to the child or injury to others, he would certainly be liable to an action.

The more difficult question is whether the result is so remote from the original wrong as to bring the case within the operation of the maxim "Causa proxima, et non remota, spectatur." It is not easy to assign limits to this rule, nor to lay down any general test which will enable the courts to determine when a case is within or without the rule. It is true that general formulas have been frequently stated, but these have carried us but little, if any, beyond the meaning conveyed by the words of the maxim itself.

The fact that some agency intervenes between the original wrong and the injury does not necessarily bring the case within the rule; on the contrary, it is firmly settled that the intervention of a third person or of other and new direct causes does not preclude a recovery if the injury was the natural or probable result of the original wrong. Billman v. Indianapolis, &c., R. R. Co., 76 Ind. 166, 40 Am. Rep. 230. This doctrine remounts to the famous case of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Black. 892, commonly known as the "Squib case." The rule goes so far as to hold that the original wrong-doer is responsible, even though the agency of a second wrong-doer intervened. This doctrine is enforced with great power by Cockburn, C. J., in Clark v. Chambers, 7 Cent. L. J. 11 [3 Q. B. D. 327 (1878)]; and is approved by the text-writers. Cooley, Torts, 70; Addison, Torts, § 12.

Although the act of the lad Bertie intervened between the original wrong and the injury, we cannot deny a recovery if we find that the injury was the natural or probable result of appellant's original wrong. In Henry v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 50 Cal. 176, it was said: "A long series of judicial decisions has defined proximate, or immediate and direct damages to be the ordinary and natural results of the negligence; such as are usual, and as therefore might have been expected." Lord Ellenborough said in Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277, that "Every man must be taken to contemplate the probable consequences of the act he does." In Billman v. Indianapolis, &c., R. R. Co., supra, very many cases are cited declaring and enforcing this doctrine, and we deem it unnecessary to here repeat the citations. Under the rule declared in the cases referred to, it is clear that one who sells dangerous explosives to a child, knowing that they are to be used in such a manner as to put in jeopardy the lives of others, must be taken to contemplate the probable consequences of his wrongful act. It is a probable consequence of such a sale as that charged against appellant, that the explosives may be so used by children, among whom it is natural to expect that they will be taken, as to injure the buyers or their associates. A strong illustration of the principle here affirmed is afforded by the case of Dixon v. Bell, 5 M. & S. 198. In that case the defendant sent a child for a loaded gun, desiring that the person who was to deliver it should take out the priming. This was done; but the gun was discharged by the imprudent act of the child, the plaintiff injured, and it was held that the defendant was liable. In Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, the doctrine of the case cited was approved, and the same judgment has been pronounced upon it by other courts as well as by the text-writers. Carter v. Towne, 98 Mass. 567, 96 Am. Judgment [for the plaintiff] affirmed.[27]

CLARK v. WALLACE.

(Supreme Court of Colorado, 1911. 51 Colo. 437, 118 Pac. 973, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 349.)

MUSSER, J. This writ of error was sued out to review a judgment in favor of Wallace, who was defendant below. Clark owned 160 acres of standing peas, upon which he was feeding and fattening about 1,200 sheep. The sheep and peas were in charge of a herder, in the employ of Clark. The herder lived there with his wife and two children. On a certain day, Wallace, who had a ranch nearby, was engaged in dipping sheep, and it became necessary for him to have more help. He caused Clark's herder to be asked to come over and help in dipping the sheep, and stated that he would pay the herder. After a time, the herder came over. While he was at Wallace's, a fire started in or near Clark's field of peas. It was evidently started by the herder's wife, or boy, or both. There was a high wind blowing, and the fire soon got beyond control, and extended to the field of peas, and destroyed them. Clark brought an action to recover from Wallace the damages sustained by him on account of the loss of the peas. After the evidence was in, the court instructed the jury to render a verdict in favor of Wallace, which was done, and upon this verdict judgment was entered against Clark.

We will not stop to consider whether or not Wallace would be liable for any damage that might have resulted to Clark in consequence of the herder being induced to leave his work. If Wallace was liable for any damage at all, which we do not determine, it was only for such damage as was "the actual, natural, and approximate result of the wrong committed." Clifford v. D., S. P. & P. R. R., 9 Colo. 333, 12 Pac. 219. "The rule is general that a person is not to be held responsible in damages for the remote consequences of his act, or indeed for any but those which are proximate or natural." 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 561. In D. & R. G. R. R. Co. v. Sipes, 26 Colo. 17, 55 Pac. 1093, it is said that proximate cause is "that cause which, in natural and continued sequence, unbroken by any efficient, intervening cause, produced the result complained of, and without which that result would not have occurred;" or "that cause which immediately precedes and directly produces an effect, as distinguished from a remote, mediate, or predisposing cause."

Whether an act was the proximate cause of damage is ordinarily a question for the jury; but, when the facts are undisputed, and are susceptible of but one inference, the question is one of law for the court. D. & R. G. R. R. Co. v. Sipes, supra. The only damage that Clark sought to recover, and of which there was any evidence, was that which he had sustained by reason of the burning of the peas. It cannot be said that the natural result of the herder's absence was that some member of his family would start a fire and that the wind would be high, and would fan that fire, so that it would extend to and destroy the peas. It cannot be said that the herder's absence, in natural and continued sequence, unbroken by any efficient, intervening cause, produced the result complained of; for the setting out of the fire by his family was not a natural and continued sequence of the herder's absence; but it was an efficient, intervening cause, coming in after the absence of the herder, and could not have been anticipated as a natural result of the absence. It cannot be said that, if the herder had been present, the fire would not have been started, or the wind not have been high. The cause of the fire was not the absence of the herder, but it was plainly the action of his family, and this action was not the natural and legitimate sequence of his absence. The fire might have been started just as well with him present, on some portion of the 160 acres of peas, and the wind would have blown just as hard.

The substantial facts in this case are undisputed; but if the evidence on the part of the plaintiff be alone considered, there is but one inference to be drawn from it, and that is that the absence of the herder was not the proximate cause of the destruction of the peas. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

FERGUS LANE v. ATLANTIC WORKS. [c]

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1872. 111 Mass. 136.)

Tort. The declaration was as follows:

"And the plaintiff says that the defendants carelessly left a truck, loaded with iron, in Marion Street, a public highway in Boston, for the space of twenty minutes and more; and the iron on said truck was so carelessly and negligently placed that it would easily fall off; and that the plaintiff was walking in said highway, and was lawfully in said highway, and lawfully using said highway, and in the exercise of due care; and said iron upon said truck was thrown and fell therefrom upon the plaintiff in consequence of the defendants' carelessness, and the plaintiff was severely bruised and crippled," &c.

The plaintiff introduced evidence,[28] under a general denial, that the defendants left a truck with a bar of iron on it standing in front of their works on Marion Street, which was a public highway in Boston; that the iron was not fastened, but would easily roll off the truck; that the plaintiff, then seven years old, and a boy about the same age named James Conners, were walking, between six and seven in the evening, on the side of Marion Street opposite the truck and the defendants' works; that Horace Lane, a boy 12 years old, being near the truck, called to them to come over and see him move it; that the plaintiff and Conners said they would go over and watch him do it; that they went over accordingly; that the plaintiff stood near the truck to see the wheels move, as Horace Lane took hold of the tongue of the truck; that Horace Lane moved the tongue somewhat; that the iron rolled off and injured the plaintiff's leg; and that neither the plaintiff nor Conners touched the iron or truck at all.

The defendants introduced evidence tending to show that the iron was fastened securely on the truck, which was drawn from the defendants' works into the street at four o'clock in the afternoon; that the boys removed the fastenings; that Horace Lane placed the boys one on each side of the truck; that he turned the tongue of the truck round; that he and Conners then took hold of the iron and rolled it off; that the plaintiff had his hands on the iron or on the truck when the iron rolled off on him; and that the boys were engaged in the common enterprise of rolling off the iron and moving the truck. There was no evidence that Horace Lane had any lawful purpose or object in moving the truck, or any right to meddle with it.

The defendants requested the judge to give, besides other rulings, the following:

"2. In order to make the plaintiff a participator or joint actor with Horace Lane, in his conduct in meddling with the truck for an unlawful purpose, it was not necessary for him to have actually taken hold of the tongue, or the iron, or the truck, to help or aid in moving it. It is enough if he joined with him in a common object and purpose voluntarily, went across the street on his invitation for that avowed purpose, and stood by the truck to encourage and aid, by his presence, word or act, the accomplishment of that purpose.

"3. While it is true that negligence alone on the part of Horace Lane, which contributed to the injury combining with the defendants' negligence, would not prevent a recovery, unless the plaintiff's negligence also concurred as one of the contributory causes also; yet, if the fault of Horace Lane was not negligence, but a voluntary meddling with the truck or iron, for an unlawful purpose, and wholly as a sheer trespass, and this culpable conduct was the direct cause of the injury which would not have happened otherwise, the plaintiff cannot recover."

[28] The statement of facts is abridged and the opinion of Colt, J., is omitted.

The judge did not give the ruling requested, but gave rulings, which, so far as they are now material, were as follows:

"The city ordinance is proper to be put in evidence and to be considered by the jury upon the question of negligence, although it is not conclusive proof that the defendants were in point of fact negligent in the act of leaving the truck there. It is a matter of evidence, to be weighed with all the other evidence in the case.

"If the sole or the direct cause of the accident was the act of Horace Lane, the defendants are not responsible. If he was the culpable cause of the accident, that is to say, if the accident resulted from the fault of Horace Lane, they are not responsible. But if Horace Lane merely contributed to the accident, and if the accident resulted from the joint negligence of Horace Lane in his conduct in regard to moving the truck and the negligence of the defendants in leaving it there, where it was thus exposed, or leaving it so insecurely fastened that this particular danger might be reasonably apprehended therefrom, then the intermediate act of Horace Lane will not prevent the plaintiff from recovering, provided he himself was in the exercise of due and reasonable care. If the plaintiff himself participated in the act of Horace Lane no further than to go there and be a witness to this transaction which Horace Lane proposed to perform, crossing over the street by his invitation, and witnessing him move this truck, that would not make him such a participator in the wrongful act of Horace Lane as to prevent his recovery, provided he himself was in the exercise of reasonable care.

"If, however, he was actually engaged in the wrongful act of Horace Lane, if he was actually engaged in disturbing this truck, and moving the fastenings which had been put upon it in order to prevent it from being disturbed, and was actively participating in the act of Horace Lane, then he cannot recover. But if the act of the plaintiff was limited to crossing the street for the purpose of witnessing the act done by Horace Lane, in answer to his invitation, and no active participation was taken by the plaintiff other than that, it would not prevent his recovery, provided he himself was in the exercise of due and reasonable care."

At the close of his charge to the jury the judge read the second ruling prayed for by the defendants, and said:

"If the plaintiff took an active participation in it, as I before instructed you, or went there as a joint actor, for the purpose of encouraging Horace Lane in it, he cannot recover. If he went there attracted by curiosity only, at the invitation of the party who was about to move the truck, Horace Lane, then he may recover; provided, you are further satisfied that, in what he did, he was in the exercise of the due and reasonable care that should be expected of a person of his age."

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $6,000, and the defendants alleged exceptions.

COLT, J. In actions of this description, the defendant is liable for the natural and probable consequences of his negligent act or omission. The injury must be the direct result of the misconduct charged; but it will not be considered too remote if, according to the usual experience of mankind, the result ought to have been apprehended.

The act of a third person, intervening and contributing a condition necessary to the injurious effect of the original negligence, will not excuse the first wrong-doer, if such act ought to have been foreseen. The original negligence still remains a culpable and direct cause of the injury. The test is to be found in the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated, not in the number of subsequent events and agencies which might arise.

Whether in any given case the act charged was negligent, and whether the injury suffered was, within the relation of cause and effect, legally attributable to it, are questions for the jury. They present oftentimes difficult questions of fact, requiring practical knowledge and experience for their settlement, and where there is evidence to justify the verdict it cannot be set aside as matter of law. The only question for the Court is, whether the instructions given upon these points stated the true tests of liability. * * *†

3. The last instruction asked was rightly refused. Under the law as laid down by the Court the jury must have found the defendants guilty of negligence in doing that from which injury might reasonably have been expected, and from which injury resulted; that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care; that Horace Lane's act was not the sole, direct, or culpable cause of the injury; that he did not purposely roll the iron upon the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff was not a joint actor with him in the transaction, but only a spectator. This supports the verdict. It is immaterial whether the act of Horace Lane was mere negligence or a voluntary intermeddling. It was an act which the jury have found the defendants ought to have apprehended and provided against. McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen, 290, 295; Powell v. Deveney, 3 Cush. 300; Barnes v. Exceptions overruled.

†Part of the opinion, on other points, is omitted. On the principle in the last instruction compare the remark of Gibson, J., in Murphy v. Great Northern Ry. Co., [1897] 2 I. R. 301, 312: "The defendants might be liable if the [baggage] truck was set in motion either accidentally or by that occasional negligence which, as Lord Halsbury has remarked, is one of the ordinary incidents of human life, and which under the circumstances they ought to have anticipated." And see Norton v. Chandler & Co. (1915) 221 Mass. 99, 108 N. E. 897: (A defective revolving door to D.'s store is spun so fast by the hurry of S. that P., another customer passing through, is hurt.)

McDOWALL v. GREAT WESTERN RY. CO.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1902] 1 K. B. 618. Court of Appeal. [1903] 2 K. B. 331.)

The action was brought by an infant, suing by her next friend, to recover damages in respect of injuries sustained by her through the alleged negligence of the defendants. It was tried before Kennedy, J., and a jury, and, the jury having answered specific questions put to them by the judge and assessed the damages at £175, the case was adjourned for further consideration.

The following statement of facts is taken from the written judgment of Kennedy, J.:

"The claim is for damages for serious injuries inflicted on the plaintiff, a girl of nineteen years of age, in July, 1900, by a brake van belonging to the defendants and under the management of their servants at Pembroke.

"The defendants, as part of their railway system at Pembroke, have a branch called the Hobbs Point Branch, which is an offshoot of the main line and is chiefly used as a siding. The Hobbs Point Branch line crosses on a level a highway with a gate on either side across the line of railway. For some distance from the highway to the eastward there is a steepish gradient in the railway line of about one in fifty-five, descending to a point where the line crosses the highway. In the course of the gradient is what is termed a 'catch-point,' which would arrest and divert any railway trucks and carriages which from any cause happened to run down the incline towards the highway and would prevent them, as the defendants' witness phrased it, from 'running wild.' On the day before the accident a servant of the company had taken an engine with five trucks and a brake-van along the Hobbs Point Branch from the railway station, intending to leave them there as on a siding until they were required. He drew them beyond and to the westward of the catch-point, that is to say, to a position on the incline between the catch-point and the highway, and there left them, after putting on the brake in the van and properly spragging, as the operation is called, that is, securing by means of pieces of wood, the wheels of the trucks. The van was attached to the trucks by the screw coupling, which was not screwed up tight, but sufficiently tight, if not interfered with, to hold the van in connection with the trucks. The position would not have been a safe one in regard to the highway if these precautions had not been taken, but with the spraggs on the trucks and the brake on the van it would have been safe, as the jury have found by their verdict, if things had remained as they were when the trucks and the van were left in this condition. The defendants' evidence shewed that the reason why the trucks and the van were not left to the eastward of the catch-point was that they wished by going further to the westward to have an extra space of line for shunting other carriages to be brought afterwards on to the branch from the mainline The Hobbs Point Branch was separated on the one side from some open ground belonging to the defendants by a wire fence, and on the other it was bounded by a field which was separated from the high road by a garden. For years the defendants had been troubled by boys trespassing on this part of the line and playing in and about the vehicles left standing upon it.

"The day after the shunting operations some boys appear to have come on the line where the trucks and van were and to have amused themselves by playing with the vehicles and their fastenings. They were seen doing this or, at all events, they were seen on and close to the van, and they seem carelessly to have unfastened the screw coupling of the van, and partially to have released the brake. In consequence of this the van, loosed from the trucks, ran down the incline, smashed the gate which separated the railway from the highway, as well as a gate higher up, and knocked down and seriously injured the plaintiff who was passing along the highway.

"It was to recover damages for the negligence of the defendants, which, as the plaintiff alleged, caused these injuries, that the action was brought. It was tried before me sitting with a jury at the last assizes at Haverfordwest. The jury assessed the damages at £175, and returned answers to specific questions which I left to them. The questions and the answers were as follows:

"(1) 'Was the van, in regard to the persons using the highway where the plaintiff was, in a safe position, as and where it was left by the defendants' servants on the 20th of July, unless interfered with afterwards?' The jury said, 'Yes.' (2) 'Would the accident to the plaintiff have happened if the van had not been interfered with?' Answer, 'No.' (3) 'Was the interference the act of trespassers, and, if so was the interference with the wilful intent of causing the van to descend the incline, or merely negligent?' Answer, 'Yes; the act of trespassers with negligence.' (4) 'Was the danger of such interference causing injury to persons using the highway known to the defendants at the time the van was left and kept where it was, and might it have been sufficiently guarded against by the exercise of reasonable care and skill on the part of the defendants?' Answer, 'Yes; it was known and could have been guarded against by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the defendants.' (5) 'Was the occurrence of the injury to the plaintiff materially and effectively caused by want of reasonable care and skill on the part of the defendants' servants in placing and keeping the van as and where it was placed by them, either (a) in regard to its position, apart from interference by trespassers; or (b) in regard to its danger if interfered with; or (c) in any other way?' To that the jury answer, 'Yes; the company were negligent in not placing the van to the east of the catch-point;' and then they assess the damages as I have stated."

KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment: In this case the material facts may be shortly stated. [The learned judge stated the facts as above set out, and continued:]

I did not give judgment at the time, but reserved the case, which is in some respects peculiar, for further consideration; and the questions of law arising upon the case have been fully argued before me. * * * The finding of the jury in answer to the fourth question, namely, that the defendants, at the time of placing and keeping the van where they did, knew of the danger to those on the highway of such interference as caused the plaintiff's hurt, appears to me to be conclusive. The position in which, with this knowledge, they placed and kept the van was one of danger because, if the interference happened so as to set the vehicles in motion, there was nothing there to stop the van running down the incline and crashing through the intervening gates and over the highway. There was a catch-point which had been placed to prevent and which would in fact have prevented, such a disaster. With a knowledge of the danger the defendants, for the convenience of their traffic arrangements, preferred not to use this obvious and effective safeguard. There was, I think, quite sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the jury of defendants' knowledge of the existence of the danger which the defendants' servants thus needlessly imposed upon persons using the highway.

For years, according to the defendants' witnesses, they had been troubled by boys playing with and on the trucks and carriages left stationary at this part of the line. This portion of the branch is bounded on one side by a wire fence, which separated it from some open ground of the defendants, and on the other side by a field, which was separated from the highroad by a garden. To the knowledge of the defendants boys used to get into the trucks, and even to unlock the doors of the vans on the siding, for the purpose either of theft or amusement. If the defendants knew of this systematic, or at any rate, very frequent interference, it does not appear to me to be otherwise than reasonable for the jury to say that they must be taken to have known, as one of the risks involved, that the trucks and vans kept in position on the down grade only by temporary means, which apparently were easily movable, might, if uncontrolled by the catch-point, cause mischief to the users of the highway. If, as the jury have found, the risk of interference by trespassers with the trucks and vans in this locality was a risk known to the defendants, and if the consequent danger of their movement down the incline to the highway was also a known risk, and if, further, this danger might have been guarded against by the exercise by the defendants of reasonable care, as the jury have also found, I can see no legal reasons upon which the defendants can claim immunity merely because the boys were trespassers. I may point out that in Engelhart v. Ferrant (1897) 1 Q. B. 240, the act which immediately caused the plaintiff's hurt was an unauthorized and improper act on the part of the person who did it; and in Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, Lord Denman said (1 Q. B. at p. 35): "If I am guilty of negligence in leaving anything dangerous in a place where I know it to be extremely probable that some other person will unjustifiably set it in motion to the injury of a third, and if that injury should be so brought about, I presume that the sufferer might have redress by action against both or either of the two, but unquestionably against the first." In this case the van as placed was not a cause of danger, but the defendants knew in effect that it might become a cause of danger, for they knew the risk of the interference which would create danger, and yet they omitted to take a reasonable precaution to prevent its consequences. Therefore, as it seems to me, the principle of liability as stated in the passage which I have read from Lord Denman's judgment, applies.

I give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount found by the jury in their verdict.

From this judgment the defendant appealed.[29]

[In the Court of Appeal]

ROMER, L. J. Clearly, as found by the jury when this train was left where it was by the railway company, with the precautions taken by them, it was perfectly safe. It was not left in any condition in which it could be said that there was any negligence on the part of the railway company under the circumstances, unless you can find some evidence of negligence by reason of the evidence relating to the mischievous boys; in other words, unless it is plain that the evidence relating to the mischievous boys turned that act which was otherwise a proper act on the part of the company into a negligent one. Upon that, having considered that evidence, it does not appear to me that upon it the jury could reasonably find that the railway company ought, under the circumstances in which they left this train, reasonably to have anticipated that the boys would do or might have done what they in fact did, or that there was at the time, known to the company, any such risk of the particular acts of the boys which caused the accident as called upon the railway company to take further precautions against those particular acts; and that being so, it appears to me that the findings upon which the learned judge below acted cannot be relied upon on behalf of the plaintiff, and that the appeal ought to succeed.

STIRLING, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The real question in this case is whether the findings of the jury in answer to the fourth and fifth questions which were put to them by the learned judge can be supported. In answer to the first three questions the jury have found that the van was in a safe position as and where it was left by the defendants' servants, unless interfered with afterwards, and that the accident would not have happened if the van had not been interfered with, and that the interference was the act of trespassers, who acted negligently. Then what really happened was that some boys got into or on the van and undid the brake and couplings, and that this led to the accident.

Now, was there any evidence to shew that the company ought reasonably to have anticipated such an occurrence? The learned judge, twice in the course of his judgment, states what the facts are. He says that for years the defendants had been troubled by boys trespassing on this part of the line and playing in and about vehicles standing upon it, and later he says that, to the knowledge of the defendants, the boys used to get into trucks and vans and unlock the doors of the vans on the siding. That is the whole length the evidence went. Nothing further has been called to our attention. That had gone on for years, and no accident of any kind had occurred. In these circumstances it does not seem to me a fair inference to draw that the company ought to have reasonably anticipated any such act as was actually done by the boys in this case, or the result which came from it. Upon that ground I think the appeal ought to be allowed.[30]

ALEXANDER v. TOWN OF NEW CASTLE.

This action was brought by Alexander to recover for personal injuries sustained by him through the alleged negligence of the defendant. The complaint charged that the town allowed an excavation to be made in the side of one of the streets, and negligently suffered this excavation to remain open and uninclosed, whereby the plaintiff, without fault on his part, fell into this excavation and was injured. The town answered: First, in denial; secondly, that the plaintiff had a warrant for the arrest of one Heavenridge, and as special constable was taking Heavenridge to jail, under an order from a justice of the peace, and in doing so attempted to pass the excavation in question, that when opposite the same Heavenridge seized the plaintiff and threw him into the excavation, whereby he was injured as charged in the complaint, and Heavenridge was enabled to escape.[31]

A demurrer to this answer, on the ground of insufficiency of facts to constitute a defense, was overruled.

NIBLACK, C. J. (after stating the facts). Complaint is first made of the overruling the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer, and this complaint is based upon the claim that, as the pit or excavation so wrongfully and negligently permitted to remain open and uninclosed afforded Heavenridge the opportunity of throwing the plaintiff into it as a means of escape, it was, in legal contemplation, the proximate cause of the injuries which the plaintiff received.

However negligent a person, or a corporation, may have been in some particular respect, he, or it, is only liable to those who may have been injured by reason of such negligence, and the negligence must have been the proximate cause of the injury sued for.

[30] The opinion of Vaughan Williams, L. J., with whom Romer and Stirling, L. JJ., concurred, is omitted.

[31] The statement of the case is abridged, and only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point.

Where some independent agency has intervened and been the immediate cause of the injury, the party guilty of negligence in the first instance is not responsible. On that subject Wharton, in his work on the Law of Negligence, at section 134, says: "Supposing that if it had not been for the intervention of a responsible third party the defendant's negligence would have produced no damage to the plaintiff, is the defendant liable to the plaintiff? This question must be answered in the negative, for the general reason that causal connection between negligence and damage is broken by the interposition of independent responsible human action. I am negligent on a particular subject-matter as to which I am not contractually bound. Another person, moving independently, comes in, and either negligently or maliciously so acts as to make my negligence injurious to a third person. If so, the person so intervening acts as a non-conductor, and insulates my negligence, so that I cannot be sued for the mischief which the person so intervening directly produces. He is the one who is liable to the person injured. I may be liable to him for my negligence in getting him into difficulty, but I am not liable to others for the negligence which he alone was the cause of making operative."

So, if a house has been negligently set on fire, and the fire has spread beyond its natural limits by means of a new agency; for example, if a high wind arose after its ignition, and carried burning brands to a great distance, thus causing a fire and a loss of property at a place which would have been safe but for the wind, the loss so caused by the wind will be set down as a remote consequence, for which the person setting the fire should not be held responsible. 1 Thompson, Negligence, 144. * * *[32]

Heavenridge was clearly an intervening, as well as an independent, human agency in the infliction of the injuries of which the plaintiff complained. The circuit court, consequently, did not err in overruling the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer. * * *

ANDREWS v. KINSEL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, 1901. 114 Ga. 390, 40 S. E. 300, 88 Am. St. Rep. 25.)

LEWIS, J. Andrews & Co. sued Kinsel for $500 damages, making by their petition substantially the following case: The plaintiffs rented from the defendant a storehouse in the city of Columbus, in which they transacted a mercantile business; and it was the duty of the defendant, as the landlord of the plaintiffs, to keep the premises in good repair. The defendant also owned the storehouse adjoining that rented by the plaintiffs, a partition wall dividing the two stores. On a named day the defendant, by his agents and servants, entered his storehouse adjoining the plaintiffs' place of business for the purpose of making certain repairs thereon, and in making the repairs the partition between the two storehouses was removed, or partly removed, leaving the store of the plaintiffs exposed and unprotected; and upon leaving the place at night the defendant's agents and servants negligently and carelessly left open two rear windows in the store next to that of the plaintiffs, thereby rendering it easy to effect an entrance into the plaintiffs' store through the rear windows and the opening in the partition. On the night in question a burglar or burglars did gain entrance to the plaintiffs' store in the manner described, and steal from the plaintiffs a large quantity of merchandise, to their damage as aforesaid. No notice was given to the plaintiffs that the partition had been removed or that the windows had been left open, and this, also, is alleged to have been negligence. The defendant filed a demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, and he also filed an answer, in which he denied liability, and denied that he had been negligent as alleged. The case went to trial, and, at the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiffs, the court, on motion of defendant's counsel, granted a nonsuit. To this ruling the plaintiffs excepted, and the defendant filed a cross-bill of exceptions in which he assigned error upon the overruling of his demurrer.

1. As, in our opinion, the court below should have sustained the demurrer filed by the defendant, and the refusal to do so was reversible, the writ of error issued upon the main bill of exceptions will, under the ruling of this court in Rives v. Rives, 113 Ga. 392, 39 S. E. 79, be dismissed.

2. It is unnecessary to argue, or to cite authorities to sustain, the well-settled legal principle that, to enable one to recover for damages resulting from the negligent conduct of another, it must appear that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury sustained. It is also a well-recognized principle that where there has intervened between the defendant's negligent act and the injury an independent illegal act of a third person, producing the injury, and without which it would not have happened, the latter is properly held the proximate cause of the injury, and the defendant is excused. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 580. As is stated in 1 Shear. & R. Neg. (5th Ed.) § 25, "The defendant's negligence may put a temptation in the way of another person to commit a wrongful act by which the plaintiff is injured, and yet the defendant's negligence may be in no sense a cause of the injury." Thus, in Tennessee, a defendant was held not liable for the negligent failure to keep a night watch on guard over the property of the plaintiff, as a result of which an incendiary set fire to the property. State v. Ward, 9 Heisk. 133. In New York it is held that the relation of cause and effect between the negligence of the defendant and the injury to the plaintiff cannot be made out by including the independent illegal acts of third persons, and that the defendant cannot be made accountable for the unauthorized illegal acts of other persons, although his own conduct may have indirectly induced or incited the commission of the acts. Olmsted v. Brown, 12 Barb. 662. And in Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 524, 41 Am. Dec. 765, the following language is used: "To maintain a claim for special damages, they must appear to be the legal and natural consequences arising from the tort, and not from the wrongful act of a third party remotely induced thereby." See, also, Shugart v. Egan, 83 Ill. 56, 25 Am. Rep. 359; Bosworth v. Brand, 1 Dana (Ky.) 377; Carpenter v. Railroad Co., 13 App. Div. 328, 43 N. Y. Supp. 203.

This principle is also well established in Georgia by the cases of Belding v. Johnson, 86 Ga. 177, 12 S. E. 304, 11 L. R. A. 53, and Henderson v. Coal Co., 100 Ga. 568, 28 S. E. 251, 40 L. R. A. 95. In the former case it was held that a widow could not recover damages of a barkeeper for the homicide of her husband, who was killed in an encounter with a third person; the quarrel leading up to the encounter having been the result of intoxication produced by liquor illegally sold to the slayer of plaintiff's husband by the barkeeper. In the Henderson Case the lessee of a convict was held not liable for the criminal act of the convict, by which a third party suffered damage, although the lessee negligently placed it in the power of the convict to commit the crime. These cases, it will be seen, are closely in point. The rule is aptly and rather quaintly stated in Whart. Neg. (2d Ed.) § 134, in the following language: "I am negligent on a particular subject-matter as to which I am not contractually bound. Another person, moving independently, comes in and either negligently or maliciously so acts as to make my negligence injurious to a third person. If so, the person so intervening acts as a nonconductor, and insulates my negligence, so that I cannot be sued for the mischief which the person so intervening directly produces."

Applying these principles to the case now before us, it is manifest that the plaintiffs did not make out a cause of action by their petition. Granting as true all of their allegations as to the negligence of the defendant, it is also true, upon the face of their pleadings, that there intervened as a direct cause between the negligence of the defendant and the damage sustained by themselves the independent criminal act of a responsible human agency. The demurrer to the petition should have been sustained.

Writ of error on main bill of exceptions dismissed. Judgment on cross bill reversed. All the justices concurring.

WATSON v. KENTUCKY & INDIANA BRIDGE & R. CO. et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1910. 137 Ky. 619, 126 S. W. 146.)

SETTLE, J. This action was instituted by the appellant, John Watson, in the court below against the appellees, Kentucky & Indiana Bridge & Railroad Company, hereinafter called the Bridge & Railroad Company, the Southern Railway Company, the Southern Railway Company in Kentucky, and the Union Tank Line Company, to recover $20,000 damages for injuries sustained to his person on the night of June 14, 1907, from an explosion of gas caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the appellees. It was, in substance, alleged in the petition as amended—that while a tank car, owned by the appellee Union Tank Line Company, and filled with a highly explosive substance known as gasoline, was being transported through a populous section of the city of Louisville over the roadbed of the appellee Bridge & Railroad Company, it was derailed and its valve broken, thereby causing all the gasoline to escape and flow in large quantities on the street and into the gutters; that from the gasoline thus flowing and standing in pools upon the street and gutters there arose and spread over the neighborhood of the place of derailment and into the houses of the residents thereof, great quantities of highly explosive and combustible gas which, three hours after the derailment of the tank car, exploded with force from contact with a lighted match thrown on the street by one Chas. Duerr, who claimed to have used it in igniting a cigar; that the explosion threw appellant from his bed and almost demolished his house, from the ruins of which he was taken unconscious and bleeding with a fractured jaw and one cheek nearly torn from his face. It was further charged in the petition that the explosion and appellant's consequent injuries resulted from the negligence of all the appellees; the negligence of the Union Tank Line Company lying, as alleged, in its failure to provide the tank car with proper trucks and main valve; that of the Bridge & Railroad Company in failing to maintain in a safe condition the roadbed and track at the point of derailment; in permitting the tank car to remain at the place of derailment in its wrecked condition an unreasonable time, and in allowing ignorant and careless meddling on the part of their servants with the main valve of the tank after it was broken, whereby the flow of the gasoline from the tank was increased instead of diminished.

All the material averments of the petition were specifically denied by the answer of the appellees.

As on the trial the proof failed to show that either the Southern Railway Company, or the Southern Railway Company in Kentucky, was charged with the duty of maintaining the roadbed or tracks at the place of derailment or that they had handled or had anything to do with the tank car in question, appellant, at the conclusion of all the evidence, dismissed the action without prejudice as to those two appellees. At the conclusion of appellant's evidence, the appellees Bridge & Railroad Company and Union Tank Line Company moved the court peremptorily to instruct the jury to find for them. The motion was overruled, but being renewed by appellees after the introduction of all the evidence, it was sustained, and the jury, in obedience to the peremptory instruction then given by the court, returned a verdict in behalf of appellees, upon which judgment was entered in their favor for costs. Appellant, being dissatisfied with that judgment and the refusal of the Circuit Court to grant him a new trial, has appealed. * * *

The lighting of the match by Duerr having resulted in the explosion, the question is, was that act merely a contributing cause, or the efficient and, therefore, proximate cause of appellant's injuries? The question of proximate cause is a question for the jury. In holding that Duerr in lighting or throwing the match acted maliciously or with intent to cause the explosion, the trial court invaded the province of the jury. There was, it is true, evidence tending to prove that the act was wanton or malicious, but also evidence conducing to prove that it was inadvertently or negligently done by Duerr. It was therefore for the jury and not the court to determine from all the evidence whether the lighting of the match was done by Duerr inadvertently or negligently, or whether it was a wanton and malicious act. As said in Milwaukee Railroad Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256: "The true rule is that what is the proximate cause of the injury is ordinarily a question for the jury. It is not a question of science or legal knowledge. It is to be determined as a fact in view of the circumstances of fact attending it." Sydnor v. Arnold, 122 Ky. 557, 92 S. W. 289, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 1252. In Thompson on Negligence, § 161, it is said: "On principle, the rule must be here, as in other cases, that, before the judge can take the question away from the jury and determine it himself, the facts must not only be undisputed, but the inference to be drawn from those facts must be such that fair-minded men ought not to differ about them. It must be concluded that this is so, when it is considered that proximate cause is a cause which would probably, according to the experience of mankind, lead to the event which happened, and that remote cause is a cause which would not, according to such experience, lead to such an event. Now, whether a given cause will probably lead to a given result is plainly to be determined by the average experience of mankind; that is, by a jury rather than by a legal scholar on the bench."

No better statement of the law of proximate cause can be given than is found in 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 490, quoted with approval in Louisville Home Telephone Company v. Gasper, 123 Ky. 128, 93 S. W. 1057, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 578, 9 L. R. A. (N.

S.) 548: "It is well settled that the mere fact that there have been intervening causes between the defendant's negligence and the plaintiff's injuries is not sufficient in law to relieve the former from liability; that is to say, the plaintiff's injuries may yet be natural and proximate in law, although between the defendant's negligence and the injuries other causes or conditions, or agencies, may have operated, and, when this is the case, the defendant is liable. So the defendant is clearly responsible where the intervening causes, acts, or conditions were set in motion by his earlier negligence, or naturally induced by such wrongful act or omission, or even, it is generally held, if the intervening acts or conditions were of a nature the happening of which was reasonably to have been anticipated, though they may have been acts of the plaintiff himself. An act or omission may yet be negligent and of a nature to charge a defendant with liability, although no injuries would have been sustained but for some intervening cause, if the occurrence of the latter might have been anticipated. * * * A proximate cause is that cause which naturally led to and which might have been expected to produce the result. * * * The connection of cause and effect must be established. It is also a principle well settled that when an injury is caused by two causes concurring to produce the result, for one of which the defendant is responsible, and not for the other, the defendant cannot escape responsibility. One is liable for an injury caused by the concurring negligence of himself and another to the same extent as for one caused entirely by his own negligence." Black's Law & Practice, § 21; Thompson on Negligence, §§ 47–52; Whitaker's Smith on Negligence, 27; 29 Cyc. 488–502.

If the presence on Madison street in the city of Louisville of the great volume of loose gas that arose from the escaping gasoline was caused by the negligence of the appellee Bridge & Railroad Company, it seems to us that the probable consequences of its coming in contact with fire and causing an explosion was too plain a proposition to admit of doubt. Indeed, it was most probable that some one would strike a match to light a cigar or for other purposes in the midst of the gas. In our opinion, therefore, the act of one lighting and throwing a match under such circumstances cannot be said to be the efficient cause of the explosion. It did not of itself produce the explosion, nor could it have done so without the assistance and contribution resulting from the primary negligence, if there was such negligence, on the part of the appellee Bridge & Railroad Company in furnishing the presence of the gas in the street. This conclusion, however, rests upon the theory that Duerr inadvertently or negligently lighted and threw the match in the gas. This view of the case is sustained by the following leading cases, all decided by this court: Sydnor v. Arnold, 122 Ky. 557, 92 S. W. 289, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 1252; Louisville Gas Co. v. Gutenkuntz, 82 Ky. 432; Whitman-McNamara Tobacco Co. v. Warren, 66 S. W. 609, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2120; Louisville Home Telephone Co. v. Gasper, 123 Ky. 128, 93 S. W. 1057, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 578, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 548. The cases supra are, indeed, in point of fact and principle so analogous to the case under consideration as to completely control its determination, and to render further discussion of it unnecessary.

If, however, the act of Duerr in lighting the match and throwing it into the vapor or gas arising from the gasoline was malicious, and done for the purpose of causing the explosion, we do not think appellees would be responsible, for while the appellee Bridge & Railroad Company's negligence may have been the efficient cause of the presence of the gas in the street, and it should have understood enough of the consequences thereof to have foreseen that an explosion was likely to result from the inadvertent or negligent lighting of a match by some person who was ignorant of the presence of the gas or of the effect of lighting or throwing a match in it, it could not have foreseen or deemed it probable that one would maliciously or wantonly do such an act for the evil purpose of producing the explosion. Therefore, if the act of Duerr was malicious, we quite agree with the trial court that it was one which the appellees could not reasonably have anticipated or guarded against, and in such case the act of Duerr, and not the primary negligence of the appellee Bridge & Railroad Company, in any of the particulars charged, was the efficient or proximate cause of appellant's injuries. The mere fact that the concurrent cause or intervening act was unforeseen will not relieve the defendant guilty of the primary negligence from liability, but if the intervening agency is something so unexpected or extraordinary as that he could not or ought not to have anticipated it, he will not be liable, and certainly he is not bound to anticipate the criminal acts of others by which damage is inflicted and hence is not liable therefor. 29 Cyc. 501–512; Sofield v. Sommers, 9 Ben. 526, 22 Fed. Cas. 769, Cas. No. 13,157; Andrews v. Kinsel, 114 Ga. 390, 40 S. E. 300, 88 Am. St. Rep. 25. * * *

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is affirmed as to the Union Tank Line Company, but reversed as to the Bridge & Railroad Company, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with the opinion.[33]

RICKARDS v. LOTHIAN.

(Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. [1913] App. Cas. 263.)

Appeal from an order of the High Court of Australia (May 22, 1911), reversing a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria (August 7, 1910), and restoring a judgment of the County Court at Melbourne (April 29, 1910).[34]

[33] Parts of the opinion are omitted.

[34] The statement of the case is abridged, and the arguments of counsel and parts of the opinion are omitted.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

Lord Moulton. The appellants in this case are the personal representatives of Harry Rickards, who was the defendant in an action for damages brought by the respondent against him in the Melbourne County Court for damages occasioned to the stock in trade of the plaintiff, who was the tenant of the second floor of certain premises belonging to the defendant, by an overflow from a lavatory basin situated on an upper floor of the same premises. Though the sum involved is not large, the legal questions raised by the case are of considerable importance, and the litigation has been characterized by remarkable differences of judicial opinion upon them. Upon the findings of the jury, the judge at the trial directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for £156, the amount of the damages found by the jury. On appeal to the Supreme Court of Victoria that judgment was set aside and judgment entered for the defendant, in accordance with the views of a majority of that Court. This decision was reversed on appeal by the High Court of Australia in accordance with the views of a majority of that Court, and the present appeal is brought by leave from that decision of the High Court of Australia. The circumstances out of which the action arose were as follows:

The defendant was the lessee under a long building lease of a building in Melbourne used for business purposes, and the plaintiff was tenant under him of part of the second floor of such building. On the fourth floor there was a room used as a men's lavatory in which was fixed a wash-hand basin supplied with water by a screw-down tap situated immediately over it and connected by a pipe with the mains of the Metropolitan Water Supply System. The basin had the usual arrangements for getting rid of the water, namely, a vent-hole provided with a plug at the bottom of the basin and holes situated near its upper edge to act as an overflow. Through these holes the overflowing water passed down a pipe which connected with the wastepipe from the hole at the bottom of the basin, some little distance below its upper end. It was common ground that the basin and fittings above described were of ordinary construction and such as are in common use, and it was proved that on their erection they had been inspected and passed by the officials of the Metropolitan Board of Works in the regular way. The lavatory was intended for the use of the tenants of the upper floors and persons in their employment.

The defendant employed one Smith as a caretaker of the building, and part of his business was to see that the lavatory was in good working order. On August 18, 1909, he was on duty until 10:20 p. m. He gave evidence that at that hour he went to the lavatory and found it in proper order. On the plaintiff arriving on the premises the following morning he found that his stock in trade there (which consisted mainly of school-books) was seriously damaged by water, and on examination it was discovered that the water tap of the basin had been turned full on and the waste-pipe plugged so that there had been an overflow from the basin to the extent of the full supply which the tap was capable of giving, and that this overflow had flooded the rooms below. There was no direct evidence as to the length of time that the water had been running in this way, but the extent of the overflow was so great that it seems to have been accepted by all parties at the trial that it must have continued for some hours. It was for the damage thus caused to the plaintiff's stock in trade that the action was brought.

On examining the basin it was found that the waste-pipe had been plugged up with various articles, such as nails, penholders, string, and soap, and that the obstruction was situated so far down the pipe that it covered its junction with the waste-pipe from the overflow holes. It therefore blocked both waste-pipes. The manner in which the plugging was effected furnished strong evidence that it had been intentionally done; indeed, the materials had been so tightly rammed together that it was difficult to clear the pipe. For the purposes of the trial the capacity of the waste-pipes for carrying off the water which the tap was capable of supplying was tested after the pipe had been cleared. It was found that at the ordinary pressure of the system during the daytime the waste-pipes were able to carry off all the water which the tap could supply even when fully open, but that during the night the pressure rose somewhat and that at the night pressure the waste-pipes were not sufficient to take off the whole of the water which the tap could supply. The plaintiff gave no evidence to shew what fraction of the water which the tap was capable of so supplying during the night would fail to pass away by the waste-pipes if they were clear and unobstructed, but it would seem probable that the amount of the overflow in such circumstances would only be a comparatively small fraction of the water issuing out of the tap and that the major portion would pass off by the waste-pipes.

In his plaint the plaintiff claimed to recover the damage done to his stock in trade as injury caused by water through the carelessness of the defendant, his servants or agents, in the construction, maintenance, management, and control of the lavatory basin and its pipes, &c., and alternatively as injury arising from a breach by the defendant of an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment. At the trial he was permitted to add a third alternative whereby he claimed to recover such damage as injury caused by the defendant wrongfully permitting large quantities of water to escape from the said basin and to flow into the premises occupied by the plaintiff. By his defence the defendant denied the allegations of negligence, covenant, and duty, and further denied that if any such covenant existed there had been any breach of it.

At the trial evidence was called on both sides and the above facts were proved. The claim upon implied covenant was obviously unsustainable and was apparently abandoned. The substantial case sought to be made on behalf of the plaintiff was twofold—first, that Smith (for whose actions the defendant was responsible) was guilty of negligence in leaving the tap turned on and in omitting to discover that the waste-pipe was choked; and, secondly, that the defendant was guilty of negligence in not placing a lead safe with an outlet pipe on the floor of the lavatory underneath the basin. Smith was called as witness on behalf of the defendant and gave evidence that the basin was in proper condition when he left it on the evening before, and the tap turned off, and, as will presently be seen, the jury accepted his evidence. With regard to the second point, namely, whether it was necessary or usual to put a lead safe in such a lavatory, the evidence was very conflicting, the views of the various expert witnesses called for the parties differing widely.

The learned judge summed up very carefully and at considerable length, calling the attention of the jury to the whole of the evidence given. In the course of his summing up he directed them that "if this" (i. e., the plugging up) "were a deliberately mischievous act of some outsider, unless it were instigated by the defendant himself, the defendant would not be responsible. He would not be responsible for a malicious act under those circumstances, because he could not guard against malice." This direction was in substance repeated in that part of the summing up which dealt with the question of the necessity of placing a lead safe in the lavatory. Referring to the contention of the defendant that the damage was caused not by the absence of a safe but by deliberate mischief, he said: "If it was, then the defendant would not be responsible because the person who deliberately tried to flood the place could overcome the precautions. He could stop the plug of the basin, he could stop the overflow, and could very easily stop the escape from the lead floors. Nobody is expected to guard against deliberate malice or mischief."

At the end of the summing up the judge handed the following written paper to the jury:

"Questions for the jury. To be taken in reference to the evidence and the judge's direction.

"(1) Was the defendant, or any of his servants or agents guilty of negligence? (a) In not providing a reasonably sufficient escape for water in case of an overflow resulting from accident or negligence having regard to the nature of the use of the rooms beneath? (b) In leaving the tap turned on on the night of the 18th August, 1909, or in omitting to discover on that night that the waste-pipe was choked?

"(2) Was such negligence (if any) the cause of the injury to the plaintiff's goods?

"(3) Damages in any case?"

And the jury returned the following written answers:

"(1) Yes. (a) We are of opinion that a lead safe was necessary on the floor of this particular lavatory, and that same would minimize risk. (b) No. We believe the evidence of Smith (caretaker), who asserts that the lavatory was in thorough order when he ceased duties.

"(2) Yes, it was.

"(3) We assess the damage done to Lothian's property at £156.

"We are of opinion that this was the malicious act of some person."

* * * These questions were not happily framed. For example the word "negligence" in 1 (a) is used twice, and evidently refers to two different things in the two places where it occurs. In the earlier part of the question it must refer to negligence in the construction of the apparatus, but in the latter part it must refer to negligence in user. But this is not the most serious defect in these questions. There is also a fatal omission. The judge had directed the jury that if the act was malicious the defendant would not be liable unless he instigated it, which was not even suggested. Yet this issue was not put to them, nor, indeed, was any question asked bearing upon it. It is evident that this omission puzzled the jury. The course they took was, on the whole, one directed by common sense. They found a verdict upon that vital issue, although it had not been separately left to them, and they then proceeded to answer the questions specifically put to them. As their language shews, these questions related solely to the issue of negligence—the first asking as to its existence, the second as to the damage being a consequence of it, and the third as to the amount of that damage. It is difficult to understand the answer of the jury to the second question, in view of the finding that the act was malicious, because if the act was malicious the negligence in not providing the lead safe could not be legally speaking, the cause of the damage. But there can be no doubt of the meaning of the finding as to the act having been malicious, and therefore their Lordships consider that the only reasonable interpretation to be put upon the answer to the second question is that the jury thought that the negligence in omitting to provide a lead safe was physically the cause of the damage in the sense that the provision of a lead safe would have prevented the damage if the overflow had been due to negligence or accident.

Their Lordships are of opinion that there was abundant evidence to support the finding of the jury that the plugging of the pipes was the malicious act of some person and indeed it is difficult to see how upon the evidence any other conclusion could reasonably have been arrived at. The answers to the question 1 (a) and (b) were also answers which the jury were competent to give upon the evidence, and no objection can be taken to them. * * * They found that it was negligent to omit to provide a lead safe on the floor of this particular lavatory. Their Lordships are satisfied that a finding so express and so carefully limited cannot be impugned.

It is clear that on these findings the plaintiff did not make good his claim as a claim in an ordinary action of negligence. To sustain such a cause of action it must be shewn that the negligence is the proximate cause of the damage. The proximate cause of the damage here was the malicious act of a third person. The only negligence which the jury found in this case was the omission to provide against accident by placing a lead safe under the lavatory. Such automatic devices are security against accident or negligent user, but they are inoperative against intentional and mischievous acts. The person who did the malicious act in this case was obliged to do three distinct things to secure the success of his plan, namely, to open the screw tap to its utmost limit, to block the waste-pipe from the bottom of the basin, and to block the waste-pipe from the overflow holes. It cannot be doubted that the presence of a lead safe would have formed no obstacle to his plan, because the outlet from that safe could have been blocked up as easily as the two waste-pipes. The arguments on behalf of the plaintiff in the Courts of Appeal were therefore mainly directed to bringing the case under one of two other well-known types of action, namely:

(1) It was contended that the defendant ought to have foreseen the probability of such a malicious act and to have taken precautions against it, and that he was liable in damages for not having done so.

(2) It was contended that the defendant was liable apart from negligence on the principles which are usually associated with the well-known case of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Ex. 265, and L. R. 3 H. L. 330.

In the argument on the first of these points, Lynch v. Nurdin (1841) 1 Q. B. 29, Cooke v. Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland, [1909] A. C. 229, and other decisions of the same type were relied upon. There is, however, a short and conclusive answer to this contention. To make good such a cause of action the plaintiff must shew that the defendant ought to have reasonably anticipated the likelihood of a deliberate choking of the pipe so that it became his duty to take precautions to prevent such an act causing damage to others. This is an issue of fact in which the burden is upon the plaintiff, and he has obtained no finding from the jury in support of it. It is perhaps irrelevant to consider who is responsible for this omission, because it is for the plaintiff to see that the questions necessary to enable him to support his case are asked of the jury. But in this case the defendant specifically requested the judge to put the question whether the defendant ought reasonably to have anticipated the deliberate choking of the pipe, and the plaintiff's counsel did not support the request, but accepted the questions framed by the judge. The absence of this finding is fatal to this part of the plaintiff's case, and it is not necessary, therefore, to inquire into it further. But it must be pointed out that there was no evidence which could have supported such a finding, and moreover, that the only duty incumbent upon the defendant in such a case would have been to take reasonable precautions to prevent such an act causing damage, and throughout the whole of the case there was no suggestion of any precaution which would have had that effect; nor was there any finding by the jury that the defendant had in this respect omitted to do anything which he should have done. The only omission found against him was of something wholly irrelevant from this point of view. It is impossible, therefore, to support the plaintiff's claim so far as it is based upon the legal principles illustrated by the above class of cases. * * *[35]

On the above grounds their Lordships are of opinion that the direction of the learned judge at the trial to the effect that "if the plugging up were a deliberately mischievous act by some outsider unless it were instigated by the defendant himself, the defendant would not be responsible," was correct in law, and that upon the finding of the jury that the plugging up was the malicious act of some person the judge ought to have directed the judgment to be entered for the defendant.

The appeal must therefore be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant in the action with costs in all the Courts, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of this appeal and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

SECTION 4.—CO-OPERATIVE AGENCIES AND LEGAL CAUSE

COREY v. HAVENER.

SAME v. ADAMS.

Corey brought two actions of tort against different defendants for injuries to the plaintiff caused by the alleged negligence of both defendants, each operating a separate gasoline motor tricycle at an illegal and dangerous rate of speed and thus causing the horse which plaintiff was driving to take fright, so that plaintiff lost control of the horse and was injured in consequence.

At the time of the accident causing the injuries complained of, the plaintiff was driving slowly along a public street in Worcester. The defendants came up from behind, on motor tricycles, which emitted smoke and made a loud noise, frightening the plaintiff's horse. The defendants passed at a high rate of speed, one on each side of the plaintiff's wagon.

The two cases were tried together. On cross-examination the plaintiff and each of his witnesses were asked if he could tell which defendant or which motor cycle caused the plaintiff's horse to take fright, and each witness was unable to tell.

[35] Lord Moulton here reviewed the facts and the decision of Fletcher v. Rylands (1866) L. R. 1 Ex. 265, and (1868) L. R. 3 H. L. 330, and held that its principle did not apply in the present case. For this part of the judgment see ante, p. 795.

The defendants requested the judge to instruct the jury that the evidence showing that they were on two separate vehicles entirely independent of each other, and there being two different suits for the same injury, the burden was on the plaintiff to show which one, if either, was to blame; and that if it was not clearly shown which one of the defendants caused the accident, the plaintiff could not recover. This instruction the judge refused to give.

The jury found for the plaintiff in each case, and in each assessed the damages at $700. The defendants alleged exceptions.

LATHROP, J. * * * The verdict of the jury has established the fact that both of the defendants were wrongdoers. It makes no difference that there was no concert between them, or that it is impossible to determine what portion of the injury was caused by each. If each contributed to the injury, that is enough to bind both. Whether each contributed was a question for the jury. Railroad Co. v. Shanly, 107 Mass. 568, 578, and cases cited.

It makes no difference that the defendants were sued severally, and not jointly. If two or more wrongdoers contribute to the injury, they may be sued either jointly or severally. McAvoy v. Wright, 137 Mass. 207. The first request for instructions was, therefore, rightly refused.

Nor was there any error in refusing to give the second request. If both defendants contributed to the accident, the jury could not single out one as the person to blame. There being two actions, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against each for the full amount. There is no injustice in this, for a satisfaction of one judgment is all that the plaintiff is entitled to. Elliott v. Hayden, 104 Mass. 180; Savage v. Stevens, 128 Mass. 254; Luce v. Dexter, 135 Mass. 23, 26; McAvoy v. Wright, 137 Mass. 207; Galvin v. Parker, 154 Mass. 346, 28 N. E. 244; Worcester Co. v. Ashworth, 160 Mass. 186, 189, 35 N. E. 773.

SALISBURY et al. v. HERCHENRODER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1871. 106 Mass. 458, 8 Am. Rep. 354.)

Tort for injuries to a building owned and occupied by the plaintiffs on the north side of Avon Street in Boston. The parties stated the following case for the judgment of the superior court:

The defendant was lessee and occupant of an adjoining building on the same street, and suspended what was called a banner-sign, bearing his name upon the banner, across the street, upon a wire rope, one end of which was fastened by an iron bolt to his building, and the other end in like manner to a building on the south side of the street. The sign was made of net-work for the purpose of diminishing its resistance of the wind, and due care was used in its construction and fastening. The lowest part of it was at least twenty feet above the pavement of the street; and it did not interfere with the ordinary enjoyment of the neighboring estates; but it was hung there in violation of an ordinance of the city of Boston, which rendered the defendant liable to a penalty for each day during which it remained suspended. On September 8, 1869, in what was commonly known as the "great gale" of that year, which was a gale of extraordinary violence, the wind blew the sign away, and the movement of the sign, which remained attached to the rope, jerked the iron bolt out of the building on the south side of the street, and hurled it across the street and through the glass of a window in the plaintiffs' building, thus doing the injuries for which they sought to recover. The plaintiffs' window was properly constructed, and they were in no way chargeable with negligence.

CHAPMAN, C. J. If the defendant's sign had been rightfully placed where it was, the question would have been presented whether he had used reasonable care in securing it. If he had done so, the injury would have been caused, without his fault, by the extraordinary and unusual gale of wind which hurled it across the street and against the plaintiffs' window. The party injured has no remedy for an injury of this character, because it is produced by the vis major. For example, a chimney or roof, properly constructed and secured with reasonable care, may be blown off by an extraordinary gale, and injure a neighboring building; but this is no ground of action.

But the defendant's sign was suspended over the street in violation of a public ordinance of the city of Boston, by which he was subject to a penalty. Laws & Ordinances of Boston (ed. 1863), 712. He placed and kept it there illegally, and this illegal act of his has contributed to the plaintiffs' injury. The gale would not of itself have caused the injury, if the defendant had not wrongfully placed this substance in its way.

It is contended that the act of the defendant was a remote, and not a proximate cause of the injury. But it cannot be regarded as less proximate than if the defendant had placed the sign there while the gale was blowing; for he kept it there till it was blown away. In this respect it is like the case of Dickinson v. Boyle, 17 Pick. 78, 28 Am. Dec. 281. The defendant had wrongfully placed a dam across a stream on the plaintiff's land, and allowed it to remain there; and a freshet came and swept it away; and the defendant was held liable for the consequential damage. It is also, in this respect, like the placing of a spout, by means of which the rain that subsequently falls is carried upon the plaintiff's land. The act of placing the spout does not alone cause the injury. The action of the water must intervene, and this may be a considerable time afterwards. Yet the placing of the spout is regarded as the proximate cause. So the force of gravitation brings down a heavy substance, yet a person who carelessly places a heavy substance where this force will bring it upon another's head does the act which proximately causes the injury produced by it. The fact that a natural cause contributes to produce an injury, which could not have happened without the unlawful act of the defendant, does not make the act so remote as to excuse him. The case of Dickinson v. Boyle rests upon this principle. See, also, Woodward v. Aborn, 35 Me. 271, 58 Am. Dec. 699, where the defendant wrongfully placed a deleterious substance near the plaintiffs' well, and an extraordinary freshet caused it to spoil the water; also Barnard v. Poor, 21 Pick. 378, where the plaintiffs' property was consumed by a fire carelessly set by the defendant on an adjoining lot; also Pittsburgh City v. Grier, 22 Pa. 54, 60 Am. Dec. 65; Scott v. Hunter, 46 Pa. 192, 84 Am. Dec. 542; Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 423, 95 Am. Dec. 115.

Judgment for the plaintiffs affirmed.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1830. 6 Bing. 716, 130 Reprint, 1456, 31 R. R. 524.)

The plaintiff delivered to the defendant on board his barge 114 tons of lime to be conveyed from the Medway to London. The master of the barge deviated unnecessarily from the usual course. Afterwards, and while the barge was thus out of her course, a tempest wetted the lime, and the barge took fire in consequence. The master was compelled, for the preservation of himself and the crew, to run the barge ashore, where both the lime and the vessel were utterly destroyed.

In an action to recover the value of the lime, there was a verdict for the plaintiff.

Taddy, Serjt., obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, or to arrest the judgment, on the ground, first, that the deviation by the master of the barge was not a cause of the loss of the lime sufficiently proximate to entitle the plaintiff to recover, inasmuch as the loss might have been occasioned by the same tempest if the barge had proceeded in her direct course; and secondly, that the declaration contained no allegation of any undertaking on the part of the defendant to carry the lime directly to London; an allegation which, it was contended, on the authority of Max v. Roberts, 12 East, 89, was essential to the plaintiff's recovery.*

TINDAL, C. J. There are two points for the determination of the Court upon this rule; first, whether the damage sustained by the plaintiff was so proximate to the wrongful act of the defendant as to form the subject of an action; and, secondly whether the declaration is sufficient to support the judgment of the Court for the plaintiff.

As to the first point, it appeared upon the evidence that the master of the defendant's barge had deviated from the usual and customary course of the voyage mentioned in the declaration without any justifiable cause; and that afterwards, and whilst such barge was out of her course, in consequence of stormy and tempestuous weather, the sea communicated with the lime, which thereby became heated, and the barge caught fire, and the master was compelled for the preservation of himself and the crew to run the barge on shore, where both the lime and the barge were entirely lost.

Now the first objection on the part of the defendant is not rested, as indeed it could not be rested, on the particular circumstances which accompanied the destruction of the barge; for it is obvious, that the legal consequences must be the same, whether the loss was immediately, by the sinking of the barge at once by a heavy sea, when she was out of her direct and usual course, or whether it happened at the same place, not in consequence of an immediate death's wound, but by a connected chain of causes producing the same ultimate event. It is only a variation in the precise mode by which the vessel was destroyed, which variation will necessarily occur in each individual case.

But the objection taken is, that there is no natural or necessary connection between the wrong of the master in taking the barge out of its proper course, and the loss itself; for that the same loss might have been occasioned by the very same tempest, if the barge had proceeded in her direct course.

But if this argument were to prevail, the deviation of the master, which is undoubtedly a ground of action against the owner, would never, or only under very peculiar circumstances, entitle the plaintiff to recover. For if a ship is captured in the course of deviation, no one can be certain that she might not have been captured if in her proper course. And yet, in Parker v. James, 4 Camp. 112, where the ship was captured whilst in the act of deviation, no such ground of defence was even suggested. Or, again, if the ship strikes against a rock, or perishes by storm in the one course, no one can predicate that she might not equally have struck upon another rock, or met with the same or another storm, if pursuing her right and ordinary voyage.

The same answer might be attempted to an action against a defendant who had, by mistake, forwarded a parcel by the wrong conveyance, and a loss had thereby ensued; and yet the defendant in that case would undoubtedly be liable.

But we think the real answer to the objection is, that no wrongdoer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong; and that as a loss has actually happened whilst his wrongful act was in operation and force, and which is attributable to his wrongful act, he cannot set up as an answer to the action the bare possibility of a loss, if his wrongful act had never been done. It might admit of a different construction if he could shew, not only that the same loss might have happened, but that it must have happened if the act complained of had not been done; but there is no evidence to that extent in the present case.

Rule discharged.

WALD v. PITTSBURGH, C., C. & ST. L. R. CO.

This was an action by Wald against the railway company to recover the value of the plaintiff's trunk and its contents, constituting his personal baggage, which had been lost in the great Johnstown flood in 1889, while in the possession of the defendant as a common carrier. The facts were as follows:

On May 30, 1889, the plaintiff bought a ticket at Cincinnati for passage by the so-called "Limited Express Train" over defendant's road to New York City. The limited express was a fast train, arriving in New York City two hours sooner than the regular day express. The tickets for this limited train consisted of two printed slips,—one, the railroad ticket, being green; the other, the special limited sleeping-car ticket, being purple. No passenger could travel by the limited without having both of these tickets. It was necessary to present these tickets at Cincinnati to some agent of the railroad company, in order to have a trunk checked to New York. Plaintiff did so present his tickets, and had his trunk checked at Cincinnati for New York. From Cincinnati to Pittsburgh passengers and their baggage for both the limited and day express traveled on the same train. This was the case with plaintiff and his baggage. Both left Cincinnati at the same time. At Pittsburgh the Cincinnati sleeper, carrying passengers for the limited train, was attached to the regular limited express, which had come from Chicago, and the Cincinnati baggage for the limited train was transferred at Pittsburgh from the baggage car of the Cincinnati express to the baggage car of the limited train. In order to have baggage intended for the limited express so transferred at Pittsburgh, it was the practice of the railroad company to attach to each trunk at Cincinnati a white pasteboard tag in addition to the regular brass check, and, unless such a white tag had been so attached, a trunk remained on the baggage car from Cincinnati, and went through by the day express from Pittsburgh to New York. In the present case no such white tag had been attached to plaintiff's trunk at Cincinnati, and as a result, while plaintiff's car was transferred at Pittsburgh to the limited express, his trunk remained on the day express, which followed along some time after the limited. This day express, carrying plaintiff's baggage, was overtaken by the flood at Johnstown, Pa., and the baggage car, with the entire contents, including plaintiff's trunk, was lost. The limited express on which plaintiff traveled passed beyond the point of danger before the flood came, and was uninjured. There was some conflict in the testimony as to whether or not it was defendant's fault that the white tag was not placed on plaintiff's trunk at Cincinnati. It is agreed "that there was no negligence in the management of the train, or in the care of the baggage while on the train."

On the trial of the case before a jury, at the close of all the evidence the court instructed the jury, as requested by defendant, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and that a verdict should be returned for defendant. On the verdict so returned judgment was entered, and this judgment was affirmed by the appellate court. The case is brought to this court under a certificate of importance.[37]

MAGRUDER, C. J. (after stating the facts). Appellee's contention is that the flood by reason of which appellant's baggage was lost was an act of God, and that it is not liable for such loss under the well-established rule that "a common carrier, liable as an insurer for the property intrusted to him for the purpose of transportation, is, nevertheless, excused from responsibility for losses which are caused by an act of God." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 592. It is appellant's contention that the railroad company should, by placing a white tag on his trunk at Cincinnati, or by some other means, have provided that it should travel with him by the same train throughout the journey; that it did not do so; that, as a result of its negligence in so failing properly to check his trunk, it was separated from him during the journey, and was lost; and that, even if this flood was an act of God, yet the appellee's negligence in failing properly to check the trunk concurred with the act of God, and thereby made appellee liable for the resulting loss or damage.

1. The Johnstown flood, as it is called, by reason of which appellant's baggage was lost, was an act of God. In Long v. Railroad Co., 147 Pa. 343, 23 Atl. 459, 14 L. R. A. 741, 30 Am. St. Rep. 732, which was an action brought to recover the value of two trunks and their contents delivered to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in Cincinnati for transportation to Washington, and where it appears that the trunks lost were contained in the baggage car of the day express which was destroyed by the Johnstown flood, so called, on May 31, 1889, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held, upon substantially the same evidence which is found in the record in the case at bar, that said flood was "an inevitable accident, properly described as actus Dei." In the Long Case, however, there was no question as to whether or not the goods lost were upon the right train; that is to say, the point was not there made that the personal baggage of the passenger had been shipped upon a different train from that on which the passenger took passage.

2. There is some conflict among the authorities as to the liability of a common carrier where the loss of goods in its or his possession is due, not solely and only to an act of God, but to an act of God combined with the negligence of the carrier. Many cases hold—and such seems to be the tendency of the decisions in this state—that a common carrier is not exempt from liability for a loss which takes place because of an act of God, if such carrier has been guilty of any previous negligence or misconduct which brings the property in contact with the destructive force of the actus Dei, or unnecessarily exposes it thereto. A loss or injury is due to the act of God when it is occasioned exclusively by natural causes, such as could not be prevented by human care, skill, and foresight; and where property committed to a common carrier is brought by the negligence of the carrier under the operation of natural causes that work its destruction, or is, by the negligence of the carrier, exposed to such cause of loss, the carrier is responsible. "It is universally agreed that, if the damage is caused by the concurring force of the defendant's negligence and some other cause for which he is not responsible, including the act of God, * * * the defendant is nevertheless responsible if his negligence is one of the proximate causes of the damage." 1 Shear. & R. Neg. (4th Ed.) § 39. The doctrine is thus clearly stated by the supreme court of Missouri in Wolf v. Express Co., 43 Mo. 421, 97 Am. Dec. 406: "The act of God which excuses the carrier must not only be the proximate cause of the loss, but the better opinion is that it must be the sole cause. And where the loss is caused by the act of God, if the negligence of the carrier mingles with it as an active and cooperative cause, he is still responsible."

In line with this principle, many authorities hold that, where the unnecessary delay of the carrier subjects the goods in his possession to a loss by an act of God which they would not otherwise have met with, the delay is of itself such negligence as will make him liable for the loss. Railroad Co. v. Curtis, 80 Ill. 324; Michaels v. Railroad Co., 30 N. Y. 564, 86 Am. Dec. 415; Read v. Spaulding, 30 N. Y. 630, 86 Am. Dec. 426; McGraw v. Railroad Co., 18 W. Va. 361, 41 Am. Rep. 696; Deming v. Railroad Co., 48 N. H. 455, 2 Am. Rep. 267; Read v. Railroad Co., 60 Mo. 199; Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716; Williams v. Grant, 1 Conn. 487, 7 Am. Dec. 235; Crosby v. Fitch, 12 Conn. 410, 31 Am. Dec. 745; Rodgers v. Railroad Co., 67 Cal. 607, 8 Pac. 377; Salisbury v. Herchenroder, 106 Mass. 458, 8 Am. Rep. 354; Higgins v. Dewey, 107 Mass. 494, 9 Am. Rep. 63; Railroad Co. v. Anderson, 94 Pa. 360, 39 Am. Rep. 787; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Sulphur Springs Independent School Dist., 96 Pa. 65, 42 Am. Rep. 529. We are inclined to think that this is the correct doctrine. There are cases which hold to the contrary, among which are the leading cases of Denny v. Railroad Co., 13 Gray (Mass.) 481, 74 Am. Dec. 645 and Morrison v. Davis, 20 Pa. 171, 57 Am. Dec. 695, upon the ground that such delay, whether justifiable or not, should not be regarded as the proximate, but only as the remote, cause of the loss. It will be found, however, upon examination, that most of these cases are cases where mere delay, without other negligence, brings the property lost within the operation of the natural cause defined to be an act of God. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 596.

In the case at bar, when the appellant bought his tickets for a passage upon the limited express train, and applied to have his baggage checked, there was an implied undertaking on the part of appellee that his baggage should go on the same train on which he took passage; and appellee was bound to send his baggage on the same train on which he went, unless the appellant gave some direction, or did something, or omitted to do something, which authorized appellee to send his baggage by some other train. "The implied undertaking of the passenger carrier as to transporting baggage is that passenger and baggage shall go together, since all baggage is taken with reference to the wants of a particular journey. * * * Nor ought the carrier, without permission, to send the baggage by later trains or a different route, unless in a strong case of necessity. We need hardly add that if, through the carrier's own action, passenger and baggage become separated, the carrier bears the risk." Schouler, Bailm. & Car. (2d Ed.) § 675; Wilson v. Railroad Co., 56 Me. 60, 96 Am. Dec. 435; Fairfax v. Railroad Co., 73 N. Y. 167, 29 Am. Rep. 119; Railroad Co. v. Tapp, 6 Ind. App. 304, 33 N. E. 462.

It was a question of fact in this case whether or not appellee was guilty of a violation of its implied undertaking or contract to send the baggage on the same train with appellant; in other words, whether or not appellee was guilty of negligence in not taking proper steps to have the baggage carried by the train on which appellant traveled, and to have it so carried throughout the whole length of the journey; or whether the failure to have the baggage transferred to the baggage car of the limited express train at Pittsburg was in any way the fault of the appellant. We think that the court erred in not submitting this question of fact to the jury, and in directing a verdict for the defendant without permitting the jury to pass upon such question. If appellant's trunk had been transferred at Pittsburg to the baggage car attached to the limited express train from Chicago, as was done with the sleeping car in which appellant was traveling, the trunk would have passed through the place of danger before the flood occurred, and would not have been destroyed or lost by reason of the flood. If the appellee was guilty of negligence in failing to put the trunk upon the right train,—upon the train where its implied contract with appellant required it to put the trunk,—it was guilty of negligence which brought the trunk in direct contact with the force known as an act of God. "If the superior force would have produced the same damage whether the defendant had been negligent or not, his negligence is not deemed the cause of the injury." Shear. & R. Neg. (4th Ed.) § 39. But here it cannot be said that the flood would have caused the loss if the trunk had been transferred to the limited express train at Pittsburg.

It is said, however, that the contract of transportation was made at Cincinnati, Ohio; that such a contract, and the liabilities of the parties under it, are governed by the law of the place where the contract is made; that the contract to transport appellant's trunk, having been made in Ohio, must be governed by the law of Ohio; that, by the law of that state, loss of goods in the possession of a common carrier, occurring by reason of an act of God, even though such loss would not have been met with but for unnecessary delay on the part of the carrier, relieves the carrier of liability for the loss; and that the case of Daniels v. Ballantine, 23 Ohio St. 532, 13 Am. Rep. 264, which was introduced in evidence, shows what the law of Ohio is upon this subject. If the doctrine of lex loci contractus is applicable to this case, and if the case referred to is the law of Ohio, we do not think that the contention set up can be maintained, because the doctrine of the Daniels Case is not applicable here. In that case the action was brought to recover the value of a barge, which defendant contracted to tow by means of a steam tug from Bay City, Mich., to Buffalo, N. Y., and which was lost in a storm on Lake Erie. It appears that after the voyage was begun the defendants delayed on the route three days, and then began the voyage again, and while on such delayed voyage the barge and tug were overtaken by the storm and lost. The court expressly states that the defendants in that case were not common carriers, and that, although they had such control of the barge as was necessary to enable them to move it, yet the plaintiffs had possession of it, "and for most purposes it remained in their custody and care."

The case, however, presents an instance of mere delay without other negligence. If, in the case at bar, the trunk had been placed upon the right train, and that train had been delayed on the way, and by reason of such delay had come in contact with the flood, then, perhaps, there would be a resemblance between this case and the Ohio case. But here the delay did not result simply from a halting or stopping in the movement of a train which was carrying the trunk in pursuance of the contract of carriage, but it resulted from negligence in failing to keep an implied contract to carry the trunk upon a particular train, and in violating that contract by carrying the trunk upon a different train from the one agreed upon; that is, upon the assumption that the facts would show no excuse for not keeping the contract. It is like a deviation from the usual course by the master of a vessel, during which a cargo is injured by a storm at sea. In such case the deviation is regarded as a sufficiently proximate cause of the loss to entitle the freighter to recover, as it brings the vessel in contact with the storm, in itself the act of God. Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716. Here was a deviation from the contract by the use of one agency of transportation not agreed upon, instead of the use of another agency of transportation which was agreed upon, thereby bringing the property in transit in contact with the flood, in itself the act of God. In Davis v. Garrett, supra, it was urged that there was no natural or necessary connection between the wrong of the master in taking the barge out of its proper course and the loss itself, "for that the same loss might have been occasioned by the very same transit if the barge had proceeded in her direct course"; but the court held the objection untenable, and Tindall, C. J., there said: "The same answer might be attempted to an action against a defendant who had by mistake forwarded a parcel by the wrong conveyance, and a loss had thereby ensued; and yet the defendant in that case would undoubtedly be liable."

The language last quoted is precisely applicable to the case at bar, which is not a case of delay in the transportation of goods being carried by the right conveyance, as in Daniels v. Ballantine, supra, but a case of neglect in forwarding a trunk by the wrong conveyance, to wit, by the day express, instead of the limited express. Of course, in all that is here said it is not intended to express any opinion as to whether the failure to ship the trunk by the right train at Pittsburg was or was not the fault of the appellee, in view of the conflict in the testimony as to the circumstances attending the checking and shipment of the trunk.

But, if there was nothing in such circumstances which excused appellee from its implied obligation to ship the trunk from Pittsburg upon the train carrying appellant eastward from that point, then we think that the property was unnecessarily exposed to the destructive power of the flood in question through the previous negligence or misconduct of appellee, and consequently that appellee is not excused. Williams v. Grant, 1 Conn. 487, 7 Am. Dec. 235. Hence the case should have been allowed to go to the jury under the instructions asked by appellant upon this question.

For the reason thus indicated, the judgments of the appellate court and of the superior court of Cook county are reversed, and the cause is remanded to said superior court for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed. Reversed and remanded.

FOTTLER v. MOSELEY.

Fottler brought this action in tort for deceit, alleging that, in reliance upon certain false representations by the defendant, a broker, as to the stock of the Franklin Park Land Improvement Company, the plaintiff had revoked an order for the sale of his shares in that company, by the defendant, whereby, through a subsequent diminution in the selling price of this stock, the plaintiff had suffered loss. There was a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

KNOWLTON, C. J. The parties and the court seem to have assumed that the evidence was such as to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff, under the law stated at the previous decision of this case, reported in 179 Mass. 295, 60 N. E. 788, if the diminution in the selling price of the stock came from common causes. The defendant's contention is that the embezzlement of an officer of a corporation, being an unlawful act of a third person, should be treated as a new and independent cause of the loss, not contemplated by the defendant, for which he is not liable. To create a liability, it is never necessary that a wrongdoer should contemplate the particulars of the injury from his wrongful act, nor the precise way in which the damages will be inflicted. He need not expect even that damage will result at all, if he does that which is unlawful, and which involves a risk of injury. An embezzler is criminally liable, notwithstanding that he expects to return the money appropriated after having used it. If the defendant fraudulently induced the plaintiff to refrain from selling his stock when he was about to sell it, he did him a wrong; and a natural consequence of the wrong, for which he was liable, was the possibility of loss from diminution in the value of the stock from any one of numerous causes. Most, if not all, of the causes which would be likely to affect the value of the stock, would be acts of third persons, or at least conditions for which neither the plaintiff nor the defendant would be primarily responsible. Acts of the officers, honest or dishonest, in the management of the corporation, would be among the most common causes of a change in value. The defendant, if he fraudulently induced the plaintiff to keep his stock, took the risk of all such changes. The loss to the plaintiff from the fraud is as direct and proximate, if he was induced to hold his stock until an embezzlement was discovered, as if the value had been diminished by a fire which destroyed a large part of the property of the corporation, or by the unexpected bankruptcy of a debtor who owed the corporation a large sum. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant would be presumed to have contemplated all the particulars of the risk of diminution in value for which the defendant made himself liable by his fraudulent representations. It would be unjust to the plaintiff in such a case, and impracticable, to enter upon an inquiry as to the cause of the fall in value, if the plaintiff suffered from the fall wholly by reason of the defendant's fraud. The risk of a fall, from whatever cause, is presumed to have been contemplated by the defendant when he falsely and fraudulently induced the plaintiff to retain his stock.

We do not intimate that these circumstances, as well as others, may not properly be considered in determining whether the plaintiff was acting under the inducement of the fraudulent representations in continuing to hold the stock up to the time of the discovery of the embezzlement. The false representations may or may not have ceased to operate as an inducement as to the disposition of his stock before that time. Of course, there can be no recovery except for the direct results of the fraud. But if the case is so far established that the plaintiff, immediately upon the discovery of the embezzlement, was entitled to recover on the ground that he was then holding the stock in reliance upon the fraudulent statements, and if the great diminution in value came while he was so holding it, the fact that this diminution was brought about by the embezzlement of an officer leaves the plaintiff's right no less than if it had come from an ordinary loss.

Exceptions sustained.

GREEN-WHEELER SHOE CO. v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1906. 130 Iowa, 123, 106 N. W. 498, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 882, 8 Ann. Cas. 45.)

This action was brought against the railway company to recover the value of two parcels of goods delivered by plaintiff to defendant at Ft. Dodge, Iowa, one parcel to go to Booneville, Mo., and the other to Chanute, Kan., one of which it is alleged was lost and the other damaged by defendant's negligence. The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts and judgment was rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

McCLAIN, C. J. In the agreed statement on which the case was tried without other evidence being introduced it is stipulated that the defendant was guilty of negligent delay in the forwarding of the goods of plaintiff from Ft. Dodge to Kansas City, where they were lost or injured on May 30, 1903, by a flood which was so unusual and extraordinary as to constitute an act of God, and that if there had been no such negligent delay the goods would not have been caught in the flood referred to or damaged thereby.

We have presented for our consideration, therefore, the simple question whether a carrier who by a negligent delay in transporting goods has subjected them, in the course of transportation, to a peril which has caused their damage or destruction, and for the consequence of which the carrier would not have been liable had there been no negligent delay intervening, is liable for the loss. On this question there is a well-recognized conflict in the authorities. In several well-considered cases decided by courts of high authority it was decided, while the question was still new, that the negligent delay of the carrier in transportation could not be regarded as the proximate cause of an ultimate loss by a casualty which in itself constituted an act of God, as that term is used in defining the carrier's exemption from liability, although had the goods been transported with reasonable diligence they would not have been subjected to such casualty, and these cases are very similar to the one before us inasmuch as the loss in each instance was due to the goods being overtaken by an unprecedented flood for the consequence of which the carrier would not be responsible. Morrison v. Davis, 20 Pa. 171, 57 Am. Dec. 695; Denny v. New York Cent. R. Co., 13 Gray (Mass.) 481, 74 Am. Dec. 645; Railroad Co. v. Reeves, 10 Wall. 176, 19 L. Ed. 909; Daniels v. Ballantine, 23 Ohio St. 532, 13 Am. Rep. 264; Hunt v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 74 S. W. 69; Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co., 5 Mackey (D. C.) 356. These cases are predicated upon the view that if the carrier could not reasonably have foreseen or anticipated that the goods would be overtaken by such a casualty as a natural and probable result of the delay, then the negligent delay was not the proximate cause of the loss, and should be disregarded in determining the liability for such loss. A similar course of reasoning has been applied in other cases, where the loss has been due immediately to some cause such as accidental fire involving no negligence on the part of the carrier and within a valid exception in the bill of lading, but the goods have been brought within the peril stipulated against by negligent delay in transportation. Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co., 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 106; Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Millsaps, 76 Miss. 855, 25 South. 672, 71 Am. St. Rep. 543; General Fire Extinguisher Co. v. Carolina & N. W. R. Co., 137 N. C. 278, 47 S. E. 208. For similar reasons it has been held that loss of or injury to the goods by reason of their inherent nature, as by freezing or the like, will not render the carrier liable, even after negligent delay in transportation, if such casualty could not have been foreseen or anticipated as the natural and probable consequence of such delay. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Burrows, 33 Mich. 6; Herring v. Chesapeake & W. R. Co., 101 Va. 778, 45 S. E. 322.

On the other hand, it was held by the Court of Appeals of New York in a case arising out of the same flood which caused the destruction of the goods involved in Denny v. New York Cent. R. Co., 13 Gray (Mass.) 481, 74 Am. Dec. 645, supra, that the preceding negligent delay on the part of the carrier, in consequence of which the goods were overtaken by the flood, was sufficient ground for holding the carrier to be liable for the loss. Michaels v. New York Cent. R. Co., 30 N. Y. 564, 86 Am. Dec. 415; Read v. Spaulding, 30 N. Y. 630, 86 Am. Dec. 426. And the same court has adhered to this view in case of a loss by fire covered by valid exception in the bill of lading. Condict v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 54 N. Y. 500. The Illinois Supreme Court has consistently followed the rule of the New York cases in holding that negligent delay subjecting the goods to loss by the Johnstown flood rendered the carrier liable (Wald v. Pittsburg, C., C. & St. L. R. Co., 162 Ill. 545, 44 N. E. 888, 35 L. R. A. 356, 53 Am. St. Rep. 332) and likewise that similar delay rendered the carrier liable for damage to the goods by freezing. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Curtis, 80 Ill. 324. The Alabama and Kentucky courts have held that a destruction by fire within a valid exception in the bill of lading would not excuse the carrier if by negligent delay in transportation the goods had been subjected to such casualty. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gidley, 119 Ala. 523, 24 South. 753; Hernsheim v. Newport News & M. V. Co., 35 S. W. 1115, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 227. In Missouri the Supreme Court has followed or approved of what may be designated as the New York rule, under a variety of circumstances. Davis v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co., 89 Mo. 340, 1 S. W. 327; Pruitt v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 62 Mo. 527; Read v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co., 60 Mo. 199. And the St. Louis Court of Appeals in that state has applied the same rule in case of a loss by freezing. Armentrout v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co., 1 Mo. App. 158. But the Kansas City Court of Appeals in a case of loss by flood has followed the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania cases. Moffatt Com. Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., 113 Mo. App. 544, 88 S. W. 117. And the St. Louis Court of Appeals seems to have recently recognized the same rule. Grier v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal R. Co., 108 Mo. App. 565, 84 S. W. 158. In West Virginia the Supreme Court has held that negligent delay renders the carrier liable for a subsequent loss by freezing. McGraw v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 18 W. Va. 361, 41 Am. Rep. 696. In Minnesota the court has recently reviewed the whole question in a case involving the loss of goods by the same flood which caused the loss for which the present suit is brought and has reached the conclusion that the previous negligent delay of the carrier which caused the goods to be subjected to the peril of the flood "concurred and mingled with the act of God" to such an extent that the carrier was precluded from relying upon the act of God as a defense. Bibb Broom Corn Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 94 Minn. 269, 102 N. W. 709, 69 L. R. A. 509, 110 Am. St. Rep. 361, 3 Ann. Cas. 450.

The irreconcilable conflict in the authorities is recognized by text-writers, and while the weight of general authority has in many cases been said to support the rule announced in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania cases (1 Thompson, Negligence, § 74; Schouler, Bailments [Ed. 1905] § 348; Hale, Bailments and Carriers, 361; 6 Cyc. 382; notes in 36 Am. St. Rep. 838), other authorities prefer the New York rule (Hutchinson, Carriers [2d Ed.] § 200; Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, 177). In the absence of any express declaration of this court on the very point, and in view of the fact that in most recent cases the conflict of authority is still recognized (see 5 Cur. Law, 517) it seems necessary that the reasons on which the two lines of cases are supported shall be considered in order that we may now reach a conclusion which shall be satisfactory to us. Mere negligence will not render one person liable to another for a loss which the latter would not have sustained had there been no such negligence, unless the negligence consists in some violation of a duty which the one person owes to the other. Dubuque Wood & Coal Ass'n v. City and County of Dubuque, 30 Iowa, 176; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Commercial Ins. Co., 139 U. S. 223, 11 Sup. Ct. 554, 35 L. Ed. 154. And, on the other hand, it is well settled that if the negligence of one person with reference to the duty owed to another concurs with an accidental cause resulting in injury to another to whom such duty is owed the negligent person must answer for the consequences as though his negligence were the sole cause of the loss. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Commercial Guano Co., 103 Ga. 590, 30 S. E. 555; Thomas v. Lancaster Mills, 71 Fed. 481, 19 C. C. A. 88; New Brunswick Steamboat Co. v. Tieres, 24 N. J. Law, 697, 64 Am. Dec. 394; Tierney v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 76 N. Y. 305; Williams v. Grant, 1 Conn. 487, 7 Am. Dec. 235; 1 Thompson, Negligence, §§ 68, 73.

The real difficulty seems to be in determining to what extent, if at all, it is necessary that the negligent party must have been able to foresee and anticipate the result of his negligent act in order to render him liable for the consequences thereof resulting from a concurrence of his negligence and another cause for which he is not responsible. In an action on contract the party who is at fault is only liable for such consequences as arise according to the usual course of things from his breach, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time the contract was made as the probable result of the breach. Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341; Sedgwick, Elements of Damage, 17. But in an action for tort, and the present action is of that character, recovery is not limited to the consequences within the contemplation of the parties or either of them, but includes all the consequences "resulting by ordinary natural sequence, whether foreseen by the wrongdoer or not, provided that the operation of the cause of action is not interrupted by the intervention of an independent agent or overpowering force, and that but for the operation of the cause of action the consequence would not have ensued." Sedgwick, Elements of Damage, § 54. It is true that for the purpose of determining whether the injury suffered by the party complaining was the natural and probable result of the wrong complained of a convenient test is to consider whether in general such a result might have been foreseen as the consequence of the wrong, but it is not necessary "that the injury in the precise form in which it in fact resulted should have been foreseen. It is enough that it now appears to have been the natural and probable consequence." Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251; Schumaker v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 46 Minn. 39, 42, 48 N. W. 559, 12 L. R. A. 257. And see Railroad Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256; McPeek v. Western Union Tel. Co., 107 Iowa, 356, 78 N. W. 63, 43 L. R. A. 214, 70 Am. St. Rep. 205; Hoag v. Railroad Co., 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653; Empire State Cattle Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (C. C.) 135 Fed. 135; Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. v. Elliott, 55 Fed. 949, 5 C. C. A. 347, 20 L. R. A. 582; Miller v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 90 Mo. 389, 2 S. W. 439; Smith v. Railroad, L. R. 6 C. P. 21; 1 Thompson, Negligence, § 59.

Now, while it is true that defendant could not have anticipated this particular flood and could not have foreseen that its negligent delay in transportation would subject the goods to such a danger, yet it is now apparent that such delay did subject the goods to the danger, and that but for the delay they would not have been destroyed; and defendant should have foreseen, as any reasonable person could foresee, that the negligent delay would extend the time during which the goods would be liable in the hands of the carrier to be overtaken by some such casualty, and would therefore increase the peril that the goods should be thus lost to the shipper. This consideration that the peril of accidental destruction is enhanced by the negligent extension of time during which the goods must remain in the carrier's control and out of the control of the owner, and during which some casualty may overtake them, has not, we think, been given sufficient consideration in the cases in which the carrier has been held not responsible for a loss for which he is not primarily liable, but which has overtaken the goods as a consequence of the preceding delay in their transportation.

It is not sufficient for the carrier to say by way of excuse that while a proper and diligent transportation of the goods would have kept them free from the peril by which they were in fact lost it might have subjected them to some other peril just as great. He cannot speculate on mere possibilities. A pertinent illustration is furnished by the well-settled rule with reference to deviation which is that if the carrier transports the goods over some other route than that specified in the contract or reasonably within the contemplation of the parties, he must answer for any loss or damage occurring during such deviation, although it is from a cause which would not in itself render him liable. In such a case it is said "that no wrongdoer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong, and that as a loss has actually happened whilst his wrongful act was in operation and force, and which is attributable to his wrongful act, he cannot set up as an answer to the action the bare possibility of a loss if his wrongful act had never been done. It might admit of a different construction if he could show, not only that the same loss might have happened, but that it must have happened if the act complained of had not been done." Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716. And see Merchants' D. Transp. Co. v. Kahn, 76 Ill. 520; Crosby v. Fitch, 12 Conn. 410, 31 Am. Dec. 745; U. S. Exp. Co. v. Kountze, 8 Wall. 342, 19 L. Ed. 457, 6 Cyc. 383. It is true that the analogy to the case of a deviation is denied in the case which announce the rule of the Pennsylvania and Massachusetts cases but the distinction attempted to be made that a deviation amounts to a conversion rendering the carrier absolutely liable is too technical to be considered as persuasive. The analogy between the two classes of cases has been recognized in Constable v. National Steamship Co., 154 U. S. 51, 14 Sup. Ct. 1062, 38 L. Ed. 903, and in Hutchinson, Carriers (2d Ed.) § 200. This court has expressed itself in favor of the liability of the carrier in classes of cases very analogous to that of deviation. Where goods were shipped with the agreement that they should be carried to their destination without change of cars, and in violation of this contract the goods were unloaded at Chicago which was not their destination, for the purpose of transporting them in other cars, and they were destroyed by the Chicago fire, it was held that the carriers were liable although the loss by fire was within a valid exemption from liability contained in the bill of lading. Robinson v. Merchants' Dispatch Transp. Co., 45 Iowa, 470; Stewart v. Merchants' Dispatch Transp. Co., 47 Iowa, 229, 29 Am. Rep. 476.

Certainly the act of the carrier in unloading the goods at Chicago, instead of carrying them through to their destination in the cars in which they were originally loaded, would not amount even to a technical conversion, nor could it have been anticipated that the result of such an act would be the destruction of the goods; nevertheless this court reached the conclusion that such a departure from the terms of the contract rendered the carrier liable for a loss for which it would not have been liable had it resulted without such departure. We think that in principle these cases support the general proposition that the wrongful act of the carrier which in fact subjects the goods to loss renders him liable for such loss although the circumstances under which it occurred could not have been anticipated. This is plainly right, for the detention due to the transfer of the goods to the other cars did increase the hazard of fire; but it is equally true in the case before us that the negligent delay increased the hazard of the loss by flood. As supporting the same view we may also refer to Hewett v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 63 Iowa, 611, 19 N. W. 790, in which it was held that negligent delay in forwarding goods which were liable to damage by freezing rendered the carrier accountable for the loss thus resulting. In that case it is said that while the carrier is responsible for such damages only as are the proximate consequence of his own acts and is not accountable for such loss as is occasioned by the intervention of the vis major, yet "one of the undertakings of the common carrier is that he will not expose the property entrusted to his care to any improper hazards or extraordinary perils, and if, by his act or omission, it is exposed to perils or hazards which ordinary foresight could have apprehended and provided against, he is accountable for such injury as may be occasioned by such exposure." See, also, Whicher v. Steam Boat Ewing, 21 Iowa, 240.

We are satisfied that the sounder reasons, supported by good authority, require us to hold that in this case the carrier is liable for the loss of and damage to plaintiff's goods, and the judgment of the trial court is therefore reversed.*

Through D.'s negligence this loaded car remained at Frankfort until May 28, when it was hauled to its destination. It was there destroyed by "the unprecedented flood of May 30, 1903." The court reviews the authorities and holds the defendant not liable. The cases permitting a recovery are disapproved as ignoring "the justice and policy" of the proximate cause principle.) PART III

TORTS THROUGH ACTS OF CONDITIONAL LIABILITY

CHAPTER I

NEGLIGENCE

SECTION 1.—THE PLACE OF NEGLIGENCE IN THE FIELD OF TORTS

I. Origin of Our Doctrine of Negligence

The original notion of a tort to one's person or property was an injury caused by an act of a stranger, in which the plaintiff did not in any way participate. A battery, an asportation of a chattel, an entry upon land were the typical torts. If, on the other hand, one saw fit to authorize another to come into contact with his person or property, and damage ensued, there was, without more, no tort. The person injured took the risk of all injurious consequences, unless the other expressly assumed the risk himself, or unless the peculiar nature of one's calling, as in the case of a smith, imposed a customary duty to act with reasonable skill. * * *

It is believed that the view here suggested will explain the following passage in Blackstone, which has puzzled many of his readers: "If a smith's servant lames a horse while he is shoeing him, an action lies against the master, but not against the servant." [1] This is, of course, not law to-day, and probably was not law when written. Blackstone simply repeated the doctrine of the Year-Books. The servant had not expressly assumed to shoe carefully; he was, therefore, no more liable than the surgeon, the barber, and the carpenter, who had not undertaken, in the cases already mentioned. This primitive notion of legal liability has, of course, entirely disappeared from the law. An assumpsit [2] is no longer an essential allegation in these actions of tort, and there is, therefore, little or no semblance of analogy between these actions and actions of contract.

James Barr Ames, "History of Assumpsit," 2 Harv. Law Rev. 3, 4 (1888).[3]

In later days, slowly and with difficulty, the court gave an action against the clumsy smith who lames the horse that he is shoeing, against the stupid surgeon who poisons the wound that he should cure. Such persons could not be charged with breaking the king's peace by force and arms. We may well doubt whether Bracton or any contemporary lawyer would have told them that they had committed no tort; we may perhaps doubt whether they could not have successfully sued in some of the local courts; but the king's justices were not as yet busied with these questions, and such records of the lowlier tribunals as are in print do not hold out much encouragement to the investigator who is in search of a medieval law of negligence, though he might find some rules, probably severe rules, about damage done by straying cattle, goring oxen, biting dogs and fire. Hardly a germ is to be found of any idea which will answer to the Roman culpa or become our modern negligence.

Pollock and Maitland, "History of English Law," vol. 2, 527 (1899).

The word "negligentia" as used in earlier times, meant apparently (as has been seen in the action for fire) [4] merely "failure to do" a duty already determined to exist; thus, though the Courts constantly said that "a man is bound to keep his cattle in at his peril," he is sometimes said to be held for "defaut de bon garde"—meaning, not careless keeping, but merely failure to keep as bound; and the misappre-

[2] "The earliest cases in which an 'assumpsit' was laid in the declaration were cases against a ferryman who undertook to carry the plaintiff's horse over the river, but who overloaded the boat, whereby the horse was drowned; against surgeons who undertook to cure the plaintiff or his animals, but who administered contrary medicines or otherwise unskillfully treated their patient; against a smith for laming a horse while shoeing it; against a barber who undertook to shave the beard of the plaintiff with a clean and wholesome razor, but who performed his work negligently or unskillfully to the great injury of the plaintiff's face; against a carpenter who undertook to build well and faithfully, but who built unskillfully. In all these cases, it will be observed, the plaintiff sought to recover damages for a physical injury to his person or property caused by the active misconduct of the defendant. The statement of the 'assumpsit' of the defendant was for centuries, it is true, deemed essential in the count. But the actions were not originally, and are not to-day, regarded as actions of contract. They have always sounded in tort." James Barr Ames, 2 Harv. Law Rev. 2, 3 Anglo-Am. Leg. Essays, 260.

hension of this was probably the source of Blackstone's well known misstatement that the action was for "negligently keeping" his cattle. It seems, then, that the action on the case based on a mere negligent doing was of little or no consequence until the 1800's, and that it then came about, partly through the principle of consequential damage noted above, and partly through the growing application of the test of negligence in Trespass.

John H. Wigmore, "Tortious Responsibility," 7 Harv. Law Rev. 453 (1894).[5]

The action on the case was stretched to cover a large number of offences. It thus, in common speech, became the parent of many special actions; though these differed from the older actions in this important point, that, as they were all commenced by the same writ, the plaintiff could not, even before the abolition of forms of action, be nonsuited for confusing one with the other. Thus we get the so-called actions of Trover, Nuisance, Assumpsit, Malicious Prosecution, Seduction, Defamation and Deceit; some of which, (e. g. Nuisance, Malicious Prosecution, and Deceit) have to be rather carefully distinguished from older remedies for similar offences, which had, for one reason or another, become obsolete or inconvenient. But it is worth remarking that no variation of the Action on the Case acquired the title of "Negligence"; and the reason is substantial and interesting. For if we look at those early examples of writs or declarations in Case which contain allegations of negligence, we shall find that, with scarcely an exception, they are confined to cases in which the ground of the action was an undertaking by the defendant and a failure to perform that undertaking. It is familiar knowledge, to all who have studied the history of Contract in English Law, that the grafting of the doctrine of Consideration onto this form of action gave us our law of simple contract. In other words, as the late Professor Ames has so brilliantly demonstrated,[6] the institution of the simple contract grew out of the action of Assumpsit, which alleged negligence on the part of the defendant. But what is this but to say that, so far as we can see, the Common Law refused to recognize negligence, i. e. omission of a positive duty, as the ground of legal liability; except where the defendant had expressly taken upon himself such duty, or where (as in the case of surgeons, common carriers, innkeepers, &c.) his profession or calling was deemed a "holding out" to that effect? * * *

[6] Harvard Law Review, ii, pp. 1, etc.; Select Essays in A.-A. L. H. iii, 259. "Professor Ames seems to think that charges of deceit and malice were more common than charges of negligence in this direction. But charges of negligence are not uncommon (see Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, 94b; Rastell, Entries, ff. 3b, 3d, 8a, 9a, 13a, 463b, 463c, 463d; Aston, pp. 13, 16, 56, etc.) And the point is, that charges of negligence were only made in actions really contractual. Actions for breach of a prescriptive duty would fall under this description; for prescription at the common law was based on a lost grant. But here, again, the allegation was usually of malice and deceit." 26 Law Quarterly Rev. 162, note.

The substantial result appears to be that, until the end of the eighteenth century, no one, apart from statute and the possible case of Nuisance, could be held civilly liable for the mere omission to perform any positive duty; unless he had, expressly or by implication, undertaken to perform that duty. The well known decision in Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 1 Sm. L. C. (11th Ed.) 240, 92 Reprint, 126, forbids us to say that a wilful refusal to perform a common law duty was not actionable; but Ashby v. White occupied a somewhat solitary position until the end of the eighteenth century. With the appearance of changed industrial conditions in the early nineteenth century, the Law of Negligence began to expand; but, with all allowance for this recent expansion, the legal scope of non-contractual negligence is still far narrower than is commonly supposed. * * *[7]

Edward Jenks, "On Negligence and Deceit in the Law of Torts," 26 Law Quarterly Review, 160, 165 (1910).

So far from being a specific tort, Negligence in itself is not a tort at all, but is merely one of the commonest grounds of liability in specific torts. Putting aside the few cases, such as Malicious Prosecution and Deceit, where there is no liability without intentional wrong doing, there is no class of tort that cannot be committed negligently as well as intentionally, e. g. trespass to the person. Conversely, every act which is a tort if committed negligently, will be equally a tort if committed intentionally.[8] It would seem, then, that to classify Negligence among specific torts, is like a classification which would put contracts for valuable consideration among specific contracts, such as Sale, Hire, and Insurance.[9]

It is true that in some of the cases we read of an "action for negligence." This is due to the fact that, excluding Trespass, and a few of the actions (originally Actions on the Case) which received distinctive names, e. g. Libel, Trover, Deceit, &c., no systematic classification of torts was attempted by the Common Law. There was no necessity to specify in pleading whether a special Action on the Case was an action for damage to the person, or to the property, or to some other interest affected by the wrong. All fell equally under the heading "Actions on the Case." But when it was recognized that (in the absence of intention) damage to the plaintiff was not a ground of liability, unless there was negligence on the part of the defendant, negligence came to be spoken of as the "gist of the action"; and an action for negligence became a common type of Action on the Case.

[7] "In all probability it was the general introduction of industrial machinery, and especially of mechanical transit, which, for the first time in the History of the English Law of Tort, produced the purely non-contractual and non-trespassory action founded on negligence." Edward Jenks, 26 Law Quarterly Review, 165 (1910). And see the remarks of the same author in his "Short History of English Law," 311, 312 (1912).

[8] But the effect of the historic forms of action in creating causes of action which still endure is to be kept in mind in considering the present doctrine of torts in many American States. See the cases given infra, "Negligence Distinguished from Other Torts."—Ed.

[9] However, "nearly all writers in Tort treat negligence as a specific ground of action."

The treatment of negligence as a special kind of tort is therefore a survival of a classification of torts based on the forms of action.

II. Negligence Distinguished from Other Forms of Tort

MITCHIL v. ALESTREE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1676. 1 Vent. 295, 86 Reprint, 190.)

In an action upon the case brought against the defendant, for that he did ride an horse into a place called Lincoln's Inn Fields (a place much frequented by the King's subjects, and unapt for such purposes) for the breaking and taming of him, and that the horse was so unruly, that he broke from the defendant, and ran over the plaintiff, and grievously hurt him, to his damages, &c.

Upon not guilty pleaded, and a verdict for the plaintiff, it was moved by Simpson in arrest of judgment, that here is no cause of action: for it appears by the declaration, that the mischief which happened was against the defendant's will, and so damnum absque injuria; and then not shewn what right the King's subjects had to walk there; and if a man digs a pit in a common into which one that has no right to come there, falls in, no action lies in such case.

Curia, contra. It was the defendant's fault, to bring a wild horse into such a place where mischief might probably be done, by reason of the concourse of people. Lately, in this court an action was brought against a butcher, who had made an ox run from his stall and gored the plaintiff; and this was alleged in the declaration to be in default of penning him.

Wylde said, If a man hath an unruly horse in his stable, and leaves open the stable door, whereby the horse goes forth and does mischief; an action lies against the master.

Twisden. If one hath kept a tame fox, which gets loose and goes wild, he that hath kept him before shall not answer for the damage the fox doth after he hath lost him, and he hath resumed his wild nature. Vide Hobart's Reports, 134, the case of Weaver and Ward.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

DAY v. EDWARDS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1794. 5 Term R. 648, 101 Reprint, 361.)

This was an action on the case, wherein the plaintiff declared, that whereas on a certain day he was possessed of a certain four-wheeled carriage called a landaulet, and of a horse drawing the same along the King's highway, called, &c. and the defendant on the same day, &c. was possessed of a certain cart and horse drawing the same along the highway aforesaid, and which were then and there under the direction of the said defendant, nevertheless the said defendant then and there so furiously, negligently and improperly drove the said cart and horse of him the said defendant, that by and through the furious, negligent, and improper conduct of the said defendant in that behalf, the said cart was then and there, to wit, &c. driven and struck with great force and violence upon and against the said carriage of the plaintiff, and thereby, then and there overturned and damaged the same, to the loss of the plaintiff, &c.

To this there was a special demurrer, assigning for causes, that the plaintiff, by his said declaration, complained against the defendant as if the supposed cause of action in the declaration mentioned had been a mere consequential injury, whereas it appeared to have been an immediate and direct trespass committed by the defendant on the property of the plaintiff; that the plaintiff complained against the defendant, as in a plea of trespass on the case, whereas the declaration ought to have been in a plea of trespass vi et armis: that the defendant was not, by the said declaration, positively charged with any of the facts therein contained, and the same were only charged by way of recital, whereas they ought to have been positively averred upon him; and also, that it was not alleged that the supposed trespass was committed with force and arms nor against the peace, &c. Joinder in demurrer.

Baldwin in support of the demurrer was stopped by the Court.

Wood contra. The action on the case for consequential damage is properly conceived, because the act of driving along the highway, in consequence of which the injury arose, was a legal one in itself, although negligently exercised. And where the act itself is legal, and an injury happens from an improper exercise of it, an action on the case is the proper remedy. If the declaration indeed had alleged that the defendant had driven against the plaintiff, there might have been some ground for contending that trespass should have been brought: but all that is here stated is, that he drove furiously along the highway, in consequence of which the mischief ensued. Vide Slater v. Baker, 2 Wils. 359, and Scott v. Shepherd, 2 Black. Rep. 892, and 3 Wils. 403.

Lord Kenyon, C. J. The distinction between the actions of trespass vi et armis and on the case is perfectly clear. If the injury be committed by the immediate act complained of, the action must be trespass; if the injury be merely consequential upon that act, an action upon the case is the proper remedy. In 1 Str. 636, it is said, "If a man throw a log into the highway, and in that act it hits me, I may maintain the trespass, because it is an immediate wrong: but if, as it lies there, I tumble over it, and receive an injury, I must bring an action upon the case." In the present case the plaintiff complains of the immediate act, therefore he should have brought trespass.

PER CURIAM. Judgment for the defendant.

LEAME v. BRAY.

(Court of King's Bench, 1803. 3 East, 593, 102 Reprint, 724.)

This was an action of trespass, in which the plaintiff declared that the defendant with force and arms drove and struck a single-horse chaise which the defendant was then driving along the king's highway with such great force and violence upon and against the plaintiff's curricle drawn by two horses, and upon and against the said horses so drawing, &c., and in which said curricle the plaintiff was then and there riding with his servant, which servant was then driving the said curricle and horses along the king's highway aforesaid, that by means thereof the plaintiff's servant was thrown out of the curricle upon the ground, and the horses ran away with the curricle, and while the horses were so running away with the curricle the plaintiff, for the preservation of his life, jumped and fell from the curricle upon the ground and fractured his collar bone, &c. Plea, not guilty.

It appeared in evidence at the trial before Lord Ellenborough, C. J., at the last sittings at Westminster, that the accident described in the declaration happened in a dark night, owing to the defendant driving his carriage on the wrong side of the road, and the parties not being able to see each other; and that if the defendant had kept his right side there was ample room for the carriages to have passed without injury. But it did not appear that blame was imputable to the defendant in any other respect as to the manner of his driving. It was therefore objected for the defendant, that the injury having happened from negligence, and not wilfully, the proper remedy was by an action on the case and not of trespass vi et armis; and the plaintiff was thereupon nonsuited.

Gibbs and Park shewed cause against a rule for setting aside the non-suit. * * *

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. The true criterion seems to be according to what Lord C. J. de Grey says in Scott v. Shepherd, whether the plaintiff received an injury by force from the defendant. If the injurious act be the immediate result of the force originally applied by the defendant, and the plaintiff be injured by it, it is the subject of an action of trespass vi et armis by all the cases both ancient and modern. It is immaterial whether the injury be wilful or not. As in the case alluded to by my Brother GROSE, where one shooting at butts for a trial of skill with the bow and arrow, the weapon then in use, in itself a lawful act, and no unlawful purpose in view; yet having accidentally wounded a man, it was holden to be a trespass, being an immediate injury from an act of force by another. Such also was the case of Weaver v. Ward, in Hob. 134, where a like unfortunate accident happened whilst persons were lawfully exercising themselves in arms. So in none of the cases mentioned in Scott v. Shepherd, 2 Black. 895, did wilfulness make any difference. If the injury were received from the personal act of another, it was deemed sufficient to make it trespass. In the case of Day v. Edwards, 5 Term Rep. 649, the allegation of the act having been done furiously was understood to imply an act of force immediately proceeding from the defendant. As to the case of Ogle v. Barnes, 8 Term Rep. 188, I incline to think it was rightly decided; and yet there are words there which imply force by the act of another; but, as was observed, it does not appear that it must have been the personal act of the defendants; it is not even alleged that they were on board the ship at the time: it is said indeed that they had the care, direction, and management of it; but that might be through the medium of other persons in their employ on board. That therefore might be sustained as an action on the case, because there were no words in the declaration which necessarily implied that the damage happened from an act of force done by the defendants themselves. I am not aware of any case of that sort where the party himself sued having been on board this question has been raised. But here the defendant himself was present, and used the ordinary means of impelling the horse forward, and from that the injury happened. And therefore there being an immediate injury from an immediate act of force by the defendant, the proper remedy is trespass; and wilfulness is not necessary to constitute trespass.

LAWRENCE, J. I am of the same opinion. It is more convenient that the action should be trespass, than case; because if it be laid in trespass, no nice points can arise upon the evidence by which the plaintiff may be turned round upon the form of the action, as there may in many instances if case be brought; for there if any of the witnesses should say that in his belief the defendant did the injury wilfully, the plaintiff will run the risk of being nonsuited. But in actions of trespass the distinction has not turned either on the lawfulness of the act from whence the injury happened, or the design of the party doing it to commit the injury: but, as mentioned by Mr. Justice Blackstone in the case of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 Black. Rep. 895, on the difference between injuries direct and immediate, or mediate and consequential; in the one instance the remedy is by trespass, in the other by case. The same principle is laid down in Reynolds v. Clarke, 2 Ld. Raym. 1402. * * *

LE BLANC, J. * * * If the defendant had simply placed his chaise in the road, and the plaintiff had run against it in the dark, the injury would not have been direct, but in consequence only of the defendant's previous improper act. Here however the defendant was driving the carriage at the time with the force necessary to move it along, and the injury to the plaintiff happened from that immediate act: therefore the remedy must be trespass: and all the cases will support that principle. It is chiefly in actions for running down vessels at sea that difficulties may occur; because certainly the force which occasions the injury is not so immediate from the act of the person steering. The immediate agents of the force are the wind and waves, and the personal act of the party rather consists in putting the vessel in the way to be so acted upon: and whether that may make any difference in that case I will not now take upon me to determine. But here, where the personal force is immediately applied to the horse and carriage, the things acted upon and causing the damage, like a finger to the trigger of a gun, the injury is immediate from the act of driving, and trespass is the proper remedy for an immediate injury done by one to another: but where the injury is only consequential from the act done, there it is case.

Rule absolute.[10]

MORETON v. HARDERN et al.

(Court of King's Bench, 1825. 4 Barn. & C. 223, 107 Reprint. 1042.)

Case. Plea, general issue. At the trial, it appeared that the defendants were the proprietors of a stage coach travelling from Congleton to Manchester. The plaintiff, at the time when the accident happened, was driving a cart along the highroad. The coach was driven by the defendant Hardern, and the coachman employed by the proprietors to drive was sitting by his side. The coach ran against the plaintiff, and thereby caused the injury stated in the declaration. It did not appear that Hardern saw the plaintiff at the time. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £200, and that the accident was occasioned by the negligence of the defendant Hardern. A nonsuit was thereupon entered and the plaintiff had leave to move to enter a verdict in his favor for £200. A rule nisi for that purpose was obtained.

BAYLEY, J. I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The second count of the declaration alleges that the defendants were possessed of a certain coach and horses, which were under their care and management, and that they so carelessly and improperly governed and directed the said horses and coach, that through their carelessness, negligence, and improper conduct the coach ran against the plaintiff, and injured him. The objection made to that count was that as one of the defendants was driving, the injury was immediate, and that, consequently, the action should have been trespass, and not case. It is sufficient answer to say that the plaintiff had a right to sue all the defendants, and that trespass clearly would not lie against them all. Such an action might, perhaps, have been maintained against Hardern, but not against the other defendants. It was long vexata quæstio whether an action on the case could be brought when the defendant was personally present and acting in that which occasioned the mischief. Early in my professional experience, case was the form of action usually adopted for such injuries. In Lord Kenyon's time a doubt was raised upon the point, and he thought that where the act was immediately injurious, trespass was the only action that could be maintained for that injury. Leame v. Bray [3 East, 593] was an action of trespass. At the trial Lord Ellenborough thought it should have been case, but on further consideration this court was of opinion that trespass was maintainable, but they did not decide that an action on the case would have been improper. Looking at the other cases on the subject it is difficult to say that an action on the case will not lie for an injury sustained through the negligent driving of a coach, although one of the proprietors was the person guilty of that negligence. In Ogle v. Barnes, 8 T. R. 188, which was a case for negligently steering a ship, the declaration alleged that the ship was under the care of Barnes, one of the defendants, and of certain servants of the defendants, and that through their negligence the injury was sustained, and it was never urged that the action should have been trespass and not case, because one of the defendants was on board, but on the ground of the injury being immediate. In Rogers v. Imbleton, 2 N. R. 117, (which was decided after Leame v. Bray,) it was alleged that the defendant was driving a cart, and took such bad care of the cart and horse, that it ran with great force against the plaintiff's horse. To that there was a demurrer, upon the authority of Leame v. Bray, the action being in case, but the court was clearly of the opinion that case would lie, and the demurrer was overruled. In Huggett v. Montgomery, 2 N. R. 446, although the defendant was on board, yet the ship was not under his immediate care and management, but under that of a pilot, and on that ground, case was held to be the proper form of action. It is not necessary to say that trespass could not, in this case, have been sustained against Hardern. No doubt that action lies when the injury is inflicted by the wilful act of the defendant, but is also clear that case will lie where the act is negligent, and not wilful. Here the report says, that the injury was occasioned by the negligent driving of the defendant Hardern. I think, therefore, that as the plaintiff had a right to sue all the proprietors of the coach, and as trespass would not lie against them all, case was the proper form of action to be adopted.

Rule absolute.[11]

SIMON et al. v. HENRY et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1898. 62 N. J. Law, 486, 41 Atl. 692.)

In this action there was a judgment for defendants. Rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted.

DIXON, J. The plaintiffs were the owners of a factory on the corner of Gardner street and the boulevard in the town of Union, Hudson county; and the defendants contracted with the authorities of the town to construct a public sewer in the boulevard. To make the necessary trench, the removal of trap rock was required, and the defendants removed it by blasting with dynamite. The plaintiffs claimed that the concussion resulting from the blasts cracked the walls of their factory, and they brought this suit to recover compensation for the damage. The court charged the jury, in substance, that if, in the prosecution of the work, the defendants had exercised reasonable care and skill, they could not be held responsible. On this topic the learned judge said to the jury:

"Reasonable care * * * is that care which reasonably prudent men acquainted with this character of work, * * * acting cautiously and prudently, with a desire to avoid injury to others, would exercise in the performance of it. * * * You can take into consideration all the circumstances, as bearing on the question whether the defendants have exercised that care or not,—the character of the soil, the character of the rock, what they used in blasting the rock, how they blasted it, the manner of doing it, whether too much of explosives was used, whether the drill holes were too far apart, whether they endeavored to take out too much rock at one time, in length or in depth, the proximity to the building, and the injury. All of the conditions there are for you to determine, as bearing upon the question of the exercise of reasonable care. Blasting close by a building necessarily would require a high degree of care—perhaps the highest degree of care—to protect the building from injury. It all comes under the term 'reasonable,' after all, depending upon all the circumstances surrounding it."

Under this charge the jury found for the defendants, and the plaintiffs now seek to set aside the verdict, on the ground, mainly, that the defendants are responsible even though they did exercise reasonable care and skill. To support this position, they rely chiefly on the case of McAndrews v. Collerd, 42 N. J. Law, 189, 36 Am. Rep. 508, where the court of errors held that one who maintains a public nuisance is liable for the damage thereby caused, notwithstanding his exercise of all possible skill and care to prevent harm. To come within the range of this decision, the plaintiffs must make out that the blasting of rock by dynamite in the construction of a public sewer through a highway is per se a nuisance. The evidence in this case by no means tended to establish such a proposition. On the contrary, it was to the effect that blasting was the only practicable mode of removing the rock; that dynamite was an explosive often used in such work; and that, if used with reasonable care and skill, it was as safe as other explosives. The proposition therefore would fall, unless it should be held that the building of public sewers in streets laid over rock would necessarily create a nuisance; and for this the plaintiffs do not contend. Nor do we think it accords with common experience that the careful and skillful use of these explosives involves more danger to person or property than such use of various other forces which science has discovered, and which, in their general effect, promote the convenience and progress of society, and are therefore recognized as lawful agencies. In McAndrews v. Collerd, ubi supra, the nuisance consisted, not in the use of explosives, but in the maintenance of a magazine where a large quantity was stored. In Booth v. Railroad Co., 140 N. Y. 267, 35 N. E. 592, 24 L. R. A. 105, 37 Am. St. Rep. 552, and in French v. Vix., 143 N. Y. 90, 37 N. E. 612, it was held that the temporary use of explosives in the blasting of rock, provided reasonable care be exercised, is lawful, and damage resulting from concussion thereby produced is damnum absque injuria. We find no contrary decision. On this point, therefore, the plaintiffs have no cause of complaint.[12] * * *

The rule to show cause is discharged.

O'BRIEN v. LOOMIS.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals, Missouri, 1890. 43 Mo. App. 29.)

This was a joint action against father and son, the latter an infant of about ten years, to recover damages, for an injury to the plaintiff, caused by a gunshot wound, inflicted by the son. A demurrer by the father having been sustained, final judgment was rendered upon it in his favor, and the case proceeded against the son alone. The answer contained a general denial. There was a verdict, with judgment for $2,500, from which the defendant prosecutes this appeal. Errors were assigned in the following instructions, among others:

"If the jury find from the evidence in this case that the act of the boy in shooting plaintiff was either intentional or done without the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, and was a negligent act, considering his age and discretion, then plaintiff is entitled to recover."

"If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant Henry Loomis shot plaintiff with a bullet fired from the gun mentioned in the evidence; and if the jury further find from the evidence that the said Henry Loomis intentionally fired said gun at the plaintiff, intending to wound or injure the plaintiff, then plaintiff is entitled to recover such damages as the jury may believe from the evidence will be a fair compensation to her for the injury received." [13]

THOMPSON, J. We are of opinion that there is a fundamental error running through these instructions, in that they authorize a recovery on the hypothesis of the injury having been "intentional," or that the gun was fired "intentionally" at the plaintiff, the defendant "intending to wound and injure her"; whereas the petition does not allege that the injury was wilful or intentional, but alleges that it was negligent. Recurring to the petition, it will be seen that it is unfortunate in having been drawn to charge both the father and the son, and in being the petition on which the case proceeded after final judgment had been rendered for the father on demurrer. It charges that the defendant, Henry, was "reckless," and that he "had little or no discretion," and it also charges that the injury happened "through his said reckless habit and want of discretion"; and it does not charge that it happened in any other manner. Webster defines the word "reckless," as "rashly or indifferently negligent; careless; heedless; mindless." The petition, therefore, claims damages for an injury the result of negligence, and the instruction authorizes the jury to give damages on the hypothesis of wilfulness, and an intent to injure. We are of opinion that this case falls within the well-settled rule that the issues made by the pleadings cannot be broadened by the instructions.

It is true that, under our system, as at common law, the plaintiff may bring an action for a direct injury, such as shooting and wounding, by a petition in the form of a declaration in the common-law action of trespass, charging in the barest terms that the defendant unlawfully and wrongfully inflicted the injury upon the plaintiff, and that he can then recover on proof that the injury—provided it be the direct injury alleged—was the result of negligence merely. Conway v. Reed, 66 Mo. 346, 27 Am. Rep. 354. The reason was that in the case of a direct injury proceeding from the plaintiff to the defendant, nothing excused it short of proof that the injury was unavoidable. Weaver v. Ward, Hobart, 134. That a plaintiff could sue in trespass and recover for a direct injury, either on proof that the injury was intentional or negligent has been familiar learning to the profession ever since the celebrated "Squib Case." Scott v. Sheppard, 2 W. Bl. 892. See Morgan v. Cox, 22 Mo. 373, 66 Am. Dec 623; Castle v. Duryee, *41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 169.

But the policy of our code of procedure is to require the party to state in his pleadings his real ground of action or defense; and, if he chooses one ground, he cannot so enlarge it as to recover on another. This is in accordance with what is said on one of the opening pages of a standard work in respect of actions for damages for negligence:

"It is clear that a plaintiff may elect between suing upon a charge of wilful injury, or a mere charge of negligence, wherever the facts are susceptible of a double construction. It does not lie with the defendant to insist that he has been criminal instead of merely careless. In making his election, however, the plaintiff must remember that he will be bound by it. If the complaint sets up a case of wilful injury, it cannot be sustained by evidence of mere negligence, however gross; while, on the other hand, if it charges negligence only, the plaintiff cannot put in evidence, the only relevancy of which consists in proving intentional injury, such as would sustain an entirely different action." Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (4th Ed.) § 7.

We have been able to find no case, decided in this state, in which a party sued on the theory of negligence and recovered on the theory of wilfulness or malice, nor indeed any case where such a thing was attempted. But this is probably evidence of an understanding on the part of the profession that such a thing cannot be done. We have, however, been referred to several decisions of the supreme court of Indiana, which proceed on the distinction between actions grounded on negligence and actions grounded on wilfulness, which is stated by the above-named authors. Pennsylvania Co. v. Sinclair, 62 Ind. 301, 30 Am. Rep. 185; Pennsylvania Co. v. Smith, 98 Ind. 42; Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Eaton, 53 Ind. 307; Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, 95 Ind. 286, 48 Am. Rep. 719. In Pennsylvania Co. v. Smith, supra, it is held that under an averment of negligence there can be no recovery for a wilful injury.

The decisions in this state present many analogous rulings, which go to show that such a recovery cannot be had. Thus Hubbard v. Railroad, 63 Mo. 68, is to the effect that a plaintiff cannot sue in trespass for a wrongful entering and recovery on proof that possession was obtained by fraud. In Martin v. Miller, 20 Mo. 391 (which was an action commenced before the code), it was held that the plaintiff could not set out in his declaration that, on a certain day of the month, in a certain year, the defendant, "wrongfully, negligently and unjustly," set out a certain fire which did damage to the plaintiff, and then recover by merely proving that that day was Sunday, and that the defendant, in setting the fire, was at work on Sunday in violation of the statute. And cases in this state are numerous, where it has been held that a plaintiff cannot sue for damages for negligence consisting of a particular thing, and then recover for negligence consisting in something else. That the action for negligence is essentially different from the action for a wilful and intentional injury, is suggested by the last of the above instructions, where the learned judge correctly told the jury that contributory negligence was a defense in the former case, but not in the latter.

If, then, the issues made by the pleadings were not large enough to embrace the hypothesis of a wilful or intentional injury, it was error for the court to instruct the jury on such a theory, although the evidence, in a proper state of the pleadings, might have warranted such an instruction; for our procedure is very strict to the effect that it is error to submit to the jury an issue of fact not made by the pleadings. Melvin v. Railroad, 89 Mo. 106, 1 S. W. 286; Kenney v. Railroad, 70 Mo. 252; Benson v. Railroad, 78 Mo. 504, 513; Fulkerson v. Thornton, 68 Mo. 468.

BARRETT v. CLEVELAND, C., C. & ST. L. RY. CO.

Action against the railway company to recover damages for breaking down a tile drain on the right of way and under the tracks of the defendant. From a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff appeals.

ADAMS, J. * * * The sufficiency of the complaint, therefore, is the only question to be determined upon this appeal. Preliminary to the consideration of the main question, however, the nature of the action set forth in the complaint must be determined. It will be noted that the act complained of is that the tile in the ditch was negligently, willfully, and purposely broken by the appellee at a point under its main track and on its right of way. It is clear that an act could not be done both willfully and negligently. Willfulness and negligence are diametrically opposite to each other. One imports inattention, inadvertence, and indifference, while the other imports intention, purpose, and design. There can be no negligence with intent, and no willfulness without intent. It does not strengthen a pleading to allege both negligence and willfulness. The action must be predicated upon one theory or the other. Miller v. Miller, 17 Ind. App. 608, 609, 47 N. E. 338; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Bryan, 107 Ind. 51, 54, 7 N. E. 807. "'The pleader is not at liberty to leave his pleading open to different constructions, and then take his choice between them.' [Van Etten v. Hurst (1844), 6 Hill (N. Y.) 311, 41 Am. Dec. 748.] Facts must be stated directly and positively, and not indirectly nor in the alternative." Langsdale v. Woollen, Adm'r, 120 Ind. 78, 80, 21 N. E. 541. * * * In Gregory, Adm'r, v. C., C., C. & I. Ry. Co., 112 Ind. 387, 14 N. E. 229, it is said: "There is a clear distinction between the cases which count upon negligence as a ground of action and those which are founded upon acts of aggressive wrong or willfulness, and a pleading should not be tolerated which proceeds upon the idea that it may be good either for a willful injury or as a complaint for an injury occasioned by negligence. It should proceed upon one theory or the other, and is to be judged from its general tenor and scope." In the same case, at page 387, of 112 Ind., at page 229 of 14 N. E., it is said: "It is only necessary to charge in a complaint which seeks redress for a willful injury that the injurious act was purposely and intentionally committed with the intent willfully and purposely to inflict the injury complained of." * * *

To constitute a willful injury, the act which produced it must have been intentional, or must have been done under such circumstances as evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of. It involves conduct which is quasi criminal. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Bryan, 107 Ind. 51, 7 N. E. 807. The breaking of the tile is declared in the complaint before us to have been done negligently and willfully. As we have seen, the injury could not have resulted from both negligence and willfulness, and it is for the court to determine the theory of the complaint from its tenor and scope, without reference to the characterization of the act complained of. In this we are not greatly aided by the averments of the complaint. It is not shown in what manner the tile was broken, nor the means employed in the breaking, but it is averred that the same was broken under the main track, and upon the appellee's right of way. This, as well as the fact that the word "negligently" is given precedence, would seem to negative the idea of willfulness. It is highly improbable that appellee would seek to injure the appellant at a place and in a manner involving danger and inconvenience to it, when the same thing might have been done more easily elsewhere on the right of way. We are, therefore, constrained to hold that the words "willfully and purposely" do not control, but that the complaint is one for injury occasioned by negligence. Miller v. Miller, supra; Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hedges, Adm'x, 105 Ind. 398, 7 N. E. 801; Cleveland, etc., Ry. Co. v. Asbury, 120 Ind. 289, 22 N. E. 140; Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Schmidt, 106 Ind. 73, 5 N. E. 684; Sherfey, Adm'r, v. Evansville, etc., R. Co., 121 Ind. 427, 23 N. E. 273.[14]

SECTION 2.—ELEMENTS OF A PRIMA FACIE CASE IN NEGLIGENCE

I. The Defendant's Duty to Use Care

(A) In General

GILES v. WALKER.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1890. 24 Q. B. Div. 656.)

Appeal from the Leicester County Court.

The defendant, a farmer, occupied land which had originally been forest land, but which had some years prior to 1883, when the defendant's occupation of it commenced, been brought into cultivation by the then occupier. The forest land prior to cultivation did not bear thistles; but immediately upon its being cultivated thistles sprang up all over it. The defendant neglected to mow the thistles periodically so as to prevent them from seeding, and in the years 1887 and 1888 there were thousands of thistles on his land in full seed. The consequence was that the thistle seeds were blown by the wind in large quantities on to the adjoining land of the plaintiff, where they took root and did damage. The plaintiff sued the defendant for such damage in the county court. The judge left to the jury the question whether the defendant in not cutting the thistles had been guilty of negligence. The jury found that he was negligent, and judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

Toller, for the defendant. The facts of this case do not establish any cause of action. The judge was wrong in leaving the question of negligence to the jury. Before a person can be charged with negligence, it must be shewn that there is a duty on him to take care. But here there is no such duty. The defendant did not bring the thistles on to his land; they grew there naturally. (He was stopped by the Court.)

R. Bray, for the plaintiff. * * * The case resembles that of Crowhurst v. Amesham Burial Board, 4 Ex. D. 5, where the defendants were held responsible for allowing the branches of their yew trees to grow over their boundary, whereby a horse of the plaintiff, being placed at pasture in the adjoining field, ate some of the yew twigs and died.

LORD COLERIDGE, C. J. I never heard of such an action as this. There can be no duty as between adjoining occupiers to cut the thistles, which are the natural growth of the soil. The appeal must be allowed.

LORD ESHER, M. R. I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.[15]

[15] Accord: Harndon v. Stultz (1904) 124 Iowa, 734, 100 N. W. 851: (P. complains that D. has allowed noxious weeds to grow in large quantities upon his land in close proximity to the division line between the farms of P. and D., and that the wind has carried the seeds over P.'s land, to his damage.)

Langer v. Goode (1911) 21 N. D. 462, 131 N. W. 258, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 429: (P. sued to recover his damage because D. had neglected to destroy wild mustard seed growing in his farm. A statute required that every person destroy upon all lands owned or occupied by him all wild mustard there growing, when the board of county commissioners had prescribed the time and manner of destruction. "Therefore," said Burr, J., delivering the opinion, "no duty devolves upon any one to destroy these noxious weeds until the board of county commissioners prescribes the time and manner of destruction. It being conceded that such action was never taken by the board, then no duty devolved upon the defendant.")

HADWELL v. RIGHTON.

(King's Bench Division. [1907] 2 K. B. 345.)

Appeal from the Birmingham County Court.

The plaintiff was riding a bicycle at the rate of about six miles an hour down a highway called Bordesley Park Road, when he saw in front of him, on the footpath three fowls. When he got abreast of the fowls all three suddenly fluttered up, and one of them flew into the spokes of his bicycle and he was upset, with the result that he suffered personal injuries and his bicycle was damaged. The fowls were the property of the defendant, who occupied premises on the side of the road opposite to the footpath on which the fowls were immediately before the accident. The cause of the fowls starting to fly across the road was that they were frightened by a dog which came out of the premises adjoining those of the defendant on which the fowls were kept, and either ran at or barked at them. The plaintiff was riding carefully, and the accident happened through no fault of his. The defendant knew that the fowls were in the habit of straying out into the road. The county court judge held that the damage was too remote a consequence of their being allowed to stray there, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Avory, K. C., and Simey, for the plaintiff. The owner of an animal is liable for its trespasses. He keeps it at his peril, and if it escapes from his premises he is responsible for any damage that naturally results from its escape. * * * The case of Lee v. Riley (1865) 18 C. B. (N. S.) 722, supports the plaintiff's contention. There the defendant's mare strayed into a field of the plaintiff in which was a horse. From some unexplained cause the animals quarrelled, and the defendant's mare kicked the plaintiff's horse and damaged it. It was held that the damage was not too remote. And the case of Ellis v. Loftus Iron Co. (1874) L. R. 10 C. P. 10, where the facts were very similar, was decided in the same way. * * *

BRAY, J. I am of the same opinion. We cannot decide this case in the plaintiff's favor without overruling Cox v. Burbidge, 13 C. B. (N. S.) 430. We have no power to overrule it, nor should I be inclined to exercise that power if we could. It is said that the fowl was trespassing. But the cases which were relied upon as shewing that that would give a cause of action were cases in which the plaintiff was the owner of the soil on which the trespass was committed, and are consequently not in point, for here the cyclist had no interest in the soil of the highway. The plaintiff's case could only be rested on the ground of negligence, as in the case of Harris v. Mobbs, 3 Ex. D. 268, where the defendant left a house van on the grassy side of the highway for the night, and a horse being driven along the road was frightened by it and bolted. Denman, J., there held the defendant responsible for the consequences, but he did so on the ground that the jury had in effect found "that there was an unreasonable and dangerous occupation of a part of the highway amounting to an obstruction and preventing of its free user by the public to an extent which was unreasonable." Where is there anything dangerous in letting fowls stray on a highway? The business of farming could not be conveniently carried on if such an act were not permissible. Homesteads are usually near a road, and it is practically impossible to keep fowls in. I should not hesitate to find that there was no danger at all in allowing them so to stray. Such an accident as this I have never heard of before. And, in the absence of anticipated danger, there is no room for the suggestion of negligence.

Appeal dismissed.[16]

PITTSBURG, FT. W. & C. RY. CO. et al. v. BINGHAM.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1876. 29 Ohio St. 364.)

The original action was brought by the defendant in error, as the personal representative of her deceased husband, against the railway company, under the act requiring compensation to be made for causing death by a wrongful act, neglect or default. The deceased was at the defendant's station-house in Massillon, on December 5, 1870, and while there was struck by a portion of its roof, torn off by the wind, and blown, during a violent storm, from the building, with such force against him as to cause his death. The defendants were charged with negligence in the construction and maintenance of the station-house.

Issue was joined upon the question of negligence. The evidence tended to show that the deceased, at the time of receiving the injury resulting in his death, was at this passenger station, not for the purpose of transacting any business with the company, its agents or servants, or with any one rightfully there, nor on business in any wise connected with the operation of the road; but being out of employment was there for pastime or pleasure, or as a place of safety during the continuance of a violent storm. After the testimony was concluded, the court instructed the jury:

That if the deceased was at, in or near the said depot, not on any business, but "was there by the tacit permission of, and without objection from," the company operating the road, "its agents and servants, and there peaceably and innocently, relying upon such station-house as a place of security," and was free from negligence contributing to his injury and consequent death, and ordinary care and skill was not employed in the construction and maintenance of the station-house, but from want of such care and skill it was defectively and insufficiently constructed, and imprudently and negligently maintained and used, and by reason thereof the deceased lost his life, the company was liable.

[16] The opinion of Phillimore, J., is omitted.

The defendant excepted to that part of the charge that held it to be the duty of the company to have exercised due care in the construction and maintenance of the building, if the deceased entered and was there by "mere permission and without objection"; and from a judgment against it, carried the cause to the district court, where the judgment of the common pleas was affirmed. A petition in error is now prosecuted to reverse both judgments.[17]

BOYNTON, J. We find in the record of the present case among the questions argued, but one deserving consideration; and that one may be stated as follows: "Is a railroad company bound to exercise ordinary care and skill in the erection, structure, or maintenance of its station-house or houses, as to persons who enter or are at the same, not on any business with the company or its agents, nor on any business connected with the operation of its road; but are there without objection by the company, and therefore by its mere sufferance or permission?" * * *

Actional negligence exists only where the one whose act causes or occasions the injury owes to the injured person a duty, created either by contract or by operation of law, which he has failed to discharge. In Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767, the owner of a store building had leased it to a tenant, who was in occupancy of the same, selling goods therein. Certain shelvings and fixtures not properly secured, fell, and injured the plaintiff, a customer of the tenant, for which injury the customer brought action against the landlord. It was said by McIlvaine, J., that there was no privity between the owner of the property and the plaintiff, and that the former owed no duty to the latter which was violated by a careless construction or fastenings of the fixtures; and that the fact that the room was kept open for the customers of the tenant did not affect the question.

But the question naturally arises, to what extent does the right of a railroad company to the control and use of its real property differ from that of a general owner of land not burdened or encumbered with a public charge? What restrictions and limitations are imposed upon the use and enjoyment of the real property of the company that do not exist in the case of ownership of property not employed for public purposes? These questions are not difficult to answer. The right to the possession and control of the property of a railroad corporation for all purposes contemplated by its charter, and to enable it to accomplish the objects for which it was created, is indispensable to the proper discharge of the duties it owes to the public. By accepting a grant of corporate power from the state, it bound itself to do and perform certain things conducive to the public welfare. And these things consist principally in the duty to carry and transport persons and property from one point on its road to another, under such reasonable rules and regulations as it may prescribe to itself, or as may be prescribed by more general law. The obligation to carry, thus assumed, can not be disregarded or rejected at pleasure. It is an indispensable condition to the right to exercise corporate functions. The duty to carry is correlative to the existence of the corporate power of the company, and ceases only with the surrender of its corporate privileges. It is, therefore, a right that the public have to enter upon the premises of the company at points designed or designated for receiving passengers, and upon compliance with the rules governing the transportation of persons to be carried over its road to such points thereon as they may desire. The right of the public to enter is coextensive with the duty of the company to receive and carry. It, however, cannot be extended beyond this. For all purposes not connected with the operation of its road, the right of the company to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the corporate property is as perfect and absolute as is that of an owner of real property not burdened with public or private easements or servitudes. * * *

His [the deceased's] presence at the depot was uninvited, and the company did not owe him the duty to keep its station-house in a safe and secure condition. Its negligence, if any, was necessarily negligence of omission, negligence in having omitted the exercise of ordinary care to ascertain the dangerous character of the building. If the question was between the company and its employés, whose duty it was to occupy the building, or if it arose between the company and those who came to take passage on its cars, or to accompany a friend about to depart, or to await the arrival of one expected, or to engage in any business connected with the operation of the road, or business with those engaged in its service and having a legal right to be and remain there; or, if the company had possessed knowledge, in fact, of the dangerous character or condition of the building, and gave no notice thereof to those it permitted to enter or occupy, other considerations would arise. It, however, is not charged with intentional wrong, nor with that gross or reckless misconduct that is difficult to distinguish from it, and therefore is equivalent to it. All it could have done, when the storm approached, to save the deceased from harm, was to see that he left the building and thereby escaped the danger. This was not a legal duty. He was injured by no act of the company, or its servants or agents, occurring at the time. The fault was of past origin and negative in character, consisting in not previously overhauling the building, ascertaining its defects and weaknesses, and supplying the needed strength and support. For this omission, or its resulting consequences, a stranger has no right to call it to account.

Judgment of the district court and of the common pleas reversed, and cause remanded.

LANE v. COX.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1897] 1 Q. B. 415.)

The defendant was owner of a house which he let unfurnished to a weekly tenant. There were no covenants to repair on the part of either the landlord or the tenant. The plaintiff was a workman, who came upon the premises at the request of the tenant for the purpose of moving some furniture. While so employed the plaintiff was injured owing to the defective state of the staircase in the house. There was evidence that at the time the house was let the staircase was in an unsafe condition. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the injuries he had sustained, and it was tried before the Lord Chief Justice, who entered a nonsuit. The plaintiff appealed.

LORD ESHER, M. R. * * * There was evidence that the defendant was owner of the house, but that it was let at the time of the accident to a tenant who was in possession of it. There was evidence that at the time the house was let it was in an unsafe condition. The plaintiff was in the house to remove furniture of the tenant's, and he sustained an injury owing to the defect in the staircase. The question is raised whether the defendant under these circumstances is liable to the plaintiff. There was no contractual relation between the plaintiff and the defendant, and it was not like the case of a person who keeps a shop to which he intends people to come.

It is said however that the defendant was guilty of negligence which led to the accident because he left the house in a defective condition. It has been often pointed out that a person cannot be held liable for negligence unless he owed some duty to the plaintiff and that duty was neglected. There are many circumstances that give rise to such a duty, as, for instance, in the case of two persons using a highway, where proximity imposes a duty on each to take reasonable care not to interfere with the other. So if a person has a house near a highway, a duty is imposed on him towards persons using the highway; and similarly there is a duty to an adjoining owner or occupier, and if by the negligent management of his house he causes injury, in either of these cases he is liable. In this case the negligence alleged is letting the house in an unsafe condition. It has been held that there is no duty imposed on a landlord, by his relation to the tenant, not to let an unfurnished house in a dilapidated condition, because the condition of the house is the subject of contract between them. If there is no duty in such a case to the tenant, there cannot be a duty to a stranger. There was, therefore, no duty on the part of the defendant to the plaintiff, and there could be no liability for negligence, and the nonsuit was right.

LOPES, L. J. I am of the same opinion. What is complained of in this case is a defect in a staircase of a house let by the defendant to a tenant. It is said that the lessor is liable for an injury sustained by a workman employed by the tenant. There is no liability either on the landlord or the tenant to put or keep the demised premises in repair, unless such liability is created between them by contract. No contractual relation in this respect is implied on the letting of an unfurnished house. A landlord who lets a house in a dangerous or unsafe state incurs no liability to his tenant, or to the customers or guests of the tenant, for any accident which may happen to them during the term, unless he has contracted to keep the house in repair. That disposes of this case so far as any liability of the landlord arising out of contract is concerned. But then it is said that the claim of the plaintiff may be grounded on the negligence of the defendant. There cannot be a liability for negligence unless there is a breach of some duty; and no duty exists in this case to the tenant, and none can be alleged to strangers. The case differs entirely from those in which property is in a dangerous state by reason of which an injury happens to one of the public on a highway, or to the occupier of an adjoining house. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L. J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.[18]

[18] Part of opinion of Lord Esher, M. R., is omitted.

Compare: Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A. C. 428: (D., the owner of a dilapidated house, rented it furnished, on an oral agreement, to H. The floor of the kitchen being out of repair, H. and his wife, W., threatened to leave, but remained after D. had promised H. to repair it. No repairs were made and as a result W. fell through the kitchen floor and was hurt. An action by H. and W. against D. resulted in a verdict of £25 for H. and £75 for W. The trial judge entered judgment accordingly, holding that, although W. could not recover against D. in contract, she could recover in tort. The Court of Appeal [one judge dissenting] reversed this decision as to the £75 and entered judgment for D. on W.'s claim, and against D. on H.'s claim. There was an appeal to the House of Lords.

Lord James of Hereford. "My Lords, I have with regret arrived at the conclusion that this appeal must fail. In my opinion, the verdict for the appellant cannot be maintained. There was but one contract and that was made with the husband. The wife cannot sue upon it. Then, is there any other form in which her claim can be maintained? It was ably argued at the Bar that, as the premises belonged to the defendant, he must be taken to be in possession of them, and that, therefore, a duty arose to maintain them in a condition that would not cause injury to anyone who came upon them. But there seems to be a fallacy in this argument. The defendant was not in actual possession of the house in question and did not occupy it. The plaintiffs were the occupiers and the statement of claim so alleges. No duty is cast upon a landlord to effect internal repairs unless he contracts to do so. Then all that remains on which to found liability is the contract, and it was urged that the contract to repair placed the premises constructively in the possession of the defendant and under his control. But the actual possession by the plaintiffs seems to negative this constructive control. The case so presented also does not come within the claim on the contract under which the husband has recovered. I therefore feel that the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal must be maintained. I regret this result, because the female plaintiff was injured entirely through the failure of the defendant's agent to fulfill the contract he made. But moral responsibility, however clearly established, is not identical with legal liability." The order of the Court of Appeal was affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.)

RICHARDSON v. BABCOCK & WILCOX CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, First Circuit, 1910. 175 Fed. 897, 99 C. C. A. 353.)

ALDRICH, District Judge. The records before us present two cases of Mrs. Richardson, administratrix, against the Babcock & Wilcox Company, one for the death of her husband and the other for conscious suffering. Both cases are controlled by the conclusion which we reach, that of nonliability. The liability in personal injury cases speaking generally, springs either from relationship or duty, as, for instance, in one class of cases, the obligation grows out of the relationship between employer and employé. The obligation of the employer is to furnish a reasonably safe place and reasonably safe appliances, and the obligation of the employé is to exercise reasonable care. And the rule of care is that which a person, similarly situated, would exercise, and this means ordinary care and prudence. These obligations result from the relationship through implication of law. The same is true of the liability of the carrier for hire. And as to one who, in the exercise of his right or business, injures a member of the public, who is in the exercise of his right, or while in the line of duty, it is the duty in respect to the relative rights which creates or implies the obligation to exercise reasonable care. If, in view of relationship or duty, a given party fails to discharge his obligation, the liability results in tort.

There are several counts in each writ. Some of them allege that the plaintiff was in the employ of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company, and was in the line of duty, and that he was injured through the defendant's negligence; and some of the counts expressly allege that he was not in the employ or service of the defendant. Therefore we assume that the plaintiff's case is not within the rules which govern where the existing relationship is that of employer and employé, and this assumption is made because the relationship from which the ordinary implied obligations arise is wholly wanting.

The evidence shows that at the time of the accident the defendant was installing heavy boilers in the power house of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company in Readville, Mass., under special contract. Mr. Richardson was a stationary engineer in the employ of the railroad company in its railroad shops at Readville, and on the day in question had occasion to pass from one part of the shops to another part, on business connected with his duty to the railroad, his employer. When he came to a doorway, through which he would ordinarily pass on such a journey, he found that the defendants were lowering a section of tubing, some eighteen feet in length, which had entered the doorway some three or four feet. When Mr. Richardson reached this point he stepped on stringers and passed safely over or by the tubing into the yard beyond. There was some lack of harmony in the evidence as to just how far the tubing had entered the doorway, and just how much of an obstruction it was; but we pass over the details of such controversy as of no controlling consequence, because Mr. Richardson had passed safely beyond the obstruction, into an open yard between the buildings, and because we think the case is controlled by what followed.

Those in the employ of the defendant were having some difficulty in passing the tubing through the doorway, and, without any request from the defendant's servants for him to do so, and without any duty by reason of the relationship between him and the defendant as their employé, or as the employé of the railroad, because the defendants were doing the work under special contract, Mr. Richardson volunteered to lend a helping hand, and, while lifting, as the tubing was beginning to pass through the doorway, it started down an incline and a rope parted, and Mr. Richardson was jammed between the tubing and the doorway and fatally injured. Thus it appears that Mr. Richardson was not injured while in the line of duty. He had passed the place of hazard in safety, and, departing from his duty, returned to help another.

The law does not furnish redress in damages for every misfortune. In order to create liability for personal injury, the plaintiff must not only show that he was in the exercise of due care, but that the defendant was lacking in some duty which it owed to him, either as an employé or as a member of the public. This case, as already observed, is not within the class governed by the rules of ordinary care, because there was no contractual relationship between Mr. Richardson and the defendant. Nor is it the case of invitation, where a member of the public by invitation comes to help. The facts plainly show, and there was no dispute about it, that he took hold to help, as men oftentimes give a lift at the wheel when they find a neighbor stuck in the mud; and under such circumstances there is no liability on the part of the neighbor for an injury received, unless the injured party establishes gross negligence, willfulness, or wantonness in respect to his safety. In a legal sense the plaintiff's intestate was a volunteer, a stranger to the operations involved in moving the heavy articles in question, and so far as the relationship and the duties between the parties are concerned, this case is within the principle of Currier v. Trustees of Dartmouth College, 117 Fed. 44, 54 C. C. A. 430, and, while that case had some strong suggestions of invitation, it was said by Judge Putnam, speaking for the Court of Appeals, that the plaintiff was "of the class of those who must take care of themselves, except as against wantonness or willfulness, or except under peculiar conditions of some undiscovered danger." We think it very plain, and so plain that we need not cite authorities, that if a plaintiff recovers at all under the circumstances of this case, it must be on the ground that the defendant was grossly negligent in the selection of appliances, or that there was some wanton or willful conduct which caused the hurt. It is apparent that counsel drawing the writs were aware of the distinction between a case like this and the case of an injured employé, because in several of the counts they alleged that Richardson was not in the employ of the defendants, and that the defendants were grossly negligent.

The Circuit Court directed a verdict upon the ground of contributory negligence; but it is a familiar rule that an order for a verdict may be sustained, not only upon the reason expressed but upon any ground which warrants the result. We think there was no evidence of gross negligence in this case in respect to appliances, and there was no suggestion of wanton or wilful conduct on the part of the defendant. Therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to go to the jury, and the situation justifies the order directing a verdict for the defendant. Having reached this conclusion, there is no occasion for dealing with the question of contributory negligence.

In each case: The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed, with costs.

CARLISLE & CUMBERLAND BANKING CO. v. BRAGG.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1911] 1 K. B. 489.)

Application by plaintiffs for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Pickford, J., with a jury.

The action was upon a document which purported to be a continuing guarantee by the defendant, up to the amount of £150, of the payment by one Rigg to the plaintiffs of any sum which might, at any time thereafter, be or become due from him to the plaintiffs on the general balance of his banking account with them. The defendant in his defence denied that he signed the guarantee upon which the action was brought, and alleged that if he did, his signature to the same was fraudulently obtained by Rigg, who falsely represented to him that the said guarantee was an insurance paper. The evidence, so far as material to this report, appeared to be in substance as follows.

The signature to the document was in fact the defendant's. Before the document was signed, the plaintiffs had required from Rigg a guarantee of his overdraft with them. On the occasion when the document was signed the defendant and Rigg had been drinking together. Rigg produced a paper, and asked the defendant to sign it; he did not read it to the defendant, or tell him it was a guarantee. He told the defendant that the paper which the defendant had signed on a previous day had got wet and blurred in the rain. The defendant did not read the paper which he was asked to sign, and stated in evidence that he did not know that it was a guarantee; that he thought that Rigg was referring to a paper which he, the defendant, had previously signed concerning some insurance matter, and that the paper which he was asked by Rigg to sign was to the same effect as that paper. Rigg, having procured the defendant's signature to the document, subsequently forged the signature of an attesting witness to it, and handed it to the plaintiffs. It was not disputed that Rigg was indebted to the plaintiffs on his banking account to the amount claimed in the action. The questions left by the learned judge to the jury and their answers thereto were as follows:

(1) Was the defendant induced to sign the guarantee by the fraud of Rigg? —Yes. (2) Did the defendant know that the document which he signed was a guarantee?—No. (3) Was the defendant negligent in signing the guarantee? —Yes. (4) Was Rigg the agent of the bank?—No.

Upon these findings, the learned judge, on the authority of Swan v. North British Australasian Co. (1862) 7 H. & N. 603, (1863) 2 H. & C. 175, gave judgment for the defendant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L. J. In my opinion the judgment of Pickford, J., in this case was quite right. He held that the finding of negligence by the jury was immaterial, and he did so after discussing the case of Foster v. Mackinnon, L. R. 4 C. P. 704, and coming to the conclusion that the doctrine there laid down as regards negligence really has reference to the particular case of a negotiable instrument, to an action on which the defence that the defendant was induced to sign the instrument by fraud and misrepresentation as to its nature is set up as against a bona fide holder for value. As I understand it, that doctrine is limited to negotiable instruments, and that was really the judgment of Pickford, J., in this case.

Now let me deal with the matter apart from any question of negotiable instruments. In this case the finding of the jury is that the signature of the defendant to this document was obtained by fraud. The jury was asked "Was the defendant induced to sign the guarantee by the fraud of Rigg?" They answered that he was. They then were asked: "Did the defendant know that the document he signed was a guarantee?" They answered in the negative. It seems to me that on these findings alone the defendant would be entitled to say in respect of this guarantee that it was not in contemplation of the law signed by him. His signature was obtained by fraud, and it is manifest on the evidence and the findings of the jury, that he was not intending to sign any such document. What he was intending to sign was some document with reference to insurance. It appears to me that under the circumstances of this case the mere fact that the jury have found that there was negligence on the part of the defendant does not raise such an estoppel as prevents the defendant from setting up the defence that he never signed the guarantee and that his signature to the document was obtained from him by fraud; that he did not know of its nature, or intend to sign a document of that description. If the document in question had not been a guarantee, but a bill of exchange, and the question had arisen what was the position of a holder for value without notice of the fraud, the matter might have been different, because the law merchant, and now the statute law, puts persons who in such circumstances take bills of exchange and such like instruments in the position that they have to prove that they gave value for the bill or other like instrument honestly, but, if they prove that, it does not matter that it was originally procured by fraud.

The only other thing which I wish to say is on the question of negligence. I do not know whether the jury understood that there could be no material negligence unless there was a duty on the defendant towards the plaintiff. Even if they did understand that, in my opinion in the case of this instrument, the signature to which was obtained by fraud, and which was not a negotiable instrument, Pickford, J., was right in saying that the finding of negligence was immaterial. I wish to add for myself that in my judgment there is no evidence whatsoever to shew that the proximate cause of the plaintiffs' advancing money on this document was the mere signature of it by the defendant. In my opinion the proximate cause of the plaintiffs' making the advance was that Rigg fraudulently took the document to the bank, having fraudulently altered it by adding the forged signature of an attesting witness, and but for Rigg having done those things, the plaintiffs would never have advanced the money at all. Under these circumstances I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Buckley, L. J. * * * There remains the question whether the defendant is estopped. On that question I agree that the existence of negligence may be relevant. I do not wish to add anything to what Vaughan Williams, L. J., has said on the subject. I do not think that there was in this case proof of any such negligence as would avail the plaintiffs as between themselves and the defendant. The defendant did not owe any duty to the plaintiffs, and the act of the defendant was not the act which involved the plaintiffs in loss. What involved the plaintiffs in loss was the act of Rigg, a rogue, who obtained from the defendant his signature to an instrument which he never intended to sign, and having thus defrauded the defendant, proceeded to do another act, which was what caused the plaintiffs loss. He took the document thus fraudulently obtained, and pretended to the plaintiffs that it was a genuine guarantee given by the defendant. In point of fact it was not. He knew how he had procured it and that he had forged the signature of an attesting witness. It was that act which involved the plaintiffs in loss. Upon these grounds I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Application dismissed.[19]

BARRETT v. CLEVELAND, C., C. & ST. L. RY. CO.

Barrett brought this action against the railway company to recover damages for the breaking down of a tile drain on the right of way and under the tracks of the defendant. After alleging that the defendant was a corporation operating a line of railway over and through the lands of the plaintiff in Rush county, the complaint averred:

"That before said railway was constructed there was a good and sufficient tile drain across the lands of plaintiff, running from a westerly to an easterly direction to the lands of Frederick Leisure, and thence to Blue river; that said drain was ample and sufficient properly to drain said lands of plaintiff, but that said defendant constructed its said railway across said lands from a northeasterly to a southwesterly direction over and across said tile drain; that on or about April 1, 1906, said railway company negligently, willfully and purposely broke the tile in said drain at a point under its main track, on its right of way on said lands, thereby causing said drain to cave in and obstruct the free flow of water therethrough; that, as a further obstruction to the flow of water through said drain, said railway company, by its officers, agents and employés, filled said drain with dirt and gravel, so as wholly to obstruct the flow of water through said drain, and thereby caused the water that should flow through said drain to back and overflow the lands of plaintiff, so as to render said lands unfit for farming or for any purpose whatever; that before said drain was so broken and filled by defendant, said lands were fertile, dry and very productive, and in fit and proper condition to raise all kinds of farm products, but by the action of defendant, aforesaid, said lands were rendered wet and unfit for farming or for any other purpose; that by reason of the action of defendant, its agents and employés, said plaintiff's lands and all growing crops thereon were overflowed each and every year since the obstruction was made, and a large tract of land, to wit, twenty-five acres, was rendered useless and of no value, to the injury and damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000."

A demurrer to this complaint, for want of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, being overruled, the defendant answered in two paragraphs. The first was in denial; the second set out certain affirmative facts. A demurrer to this second paragraph of the answer was carried back by the court, and sustained to the complaint. The plaintiff thereupon refused to plead further and elected to stand by his exception to carrying the demurrer back, and sustaining it to the complaint. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff for costs.

ADAMS, J.[20] * * * The error relied on for reversal in this court relates to the overruling of appellant's demurrer to the second paragraph of answer, and the action of the court in carrying said demurrer back, and sustaining it to the complaint.

If there was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, then the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the second paragraph of answer would not be error, even if said paragraph were bad, under the well-recognized rule that a bad answer is good enough for a bad complaint. Alexander v. Spaulding (1903) 160 Ind. 176, 66 N. E. 694; Grace v. Cox (1896) 16 Ind. App. 150, 44 N. E. 813. * * * [21]

The question then for determination is, Does the complaint state a cause of action for negligence? * * * The complaint only states that, before the construction of appellee's railroad, there was a good and sufficient tile drain from the lands of appellant through the lands of another, and thence to the outlet; that at a subsequent date the appellee broke down the tile under its main track, and on its right of way, and also filled up the ditch. It is not shown how or from whom the right of way was obtained. It is not shown that the appellee had any knowledge of the existence or the location of the tile ditch. No contractual or prescriptive right is claimed by the appellant, and it does not appear that the ditch was a natural water course or a public drain.

The evident theory of the complaint is that appellee, having come into possession of a right of way across which a private tile drain extended, and through which appellant secured an outlet for the surface water accumulating upon his lands, was bound to keep such tile drain open and in working order for the benefit of appellant. The law does not impose such a burden upon the appellee. This subject was fully discussed in the well-considered case of Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Huddleston, 21 Ind. App. 621, 52 N. E. 1008, 69 Am. St. Rep. 385, and the principle stated as follows: "An artificial waterway may not be constructed or maintained, except by authority of law, or under a contract, in any case where it imposes a burden upon the property of an adjacent owner." In the same case, 21 Ind. App. 625, 52 N. E. 1010, 69 Am. St. Rep. 385, the court quoted with approval the following from O'Connor v. Fond du Lac, etc., Ry. Co., 52 Wis. 526, 9 N. W. 287, 38 Am. Rep. 753: "The company has only obstructed a ditch which drained or carried off surface water from the plaintiff's premises. We do not think the defendant was bound to keep that ditch open on its own land for the convenience of the plaintiff; in other words, the owner of the land is under no legal obligation to provide a way for the escape of mere surface water coming onto his land from the land of his neighbor, but has the right to change the surface of the ground so as to interfere with or obstruct the flow of such water." See, also, Jean v. Pennsy. Co., 9 Ind. App. 56, 36 N. E. 159; New York, etc., R. Co. v. Speelman, 12 Ind.

[21] In the omitted portion of the opinion the court considers the question whether the complaint shows a cause in negligence or a cause for intentional injury, and reached the conclusion that the cause alleged is for negligence. On the principle involved, see ante, "The Place of Negligence in the Field of Torts."

App. 372, 40 N. E. 541; Cairo, etc., R. Co. v. Stevens, 73 Ind. 278, 38 Am. Rep. 139; Clay v. Pittsburg, etc., Ry. Co., 164 Ind. 443, 73 N. E. 904; Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Hammer, 22 Kan. 763, 31 Am. Rep. 216.

The complaint does not state a cause of action, and there was no error in carrying back and sustaining a demurrer thereto. Judgment affirmed.

HURLEY v. EDDINGFIELD.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1901. 156 Ind. 416, 59 N. E. 1058, 53 L. R. A. 135, 83 Am. St. Rep. 198.)

Action by Hurley, as administrator, against Eddingfield. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appeals.

BAKER, J. The appellant sued appellee for $10,000 damages for wrongfully causing the death of his intestate. The court sustained appellee's demurrer to the complaint, and this ruling is assigned as error.

The material facts alleged may be summarized thus: At and for years before decedent's death appellee was a practicing physician at Mace, in Montgomery county, duly licensed under the laws of the state. He held himself out to the public as a general practitioner of medicine. He had been decedent's family physician. Decedent became dangerously ill, and sent for appellee. The messenger informed appellee of decedent's violent sickness, tendered him his fee for his services, and stated to him that no other physician was procurable in time, and that decedent relied on him for attention. No other physician was procurable in time to be of any use, and decedent did rely on appellee for medical assistance. Without any reason whatever, appellee refused to render aid to decedent. No other patients were requiring appellee's immediate service, and he could have gone to the relief of decedent if he had been willing to do so. Death ensued, without decedent's fault, and wholly from appellee's wrongful act. The alleged wrongful act was appellee's refusal to enter into a contract of employment.

Counsel do not contend that, before the enactment of the law regulating the practice of medicine, physicians were bound to render professional service to every one who applied. Whart. Neg. § 731. The act regulating the practice of medicine provides for a board of examiners, standards of qualification, examinations, licenses to those found qualified, and penalties for practicing without license. Acts 1897, p. 255; Acts 1899, p. 247. The act is a preventive, not a compulsive, measure. In obtaining the state's license (permission) to practice medicine, the state does not require, and the licensee does not engage, that he will practice at all or on other terms than he may choose to accept. Counsel's analogies, drawn from the obligations to the public on the part of innkeepers, common carriers, and the like, are beside the mark.*

Judgment affirmed.

*Hurley v. Eddingfield, although not a negligence case, indicates the scope of the principle in negligence which is under examination here.

A. 513: While trespassing on defendant's railway track C. was struck by a freight car pushed by a locomotive; a leg and an arm were cut off by the wheels. The engine was stopped and the wounded man was moved to the side of the right of way, when the engine and the crew left, without immediately binding up C.'s wounds or trying to stop the blood. But they telephoned from the railway yards for an ambulance, which reached C. about 30 minutes later. He died a few hours after reaching the hospital. In an action to recover damages for C.'s death, Smith, J., delivering the opinion, remarks as follows: "We are unable, however, to approve the doctrine that when the acts of a trespasser himself result in his injury, where his own negligent conduct is alone the cause, those in charge of the instrument which inflicted the hurt, being innocent of wrongdoing, are nevertheless blamable in law if they neglect to administer to the sufferings of him whose wounds we might say were self-imposed. With the humane side of the question courts are not concerned. It is the omission or negligent discharge of legal duties only which come within the sphere of judicial cognizance. For withholding relief from the suffering, for failure to respond to the calls of worthy charity, or for faltering in the bestowment of brotherly love on the unfortunate, penalties are found not in the laws of men, but in that higher law, the violation of which is condemned by the voice of conscience, whose sentence of punishment for the recreant act is swift and sure. In the law of contracts it is now well understood that a promise founded on a moral obligation will not be enforced in the courts. Bishop states that some of the older authorities recognize a moral obligation as valid, and says: 'Such a doctrine, carried to its legitimate results, would release the tribunals from the duty to administer the law of the land, and put in the place of law the varying ideas of morals which the changing incumbents of the bench might from time to time entertain.' Bishop on Contracts, § 44. Ezelle's injuries were inflicted, as the court below held, without the fault of the yardmaster, engineer, or fireman in charge of the car and locomotive. The railway company was no more responsible than it would have been had the deceased been run down by the cars of another railroad company on a track parallel with that of plaintiff in error. If no duty was imposed on the servants of defendant below to take charge of and care for the wounded man in such a case, how could a duty arise under the circumstances of the case at bar?"

I might easily save the child, but do nothing, and the child, though it lives, loses both legs. (B) Legal Degrees of Care

WILSON v. BRETT.

(Court of Exchequer, 1843. 11 Mees. & W. 113, 63 R. R. 528.)

Case. Plea, not guilty. At the trial, before Rolfe, B., it appeared that the plaintiff had entrusted his horse to the defendant, requesting him to ride it to Peckham, for the purpose of showing it for sale to a Mr. Margetson. The defendant accordingly rode the horse to Peckham, and for the purpose of showing it, took it into the East Surrey Race Ground, where Mr. Margetson was engaged with others playing the game of cricket: and there, in consequence of the slippery nature of the ground, the horse slipped and fell several times, and in falling broke one of his knees. It was proved that the defendant was a person conversant with and skilled in horses. The learned Judge in summing up, left it to the jury to say whether the nature of the ground was such as to render it a matter of culpable negligence in the defendant to ride the horse there; and told them, that under the circumstances, the defendant, being shown to be a person skilled in the management of horses, was bound to take as much care of the horse as if he had borrowed it; and that, if they thought the defendant had been negligent in going upon the ground where the injury was done, or had ridden the horse carelessly there, they ought to find for the plaintiff. The jury found for the plaintiff, damages £5. 10s.

Byles, Serjt., now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection: There was no evidence here that the horse was ridden in an unreasonable or improper manner, except as to the place where he was ridden. The defendant was admitted to be a mere gratuitous bailee; and there being no evidence of gross or culpable negligence, dian Criminal Code, puts the case of a surgeon refusing to go from Calcutta to Meerut to perform an operation, although it should be absolutely certain that this surgeon was the only person in India who could perform it and that, if it were not performed, the person who required it would die. We may suppose again that the situation of imminent danger of death was created by the act, but the innocent act, of the person who refuses to prevent the death. The man, for example, whose eye was penetrated by the glancing shot of the careful pheasant hunter, stunned by the shot, fell face downward into a shallow pool by which he was standing. The hunter might easily save him, but lets him drown. In the first three illustrations, however revolting the conduct of the man who declined to interfere, he was in no way responsible for the perilous situation, he did not increase the peril, he took away nothing from the person in jeopardy, he simply failed to confer a benefit upon a stranger. As the law stands to-day there would be no legal liability, either civilly or criminally, in any of these cases. The law does not compel active benevolence between man and man. It is left to one's conscience whether he shall be the good Samaritan or not."

And see the remarks of Carpenter, C. J., in Buch v. Amory Mfg. Co. (1898) 69 N. H. 257, 44 Atl. 809, 811, 76 Am. St. Rep. 163.

the learned Judge misdirected the jury, in stating to them that there was no difference between his responsibility and that of a borrower.[22]

PARKE, B. I think the case was left quite correctly to the jury. The defendant was shown to be a person conversant with horses, and was therefore bound to use such care and skill as a person conversant with horses might reasonably be expected to use: if he did not, he was guilty of negligence. The whole effect of what was said by the learned Judge as to the distinction between this case and that of a borrower, was this; that this particular defendant, being in fact a person of competent skill, was in effect in the same situation as that of a borrower, who in point of law represents to the lender that he is a person of competent skill. In the case of a gratuitous bailee, where his profession or situation is such as to imply the possession of competent skill, he is equally liable for the neglect to use it.

ROLFE, B. The distinction I intended to make was, that a gratuitous bailee is only bound to exercise such skill as he possesses, whereas a hirer or borrower may reasonably be taken to represent to the party who lets, or from whom he borrows, that he is a person of competent skill. If a person more skilled knows that to be dangerous which another not so skilled as he does not, surely that makes a difference in the liability. I said I could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence—that it was the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet, and I intended to leave it to the jury to say whether the defendant, being, as appeared by the evidence, a person accustomed to the management of horses, was guilty of culpable negligence.

Rule refused.[23]

[22] The statement is abridged. The opinions of Lord Abinger, C. B., and Alderson, B., are omitted.

[23] "It is further complained that the Lord Chief Justice misdirected the jury because he made no distinction in this case between gross and ordinary negligence. No information, however, has been given us as to the meaning to be attached to gross negligence in this case; and I quite agree with the dictum of Lord Cranworth in Wilson v. Brett (1843) 11 M. & W. 113, that gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet,—a view held by the Exchequer Chamber. Beal v. South Devon Railway Company (1864) 3 H. & C. 337. Confusion has arisen from regarding negligence as a positive instead of a negative word. It is really the absence of such care as it was the duty of the defendant to use. A bailee is only bound to use the ordinary care of a man, and so the absence of it is called gross negligence. A person who undertakes to do some work for reward to an article must exercise the care of a skilled workman, and the absence of such care in him is negligence. 'Gross,' therefore, is a word of description, and not a definition, and it would have been only introducing a source of confusion to use the expression, 'gross negligence,' instead of the equivalent, a want of due care and skill in navigating the vessel, which was again and again used by the Lord Chief Justice in his summing up." MEREDITH v. REED.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1866. 26 Ind. 334.)

Action to recover damages due to the alleged negligence of the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, on which judgment was entered.

GREGORY, C. J. * * * In May, 1865, the defendant owned a stallion, which had previously been let to mares, but, owing to the sickness of the owner, was not so let during the spring of 1865. He was a gentle stallion, and had never been known by the owner to be guilty of any vicious acts. Not being in use, he had been kept up in a stable for four or five months. He was secured in the stable by a strong halter and chain fastened through an iron ring in the manger. The stable door was securely fastened on the inside by a strong iron hasp, passed over a staple, and a piece of chain passed two or three times through the staple over the hasp, and the ends firmly tied together with a strong cord. It was also fastened on the

if these terms can be usefully applied in practice. Their meaning is not fixed, or capable of being so. One degree, thus described, not only may be confounded with another, but it is quite impracticable exactly to distinguish them. Their signification necessarily varies according to circumstances, to whose influence the courts have been forced to yield, until there are so many real exceptions that the rules themselves can scarcely be said to have a general operation. In Storer v. Gowen (1841) 18 Me. 177, the Supreme Court of Maine say: 'How much care will, in a given case, relieve a party from the imputation of gross negligence, or what omission will amount to the charge, is necessarily a question of fact, depending on a great variety of circumstances which the law cannot exactly define.' Mr. Justice Story (Bailments, § 11) says: 'Indeed, what is common or ordinary diligence is more a matter of fact than of law.' If the law furnishes no definition of the terms gross negligence, or ordinary negligence, which can be applied in practice, but leaves it to the jury to determine, in each case, what the duty was, and what omissions amount to a breach of it, it would seem that imperfect and confessedly unsuccessful attempts to define that duty had better be abandoned. Recently the judges of several courts have expressed their disapprobation of these attempts to fix the degrees of diligence by legal definitions, and have complained of the impracticability of applying them. Wilson v. Brett (1843) 11 Mees. & Wels. 113; Wylde v. Pickford (1841) 8 Mees. & Wels. 443, 461, 462; Hinton v. Dibbin (1842) 2 Q. B. 646, 651. It must be confessed that the difficulty in defining gross negligence, which is apparent in perusing such cases as Tracy et al. v. Wood (1822) 3 Mason, 132, Fed. Cas. No. 14,130, and Foster v. Essex Bank (1821) 17 Mass. 479, 9 Am. Dec. 168, would alone be sufficient to justify these complaints. It may be added that some of the ablest commentators on the Roman law, and on the Civil Code of France, have wholly repudiated this theory of three degrees of diligence, as unfounded in principles of natural justice, useless in practice, and presenting inextricable embarrassments and difficulties. See Toullier's Droit Civil, 6th vol., p. 239, &c.; 11th vol., p. 203, &c.; Makeldey, Man. Du Droit Romain, 191, &c." Per Mr. Justice Curtis, in The New World v. King (1853) 16 How. (U. S.) 469, 474, 14 L. Ed. 1019.

"Counsel make frequent use of the phrase 'gross negligence' in their discussion of this case. In this state, as is well known, the actionable character of negligence is not dependent upon its 'degree,' and the ancient differentiation into 'gross,' 'ordinary,' and 'slight' has come to mean little more than a matter of comparative emphasis in the discussion of testimony." outside by a piece of timber, one end of which was planted in the ground, while the other rested against the door. The horse was thus secured on the day and night the injury occurred. The gate of the inclosure surrounding the stable was shut and fastened as usual. About 11 o'clock that night the horse was found loose on the highway, and did the injury complained of. Early the following morning the outside gate was found open; the stable door was found open, with the log prop lying some distance to one side, and the chain which had been passed through the staple was gone, and the cord with which it had been tied was found cut and the pieces lying on the floor. * * *

It is contended, on the one hand, that ordinary care was all the law required of the defendant in this case. On the other it is claimed that the utmost care was necessary to free him from liability. Ordinary care is all that the law required in the case in judgment. What is ordinary care in some cases, would be carelessness in others. The law regards the circumstances surrounding each case, and the nature of the animal or machinery under control. Greater care is required to be taken of a stallion than of a mare; so in the management of a steam engine, greater care is necessary than in the use of a plow. Yet it is all ordinary care; such care as a prudent, careful man would take under like circumstances. The degree of care is always in proportion to the danger to be apprehended. The case at bar was properly sent to the jury, and the verdict is fully sustained by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.[24]

HILL v. CITY OF GLENWOOD.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1904. 124 Iowa, 479, 100 N. W. 522.)

Action to recover damages due to the negligence of the defendant, the city of Glenwood. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals.

WEAVER, J. The plaintiff claims to have been injured upon one of the public walks of the city of Glenwood, and that such injury was occasioned by reason of the negligence of the city in the maintenance of the walk at the place of the accident, and without fault on his own part contributing thereto. From verdict and judgment in his favor for $665, the city appeals. In this court the appellant makes no claim that the city was not negligent, but a reversal is sought on other grounds. * * *

It was shown without dispute that plaintiff had been blind for many years, and this fact is the basis of the criticism upon the charge given to the jury. In the third paragraph of the charge, the court, defining negligence, said:

"(3) Negligence is defined to be the want of ordinary care; that is, such care as an ordinary prudent person would exercise under like circumstances. There is no precise definition of ordinary care, but it may be said that it is such care as an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under like circumstances, and should be proportioned to the danger and peril reasonable to be apprehended from a lack of proper prudence. This rule applies alike to both parties to this action, and may be used in determining whether either was negligent."

In the eighth paragraph, referring to the plaintiff's duty to exercise care for his own safety, the following language is used:

"(8) It must also appear from the evidence that the plaintiff did not in any way contribute to the happening of the accident in question by any negligence on his part; that is, by his own want of ordinary care. The plaintiff, on his part, was under obligation to use ordinary care to prevent injury when passing over any sidewalk, and if he failed so to do, and his failure in any way contributed to the happening of the accident in question, then he cannot recover herein. The evidence shows without dispute that he was blind, and this fact should be considered by you in determining what ordinary care on his part would require when he was attempting to pass over one of the sidewalks of this city."

Counsel for appellant does not deny that the rules here laid down would be a correct statement of the law of negligence and contributory negligence as applied to the ordinary case of sidewalk accident, but it is urged that the conceded fact of plaintiff's blindness made it the duty of the court to say to the jury that a blind person who attempts to use the public street "must exercise a higher degree of care and caution than a person ordinarily would be expected or required to use had he full possession of his sense of sight."

We cannot give this proposition our assent. It is too well established to require argument or citation of authority that the care which the city is bound to exercise in the maintenance of its streets is ordinary and reasonable care, the care which ordinarily marks the conduct of a person of average prudence and foresight. So, too, it is equally well settled that the care which a person using the street is bound to exercise on his own part to discover danger and avoid accident and injury is of precisely the same character, the ordinary and reasonable care of a person of average prudence and foresight. The streets are for the use of the general public without discrimination; for the weak, the lame, the halt and the blind, as well as for those possessing perfect health, strength and vision. The law casts upon one no greater burden of care than upon the other. It is true, however, that in determining what is reasonable or ordinary care we must look to the circumstances and surroundings of each particular case. As said by us in Graham v. Oxford, 105 Iowa, 708, 75 N. W. 474: "There is no fixed rule for determining what is ordinary care applicable to all cases, but each case must be determined according to its own facts."

In the case before us the plaintiff's blindness is simply one of the facts which the jury must give consideration in finding whether he did or did not act with the care which a reasonably prudent man would ordinarily exercise when burdened by such infirmity. In other words, the measures which a traveler upon the street must employ for his own protection depend upon the nature and extent of the peril to which he knows, or in the exercise of reasonable prudence ought to know, he is exposed. The greater and more imminent the risk, the more he is required to look out for and guard against injury to himself; but the care thus exercised is neither more nor less than ordinary care—the care which men of ordinary prudence and experience may reasonably be expected to exercise under like circumstances. See cases cited in 21 A. & E. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 465, note 1. In the case at bar the plaintiff was rightfully upon the street, and if he was injured by reason of the negligence of the city, and without contributory negligence on his part, he was entitled to a verdict. In determining whether he did exercise due care it was proper for the jury, as we have already indicated, to consider his blindness, and in view of that condition, and all the surrounding facts and circumstances, find whether he exercised ordinary care and prudence. If he did, he was not guilty of contributory negligence. This view of the law seems to be fairly embodied in the instructions to which exception is taken. If the appellant believed, as it now argues, that the charge should have been more specific, and dwelt with greater emphasis upon the fact of plaintiff's blindness as an element for the consideration of the jury in finding whether he exercised reasonable care, it had the right to ask an instruction framed to meet its views in that respect. No such request was made, and the omission of the court to so amplify the charge on its own motion was not error.[25]

Action by Dimauro, brought under Revised Laws Mass. c. 111, § 267,[26] to recover for the alleged wrongful death of the plaintiff's intestate. Verdict ordered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

[25] A portion of the opinion, on other points, is omitted.

[26] This statute provided that "if a corporation which operates a railroad or a street railway, by reason of its negligence or by reason of the unfitness or gross negligence of its agents or servants while engaged in its business, causes the death of a passenger, or of a person who is in the exercise of due care and who is not a passenger or in the employ of such corporation, it shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000. * * * Such corporation shall also be liable in damages in the sum of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, which shall be assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of the corporation or of its servants or agents, and shall be recovered in an action of tort commenced within one year after the injury which caused the death, by executor or administrator of the deceased," etc. Rev. Laws Mass. (1902) c. 111, § 267.

LORING, J. We are of opinion that the evidence did not warrant a finding of gross negligence on the part of the defendant's servants.

In view of the argument made in the case at bar we repeat what has been decided: (1) It was decided in Banks v. Braman, 188 Mass. 367, 74 N. E. 594, that gross negligence under Rev. Laws, c. 111, § 267, is not the same thing as a wanton act which dispenses with proof by a plaintiff of the fact that his negligence was not a contributory cause of the accident. See in this connection Lanci v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 197 Mass. 32, 83 N. E. 1, a note to Dolphin v. Worcester Consolidated St. Ry., 189 Mass. 270, 272, 75 N. E. 635, and a note to Fitzmaurice v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 192 Mass. 159, 162, 78 N. E. 418, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1146, 116 Am. St. Rep. 236, 7 Ann. Cas. 586. (2) Gross negligence, as distinguished from ordinary negligence, was created by the act under which this action was brought (Rev. Laws, c. 111, § 267), and exists by force of the provisions of that statute. See Dolphin v. Worcester Consolidated St. Ry., 189 Mass. 270, 273, 75 N. E. 635. (3) In Dolphin v. Worcester Consolidated St. Ry., ubi supra, where the degree of care due was the highest degree of care, the defendant being a carrier and the plaintiff one of its passengers, it was held by the court that gross negligence means a gross failure to exercise the highest degree of care. Where the duty owed by the defendant is to exercise ordinary care, gross negligence has been defined to be "a materially greater degree of negligence than the lack of ordinary care." See Lanci v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., supra; Brennan v. Standard Oil Co., 187 Mass. 376, 378, 73 N. E. 472; Manning v. Conway, 192 Mass. 122, 125, 78 N. E. 401. In such a case gross negligence may also be defined to be a failure to exercise a slight degree of care.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff showed that one Paciello, his intestate, was killed by a car of the defendant railway under the following circumstances. He was a member of a gang of some 25 to 30 Italians engaged in digging a trench for sewer pipes. This trench was in a public way between Linwood, a station on a steam railroad, and the town of Whitinsville. In this same public way the tracks of the defendant railway were laid. On the day in question a heap of gravel and cobblestones, some three feet high in the middle of the heap, had been made by the dumping of material which came from the digging of the trench. Several teams had dumped loads at this point before the team in question came there to dump its load. The method of dumping had been for the successive teams to drive up on to the gravel previously dumped, and then dump its load. The plaintiff's intestate and another Italian, Delgrosso by name, were digging in the trench when the team in question drove up on to the heap of gravel. It was a four-wheel dump cart. Paciello and Delgrosso left the trench to help dump this load of gravel. The horses and cart had come to a stop parallel to the defendant's track, with the tracks on the left of the team as the team stood facing Linwood.

Rosetti, the foreman of the gang, stood at the front of the team, prying up the forward end of the dump cart with an iron bar. Paciello and Delgrosso were at the back of the cart, one on each side of it, bearing down on that end to help dump the gravel.

The evidence put the hub of the rear wheel of the dump cart "about 3 to 4 feet from the track," and the overhang of the defendant's car at 10 to 12 inches. This left a clearance of 2 to 3 feet between the hub of the wheel and the defendant's car. Paciello was on the side of the dump cart facing toward Linwood, that is to say, with his back toward Whitinsville, where the car in question was coming from. He was bending over, bearing down on the end of the car (as we have said), when Rosetti the foreman called out to him, "Guarda tevo per carro," or "Guarda tevo del carro," which being translated means "Look out for the car" or "Look out for the cart." Thereupon Paciello straightened up, looked round over his right shoulder, and in doing so brought his body over the line of the outside of the defendant's car, was struck on the hip, rolled over and was killed by the rear wheels. Rosetti's exact words were: "He moved his body or the car would not have touched him." The distance from the place where Paciello was struck to the place where he lay dead was 8 to 10 feet, and the back end of the car, when it came to a stop, was 10 to 12 feet from the body of Paciello where it lay dead. The car was 28 feet long, so that from the place where Paciello was struck to the place where the car stopped was about 50 feet.

Rosetti testified that he saw the defendant's car when it was 100 feet away, and that he then called out for it to stop. Seeing that there was no change in its speed he signaled it to stop by raising his hand, but the car continued to come on at the same rate of speed. He also testified that the motorman was looking in his direction all the time.

It was proved that the defendant had issued an order, properly posted, that cars "should not run exceeding 4 miles an hour by the sewer construction."

In addition there was evidence from an expert as to a hypothetical case, covering what the jury were warranted in finding to be the facts in the case at bar, that a motorman with a slack brake chain ought to have been able to stop the car running 4 miles an hour within 20 feet, and at 5 miles an hour within 27 feet.

The only testimony as to the speed at which the defendant's car was running, in addition to what has been stated, came from Delgrosso, who said that the car was coming all the time at the same rate of speed; "in a hurry; fast."

This warranted a finding that the defendant's car was going faster than 5 miles an hour. That fact in connection with the defendant's rule that its cars should not run over 4 miles an hour while going by sewer construction, would have warranted a finding that the motorman was negligent within the rule established in Stevens v. Boston Elevated R., 184 Mass. 476, 69 N. E. 338.

But the question here is whether the evidence warranted a finding of gross negligence on the part of the motorman, and we are of opinion that it did not. It is true that the jury were warranted in finding that the motorman saw or ought to have seen Paciello. But it is also true that there was a clearance of 2 to 3 feet between the hub of the wheel and the motorman's car, and that Paciello would not have been hurt if he had stayed where he was and not swung himself out into the line of the side of the car just as the car reached him. To run a car at something over 5 miles an hour under these circumstances is not, in our opinion, evidence of gross negligence.

The plaintiff's counsel contended that the evidence in the case at bar was stronger than that in the following cases: Com. v. Vermont & Massachusetts Ry., 108 Mass. 9, 11 Am. Rep. 301; Tilton v. Boston & Albany R. R., 169 Mass. 253, 47 N. E. 998; Young v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 171 Mass. 33, 50 N. E. 455, 41 L. R. A. 193; Walsh v. Boston & Maine R. R., 171 Mass. 52–56, 50 N. E. 453; Lutolf v. United Electric Light Co., 184 Mass. 53–58, 67 N. E. 1025; Hartford v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 184 Mass. 365, 68 N. E. 835; Hale v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 190 Mass. 85, 76 N. E. 656. We have examined these cases and find that they do not support that contention.

Exceptions overruled.

WALTHER v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

The plaintiff's intestate was killed, on March 28, 1907, in the derailment of a Southern Pacific passenger train. The accident occurred in the defendant's yard, and was caused by the train running from the main track into an open switch at a speed of some 45 miles an hour. The switch had been left open by the switch foreman, who, with his crew, were working on the siding at the time, and who had neglected to keep himself advised of the whereabouts of the train, which was long overdue, and had left the switch open in violation of the rules of the defendant. Deceased was an employé of defendant, but at the time of the accident and for some months next preceding the same was absent on leave. At the time of the accident he was returning from a journey to an Eastern state to his home in California. He was riding on a pass, good until March 31, 1907, which had been issued to him by defendant for the purposes of his journey. It was found by the trial court, in accord with a stipulation of the parties, that the pass was issued to him as an employé, "in accordance with the long established practice of the company, and one well known to its employés, to furnish passes from time to time to its employés." There was no other consideration for such pass. It contained the following statements, subscribed by the deceased: "This is a free pass based upon no consideration whatever. The person accepting and using this pass, in consideration of receiving the same, agrees that the Southern Pacific Company shall not be liable under any circumstances, whether of negligence—criminal or otherwise—of its agents or others, for any injury to the person, or for any loss or damage to the property of the individual using this pass; and that as to such person the company shall not be considered as a common carrier, or liable as such."

This action was brought by plaintiff to recover the damage caused her by the death of her husband, being based upon section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, when the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death, or, if such person be employed by another person who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such person. In her complaint she alleged that the accident and the consequent death of deceased were caused by the "gross negligence" of defendant, and these allegations were found by the trial court, which tried the case without a jury, to be true. Damages were assessed at the sum of $8,000, and judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for that amount. This is an appeal by defendant from such judgment.

ANGELLOTTI, J. * * * The ultimate question presented by this appeal is whether the provision in the pass purporting to exempt defendant from liability for the negligence of its agents precluded a recovery under the circumstances of this case. * * *

We think that the question of public policy in regard to such contracts of exemption, even as to passengers carried gratuitously, has been settled in this state by legislative enactment. Section 2175, Civil Code, provides: "A common carrier cannot be exonerated, by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or wilful wrong of himself or his servants." Aside from the question of the meaning of the term "gross negligence" as used in this section, it is earnestly contended that the section has no application in the case of one carried without consideration of any kind, and that as to such a passenger the carrier is not a common carrier at all. We are of the opinion that the question of consideration cuts no figure in determining the applicability of the section. Section 2168, Civil Code, contained in the same chapter, which is entitled "Common Carriers in General," declares that "every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages, is a common carrier of whatever he thus offers to carry," and, of course, the defendant was under this definition a common carrier of persons. As such, under other provisions of the same chapter and other chapters, it was entitled to refuse to carry any person except upon compliance with certain requirements, including the payment of a prescribed reasonable compensation, but at the time of this accident at least it could legally waive any of these requirements on the part of the passenger, and could receive and carry him for a reduced or different consideration, or altogether without consideration.

But, on whatever terms a common carrier of persons voluntarily receives and carries a person, the relation of common carrier and passenger exists. This is recognized by some of the authorities upholding the exemption from liability for negligence provision in the case of a passenger carried gratuitously. See Rogers v. Kennebec Steamboat Co., supra [86 Me. 261, 29 Atl. 1069, 25 L. R. A. 491]. The sole inquiry in this regard is, as has been said, whether the person was lawfully on the vehicle (see Ohio & Miss. R. Co. v. Muhling, 30 Ill. 9, 81 Am. Dec. 336), has been voluntarily received by the common carrier on any terms for the purpose of carriage, and is not, as was the case in Sessions v. Southern Pacific Co., 159 Cal. 599, 114 Pac. 982, a mere trespasser on the vehicle.

The voluntary waiver of all claim for compensation for carriage of a person does not take away from the status of the carrier as a common carrier so far as the person carried is concerned, any more than would a special reduction in the amount of compensation charged or a special concession as to some other authorized requirement accomplish such effect. The carrier is still a common carrier as to such person, with all the obligations of a common carrier, except in so far as those obligations are limited by contract provisions which are not inhibited by law. Other sections of our Civil Code permit such limitations as to certain matters not here involved, but section 2175 expressly prohibits limitations of liability for gross negligence on the part of the common carrier or his servants, whatever, as we read the various sections bearing upon this matter, may be the terms upon which it receives and undertakes to carry a passenger.

This brings us to a consideration of the question of the meaning of the term "gross negligence," as used in section 2175, Civil Code, for under the views already stated the exemption provision in the pass of deceased was not effectual to free defendant from liability for damages resulting from "gross negligence" of the defendant or its servants, within the meaning of the term "gross negligence," as used in said section. The contention of learned counsel for defendant is that these words, in the connection in which they are used, imply something in the nature of willful wrong, and do not include anything in the nature of a mere omission to exercise care without knowledge that such omission will probably result in injury to others. Section 2175 was, as it now stands, a part of the original Civil Code adopted in the year 1872. This Code contained two sections declaring that there are three degrees of care and diligence, "slight," "ordinary," and "great," and three degrees of negligence, "slight," "ordinary," and "gross." "Slight care" was defined as that "which is such as persons of ordinary prudence usually exercise about their own affairs of slight importance," and "gross negligence" was defined as that "which consists in the want of slight care and diligence." Sections 16 and 17. These sections were repealed outright in 1874, but such repeal cannot affect the question of the construction of the words "gross negligence" in section 2175, Civil Code, as it is the intention of the Legislature at the time of the adoption of the latter section that must control.

We see no warrant for holding that the term "gross negligence" as used therein was intended to mean other than the "gross negligence" defined in section 17 of the same act "to establish a Civil Code," which was simply "the want of slight care and diligence." This must necessarily have been the view of this court in Donlon Bros. v. Southern Pacific Co., 151 Cal. 763, 766, 91 Pac. 603, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 811, 12 Ann. Cas. 1118, for an examination of the record shows that there could have been no other ground for the expression of opinion "that there was sufficient evidence in the case warranting the jury in finding that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence occasioning the loss and injury complained of." It was also recognized in Merrill v. Pacific Transfer Co., 131 Cal. 582, 589, 63 Pac. 915, upon evidence that was utterly destitute of anything in the nature of a showing of willful or wanton wrong, that the question whether or not the common carrier was guilty of gross negligence was one for the jury to pass upon under proper instructions. But regardless of these expressions of opinion, both of which were made under such circumstances that they may reasonably be claimed not to constitute binding authority on the question, we are satisfied that the definition of the "gross negligence" of section 2175, Civil Code, must be found in sections 16 and 17 of the Civil Code, as the same were adopted in 1872.

Accepting this definition of gross negligence, it cannot reasonably be contended that the evidence was not legally sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the deceased was killed by the gross negligence of defendant's servants. The question of the existence of such gross negligence was one for the trial court, and, the facts being legally sufficient to warrant the inference drawn, an appellate court cannot properly disturb the conclusion reached by that tribunal.

The conclusion we have arrived at upon the points already discussed renders it unnecessary to consider other questions argued in the briefs, and compels an affirmance of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.[27]

[27] The statement is abridged and parts of the opinion are omitted. Sloss and Shaw, JJ., concurred. Beatty, C. J., dissented on the ground that the opinion lays down too broad a rule, because "the issuance of a free pass to a railway employé rests upon a valuable consideration."

GEORGE N. PIERCE CO. v. WELLS FARGO & CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1911. 189 Fed. 561, 110 C. C. A. 645.)

WARD, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff, a manufacturer, brought this action at law to recover of the defendant, an express company, the value of a car load of automobiles and appurtenances which it had delivered to the defendant to be carried from Buffalo to San Francisco. The defendant admitted its liability, and the trial judge directed the jury to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $50, the agreed value of the shipment, with interest and costs. The plaintiff took out this writ of error to the judgment entered on the verdict on the ground that the jury should have been directed to find a verdict for the actual value of the shipment, which was over the sum of $15,000.

The bill of lading under which the goods were carried provided: "* * * Nor shall said company be liable for any loss of or damage to said property in any event or for any cause whatever unless said loss or damage shall be proved to have been caused by or to have resulted from the fraud or gross negligence of said company or its servants; nor in any event shall said company be held liable beyond the sum of fifty dollars, at not exceeding which sum the said property is hereby valued, unless a different value is hereinabove stated. * * *"

There is nothing against public policy in the first clause above quoted. The federal courts recognize no difference between gross and ordinary negligence. Railway Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. Ed. 374. In all cases negligence is failure to exercise the care appropriate to the circumstances of the particular case. Greater care is called for in transporting eggs than in transporting pig iron. Therefore the clause, though it exempts the defendant from its liability as insurer, which is lawful, does not exempt it from the consequences of its own fraud or negligence, which would be unlawful as against public policy. It remained liable for its negligence to the full amount agreed upon. Such a contract is valid in the federal courts. * * *

The judgment is affirmed.[28]

[28] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point.

Noyes, Circuit Judge, dissented, on the ground that the weight of authority in this country is to the effect that the same principles of public policy which condemn total exemptions from liability for negligence condemn partial exemptions, and that such limitations, as distinguished from agreed valuations, are invalid.

II. Defendant's Failure to Use Care

SHERMAN v. WESTERN TRANSP. CO.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1861. 62 Barb. 150.)

This action, on the issues raised by a general denial, was referred to a referee, who found:

That the plaintiff and the defendant, in the boating season of 1859 were each lawfully navigating the Erie Canal, the plaintiff with the canal boat Sarah, the defendant with the Rosebud; that while these boats were passing each other, the tow-line of the plaintiff's boat Sarah caught underneath the defendant's boat Rosebud, without any fault on the part of the plaintiff, and in consequence the horses of the plaintiff were drawn into the canal and one of them was drowned and the other injured; that the plaintiff's tow-line caught on some part of the bottom of the defendant's boat as the boats were passing; and that the defendant was careless and negligent in not having the bottom of his boat in such condition at all times while navigating the canal as to permit tow-lines to pass underneath it without catching; and that the injury in question occurred in consequence of this negligence.

Upon this report judgment was entered for the plaintiff; the defendant appealed.

Mullin, J.[29] * * * It is of the essence of negligence that the party charged should have knowledge that there was a duty for him to perform, or he must have omitted to inform himself as to what his duty was, in a given case. Knowledge is presumed in a great number of cases, and the party will not be permitted to prove that he had not knowledge of his duty. Every man is presumed to know the law; and hence, when the law imposes a duty on a man, it presumes that he knew of it; and it will not permit him to prove that he did not. When the specific duty is not imposed, by either the statute or the common law, the party alleging negligence must show that the accused was cognizant of the duty he is charged with having neglected. It is not necessary that this should be established by direct evidence; it may be, and almost universally is, inferred from the nature of the duty, or the facts and circumstances of the case.

I am not aware of any statute requiring those navigating boats on the canals to have the bottoms of such boats so made as to permit tow-lines to pass under them without obstruction. But the duty is most obvious the moment a person becomes acquainted with the manner in which canal boats pass each other in the canal. And the person omitting to keep the bottom of his boat in the condition required to permit the free passage of the tow-line of another boat under her is responsible for whatever damages naturally and necessarily flow from his neglect.

To perfect his liability several things must concur: 1. He must be the owner, lessee, or captain of the boat. 2. The bottom of his boat must be such as not to permit the free passage of the towing line. 3. He must have known of it before the accident a sufficient length of time to enable him to avoid the injury; or, 4. The defect must have continued so long as to satisfy a court or jury that if he had paid proper attention to his boat he must have discovered it. 5. Damage must have been sustained by reason of the defect.

There is no question made, in this case, but that the defendant is the proper party defendant, if the action can be maintained. The towing line of the plaintiff's boat was caught on the bottom of the defendant's boat, and damages have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the catching of said line. Three of the four conditions necessary to be proved in order to maintain the suit have been established, in this case, and it only remains to inquire whether the referee was justified in finding the fourth.

When did the catch attach to said boat? There is no proof that it was put on by the defendant, or anyone in its employ. It is not proved that it was on an hour before the accident happened; nor that it was known to be there by the defendant, or any of its agents, until the moment it occurred.

I admit it was the duty of the defendant to so construct the boat as that towing lines could pass freely under it, and that it should cause examination to be made, from time to time, to see that the bottom of the boat continued in such condition. The boat, in passing through a lock, or over a stone or other hard substance in the bottom of the canal, might tear up the planking on the bottom so as to catch and retain a rope passing along it. The end of a plank might have become loosened and sprung off—a spike or bolt might become loose and be projected beyond the surface of the plank and catch and retain a towing line—and the defect not have existed ten minutes before the accident.

It is not shown, in this case, but that the injury was occasioned in one of the ways suggested, and from a cause originating within the period named.

Nor can we presume that the bottom of this boat was known to the defendant to be in a condition not to allow the free passage of towing lines, for such a length of time as to have made it their duty to put it in proper order. If they had such knowledge, they were guilty of negligence in not putting the boat in good order. But negligence is never presumed. 1 Cowen & Hill's Notes, 298, 478.

In the case of Olmsted v. The Watertown and Rome Railroad Company, decided at the general term in this district in October, 1855, the plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for negligence in killing his horse. The negligence charged consisted in the company's not maintaining a fence of the requisite height along the side of their road, whereby the horse strayed on to the railroad track and was killed by an engine. The only evidence of a defect in the fence was that one of the stakes which supported the upper rail was split, and one of the rails had fallen down, so that it was as low as the rail next below it, thus leaving the fence, at that point, below the required height of a sufficient fence. It was further proved that there were marks of the horse's foot on the top of the upper rail, showing, as the plaintiff's counsel argued, that the horse had gone over at that place. It was insisted on the part of the defendant, that there was no evidence of negligence; that it did not appear that the fence had been defective an instant before the horse had passed over; but on the contrary, the marks of the horse's foot being left on the rail demonstrated that he had struck in passing over, and thus splitting the stake, and letting down the bar. The court so held, and reversed the judgment of the county court affirming that of the justice, which was in favor of the plaintiff, for the value of the horse.

The principle decided in that case is decisive of this. The defective condition of the bottom of the boat may not have existed sufficiently long to have imposed any duty, in reference to it, on the defendant. And if its condition was not known, or had not existed long enough to charge the defendant with notice of the defect, it was not guilty of neglect. And there is no evidence in this case from which any such inference can be drawn. * * *

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and a new trial ordered; costs to abide the event.

New trial granted.

INDIANAPOLIS TRACTION CO. v. PRESSELL.

Action against the traction company for damages sustained by a passenger in alighting from the defendant's open car. The complaint in its first paragraph alleged that the only exit from the car was at its side, by means of a single step extending the full length of the car; that this step was two feet above the top of the rail; that at a certain point plaintiff informed the conductor that she wished to alight; that the conductor accordingly stopped the car to enable her to alight, but that

"Owing to the condition of the streets, and the surface of the earth at said point, said step stood at a point three feet above the level of the earth, upon which plaintiff was compelled to step in disembarking; that the defendant, notwithstanding its duty to furnish and provide a safe place of exit, * * * negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully failed and refused to furnish and provide any additional step or steps, or any contrivance other than said single step, whereby the egress of plaintiff from said car might be made in safety; that the plaintiff, in the due and proper exercise of care, attempted to disembark from said car at said point, but because of said negligence of the defendant, and its failure and refusal to do and perform its said duties, this plaintiff was thrown, and fell heavily upon the earth."

A demurrer to each paragraph of the complaint was overruled by the court, and a trial by jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $1000. The defendant appealed.

WILEY, J. * * * [30] By section 5454, Burns' 1901 (section 4147, R. S. 1881), it is required that a street railway track within city limits "shall conform exactly to the established grade of such street." There is no allegation in the complaint that appellant's track at the place of injury did not conform to the established grade. We may assume, therefore, as against the pleading, that it did. There is no fact averred which shows a negligent construction or operation of the car, and neither is there any negligence charged as to the construction of the track. As appellee approached the point where she desired to alight, she gave the signal for the car to stop. She avers that it did stop, and that she immediately undertook to get off. It is not averred that the car stopped at any improper or dangerous place, or that there was a safer or more convenient place for it to stop. There are no facts pleaded from which it can be said that appellant could have anticipated, or with reasonable care have prevented, the accident. It appears from the complaint that the cause of the accident was the distance from the step of the car to the surface of the street, and that that distance was so great that appellee fell, etc. The surface of the street at that point was lower than the top of the rail. Assuming that the track was laid to conform to the established grade of the street, it appears that the surface of the street had not been maintained in that condition. Appellant is not charged with the maintenance of streets occupied by its tracks, outside of that part of the street actually occupied by it. It is not averred that appellant was old or infirm, or that she required any assistance in alighting from the car. Ordinarily it is not the duty of those in charge of a street car to aid passengers to get on and off, but such duty would only arise where there is an apparent necessity for such assistance, and such necessity is brought to the attention of the servants. If there is any negligence charged in the first paragraph, it is the failure of appellant to furnish an extra step to enable appellee to alight safely. The facts exhibited do not justify us in holding that such a legal duty devolved upon appellant. In Young v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. (1902) 93 Mo. App. 267, it was said: "We know of no law, nor has our attention been called to any, which required the defendant to furnish portable steps for the use of its passengers in entering or leaving any of its cars." See, also, Barney v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co. (1895) 126 Mo. 372, 28 S. W. 1069, 26 L. R. A. 847; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Frey (1901) 25 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 61 S. W. 442. In this paragraph there are no facts pleaded which show that there was any necessity existing which would require appellant to furnish an extra step at the place of the accident. * * *

[30] The statement is abridged. Only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point. The court expressed an opinion also that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, on the ground that the plaintiff "is deemed actually to have seen what she could have seen, if she had looked; and also, if she did not look, or if she did look, but did not heed what she saw, such conduct was negligent on her part."

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to sustain the demurrer to each paragraph of the complaint.

SCOTT v. LONDON & ST. KATHERINE DOCKS CO.

(Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1865. 3 Hurl. & C. 596, 140 R. R. 627.)

This was an appeal against the decision of the Court of Exchequer in making absolute a rule to set aside the verdict for the defendants and for a new trial.

The declaration stated that the defendants were possessed of a warehouse, and of a certain crane or machine for lowering goods therefrom, and at the time of the grievances committed by them as hereinafter mentioned, they, by their servants in that behalf, were lowering by the said crane or machine from the said warehouse certain bags of sugar on to the ground and stone pavement in the docks of the said company, and on and along which the plaintiff was then lawfully passing; and the defendants, by their servants, so negligently, carelessly and improperly lowered the said bags of sugar and conducted themselves in that behalf that the same came and fell upon and against the plaintiff: Whereby the plaintiff was greatly wounded, bruised, hurt and permanently injured, &c. Plea. Not guilty, and issue thereon.

At the trial, before Martin, B., at the London sittings after Trinity Term, 1864, the plaintiff deposed as follows:

"I am an officer of the customs. I am an auxiliary examiner. I superintend weighing goods. On the 19th of January I had performed duty at the East Quay of the London Docks. I was directed to go from the East Quay to the Spirit Quay by Mr. Lilley, the surveyor. I went to the Spirit Quay in order to do duty. I proceeded on my way. There are warehouses on the Spirit Quay. I went to the entrance of one of the warehouses, and could not find Mr. Lilley. I was told he was in another warehouse. I was proceeding to where I was told he was at the time of the accident. I proceeded to the first door I met upon the quay. I went into the warehouse of which it was the door. I met a labouring man about two yards within the warehouse. I asked him if Mr. Lilley was there. He said, 'No, sir; you will find him in the next doorway.' In passing from one doorway to the other I was felled to the ground by six bags of sugar falling on me. (He then described the injuries he had received.) No one but myself was at the place. I had no warning. There was no fence or barrier. No one called out. I heard the rattling of a chain."

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's examination in chief the learned Judge expressed his opinion that, even assuming that the bags of sugar were being dealt with by the servants of the defendants in the course of their employment, and that the plaintiff was lawfully passing through the docks, there was not sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants to entitle him to leave the case to the jury; and his Lordship then directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants.

The Solicitor-General, in the following Michaelmas Term, obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, on the ground that there was evidence for the jury of negligence by the defendants' servants; which rule was made absolute in the same Term: whereupon the defendants brought this appeal.

Field (Murphy with him) argued for the defendants: There was no evidence of negligence which ought to have been submitted to the jury. This case is distinguishable from Byrne v. Boadle, 2 H. & C. 722, because the place in which the accident occurred was not, as there, a public highway, but a dock the property of a company, and the public had no right to walk in front of the warehouses. If, upon the evidence, the facts are as consistent with the absence of negligence as with negligence, there is no evidence for the jury. * * * The accident may be accounted for in many ways consistent with the absence of negligence. If a custom-house officer, in the performance of his duty, boarded a ship and fell down an open hatchway, the fact of the accident would be no evidence of negligence. (BLACKBURN, J. There is an old pleading rule, that less particularity is required when the facts lie more in the knowledge of the opposite party than of the party pleading. Applying that here, is not the fact of the accident sufficient evidence to call upon the defendants to prove that there was no negligence?)

The Solicitor-General, for the plaintiff: It is conceded that where the evidence is as equally consistent with due care as with negligence, there is no case for the jury. It is also conceded that it is not enough to show a mere scintilla of evidence. No rule can be laid down that the mere fact of an accident is evidence of negligence; for each case must depend on its own circumstances. In determining what evidence a plaintiff must give, regard must be had to what a person in his position may be reasonably expected to give. Assuming that there was negligence on the part of the defendants in hiring incompetent servants, what more evidence could the plaintiff have given unless he called adverse witnesses to prove facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants? * * * The true test is, whether the case is more consistent with negligence than care. Looking at the simple fact that the bags of sugar fell violently upon the plaintiff, this case is more consistent with negligence than care.[31]

ERLE, C. J. The majority of the Court have come to the following conclusions:

There must be reasonable evidence of negligence. But where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, [31] The arguments of counsel are slightly abridged.

it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care.

We all assent to the principles laid down in the cases cited for the defendants; but the judgment turns on the construction to be put on the Judge's notes. As my Brother MELLOR and myself read them we cannot find that reasonable evidence of negligence which has been apparent to the rest of the Court.

The judgment of the Court below must be affirmed, and the case must go down to a new trial, when the effect of the evidence will in all probability be more correctly ascertained.

Judgment affirmed.[32]

[32] "In Scott v. London Dock Co., the rule now known by the catch-word 'res ipsa loquitur' was clearly laid down, it is thought for the first time, by the Exchequer Chamber. The two judges who did not agree in the result do not appear to have dissented from the general statement of the law: they can hardly have thought, on the facts, that the falling of six bags of sugar on a customs officer did not call for some explanation; but the dissent is indicated with seemingly studious obscurity, and may well be left in that condition." Sir Frederick Pollock, 140 R. R. vi.

Compare: Byrne v. Boadle (1863) 2 H. & C. 722, 133 R. R. 761: (P. was walking in a public street past the shop of D., a dealer in flour, when a barrel of flour fell upon P. from a window in D.'s premises, above his shop. Pollock, C. B., remarked: "The learned counsel was quite right in saying that there are many accidents from which no presumption of negligence can arise, but I think it would be wrong to lay down as a rule that in no case can presumption of negligence arise from the fact of an accident. Suppose in this case the barrel had rolled out of the warehouse and fallen on the plaintiff, how could he possibly ascertain from what cause it occurred? It is the duty of persons who keep barrels in a warehouse to take care that they do not roll out, and I think that such a case would, beyond all doubt, afford prima facie evidence of negligence. A barrel could not roll out of a warehouse without some negligence, and to say that a plaintiff who is injured by it must call witnesses from the warehouse to prove negligence seems to me preposterous. * * * A man is passing in front of the premises of a dealer in flour, and there falls down upon him a barrel of flour. I think it apparent that the barrel was in the custody of the defendant who occupied the premises, and who is responsible for the acts of his servants who had the control of it: and in my opinion the fact of its falling is prima facie evidence of negligence, and the plaintiff who was injured by it is not bound to show that it could not fall without negligence, but if there are any facts inconsistent with negligence it is for the defendant to prove them.")

Kearney v. London, etc., Ry. Co. (1871) L. R. 6 Q. B. 760: (As P. was passing along a highway under D.'s railway bridge—a girder bridge resting on a perpendicular brick wall with pilasters—a brick fell from the top of the wall and struck him. There was no assignable cause except the slight vibration caused by a passing train. The bridge had been built and in use for three years.)

Cincinnati, etc., Ry. Co. v. South Fork Coal Co. (1905) 71 C. C. A. 316, 139 Fed. 528, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 533: (Defendant's train, following another of defendant's trains, ran into it with such force that the engine of the rear train telescoped several oil cars in the forward train. The oil escaped and sparks from the engine fell on it and started a fire which spread to and destroyed the plaintiff's property 50 feet away. Said Lurton, J., delivering the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals: "According to all human experience such a collision cannot occur without something abnormal. It may be that that abnormal cause may be one for which the defendant may not be legally liable, but the question is whether the burden of showing this to be the fact is not legally shifted to the defendant by evidence showing a state of things most unlikely to occur unless caused by the absence of due care. It cannot be un-

MULLEN v. ST. JOHN.

(Commission of Appeals of New York, 1874. 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530.)

This was an action to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, by the falling of a building in Brooklyn.

The defendants were the owners of a building called the Hamilton Market, standing on the corner of Hamilton avenue and Van Brunt street, in the city of Brooklyn. It was built in 1854, of brick, was leased to the defendants in 1863, and purchased by them in 1866. On the 26th of June, 1870, the building being then unoccupied, a part of its walls fell outward into Van Brunt street, and the plaintiff, who was on the sidewalk, about twenty-five feet from the rear of the building, was knocked down by the bricks and mortar, and received injuries for which this action was brought. There was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, with a judgment thereon. The defendant appealed.

DWIGHT, C. The question in the present case arises upon the charge of the judge, which is in the following terms, as far as an exception was taken, to wit:

"When the plaintiff proved that the building fell into the street and injured her, she had made out a case, in the absence of any explanation on the part of the defendants, as buildings do not usually or necessarily fall, and it is for the jury to say, under all the evidence, whether that explanation, on the part of the defendants, is reasonably made."

This passage is an extract from the charge, and was preceded by a statement, that when the cause of an accident is under the management of a person, and the accident is one which does not happen in the ordinary course of things if those who have this management use ordinary care, it is a reasonable presumption, in the absence of any explanation, that the accident resulted from a want of such care. It was followed by words to this effect: If the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care—the care a prudent person exercises in his own affairs—could have discovered and remedied this defect so as reasonable to ascribe to negligence the happening of a catastrophe, which was not likely to occur if due care had been exercised, until the cause is explained by other evidence. If, therefore, the nature of the accident is such as to make it altogether probable that it was caused by negligence, it makes a case which falls within the maxim res ipsa loquitur. Manifestly, a presumption of negligence does not arise upon mere evidence of an injury sustained. The inference logically as well as legally deducible is necessarily dependent upon the nature of the accident, the surrounding circumstances which characterize it and the relation of the parties. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 521. Many accidents do not speak for themselves. The maxim res ipsa loquitur does not, therefore, apply when the circumstances in evidence are of doubtful solution. That there should not be uniformity of opinion as to the applicability of the maxim is due not only to the infinite variety of circumstances under which injuries are inflicted, but to differences in respect of the standard of diligence applicable in different situations. In cases between passengers and carriers it has been most often applied, and sometimes in such sweeping terms as suggest application only to an action for breach of contract, rather than one grounded upon tort."

to have prevented this accident, then he is liable. If he could not, by such ordinary care, then he is not liable. The whole of the charge must be considered, and the question is, whether any erroneous rule was announced to the jury.

The solution of this question will depend upon the fact, whether there was any duty imposed upon the owners of the building in respect to persons passing along the highway, and whether a presumption of negligence can be raised from the circumstances under which its fall occurred. In regard to the question of duty there can be no reasonable doubt. If a person erects a building upon a city street, or an ordinary highway, he is under a legal obligation to take reasonable care that it shall not fall into the street and injure persons lawfully there. It cannot be affirmed that he is liable for any injury that may occur, whether by inevitable accident or the wrongful act of others. It is not to be disputed however that he is liable for want of reasonable care. * * *

Assuming the foregoing propositions to be true, it may be further insisted that the question, whether an owner has used reasonable care or not, will depend on all the circumstances of the case. Buildings properly constructed do not fall without adequate cause. If there be no tempest prevailing or no external violence of any kind, the fair presumption is, that the fall occurred through adequate causes, such as the ruinous condition of the building, which could scarcely have escaped the observation of the owner. The mind is thus led to a presumption of negligence on his part, which may, of course, be rebutted. In the absence of explanatory evidence, negligence may be presumed. * * *[33]

In the case at bar the walls of the building, without any special circumstances of storm or violence, fell into the street. There was some evidence tending to show that it was out of repair. Without laying any stress upon the affirmative testimony, it is as impossible to conceive of this building so falling unless it was badly constructed or in bad repair, as it is to suppose that a seaworthy ship would go to the bottom in a tranquil sea and without collision. The mind, necessarily, seeks for a cause for the fall. That is, apparently, the bad condition of the structure. This, again, leads to the inference of negligence which the defendant should rebut.

The same principle prevails in the Roman law. Thus, it is laid down in 1 Domat on Civil Law (1557): "If tiles fall from the roof of a house, which was in good case, and by the bare effect of a storm, the damage which may happen by such fall is an accident, for which the proprietor or tenant of the house cannot be made accountable. But, if the roof was in a bad condition, he who was bound to keep it in repair may be liable to make good the damage that has happened, according to the circumstances."

[33] In an omitted portion of the opinion, the Court referred to and quoted from Kearney v. London, etc., Ry. (1871) L. R. 6 Q. B. 760; Byrne v. Boadle (1863) 2 H. & C. 722; Scott v. London Dock Company (1865) 3 H. & C. 596, the facts of which appear ante.

The case of Losee v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623, is not opposed to these views. There the question was, whether one was liable for the explosion of a steamboiler which he had operated with care and skill; or, in other words, whether he was bound, at all events, to prevent the effects of an explosion from injuring another. The present question is one simply of presumptions in the law of evidence, which was not at all involved in Losee v. Buchanan, supra; while that case holds that there must be evidence of negligence, it does not at all prescribe the mode of proving it, which, as has been abundantly shown, may in such cases as the present be by presumption. The cases concerning the management of railroads concur with this view; holding that where the company has the control of the car and the track, and the car leaves the track, the presumption of negligence may arise. Edgerton v. New York & Harlem Railroad Co., 39 N. Y. 227; Curtis v. Rochester & Syracuse Railroad Co., 18 N. Y. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 258.

There was no error in the charge of the judge, and the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

PIEHL v. ALBANY RY.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1898. 30 App. Div. 166, 51 N. Y. Supp. 755.)

The action was against the Albany Railway, to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, caused, as alleged, by the defendant's negligence. The defendant operated a street railway by means of electrical power, and had a power house in which five steam engines were used to generate this power. On November 12, 1895, the fly wheel, 18 feet in diameter and weighing 50,000 pounds, attached to one of these engines, burst, while in operation, and one of its fragments was thrown across a public street into a saloon, and there struck and killed the plaintiff's intestate.

LANDON, J. Upon the former appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff entered upon the verdict of a jury, the single question presented by the record was whether the evidence supported the finding that the bursting of the fly wheel was due to the negligence or incompetency of the defendant's servant in charge of the engine, and we held that it did not. 19 App. Div. 471, 46 N. Y. Supp. 257. Upon the trial now under review the plaintiff was nonsuited at the close of her case. She asked to go to the jury, upon all the facts in the case, upon the questions whether the defendant was negligent, or was maintaining and operating a nuisance, and her request was denied. The question whether the explosion was due to the negligence or incompetency of the defendant's servant in charge is not now urged. The learned counsel for the plaintiff insists (1) that the fact that the fly wheel burst is of itself presumptive evidence of negligence; (2) that its maintenance and operation in the midst of a densely inhabited part of the city was a nuisance; (3) that the evidence tended to show that the engine was out of order at the time of the explosion, and some time prior to it, and that defendant knew it.

The general rule is that proof of an accident is not of itself proof of negligence. There are some exceptions to the rule. Thus, in Hogan v. Railway Co., 149 N. Y. 23, 43 N. E. 403, it is said that, "if a person erects a building, bridge, or other structure upon a city street or an ordinary highway, he is under a legal obligation to take reasonable care that nothing shall fall into the street and injure persons lawfully there. This being so, it is further assumed that buildings, bridges, and other structures properly constructed do not ordinarily fall upon the wayfarer. So, also, if anything falls from them upon a person lawfully passing along the street or highway, the accident is prima facie evidence of negligence,"—citing Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530; Volkmar v. Railway Co., 134 N. Y. 418, 31 N. E. 870, 30 Am. St. Rep. 678, and cases there cited. It is also presumed in favor of a passenger that a well constructed and managed railway train will not leave the track. Edgerton v. Railroad Co., 39 N. Y. 227; Curtis v. Railway Co., 18 N. Y. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 258; Guldseth v. Carlin, 19 App. Div. 588, 46 N. Y. Supp. 357; Gerlach v. Edelmeyer, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. 292, affirmed 88 N. Y. 645. Also, if a passenger is injured by some unusual action or defect in the appliances of conveyance, that the carrier is negligent. Poulsen v. Railroad Co., 18 App. Div. 221, 45 N. Y. Supp. 941; Gilmore v. Railroad Co., 6 App. Div. 119, 39 N. Y. Supp. 417. The traveler upon the highway ought to be reasonably free from the infliction by others of injuries by external violence, and hence, when a span wire supporting defendant's trolley broke and injured plaintiff, the defendant should be put to an explanation. Jones v. Railway Co., 18 App. Div. 267, 46 N. Y. Supp. 321; Clarke v. Railroad Co., 9 App. Div. 51, 41 N. Y. Supp. 78; Gall v. Railway Co. (Super. N. Y.) 5 N. Y. Supp. 185; Cole v. Bottling Co., 23 App. Div. 177, 48 N. Y. Supp. 893. Some injuries are of such a nature that the first thought that occurs to the mind is that nothing but carelessness or willfulness could have produced them. The law adopts the same idea. "Res ipsa loquitur." Stallman v. Steam Co., 17 App. Div. 397, 45 N. Y. Supp. 161. Sometimes the situation is such as to suggest negligence, and the defendant alone is able, or is presumed to be able, to furnish the facts. Wintringham v. Hayes, 144 N. Y. 1, 38 N. E. 999, 43 Am. St. Rep. 725; Collins v. Bennett, 46 N. Y. 490.

Now, in all these cases, although the burden rests upon the plaintiff to prove negligence, he does prove it, prima facie, by proving what happened, not what caused it to happen. This fly wheel burst.

There is no affirmative proof of negligence, other than the explosion. There is evidence showing the situation of the power house, and a general description of the fly wheel and engine, and of their uses. The engine with its fly wheel, was used in generating the electrical power by which the defendant operated its street cars, and had been so used for two years before the explosion. It was purchased from the manufacturers. In such case the authorities are to the effect that the mere fact of the explosion is not prima facie evidence of negligence. Losee v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623; Cosulich v. Oil Co., 122 N. Y. 118, 25 N. E. 259, 19 Am. St. Rep. 475; Reiss v. Steam Co., 128 N. Y. 103, 28 N. E. 24. Why distinguish this class of cases from the others? The better question is, why make it an exception to the general rule? I assume it is not excepted, because such are the limitations upon human foresight that every reasonable care does not always prevent accidents, and that such is the nature of steam and electricity, and of the engines by or upon which they operate, that, when such an explosion as this occurs, our experience, or even expert experience, is not sufficiently uniform to justify us in presuming that negligence is the cause. The explosion does not, in fact, speak for itself and tell us its cause. * * *

[34] Compare: Griffen v. Manice (1901) 166 N. Y. 188, 59 N. E. 925, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, where Cullen, J., discussing the principle, remarked:

"In Mullen v. St. John [1874] 57 N. Y. 567 [15 Am. Rep. 530], it was held that the falling of an adjacent building into the street whereby the plaintiff traveling on the street was injured, was prima facie evidence of negligence. In Piehl v. Albany Railway Co. [1898] 30 App. Div. 166 [51 N. Y. Supp. 755], affirmed [1900] 162 N. Y. 617 [57 N. E. 1122], a fly wheel was disrupted and a portion of it cast across the street into a saloon, killing the plaintiff's intestate. It was held that the mere bursting of the fly wheel was not sufficient to warrant an inference of negligence. These two cases proceeded on the differing views that this court took as to the nature of the respective accidents, not on the situation of the parties. I think it may be safely said that we would not have held the defendant liable in the latter case had Piehl been killed in the street, or in the earlier case, the defendant exempt, had the plaintiff been injured while in a neighboring building. To put it tersely, the court thought that in the absence of tempest or external violence a building does not ordinarily fall without negligence; while it also thought that the disruption of a fly wheel proceeds so often from causes which science has been unable to discover or against which art cannot guard, that negligence cannot be inferred from the occurrence alone. Authority is not wanting on the point. In Green v. Banta [1882] 48 N. Y. Super. Ct. 156, a workman was injured by the breaking down of a scaffold. In a suit against his master, the court charged: 'The fact that the scaffold gave way is some evidence—it is what might be called prima facie evidence—of negligence on the part of the person or persons who were bound to provide a safe and proper scaffold.' This charge was held correct by the General Term of the Superior Court of the city of New York and the decision affirmed by this court, 97 N. Y. 627. In Mulcairns v. City of Janesville (1886) 67 Wis. 24, 29 N. W. 565, the fall of a wall was held presumptive evidence of negligence in a suit by a servant against his master. In Smith v. Boston Gaslight Co., 129 Mass. 318, it was held that the escape of gas from the pipes of a gas company was prima facie evidence of negligence. In that case there seems to have been no contractual relations whatever between the parties. In Peck v. N. Y. Central

PATTON v. TEXAS & P. RY. CO.

Patton brought this action against the railway company to recover for injuries sustained by him while in its employment as fireman. A judgment in his favor was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. 9 C. C. A. 487, 23 U. S. App. 319, 61 Fed. 259. On a second trial in the Circuit Court the judge directed a verdict for the defendant, upon which judgment was rendered. This judgment was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. 37 C. C. A. 56, 95 Fed. 244. Thereupon the plaintiff brought error.

The facts were that the plaintiff was a fireman on a passenger train of the defendant, running from El Paso to Toyah and return. Some three or four hours after one of those trips had been made,

R. R. Co. (1901) 165 N. Y. 347, 59 N. E. 206, which was an action for injury to plaintiff's property by fire, it was said: 'But while it was necessary for the plaintiff to affirmatively establish negligence on the part of the defendant, either in the condition or in the operation of its engine, for which the mere occurrence of the fire was not sufficient, it was not necessary that he should prove either the specific defect in the engine or the particular act of misconduct in its management or operation constituting the negligence causing the injury complained of. It was sufficient if he proved facts and circumstances from which the jury might fairly infer that the engine was either defective in its condition or negligently operated.' This is the principle which underlies the maxim of "res ipsa loquitur." When the facts and circumstances from which the jury is asked to infer negligence are those immediately attendant on the occurrence, we speak of it as a case of 'res ipsa loquitur'; when not immediately connected with the occurrence, then it is an ordinary case of circumstantial evidence. In Benedick v. Potts (1898) 88 Md. 52, 40 Atl. 1067, 41 L. R. A. 478, it is said: 'In no instance can the bare fact that an injury has happened, of itself and divorced from all the surrounding circumstances, justify the inference that the injury was caused by negligence. It is true that direct proof of negligence is not necessary. Like any other fact, negligence may be established by the proof of circumstances from which its existence may be inferred. * * * This phrase (res ipsa loquitur), which literally translated means that 'the thing speaks for itself,' is merely a short way of saying that the circumstances attendant upon an accident are themselves of such a character as to justify a jury in inferring negligence as the cause of that accident.'

"Returning now to the case before us, it appears that the deceased was present by the implied invitation of the defendant, extended to him and all others who might have lawful business on the premises, to use the elevator as a means of proceeding from one story to another. The defendant, therefore, owed the plaintiff the duty of using at least reasonable care in seeing that the premises were safe. The death of the plaintiff's intestate was caused by the fall of the counterbalance weights. These weights were held in a frame, to which was attached a rope or cable passing around a drum. The weights fell down from the frame and the rope was thrown off the drum. That no such accident could ordinarily have occurred had the elevator machinery been in proper condition and properly operated seems to me very plain. The court was, therefore, justified in permitting the jury to infer negligence from the accident, construing, as I do, the term accident to include not only the injury but the attendant circumstances."

See also 29 Cyc. 590, the notes to Mullen v. St. John (1874) 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530, in 6 N. Y. Ann. Dig. 289, and Key No. "Negligence," §§ 121 (2), 136 (6).

and while the engine of which he was fireman was being moved in the railroad yards at El Paso, plaintiff attempted to step off the engine, and in doing so the step turned, and he fell so far under the engine that the wheels passed over his right foot. Plaintiff alleged that the step turned because the nut which held it was not securely fastened; that the omission to have it so fastened was negligence on the part of the company, for which it was liable.

MR. JUSTICE BREWER. The plaintiff's contention is that the trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant, and in failing to leave the question of negligence to the jury. * * *

Upon these facts we make these observations: First. That while in the case of a passenger the fact of an accident carries with it a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, a presumption which, in the absence of some explanation or proof to the contrary, is sufficient to sustain a verdict against him, for there is prima facie a breach of his contract to carry safely (Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. Ed. 115; New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. Pollard, 22 Wall. 341, 22 L. Ed. 877; Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co., 140 U. S. 435, 443, 35 L. Ed. 458, 463, 11 Sup. Ct. 859), a different rule obtains as to an employé. The fact of accident carries with it no presumption of negligence on the part of the employer; and it is an affirmative fact for the injured employé to establish that the employer has been guilty of negligence (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett, 166 U. S. 617, 41 L. Ed. 1136, 17 Sup. Ct. 707). Second. That in the latter case it is not sufficient for the employé to show that the employer may have been guilty of negligence; the evidence must point to the fact that he was. And where the testimony leaves the matter uncertain and shows that any one of half a dozen things may have brought about the injury, for some of which the employer is responsible and for some of which he is not, it is not for the jury to guess between these half a dozen causes and find that the negligence of the employer was the real cause when there is no satisfactory foundation in the testimony for that conclusion. If the employé is unable to adduce sufficient evidence to show negligence on the part of the employer, it is only one of the many cases in which the plaintiff fails in his testimony; and no mere sympathy for the unfortunate victim of an accident justifies any departure from settled rules of proof resting upon all plaintiffs. Third. That while the employer is bound to provide a safe place and safe machinery in which and with which the employé is to work, and while this is a positive duty resting upon him, and one which he may not avoid by turning it over to some employé, it is also true that there is no guaranty by the employer that place and machinery shall be absolutely safe. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 218, 25 L. Ed. 612, 615; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 386, 37 L. Ed. 772, 780, 13 Sup. Ct. 914; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 157 U. S. 72, 87, 39 L. Ed. 624, 630, 15 Sup. Ct. 491; Texas & P. R. Co. v.

Archibald, 170 U. S. 665, 669, 42 L. Ed. 1188, 1190, 18 Sup. Ct. 777. He is bound to take reasonable care and make reasonable effort; and the greater the risk which attends the work to be done and the machinery to be used, the more imperative is the obligation resting upon him. Reasonable care becomes, then, a demand of higher supremacy; and yet, in all cases, it is a question of the reasonableness of the care; reasonableness depending upon the danger attending the place or the machinery.

The rule in respect to machinery, which is the same as that in respect to place, was thus accurately stated by Mr. Justice Lamar, for this court, in Washington & Georgetown Railroad v. McDade, 135 U. S. 554, 570, 34 L. Ed. 235, 241, 10 Sup. Ct. 1044:

"Neither individuals nor corporations are bound, as employers, to insure the absolute safety of machinery or mechanical appliances which they provide for the use of their employés. Nor are they bound to supply the best and safest or newest of those appliances for the purpose of securing the safety of those who are thus employed. They are, however, bound to use all reasonable care and prudence for the safety of those in their service, by providing them with machinery reasonably safe and suitable for the use of the latter. If the employer or master fails in this duty of precaution and care, he is responsible for any injury which may happen through a defect of machinery which was, or ought to have been, known to him, and was unknown to the employé or servant."

Tested by these rules we do not feel justified in disturbing the judgment, approved as it was by the trial judge and the several judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals. Admittedly, the step, the rod, the nut, were suitable and in good condition. Admittedly, the inspectors at El Paso and Toyah were competent. Admittedly, when the engine started on its trip from El Paso the step was securely fastened, the plaintiff himself being a witness thereto. The engineer used it in safety up to the time of the engine's return to El Paso. The plaintiff was not there called upon to have anything to do with the engine until after it had been inspected and repaired. He chose, for his own convenience, to go upon the engine and do his work prior to such inspection. No one can say from the testimony how it happened that the step became loose. Under those circumstances it would be trifling with the rights of parties for a jury to find that the plaintiff had proved that the injury was caused by the negligence of the employer.

The judgment is affirmed.[35]

CARNEY v. BOSTON ELEVATED RY. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1912. 212 Mass. 179, 98 N. E. 605, 42 L. R. A. [N. S.] 90, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 302.)

Action against the Elevated Railway for damages because of a personal injury through the defendant's alleged negligence. There was a judgment for defendant; the plaintiff brings exceptions.

SHELDON, J. The plaintiff was injured while she was riding in an open surface car beneath the defendant's elevated structure. She heard the rumble of an elevated train over her car, "saw the sparks flying," looked up and was struck in the eye by a spark, which could be found to have been a minute piece of hot iron, about as large as the fine end of a pin, coming from the elevated road, and, as we assume, from the contact shoe of the train which was passing thereon. The structure was properly in the street and the defendant was authorized to operate its road by electricity. There was no evidence that it was a frequent occurrence for sparks to fall from its passing trains into the street, or indeed that this had ever before happened. There was nothing to indicate that the defendant ought to have foreseen this danger and to have guarded against it or given warning of its existence. There was no evidence that there was any practicable method or device for checking the emission of sparks from its trains or its electrical apparatus, or preventing their fall to the street, which the defendant had failed to adopt. There was nothing to show any lack of proper care on the part of the defendant in the operation of its trains or cars. Under these circumstances it is manifest that the cases of Woodall v. Boston Elev. St. Ry., 192 Mass. 308, 78 N. E. 446, and Walsh v. Boston Elev., 192 Mass. 423, 78 N. E. 451, cannot help the plaintiff. The ground on which those cases were decided, that there was evidence of an existing danger and of negligence on the part of the defendant in not providing an appliance to prevent the falling of sparks into the street, and in not applying to the railroad commissioners for the approval of a plan to accomplish that object, is lacking here. Either she has chosen, or the facts of the case have compelled her, to rest her claim simply upon the ground that she has been injured by a spark falling on her eye and that this spark came from a train of the defendant lawfully operated upon its elevated railroad.

She contends accordingly that these facts present a case for the application of the doctrine res ipsa loquitur—that negligence of the defendant may be inferred from the bare fact that she has been injured in the manner stated. It is true no doubt that the cause of her injury could be found to have come from the operation of apparatus which had been furnished and applied by the defendant and was wholly under its management and control. McDonough v. Boston Elevated Ry., 208 Mass. 436, 94 N. E. 809; Le Barron v. East Boston Ferry Co., 11

Allen, 312, 317, 87 Am. Dec. 717; Miller v. Ocean Steamship Co., 118 N. Y. 199, 23 N. E. 462; Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. R., 140 U. S. 435, 11 Sup. Ct. 859, 35 L. Ed. 458; Scott v. London Dock Co., 3 H. & C. 596; Kearney v. London, Brighton & South Coast Ry., L. R. 5 Q. B. 411. But this single circumstance is not always enough. Where as here the cause of the accident has come from the lawful operation by lawful means of an authorized instrumentality, and where any damage or injury that has resulted may have come without any negligence of the defendant, but may have arisen merely as an unavoidable accident from the careful and skillful exercise of its lawful rights in spite of the observance of all proper precautions, there no liability can arise without some affirmative evidence of negligence. In such a case the happening of the accident with the resulting injury is as likely to have come without the fault of the defendant as to have been due to its negligence, and the presumption of fact upon which the doctrine res ipsa loquitur is based does not arise; the inference of negligence cannot be drawn without some evidence to support it. Beattie v. Boston Elev. St. Ry., 201 Mass. 3, 6, 86 N. E. 920; Minihan v. Boston Elev. St. Ry., 197 Mass. 367, 373, 83 N. E. 871; Thomas v. Boston Elev. St. Ry., 193 Mass. 438, 79 N. E. 749; Wadsworth v. Boston Elev. St. Ry., 182 Mass. 572, 574, 66 N. E. 421; Clare v. New York & New England R. R., 167 Mass. 39, 44 N. E. 1054; Graham v. Badger, 164 Mass. 42, 47, 41 N. E. 61. For this reason we recently have held that in the absence of a statutory liability a railroad company is not liable, without evidence of negligence on its part, for damage done by fire caused by sparks from its locomotive engines. Wallace v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 208 Mass. 16, 94 N. E. 306.

For the same reasons, in two cases closely resembling that which is here presented, it was held that no inference of negligence could be drawn from the happening of the accident, and the plaintiff was not allowed to recover. Searles v. Manhattan Ry., 101 N. Y. 661, 5 N. E. 66; Wiedmer v. New York Elev. R. R., 114 N. Y. 462, 21 N. E. 1041. In the last cited case, the court said that the evidence disclosed a single colorless fact, the emission of a coal smaller than a pinhead, and that the rule res ipsa loquitur has not been extended for enough to authorize from this fact an inference of actionable negligence.

It is perfectly consistent with the evidence that the defendant has taken all the precautions that were suggested in Woodall v. Boston Elev. St. Ry., 192 Mass. 308, 78 N. E. 446, or which since have been discovered to be possible. If so, it has not been guilty of negligence. It follows that the judge at the trial acted rightly in ordering a verdict in its favor.

Exceptions overruled.

III. Plaintiff's Actual Damage

ASHBY v. WHITE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1703. Holt, 524, 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 90 Reprint, 1188, 92 Reprint, 126.)

In an action upon the case against the constables of Ailesbury, the plaintiff declared, that such a day the late King's writ issued and was delivered to the Sheriff of B. for election of members of Parliament in his county; whereupon the said sheriff made out his precept or warrant to the defendants, being constables of A., to chuse two burgesses for that borough, which precept was delivered to the said constables; and that in pursuance thereof, the burgesses were duly assembled, etc., and the plaintiff, being then duly qualified to vote for the election of two burgesses, offered to give his voice to Sir T. L. and S. M. Esq.; to be burgesses of Parliament for the said borough; but the defendants knowing the premisses, with malice, etc., obstructed him from voting, and refused and would not receive his vote, nor allow it; and that two burgesses were chose, without allowing or receiving his voice.

After a verdict for the plaintiff on not guilty pleaded, it was moved in arrest of judgment by Serjeant Whitacre, that this action was not maintainable. And for the difficulty it was ordered to stand in the paper, and was argued Trin. 1 Q. Anne by Mr. Weld and Mr. Mountague for the defendants, and this term judgment was given against the plaintiff, by the opinion of Powell, Powys, and Gould, Justices, Holt, Chief Justice being of opinion for the plaintiff. * * *

Holt, Chief Justice. The single question in this case is, whether, if a free burgess of a corporation, who has an undoubted right to give his vote in the election of a burgess to serve in Parliament, be refused and hindered to give it by the officer, if an action on the case will lie against such officer. * * *

And I am of opinion, that this action on the case is a proper action. My brother Powell indeed thinks, that an action upon the case is not maintainable because there is no hurt or damage to the plaintiff; but surely every injury imports a damage, though it does not cost the party one farthing, and it is impossible to prove the contrary; for a damage is not merely pecuniary, but an injury imports a damage, when a man is thereby hindered of his right. As in an action for slanderous words, though a man does not lose a penny by reason of the speaking them, yet he shall have an action. So if a man gives another a cuff on the ear, though it cost him nothing, no not so much as a little diachylon, yet he shall have his action, for it is a personal injury. So a man shall have an action against another for riding over his ground, though it do him no damage; for it is an invasion of his property, and the other has no right to come there.

And in these cases the action is brought vi et armis. But for invasion of another's franchise, trespass vi et armis does not lie, but an action of trespass on the case; as where a man has retorna brevium, he shall have an action against any one who enters and invades his franchise, though he lose nothing by it. So here in the principal case, the plaintiff is obstructed of his right, and shall therefore have his action. And it is no objection to say, that it will occasion multiplicity of actions; for if men will multiply injuries, actions must be multiplied too; for every man that is injured ought to have his recompence. * * * So the case of Hunt and Dowman, 2 Cro. 478, where an action on the case is brought by him in reversion against lessee for years, for refusing to let him enter into the house, to see whether any waste was committed. In that case the action is not founded on the damage, for it did not appear that any waste was done, but because the plaintiff was hindered in the enjoyment of his right, and surely no other reason for the action can be supposed. * * *†

†The statement of facts is from Holt, 524; the rest of the case is from Lord Raymond.

The opinions of Gould and Powell, JJ., reported in Lord Raymond, are omitted; only a portion of Chief Justice Holt's opinion is given.

The judgment of the King's Bench, for the defendant, "was reversed in the House of Lords and judgment given for the plaintiff by fifty Lords against sixteen." See 2 Ld. Raym. 958, 92 Reprint, 138.

The principle of Ashby v. White has a wider range than negligence case. For its application in a negligence case, see Clifton v. Hooper (1844) 6 Q. B. 468, 115 Reprint, 175.

See the remarks of Mr. Justice Story, in Webb v. Portland Mfg. Co. (1838) 3 Sumn. 189, Fed Cas. No. 17,322: "I can very well understand that no action lies in a case where there is a damnum absque injuria, that is, where there is a damage done without any wrong or violation of any right of the plaintiff. But I am not able to understand how it can correctly be said, in a legal sense, that an action will not lie, even in case of a wrong or violation of a right, unless it is followed by some perceptible damage, which can be established, as a matter of fact; in other words, that injuria sine damno is not actionable. See Mayor of Lynn v. Mayor of London, 4 Term R. 130, 141, 143, 144; Com. Dig. 'Action on the Case,' B, 1, 2. On the contrary, from my earliest reading, I have considered it laid up among the very elements of the common law that, wherever there is a wrong, there is a remedy to redress it; and that every injury imports damage in the nature of it; and, if no other damage is established, the party injured is entitled to a verdict for nominal damages. A fortiori this doctrine applies where there is not only a violation of a right of the plaintiff, but the act of the defendant, if continued, may become the foundation, by lapse of time, of an adverse right in the defendant; for then it assumes the character, not merely of a violation of a right tending to diminish its value, but it goes to the absolute destruction and extinguishment of it. Under such circumstances, unless the party injured can protect his right from such a violation by an action, it is plain that it may be lost or destroyed, without any possible remedial redress. In my judgment, the common law countenances no such inconsistency, not to call it by a stronger name. Actual, perceptible damage is not indispensable as the foundation of an action. The law tolerates no farther inquiry than whether there has been the violation of a right. If so, the party injured is entitled to maintain his action for nominal damages, in vindication of his right, if no other damages are fit and proper to remunerate him."

But see the reasoning of Baron Parke in Embrey v. Owen (1851) 6 Ex. 353, 368, 86 R. R. 331, 343: "It was very ably argued before us by the learned

HOBSON et al. v. THELLUSON.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1867. L. R. 2 Q. B. 642.)

Declaration against the defendant as sheriff of Yorkshire for not duly executing a writ of fi. fa. at the suit of the plaintiffs against the goods of John Bower, and for falsely returning that Bower had no goods in the defendant's bailiwick whereon the defendant could levy. Pleas: (1) Not guilty; (2) that there were not at the time, or after the delivery of the writ, any goods of Bower in the defendant's bailiwick whereon the defendant could have levied; (3) that the plaintiffs sustained no damage by reason of the matters alleged in the declaration. Issue joined.

At the trial, it appeared that the plaintiffs obtained judgment for £284 against John Bower, a cloth merchant at Huddersfield, and a trader within the bankruptcy laws; and a writ of fi. fa. was issued and lodged in London with the undersheriff for Yorkshire on the 23d of May, 1866; and a warrant was sent down to Mr. Thornton, an officer of the sheriff at Huddersfield, by the evening post of that day, and was delivered at his office there at half past seven in the morning of the 24th of May. Jaggar, the assistant to Mr. Thornton, went to the office about a quarter past nine. Jaggar opened the warrants, and on coming to the warrant against Bower's goods, which he had reason the day before to expect, he at once sent off one Sizer to watch Bower's warehouse, which was 400 or 500 yards off; and on Mr. Thornton coming in about five minutes afterwards Jaggar went off himself to the warehouse with the warrant. He got to the warehouse at twenty-five minutes past nine, and found the outer door fastened with two locks. Sizer was left, and remained on the watch till just before ten o'clock, when he withdrew in consequence of a message from Thornton, the door being still locked. Bower, it appeared, had had notice of the writ, counsel for the plaintiffs, that the plaintiffs had a right to the full flow of the water in its natural course and abundance, as an incident to their property in the land through which it flowed; and that any abstraction of the water, however inconsiderable, by another riparian proprietor, and though productive of no actual damage, would be actionable, because it was an injury to a right, and, if continued, would be the foundation for a claim of adverse right in that proprietor. We by no means dispute the truth of this proposition, with respect to every description of right. Actual perceptible damage is not indispensable as the foundation of an action; it is sufficient to show a violation of a right, in which case the law will presume damage; injuria sine damno is actionable, as was laid down in the case of Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Ray. 938, by Lord Holt, and in many subsequent cases, which are all referred to, and the truth of the proposition powerfully enforced, in a very able judgment of the late Mr. Justice Story in Webb v. Portland Mfg. Co., 3 Sumn. Rep. 189, Fed. Cas. No. 17,322. But in applying this admitted rule to the case of rights to running water, and the analogous cases of rights to air and light, it must be considered what the nature of those rights is, and what is a violation of them." In this case it was held that, as no actual damage had been caused to the plaintiff by the defendant's act, there had been "no injury in fact or in law in this case, and consequently that the verdict for the defendant ought not to be disturbed."

and had had the warehouse kept closed in consequence; and he went to the office of Mr. Learoyd, his attorney, on the morning of the 24th of May, and told him that an execution was out against his, Bower's goods; and at Mr. Learoyd's suggestion a deed of assignment was drawn up, in form schedule D to the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and executed by Bower at a few minutes before ten, by which Bower conveyed all his goods to Robert Wood and Thomas Hirst, two of his creditors, to be applied for the benefit of themselves and all the other creditors. Thornton, the sheriff's officer, was at once informed of the deed, and took possession of the goods in the warehouse by Learoyd's direction on behalf of the trustees under the deed. Learoyd was not at this time employed by the trustees, but he became their attorney soon afterwards. Neither of the trustees assented to the deed at the time of execution, but Wood executed it on the afternoon of the 24th of May, and Hirst a few days afterwards. A meeting of Bower's creditors was held on the 4th of June as to what was the best course to pursue, and most of the requisite assents to the deed were given on that day, but the plaintiffs refused theirs; and it was determined that no preference of any kind should be allowed to any creditor, and bankruptcy was suggested as the alternative if some arrangement was not come to. Meetings were again held on the 12th and 19th of June, and on the last occasion the plaintiffs agreed to suspend their proceedings, and it was determined to wind up under the deed; and the requisite assents having been obtained, the deed was registered on the 21st of June.

The learned judge told the jury that a sheriff's officer might break open the door of a warehouse, but was not bound in law to do so at once; and he left it to them to say whether the sheriff had used due diligence in executing the warrant, that is, could the officer, with due diligence, have made the levy before ten o'clock? If they thought the officer ought to have broken the locks at once they would find for the plaintiffs, otherwise for the defendant. The jury found for the defendant, leave being reserved to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs, for such sum (if any) as the Court should think them entitled to, the Court to have power to draw any inference of fact not inconsistent with the finding of the jury as to the breaking of the locks.

A rule was obtained to enter the verdict for the amount of the judgment, or for the costs of action and execution, or for nominal damages.

BLACKBURN, J. * * *[36] Notwithstanding the execution of the deed, the sheriff might and ought to have levied on the goods during any part of the 24th of May. Next comes the question, what damage have the plaintiffs sustained? Prima facie, the damage is measured by the whole value of the goods which might have been seized. But at ten o'clock, before the sheriff might and ought to have levied, [36] The argument of counsel, a portion of the opinion of Blackburn, J., and the concurring opinion of Mellor, J., are omitted.

Bower executed the deed of assignment of all his goods, and this was for the very purpose of defeating and delaying the execution creditors, and it was therefore an act of bankruptcy. * * * Therefore, at ten in the morning of the 24th of May, before the sheriff was in default, that had happened which would have been available as an act of bankruptcy, and if the officer had proceeded afterwards to levy, instead of taking possession under the deed, by section 74 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, he could not have sold till after three days, and then only by public auction; so that I cannot doubt, when drawing inferences of fact, that if the sheriff had proceeded with the execution and had levied and had then advertised the sale, as he was bound to do under section 74, the very first thing that would have happened would have been that the execution would have been brought to the notice of the trustees, or some other of the creditors, and they would infallibly have made the present plaintiffs and their attorney fully aware of the deed, setting it up in all probability, as in fact they did, as a valid transfer. What, then, would have been the consequence of this state of facts? Why, that by section 133 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1849 the plaintiffs would have got no benefit at all from their execution; for if they had proceeded with it there would have been an adjudication of bankruptcy, and then there would have been execution levied, but not completed by sale until after notice of the previous act of bankruptcy.

Mr. Manisty says that these probable facts ought not to be taken into consideration, and that we ought not to speculate on probabilities, or whether or not the creditors would have made Bower a bankrupt. If that position were followed out to its consequences, the damages would in every case be the value of the goods which ought to have been seized. But if you may take any facts into consideration which go to show that the execution creditor would not have reaped the full advantage of his execution, I do not see why you may not take all the facts that would probably occur as against the execution creditor's prima facie presumption that the damages are the full value of the goods. It appears to me, as a juryman, an absolute certainty that notice of the act of bankruptcy would have been brought home to the plaintiffs before sale; and balancing the weight of probabilities, I think there is the strongest probability that had the defendant levied there would have been an adjudication of bankruptcy; and I accordingly draw the inference that the plaintiffs would have derived no benefit from their execution had it been proceeded with. Consequently they have suffered no damage from the defendant's breach of duty.

The question remains, are they entitled to a verdict for nominal damages? I think not. The one case is anomalous and exceptional, that a creditor may maintain an action for nominal damages for an escape on a ca. sa., although the custody of the debtor would have been of no value to him, and the ground seems to be that the creditor has a right to have the body of his debtor. Whether the reasoning is satisfactory or not, it has no application to the case of not levying on goods. On the whole, therefore, it appears to me that the verdict for the defendant must stand, and the rule be discharged.

Rule discharged.

SULLIVAN v. OLD COLONY ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1908. 200 Mass. 303, 86 N. E. 511.)

Tort. The first count in the declaration alleged that while the plaintiff was a passenger on an electric car of the defendant the car was derailed owing to the defendant's negligence "whereby the plaintiff was jolted and in many ways injured externally and internally." * * * The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

SHELDON, J. No question was made at the trial but that the defendant was liable for an injury done to the plaintiff by reason of its car having left the track. But if no injury was caused by this to the plaintiff, if he suffered no damage whatever from the defendant's negligence, then he would not be entitled to recover. Although there has been negligence in the performance of a legal duty, yet it is only those who have suffered damage therefrom that may maintain an action therefor. Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503, 507; Farrell v. Waterbury Horse R. Co., 60 Conn. 239, 246, 21 Atl. 675, 22 Atl. 544; Salmon v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 38 N. J. Law, 5, 11, 20 Am. Rep. 356; 2 Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 791; Wharton on Negligence (2d Ed.) § 3. In cases of negligence, there is no such invasion of rights as to entitle a plaintiff to recover at least nominal damages, as in Hooten v. Barnard, 137 Mass. 36, and McAneany v. Jewett, 10 Allen, 151. * * *[37]

[37] The statement of facts is abridged and part of the opinion is omitted.

Compare the remark of Bowen, L. J., in Brunsden v. Humphrey (1884) 14 Q. B. D. 141, 149: "Actions for the negligent management of any animal, or any personal or movable chattel, such as a ship or machine, or instrument, all are based upon the same principle, viz., that a person, who, contrary to his duty, conducts himself negligently in the management of that which contains in itself an element of danger to others is liable for all injury caused by his want of care or skill. Such an action is based upon the union of the negligence and the injuries caused thereby, which in such an instance will as a rule involve and have been accompanied by specific damage. Without remounting to the Roman law, or discussing the refinements of scholastic jurisprudence and the various uses that have been made, either by judges or juridical writers, of the terms 'injuria' and 'damnum,' it is sufficient to say that the gist of an action for negligence seems to me to be the harm to person or property negligently perpetrated. In a certain class of cases the mere violation of a legal right imports a damage. 'Actual perceptible damage,' says Parke, B., in Embrey v. Owen [1851] 6 Exch. 353, 368, 'is not indispensable, as the foundation of an action; it is sufficient to shew the violation of a right, in which case the law will presume damage.' But this principle is not as a rule applicable to actions for negligence, which are not brought to establish a bare right, but to recover compensation for substantial injury. 'Generally speaking,' says Littledale, J., in Williams v. Morland [1824] 2 B. & C. 916, 'there must be temporal loss or damage accruing from the wrongful

Action on the case, alleging negligence on the part of the defendants' servant when driving a four-horse sleigh in the highway, whereby the plaintiff was run over and injured. A verdict being found in favor of the plaintiff, a motion was made to set it aside, for a misdirection.[38]

Per Curiam. We consider the rule to be well settled, that to enable a plaintiff to recover under such circumstances, he must not only show some negligence and misconduct on the part of the defendant, but ordinary care and diligence on his own part. Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 61; Harlow v. Humiston, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 191; Smith v. Smith, 2 Pick. 621, 13 Am. Dec. 464.

The judge who tried the cause so instructed the jury; but in the course of the charge, he further stated to the jury, that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to prove negligence in the defendants, that being the gist of the case; but that when the defendants relied upon the fact, that the plaintiff conducted herself carelessly, the burden of proof was upon the defendants to show that the plaintiff had not used ordinary care.

The latter part of this direction, we think, was incorrect in point of law, and that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the accident was not occasioned by her own negligence, in placing herself in a hazardous position, without due precaution. In the actual state of the evidence, it is extremely probable that this direction made no difference in regard to the result; still, if the evidence was such that the jury might have decided the other way upon this point, without going decidedly against the weight of the evidence, or in other words,

Accord: Commercial Bank v. Ten Eyck (1872) 48 N. Y. 305: (Action against the cashier of a bank for neglect of duty. The neglect was proved, but there was no evidence that the plaintiff had suffered damage.)

Lalaurie v. Southern Bank (1873) 25 La. Ann. 330: (A note for $60 made by Lalaurie was deposited in the Southern Bank for collection. The employés of the bank were not able to decipher the maker's signature, and guessing at it entered the name in the bank book kept for the purpose as Labalos. As a result, when the clerk of the maker called to pay the note, he was informed by the cashier that no such note was deposited with the bank. A few days later the note was protested. Early the next day the note was paid. The maker sued to recover damages because of the protest due to the defendant's negligence. The jury awarded him $500 damages and judgment was entered for this by the trial court. "But," said the reviewing court, "no actual injury or damage to the plaintiff has been proved.")

if the evidence was doubtful and balanced, such a direction may have had an influence to mislead the jury; and therefore the Court are now all of opinion, that the verdict must be set aside and a new trial granted.[39]

[39] "The first error assigned, on which the plaintiff in error, the defendant below, relies, is that the county court omitted to charge the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff below of proving that, when the injury complained of was committed, he was in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence. We accord, entirely, with the decisions, cited by him to show that, in this suit, the burden of showing that the injury was not attributable to the want of reasonable care on his part, rested on the plaintiff. The reason of this rule is, that the plaintiff must prove all the facts which are necessary to entitle him to recover, and this is one of those facts. It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove, first, negligence on the part of the defendant, in respect to the collision alleged, and, secondly, that the injury to the plaintiff occurred in consequence of that negligence. But in order to prove this latter part, the plaintiff must show that such injury was not caused, in whole, or in part, by his own negligence; for, although the defendant was guilty of negligence, if the plaintiff's negligence contributed essentially to the injury, it is obvious that it did not occur by reason of the defendant's negligence. Therefore the plaintiff would not prove enough to entitle him to recover, by merely showing negligence on the part of the defendant; but he must go further and also prove the injury to have been caused by such negligence by showing a want of concurring negligence on his own part, contributing materially to the injury. Hence, to say that the plaintiff must show the latter, is only saying that he must show that the injury was owing to the negligence of the defendant. And as the defendant had a right to have the jury informed, as to what facts the plaintiff must prove in order to recover, he had a right to require the court to instruct them, that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove a want of such concurring negligence on his part." Per Storrs, J., in Park v. O'Brien (1854) 23 Conn. 339, 345.

The decisions cited by the plaintiff in error were Lane v. Crombie (1831) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 177; Adams v. Carlisle (1838) 21 Pick. (Mass.) 146; Parker v. Adams (1847) 12 Metc. (Mass.) 415, 46 Am. Dec. 694; Bosworth v. Swansey (1845) 10 Metc. (Mass.) 363, 43 Am. Dec. 441.

Compare O'Connor v. Connecticut, etc., Co. (1909) 82 Conn. 120, 72 Atl. 934: (P. sued for injuries sustained by him from a collision between his cart and D.'s street car. The Supreme Court sustained a judgment in favor of P. under the application of this principle: "We held in Fay v. Hartford St. Ry. Co. [1908] 81 Conn. 330, 71 Atl. 361, that under an answer denying the averments of the complaint, in an action of this character, the jury were never at liberty to guess or surmise the existence of the claimed negligence of the defendant, or due care of the plaintiff, but that the burden rested upon the plaintiff to prove them either by direct evidence, or by the proof of facts or circumstances from which they could fairly and reasonably be inferred, and that, when upon the trial there was no evidence from which the jury could reasonably conclude that there was a preponderance of proof of the alleged negligence of the defendant, or of the due care of the injured person, the court, if a nonsuit was not granted, should either direct a verdict for the defendant upon his request, or, if a verdict should be returned for the plaintiff, should upon motion set it aside as against the evidence.")

The doctrine that it is part of the plaintiff's prima facie case to show that his damage was not caused by his own negligence is recognized in a number of states. See 29 Cyc. 576, 577, and the cases cited there, and in the subsequent Annotation volumes, for the following jurisdictions: Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana (until 1899, when a statute excepted actions for negligence causing personal injury or death), Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, North Carolina (until the statute of 1887, applicable to all actions for negligence; Revisal of 1905, § 483), Oklahoma, and Vermont. The cases, however, even in the same state, are not always in accord. See also Cent. Dig. "Negligence," §§ 186–189, 229–232; Key-No. "Negligence," §§ 113, 122.

WAKELIN v. LONDON & S. W. RY. CO.

(House of Lords, 1886. L. R. 12 App. Cas. 41.)

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal.

The action was brought by the administratrix of Henry Wakelin on behalf of herself and her children under Lord Campbell's Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93.

The statement of claim alleged that the defendant's line between Chiswich Station and Chiswich Junction crossed a public footway, and that on the 1st of May, 1882, the defendants so negligently and unskilfully drove a train on the line across the footpath and so neglected to take precautions in respect of the train and the crossing that the train struck and killed one Henry Wakelin, the plaintiff's husband, whilst lawfully on the footpath.

The statement of defence admitted that on that day the plaintiff's husband whilst on or near the footpath was struck by a train of the defendants, and so injured that he died, but denied the alleged negligence; did not admit that the deceased was lawfully crossing the line at the time in question; and alleged that his death was caused by his own negligence and that he might by the exercise of reasonable caution have seen the train approaching and avoided the accident.

At the trial before Manisty, J., and a special jury in Middlesex in December, 1883, the following evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff. It appeared from defendants' answers to interrogatories that the crossing was a level crossing open to all foot passengers: that the approaches to the crossing on each side of the line were guarded by hand gates: that there was a slight curve at the crossing: that assuming the deceased to have been crossing the line from the down side and standing inside the hand gates but not on the line he could have seen a train approaching on the down side at a distance of nearly if not quite half a mile, but that when standing in the centre of the line he could have seen a train approaching on the down side at a distance of more than one mile: that the body of the deceased was found on the down side of the line and that he was run upon and killed by a down train: that the engine carried the usual and proper headlights which were visible at the distances above mentioned: that the company did not give any special signal or take any extraordinary precautions while their trains were travelling over the crossing: that a watchman in the company's employ was on duty from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m. to take charge of the gates and crossing and amongst other duties to provide for the safety of foot passengers.

Oral evidence was given that from the cottage where the deceased lived it would take about ten minutes to walk to the crossing; that he left his cottage on the evening of the 1st of May after tea, and that he was never seen again till his body was found the same night on the down line near the crossing. There was no evidence as to the circumstances under which he got on to the line.

The defendants called no witnesses, and submitted that there was no case. Manisty, J., left the case to the jury who returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £800. The Divisional Court (Grove, J., Huddleston, B., and Hawkins, J.) set aside the verdict and entered judgment for the defendants. The Court of Appeal (Brett, M. R., and Bowen and Fry, L. JJ.) on the 16th of May, 1884, affirmed this decision. In the course of his judgment Brett, M. R., said that in his opinion the plaintiff in this case was not only bound to give evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants which was a cause of the death of the deceased, but was also bound to give prima facie evidence that the deceased was not guilty of negligence contributing to the accident; and that by reason of the plaintiff having been unable to give any evidence of the circumstances of the accident she had failed in giving evidence of that necessary part of her prima facie case.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Lord Watson. My Lords, in the view which I take of the evidence adduced at the trial before Manisty, J., it may not be absolutely necessary to say anything in regard to the onus which attaches to the plaintiff in this and similar cases. I shall nevertheless express my opinion upon the point, because it was discussed in the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal, and has been fully and ably argued at your Lordships' bar.

It appears to me that in all such cases the liability of the defendant company must rest upon these facts,—in the first place that there was some negligent act or omission on the part of the company or their servants which materially contributed to the injury or death complained of, and, in the second place, that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the injured or deceased person. But it does not, in my opinion, necessarily follow that the whole burden of proof is cast upon the plaintiff. That it lies with the plaintiff to prove the first of these propositions does not admit of dispute. Mere allegation or proof that the company were guilty of negligence is altogether irrelevant; they might be guilty of many negligent acts or omissions, which might possibly have occasioned injury to somebody, but had no connection whatever with the injury for which redress is sought, and therefore the plaintiff must allege and prove, not merely that they were negligent, but that their negligence caused or materially contributed to the injury.

I am of opinion that the onus of proving affirmatively that there was contributory negligence on the part of the person injured rests, in the first instance, upon the defendants, and that in the absence of evidence tending to that conclusion, the plaintiff is not bound to prove the negative in order to entitle her to a verdict in her favor. That opinion was expressed by Lord Hatherley and Lord Penzance in the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company v. Slattery, 3 App. Cas. 1169, 1180. I agree with these noble Lords in thinking that, whether the question of such contributory negligence arises on the plea of "not guilty," or is made the subject of a counter issue, it is substantially a matter of defence, and I do not find that the other noble Lords, who took part in the decision of Slattery's Case, said anything to the contrary. In expressing my own opinion, I have added the words "in the first instance," because in the course of the trial the onus may be shifted to the plaintiff so as to justify a finding in the defendants' favour to which they would not otherwise have been entitled.

The difficulty of dealing with the question of onus in cases like the present arises from the fact that in most cases it is well nigh impossible for the plaintiff to lay his evidence before a jury or the Court without disclosing circumstances which either point to or tend to rebut the conclusion that the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence. If the plaintiff's evidence were sufficient to shew that the negligence of the defendants did materially contribute to the injury, and threw no light upon the question of the injured party's negligence, then I should be of opinion that, in the absence of any counter-evidence from the defendants, it ought to be presumed that, in point of fact, there was no such contributory negligence. Even if the plaintiff's evidence did disclose facts and circumstances bearing upon that question, which were neither sufficient per se to prove such contributory negligence, nor to cast the onus of disproving it on the plaintiff, I should remain of the same opinion. Of course a plaintiff who comes into Court with an unfounded action may have to submit to the inconvenience of having his adversary's defence proved by his own witnesses; but that cannot affect the question upon whom the onus lies in the first instance. As Lord Hatherley said in Dublin, Wicklow & Wexford Railway Company v. Slatterly, 3 App. Cas. 1169: "If such contributory negligence be admitted by the plaintiff, or be proved by the plaintiff's witnesses while establishing negligence against the defendants, I do not think there is anything left for the jury to decide, there being no contest of fact."

In the present case, I think the appellant must fail, because no attempt has been made to bring evidence in support of her allegations up to the point at which the question of contributory negligence becomes material. The evidence appears to me to shew that the injuries which caused the death of Henry Wakelin were occasioned by contact with an engine or a train belonging to the respondents, and I am willing to assume, although I am by no means satisfied, that it has also been proved that they were in certain respects negligent. The evidence goes no further. It affords ample materials for conjecturing that the death may possibly have been occasioned by that negligence, but it furnishes no data from which an inference can be reasonably drawn that as a matter of fact it was so occasioned.

I am accordingly of opinion that the order appealed from must be affirmed.[40]

LORD BLACKBURN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of perusing in print the opinion just delivered by my noble and learned friend. In it I perfectly agree.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

WASHINGTON & G. R. CO. v. GLADMON.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1872. 15 Wall. 401, 21 L. Ed. 114.)

Oliver Gladmon, by his next friend, brought an action in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the railroad company to recover for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence. Judgment for the plaintiff; the defendant sued out a writ of error.

MR. JUSTICE HUNT. Oliver Gladmon, a child of the age of seven years, while crossing a street in Georgetown, was injured by the cars of the Company, the original defendant in this suit. Sufficient proof was given to establish the negligence of the driver of the car, and no point is raised on that branch of the case. The alleged errors arise from refusals to give certain instructions upon the effect of the conduct of the child, and of the charge as actually made on that subject. The first prayer for instructions is stated in the record in the words following:

"After the close of the testimony the defendants by their counsel asked the court to give the following instructions to the jury: if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff's injuries resulted from his attempting to cross a street in front of an approaching car, driven by an agent of defendants, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively, not only the want of ordinary care and caution on the part of the driver, but the exercise of due care and caution on his own part; and if the jury find from the evidence that the negligence or want of due care or caution of the plaintiff caused the accident, or even contributed to it, or that it could have been avoided by the exercise of due care on his own part, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, whether the driver of the car was guilty of negligence or not, but the jury must find for defendant."

As applied to adult parties, the first branch of this proposition is not correct. While it is true that the absence of reasonable care and caution, on the part of one seeking to recover for an injury so received, will prevent a recovery, it is not correct to say that it is incumbent upon him to prove such care and caution. The want of such care, or contributory negligence as it is termed, is a defense to be proved by the other side.

The plaintiff may establish the negligence of the defendant, his own injury in consequence thereof, and his case is made out. If there are circumstances which convict him of concurring negligence, the defendant must prove them, and thus defeat the action. Irrespective of statute law on the subject, the burden of proof on that point does not rest upon the plaintiff. Oldfield v. N. Y. & Har. R. R. Co., 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 103, affirmed 14 N. Y. 310; Johnson v. Hud. Riv. R. R. Co., 20 N. Y. 65, 75 Am. Dec. 375; Button v. Same, 18 N. Y. 248; Wilds v. Same, 24 N. Y. 430. In the case first cited Denio, J., says:

"I am of opinion that it is not a rule of law of universal application that the plaintiff must prove affirmatively that his own conduct, on the occasion of the injury, was cautious and prudent. The onus probandi, in this as in most other cases, depends upon the position of the affair as it stands upon the undisputed facts. Thus, if a carriage be driven furiously through a crowded thoroughfare, and a person is run over, he would not be obliged to prove that he was cautious and attentive, and he might recover, though there were no witness of his actual conduct. The natural instinct of self-preservation would stand in the place of positive evidence, and the dangerous tendency of the defendant's conduct would create so strong a probability that the injury happened through his fault that no other evidence would be required. * * * The culpability of the defendant must be affirmatively proved before the case can go to the jury, but the absence of any fault on the part of the plaintiff may be inferred from circumstances: and the disposition of men to take care of themselves and keep out of difficulty may properly be taken into consideration."

The later cases in the New York Court of Appeals I think will show that the trials have almost uniformly proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff is not bound to prove affirmatively that he was himself free from negligence, and this theory has been accepted as the true one. Generally, as here, the proof which shows the defendant's negligence, shows also the negligence or the caution of the plaintiff. The question of the burden of proof is, therefore, not usually presented with prominence. In some of the States it has been held that the plaintiff was bound to make affirmative proof of his freedom from negligence. In many cases it is so held by virtue of local statutes. Shear. & Red. Neg. §§ 43 and 44, and note, where the cases are collected. * * * [41]

Upon the case, as it comes before us, the judgment must be affirmed.[42]

[41] In the omitted portion of the opinion, the court held that the charge requested was properly refused because it ignored the difference in the rule in regard to the negligence of an adult and the negligence of a child of tender years.

[42] "By the settled law of this court, not controverted at the bar, contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff need not be negatived or disproved by him, but the burden of proving it is upon the defendant." Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion in Texas, etc., Ry. Co. v. Volk (1894) 151 U. S. 73, 74, 14 Sup. Ct. 239, 38 L. Ed. 78.

See, also, O'Hara v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey (1910) 183 Fed. 739, 106 C. C. A. 177: (Plaintiff's decedent was struck by defendant's train at a crossing in New Jersey. The defendant's liability turned on the question of contributory negligence in the decedent. Said Lacombe, J., delivering the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals: "In the state courts it is incumbent on the plaintiff, in actions of this kind, to satisfy the jury as part of his case that the person injured was free from contributory negligence. Evidence to establish this proposition is not always direct. The exercise of proper care may be inferred from facts showing what occurred, even though death or other cause may prevent the introduction of any proof as to the mental processes of the person injured. . In the federal courts contributory negligence is an affirmative defense. The burden of establishing it rests on the defendant. This rule does not require defendant to establish contributory negligence by witnesses whom defendant calls to the stand. If the plaintiff's own witnesses testify to undisputed facts from which that inference must be drawn, defendant may rest on their testimony and ask for a dismissal; but if the undisputed facts might reasonably support an inference as to the injured person's conduct which would leave it doubtful whether he was or was not negligent, the question whether or not the defense is proved will be one for the jury to determine.")

The doctrine of the principal case, treating contributory negligence as regularly matter of defense, is the rule in the federal courts, and in most of the state courts. See 29 Cyc. 575, 576, and the cases cited there, and in the subsequent Annotation volumes, for the following jurisdictions: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Indiana (since 1899, by statute, if the action is for negligence causing personal injury or death; Act Feb. 17, 1899, Burns' Rev. Stats. Ind. [1914] § 362), Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina (since 1887, by statute, applicable to all actions for negligence; Revisal of 1905, § 483), North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, United States. The cases, however even in the same state, are not always in accord.

See, also, Cent. Dig. "Negligence," §§ 186–189, 229–232; Key-No. "Negligence," §§ 113, 122.

Compare: Smith v. Delaware River Amusement Co. (1908), 76 N. J. Law, 46, 69 Atl. 970: (Minturn, J.: "The declaration alleges that * * * the plaintiff purchased a ticket of admission to a grand stand in an amusement park maintained by defendant * * * and that while leaving the stand with other people she, without notice of the existence of any danger, walked into a hole in the flooring and severely injured herself. * * * We cannot say from an inspection of this declaration that it shows the plaintiff to have contributed to her own injury; nor will the law presume that she was negligent in that respect. * * * The requirement in some jurisdictions that the declaration shall allege that due care was exercised by the plaintiff, or, in other words, that contributory negligence shall be negatived by an allegation of due care [Cooley on Torts, 673], has never been the rule in this state; but, on the contrary, it has been determined that a declaration is good if it contains all that is necessary for the plaintiff to prove under a plea of the general issue in order to entitle him to recover. Beardsley v. Southmayd, 14 N. J. Law, 534. The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to judgment on the demurrer.")

WHALEN v. CITIZENS' GASLIGHT CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1896. 151 N. Y. 70, 45 N. E. 363.)

Appeal from a judgment of the General Term of the City Court of Brooklyn, which affirmed a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, entered upon a verdict.

HAIGHT, J. This action was brought to recover damages for a personal injury.

On the 12th day of September, 1893, the defendant was engaged in laying a gas pipe across the sidewalk in Court street in the city of Brooklyn, connecting its gas main in that street with the premises on the northeast corner of Court and Sackett streets. For this purpose it had obtained the consent of the city authorities for the removal of the flagstones of the sidewalk in order to dig a trench in which to lay the pipe. At the time of the accident complained of it had caused a flagstone next to the building to be removed, and another flagstone, four feet two inches in length by three feet four inches in breadth and between three and four inches in thickness in the center of the walk, to be taken up and placed upon an adjoining flagstone upon the walk, and its employees were engaged in digging a pit next to the house, intending to tunnel through the intervening space so as not to necessitate the removal of any more of the sidewalk. The space between the two openings undisturbed was about five feet. Whilst the walk was in this condition the plaintiff approached, tripped her foot upon the flagstone that had been removed, fell upon it and sustained the injury for which this action was brought. It was about a quarter before eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and was a nice day. She was about seventy years of age, and had been engaged in doing general housework and sewing, and used to go out to wash, iron and clean house. She testified that her eyesight was very good and that she did not notice the flagstone or the excavation beside it as she came near the place where she fell; that she was looking along the street as she walked.

It is the well-settled law of this state that, in actions of this character, the absence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff contributing to the injury must be affirmatively shown by the plaintiff, and that no presumption of freedom from such negligence arises from the mere happening of an injury. Reynolds v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 248; Weston v. City of Troy, 139 N. Y. 281, 34 N. E. 780. If this law is to be recognized and followed we are unable to see how this judgment can be sustained; for to hold otherwise would practically overrule and annul the rule of contributory negligence. As we have seen, it was a bright day and about eleven o'clock in the forenoon. The obstacle over which the plaintiff fell was a large flagstone over four feet in length and three in breadth. There was nothing to obscure her vision; her eyesight was good and she could see as she was walking along the walk. It is not pretended that anything occurred that momentarily obstructed her vision, and it is difficult to conceive how she could have avoided seeing the obstacle unless she was heedlessly proceeding in utter disregard of the precautions usually taken by careful and prudent people.

To our minds the negligence here is greater than that of the plaintiff in the Weston Case, supra. In that case the plaintiff stepped upon a ridge of ice which was partially covered with snow. Andrews, C. J., in delivering the opinion, says: "Whether the plaintiff saw the ridge before stepping upon it does not appear. Nor was it shown whether she was walking fast or slow, or what attention she was paying, if any, to the condition of the sidewalk. If she discovered the ridge she was not required to leave the sidewalk, but she might, without being subject to the charge of negligence, using due care and prudence, have kept on her way. But she could not heedlessly disregard the precautions which the obvious situation suggests and proceed as if the sidewalk was free and unobstructed. The presumption which a wayfarer may indulge, that the streets of a city are safe and which excuses him from maintaining a vigilant outlook for dangers and defects, has no application where the danger is known and obvious." See, also, Beltz v. City of Yonkers, 148 N. Y. 67, 42 N. E. 401, and cases there cited. * * *[43]

[44] See the remark of Gray, J., in Specht v. Waterbury Co. (1913) 208 N. Y. 374, 380, 102 N. E. 569, 570: "Notwithstanding that she [plaintiff's intestate, a child six years of age, whose death had been caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant in starting a fire on a vacant lot] may have been non sui juris, the defendant was entitled to have it appear that she had acted with such care as was commensurate with a child of her age. According to the plaintiff his daughter was a bright, intelligent child and while, in the case of the death of an injured person, less evidence is required upon the question of freedom from contributory negligence, nevertheless, evidence of facts cannot be wholly dispensed with, upon which an inference might rest that the deceased was fairly free from fault. Wendell v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. [1883] 91 N. Y. 420."

Compare the remark of Strong, J, in Button v. Hudson River R. Co. (1858) 18 N. Y. 248, 251: "The other point presents the question upon whom was the burden of proof, in reference to negligence of the intestate conducing to the injury—whether it belonged to the plaintiff to prove affirmatively the absence, or to the defendants to prove affirmatively the presence, of such negligence. In regard to all the circumstances essential to the cause of action the plaintiff held and was required to sustain the affirmative. Among those circumstances were, that the defendants were negligent, and that the injury resulted from that negligence. If the intestate was negligent, and his negligence concurred with that of the defendants in producing the injury, the plaintiff had no cause of action. The reason why no right of action would exist is that, both the intestate and the defendants being guilty of negligence, they were the common authors of what immediately flowed from it, and it was not a consequence of the negligence of either. The court cannot accurately, and will not undertake to, discriminate between them as to the extent of the negligence of each and the share of the result produced by each; nei-

HUDSON v. WABASH WESTERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, 1890. 101 Mo. 13, 14 S. W. 15.)

This action was against the railway company for damages for a personal injury alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence. It appeared that the defendant's freight train had been negligently left standing across a public street without a watchman to warn persons using the crossing, that plaintiff tried to cross by climbing on to the cars and stepping on the coupling pins, that as plaintiff was thus crossing, the defendant suddenly and negligently started the train, whereby plaintiff's foot was caught and crushed. The petition alleged that "the plaintiff, without any fault on his part, was caught between two of said cars, then and there, and had his foot smashed, torn and ther, therefore, could allege against the other any wrong, and without a wrong there can be no legal injury. In this view, the exercise of due care by the intestate was an element of the cause of action. Without proof of it, it would not appear that the negligence of the defendants caused the injury. * * * It must not be understood that it was incumbent on the plaintiff, in the first instance, to give evidence for the direct and special object of establishing the observance of due care by the intestate; it would be enough if the proof introduced of the negligence of the defendants and the circumstances of the injury, prima facie, established that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants; as such evidence would exclude the idea of a want of due care by the intestate aiding to the result. Ordinarily, in similar actions, when there has been no fault on the part of the plaintiff, it will sufficiently appear in showing the fault of the defendant, and that it was a cause of the injury and when it does so, no further evidence on the subject is necessary."

See also the reporter's note on the foregoing case (page 259): "Selden, J., objected to an implication which he conceived to lurk in the opinion of Strong, J. (but which Strong, J., disclaimed), that, in the absence of proof of any circumstances importing negligence on the part of the plaintiff, there might be a presumption thereof which he is required to repel; whereas his negligence must be inferred from evidence, and is not to be presumed."

In Lee v. Troy Gaslight Co. (1885) 98 N. Y. 115, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff's horse had been killed by gas escaping from a leak in the gas pipe under plaintiff's barn, and that the leak was occasioned by the negligence of defendant's employés in twisting the pipe while engaged in changing its position. The defendant contended that the complaint was insufficient because it nowhere alleged the absence of contributory negligence in the plaintiff. Said Finch, J., delivering the opinion: "Such separate and direct averment in the pleading was unnecessary. Hackford v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. [1871] 6 Lans. [N. Y.] 381, affirmed [1873] 53 N. Y. 654. Substantially that allegation is always involved in the averment that the injury set out was occasioned by the defendant's negligence. To prove that, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show, and the burden is upon him to establish, that his own negligence did not cause or contribute to the injury. Hale v. Smith [1879] 78 N. Y. 480. In the multitude of cases of this general character we know of none which requires of the pleader any independent or explicit allegation that the plaintiff himself was without fault."

For the application of this rule of pleading see, also, Bogardus v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co. (1901) 62 App. Div. 376, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1094; Klein v. Burleson (1910) 138 App. Div. 407, 122 N. Y. Supp. 752.

broken." The answer denied each and every allegation in the petition. The following instruction was given:

"The court instructs the jury that defendant has not pleaded as a defense in this case contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff; and therefore the question whether plaintiff himself was negligent or not is not before the jury, and must not be considered by it."

To this instruction the defendant excepted. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,500 and judgment thereon.[45]

SHERWOOD, J. It is the unquestioned law of this state that contributory negligence, strictly, is an affirmative defense, and, in order to avail a defendant as a matter of pleading, it must be affirmatively pleaded. O'Connor v. Railway Co., 94 Mo. 155, 7 S. W. 106, 4 Am. St. Rep. 364, and cases cited; Donovan v. Railroad Co., 89 Mo. 147, 1 S. W. 232; Schlereth v. Railway Co., 96 Mo. 509, 10 S. W. 66. The contention is, however, made by the defendant that, as the petition, among other things, alleged concerning plaintiff "that by said negligent acts, and without any fault on his part, he was then and there caught between two of said cars," etc., and the answer denied this averment, that therefore the defense of contributory negligence was raised. This is a mistake. True, the case of Karle v. Railroad Co., 55 Mo. 482, apparently supports this contention; but the utterance there was only obiter, and should not be regarded as possessing any authoritative value. * * *

But, while contributory negligence as a matter of defense has to be pleaded in order for a defendant to avail himself of it by the introduction of evidence to sustain that issue, yet it does not thence follow that, if the plaintiff's own testimony shows circumstances of contributory negligence which absolutely defeat his right of action, and disprove his own case, that the defendant is not at liberty to take advantage of such testimony, though produced by the adversary. On the contrary, it is well settled in this state, as well as elsewhere, that such advantage may be taken of the plaintiff's testimony, regardless of whether the special defense be pleaded or not. Milburn v. Railroad Co., 86 Mo. 104, and cases cited; Schlereth v. Railway Co., 96 Mo. 509, 10 S. W. 66. When this occurs it is the duty of the trial court to declare this result to the jury as a matter of law. 1 Shear. & R. Neg. (4th Ed.) 56, 112, note; 2 Ror. R. R. 1054, 1055.

This duty, it is claimed, the court should have performed, and that the first instruction of the defendant, in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, should have been given. The text-books lay it down as undoubted law that the act of climbing over stationary cars, without looking to see whether they were attached to an engine or not, has been held so grossly negligent as to preclude a recovery for injuries received while making such attempt. 1 Thomp. Neg. 429; 2 Ror. R. R. 1055; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 72. And the reported cases take the same view of the matter. * * *[46]

In the light of these authorities there seems no room to question that the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

[46] Accord: Orient Ins. Co. v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co. (1905) 31 Mont. 502, 78 Pac. 1036.

And see Fitchburg R. Co. v. Nichols (1898) 29 C. C. A. 500, 85 Fed. 945, 947, where Putnam, Circuit Judge, remarks: "The defendant below excepted to a refusal of the court to rule that the burden was on the plaintiff below to prove that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, claiming that the case is excepted from the general rule of the federal courts, because the plaintiff below alleges in his declaration that he was 'in the exercise of due care.' None of the numerous rulings of the Supreme Court to the effect that, on this question, the burden is on the defendant, commencing with Railroad Co. v. Gladmon [1872] 15 Wall. 401, 42 L. Ed. 114, have ever deemed it necessary to notice the state of the pleadings in this particular; and the rule has been constantly applied in this circuit to cases removed from the state courts, where this allegation frequently appears. The rule has more relation to the orderly trial of a case than to the state of the pleadings, and to shift from and to it from time to time would cause a great judicial inconvenience, wholly unnecessary, as the allegation referred to may better be regarded as surplusage than as leading to a variance."

Compare: Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Mackey (1895), 53 Ohio St. 370, 41 N. E. 980, 29 L. R. A. 757, 53 Am. St. Rep. 641. It was contended that the complaint was not good, as against a general demurrer, because "the presumption of contributory negligence arising from the facts stated is not overcome by proper averments." The petition alleged in substance: That the plaintiff was a minor of the age of nine years. That defendant's track through the village of Coldwater intersects and crosses Main street at grade. That Main street is a common thoroughfare and highway, the principal street of said village, and the point of junction of both a public highway and street crossing, necessarily much used and frequented by the public. On June 5, 1890, the defendant did negligently and unlawfully, and without due care on the part of the servants of said defendant in charge thereof, leave a long train of freight cars, attached to a locomotive, standing upon and over, obstructing and blocking, said crossing, for a period of more than five minutes without any attention to said crossing or the consequences to the convenience or life and limb of persons having occasion to pass such obstruction. That at the time aforesaid, during the hour of noon of said day, while said train was so unlawfully standing on said crossing, the plaintiff, a child of tender years and immature experience and judgment, was lawfully passing along said street, going to a point beyond said crossing on Main street. When arriving at said crossing, and in full view of the engineer's position, and in full view of any servant being on the lookout or keeping watch over said train, he found said crossing so obstructed and blocked by said defendant's train. That after remaining at said crossing for more than five minutes, and receiving no warning, plaintiff, in full view of the engineer's proper position, and within the knowledge of ordinary prudence of defendant's servants, attempted to pass over and cross such obstruction. While so passing over said cars, defendant's servants, without any care or attention to said crossing, or the consequence to any one attempting to pass such unlawful obstruction, without due care, without signal, without notice, without warning, did then and there imprudently, carelessly negligently, and wrongfully start said cars suddenly and violently backward, whereby said plaintiff's right foot was caught between the couplings of two cars, and the injury followed. Held a sufficient statement as against a demurrer for lack of facts.

SECTION 3.—THE SCOPE OF THE DUTY TO USE CARE

I. In Relation to the Ownership or Possession of Property

(A) Duty of Care Towards a Trespasser

(a) In General

BLYTH v. TOPHAM.

(Court of King's Bench, 1607. Cro. Jac. 158, 79 Reprint, 139.)

Action on the case; for that he digged a pit in such a common, by occasion whereof his mare, being straying there, fell into said pit and perished. The defendant pleaded not guilty; and it was found for him.

The plaintiff, to save costs, now moved in arrest of judgment upon the verdict, that the declaration was not good; for when the mare was straying, and he shews not any right why his mare should be in the said common, the digging of the pit is lawful as against him: and although his mare fell therein, he hath not any remedy; for it is damnum absque injuria: wherefore an action lies not by him.

The whole Court was of that opinion. It was therefore judged upon the declaration that the bill should abate, and not upon the verdict.

PONTING v. NOAKES et al.

(Queen's Bench Division. [1894] 2 Q. B. 281.)

Appeal against the verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in an action, tried before the deputy judge of Andover County Court and a jury, to recover as damages the value of the plaintiff's horse, which was alleged to have died through eating of the defendant's yew tree.

The following statement of the facts proved or admitted at the trial is taken from the judgment of Charles, J.:

The plaintiff was a farmer and occupied a field separated from the premises of the defendants by a fence. On the side of the fence next the plaintiff's field was a ditch belonging to the defendants. On the defendants' land near the fence grew a yew tree, the branches of which projected over the ditch, but not beyond it. They did not overhang the plaintiff's field. At the distance of about 120 yards grew another yew tree in the garden of one Hunt, which overhung the plaintiff's field, and in the hedge of the plaintiff's field, about fifty yards from the defendants' yew tree, there was a small yew bush. On June 25, 1893, the colt and several other horses were in the plaintiff's field. On the 26th the colt was found dead five yards from the defendants' yew, and there was no doubt from the examination made of the body that it had died from eating yew leaves. All the three trees, the defendants', Hunt's, and the plaintiff's yew bush, presented appearances of having been recently eaten. A veterinary surgeon stated that it was a fact within his knowledge that horses have been known to walk a mile after eating yew leaves before dying, and then to drop down dead. Such a case, however, he said, would be exceptional: the animal most often drops down dead directly after the eating, or after walking a short distance.

On the above evidence the deputy judge left the case to the jury, who gave a verdict for damages claimed, and judgment for the plaintiff was given accordingly. The defendants appealed.

Horace Browne, for the defendants. * * * No duty on their part to fence against their neighbour's cattle was shewn, nor was there any duty to protect such cattle from having access to the tree. The deputy judge, therefore, ought to have given judgment for the defendants.

CHARLES, J. * * * Can it be said that there is any duty on a man, either not to grow a poisonous tree so near the boundary of his property as to be accessible to the stock of his neighbour, or, if he does so, to take precautions to prevent any danger to the stock arising? Now here it must be remembered that no liability on the part of the defendants to fence against the cattle of their neighbour was proved. Had any such liability been shown to exist, and had the fence been defective, it might well have been found by the jury that the colt had obtained access to the defendants' land through breach of his obligation to fence, and the poisonous tree being immediately within the fence that the eating of its leaves by the colt was the natural consequence of the defendants' breach of duty. But, there being no liability on the part of the defendants to repair the fence, I do not see that they can be made responsible for the eating of those yew leaves by an animal which, in order to reach them, had come upon their land. The hurt which the animal received was due to its wrongful intrusion. It had no right to be there, and its owner, therefore, had no right to complain. The true test in such a case is pointed out by Gibbs, C. J., in Deane v. Clayton, 7 Taunt. 489, at p. 533, in a judgment which was emphatically approved by the Court of Exchequer in Jordin v. Crump, 8 M. & W. 782, though on the facts proved in Deane v. Clayton, 7 Taunt. 489, at p. 533, the Court were equally divided as to what judgment should be entered. We must ask, he says, "in each case whether the man or the animal which suffered had, or had not, a right to be where he was when he received the hurt." If he had not, then (unless, indeed, the element of intention to injure, as in Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bing. 628, or of nuisance, as in Barnes v. Ward, 9 C. B. 392, is present) no action is maintainable. It was, however, urged that there was here something in the nature of nuisance, and that the growing of this yew tree so near to the boundary was actionable, in case damage was caused by it, on the same ground as that on which Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277, was decided. It was there held that if a man places traps baited with flesh on his own ground so near to the premises of another that dogs kept on his neighbour's premises must probably be attracted by their instinct into the traps, and if in consequence his neighbour's dogs are so attracted and are injured, an action lies. But no evidence whatever was offered in this case that the yew tree could be regarded as a trap in this sense to the plaintiff's horses, and in the absence of any such evidence it was, I think, the plaintiff's business to keep his horses from going too near the tree, and not the defendants' duty to take any precautions against their doing so. In the result, therefore, I think, that this appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendant.

BAKER v. BYRNE.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1871. 58 Barb. 438.)

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment dismissing the complaint, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for an injury suffered by him from falling down a hatchway of the barge Pilgrim. It was admitted by the defence that the barge was owned by the defendant George C. Byrne. The accident occurred at Jersey City, New Jersey, in August, 1863. The plaintiff was then mate, and in charge of the steamer Oriel. At the time of the injury, there was next to the dock, in Jersey City, a steamer named Carnac. The barge Pilgrim was lying next to the Carnac, and the Oriel was lying outside of and next to the Pilgrim. The evidence showed that there was no way of getting aboard the Oriel except by going over the Carnac and Pilgrim, unless it was by means of a small boat.

The plaintiff had been going over the Carnac and the Pilgrim to get to his own boat for a day or two previous to the accident. The accident occurred at about nine o'clock in the evening of August 23. That evening was dark and the upper deck of the Pilgrim a little wet and slippery, and the plaintiff went from the upper deck to the main deck of the Pilgrim to pass over to his own boat. The hatchways on board the Pilgrim were on the main deck. The plaintiff had usually gone over the upper deck of the Pilgrim, and in doing so would not have observed the hatchways. On the evening in question, the hatchways of the Pilgrim had been left open, and the plaintiff fell through one of them, and thereby had his hip dislocated or very much injured.

[47] Only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point. In an omitted portion, the question was raised whether Fletcher v. Rylands (1866) L. R. 1 Exch. 265 (1868) 3 H. L. 330, applies to the facts of this case. It was answered in the negative.

The defense was a general denial, and a specific denial of any negligence in respect to the hatchways or any other part of the Pilgrim.

By the Court, INGRAHAM, P. J. The plaintiff, when crossing the defendant's vessel, had no right or license to be there, and the defendants owed him no duty which threw on them the obligation to close the hatches of their vessel at night, so as to protect a trespasser from injury.

The principle on which persons are held liable for such acts, is that they are in duty bound to keep their property in such a condition that persons who are lawfully there shall not be injured; but it does not extend to persons on the defendant's premises without right, or without permission.

The cases of Roulston v. Clark, 3 E. D. Smith, 366, Bush v. Brainard, 1 Cow. 78, 13 Am. Dec. 513, and Mentges v. New York & H. R. Co., 1 Hilt. 425, are cases exemplifying this rule.

Judgment affirmed.

DUDLEY v. NORTHAMPTON ST. RY. CO.

In this action a verdict was directed for the defendant, the Northampton Street Railway Company. The plaintiff excepts.

SHELDON, J. It was provided by the statutes in force at the time of this accident that no person should operate an automobile or motor cycle upon any public highway or private way laid out under authority of statute unless he had been licensed to do so and unless his automobile or motor cycle had been registered as prescribed. St. 1903, p. 507, c. 473; St. 1905, p. 227, c. 311. But it was also provided by section 2 of the act last cited that "any automobile or motor cycle owned by a nonresident of this state who has complied with the laws relative to motor vehicles and the operation thereof of the state in which he resides may be operated by such owner on the roads and highways of this state for a period not exceeding fifteen days without the license," etc., required in other cases. The first question presented in this case is whether the plaintiff in operating his machine in this state on the day of the accident was acting in violation of law.

He was a resident of Connecticut. He had complied with all the laws of that state, and had a right to operate his machine on the highways of this state for a period not exceeding 15 days. He came into this state in his automobile on Wednesday, September 13th, and remained here until the day of the accident, September 29th, except that on September 14th he drove to West Suffield, Conn., returning to Massachusetts the same evening, and that he went to Brattleboro, Vt., on one day to attend a fair, staying there that day, but not overnight. Each of these absences was merely a temporary visit to the other state, made with no intention of a permanent stay, and followed by a speedy return; and on each of these days he did actually operate his machine in this state. After his return from Vermont and before the accident, his machine needed repairs, and was kept in a repair garage a day and a half for that purpose.

It is not necessary to determine whether the statute before us should be interpreted as giving to nonresident owners of motor cars who have complied with the laws of their own state merely one period of 15 days after once coming into the state before being forbidden to operate their machines on the roads of this state without a license under its authority, and allowing only one total period of grace during the whole of the license year, or whether it should be construed more liberally by allowing nonresident owners to operate their cars without a license for a period of not more than 15 days upon any and every occasion when they shall come into this commonwealth. In either event, this plaintiff had exceeded his privilege. He made one visit here; and the running of his 15 days was not interrupted by his temporary calls into other states. Nor can the period be extended by not counting the days on which his machine was laid up for repairs or on which for any other reason he did not actually operate it. He had driven it into this commonwealth; within the meaning of the statute he was operating it during the whole of his stay. By no process of computation can it be claimed that his stay had lasted for less than 16 days. It follows that he was acting unlawfully, in violation of the statutes referred to, at the time of the collision between his machine and the defendant's trolley car; and it must be determined whether his violation of law is necessarily fatal to his right of action. * * *

The legislature, in the opinion of a majority of the court, intended to outlaw unregistered machines, and to give them, as to persons lawfully using the highways, no other right than that of being exempt from wanton or willful injury. They were to be no more travelers than is a runaway horse. Richards v. Enfield, 13 Gray, 344; Higgins v. Boston, 148 Mass. 484, 20 N. E. 105. The plaintiff as a mere trespasser upon the highway was there not only against the right of the owner of the soil and so liable to an action by him, but also against the rights of all other persons who were lawfully using the highway. He was violating a law made for their protection against him; accordingly, he was a trespasser as to them. It follows that the defendant, which was lawfully using the highway with its cars, owed to the plaintiff no other or further duty than that which it would owe to any trespasser upon its property, that is, not the duty of ordinary care, as those words are commonly used, but merely the duty to abstain from injuring him by wantonness or gross negligence. Sullivan v. Boston Elevated Ry., 199 Mass. 73, 76, 84 N. E. 844, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 36; Fitzmaurice v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 192 Mass. 159, 162, 78 N. E. 418, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1146, 116 Am. St. Rep. 236, 7 Ann. Cas. 586; Massell v. Boston Elevated Ry., 191 Mass. 491, 493, 78 N. E. 108. * * *

Of course the defendant would have had no right to run its car into the plaintiff's machine wantonly or recklessly; and that is the point of such cases as Welch v. Wesson, 6 Gray, 505, and McKeon v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 183 Mass. 271, 67 N. E. 329, 97 Am. St. Rep. 437. But there was no evidence in the case at bar to warrant a finding for the plaintiff upon this ground.

Accordingly, the verdict for the defendant was rightly ordered; and we need not consider the somewhat doubtful question whether upon the evidence it could have been found that the plaintiff's conduct at the time of the collision was in other respects consistent with the exercise of due care on his part.

Exceptions overruled.[48]

(b) MODIFICATIONS OF THE RULE

McVOY v. OAKES et al.

The action was by McVoy, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff's ward, through the negligence of the defendants. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the defendants appealed. The complaint, in addition to appropriate allegations to show the liability of the defendants, if plaintiff is entitled to recover at all, alleges, in substance, that on the 4th day of October, 1893, plaintiff's ward, a little boy seven years of age, while on his way home from school, had traveled out of the public way, along the railway track, for some distance, on account of such way being obstructed by defendants' train of cars, when he climbed upon one of the cars by invitation of the conductor, and was induced by such conductor to remain on such car while the train moved several hundred feet; that the cars stopped, and the boy then jumped off on the side furthest from his home, and, as the cars moved back, he walked along the side of the train, on a path commonly used and traveled by the public, by consent of the defendants; that, while so walking, he took hold of one of the brake rods and proceeded in that way for a distance of 500 feet; that defendants' servants saw him as he was walking with the moving train, with one hand hold of the brake rod, and recklessly and wantonly caused the train to be propelled at a rapid and increasing rate of speed, in such a way as to violently jerk him from his feet, and throw him under the cars, and injure him.

MARSHALL, J. (after stating the facts). According to the allegation of the complaint, defendants' servants, with knowledge that the plaintiff's ward, a boy of such tender years that he could not be held to a very high degree of care, too young certainly to be held guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, was in a dangerous situation, recklessly and wantonly gave speed to the moving train, and suddenly jerked the child from his feet, and threw him under the cars. It needs no argument or citation of authority to support the proposition that such conduct, under the circumstances alleged, constitutes actionable negligence. We do not deem it necessary to consider how the boy happened to be in the position he was at the time of the injury. Without any reference as to how he came to be in such situation, defendants' servants at least owed to him the duty not to knowingly, recklessly, and wantonly injure him. The order of the superior court is affirmed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

PALMER v. GORDON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1899. 173 Mass. 410, 53 N. E. 909, 73 Am. St. Rep. 302.)

In this action, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

HOLMES, J. This is an action of tort for personal injuries. We are to take it that the plaintiff, a boy, was a trespasser, with some other boys, in the kitchen attached to the defendant's restaurant, and that the defendant spilled water upon the stove for the purpose of frightening the boys away. He did not intend to scald them, but the water flew from the stove upon the legs of the boys. The question raised by the exceptions is whether the jury were warranted in finding the defendant liable.

It will be seen that this case falls between the cases of spring guns and the like, where the defendant is or may be in the same position as if he had been personally present, and had shot the plaintiff, and the cases where, as against trespassers or licensees, railroads are held entitled to run trains in their usual way without special precautions. Chenery v. Railroad Co., 160 Mass. 211, 213, 35 N. E. 554, 22 L. R. A. 575. In the case at bar the defendant, although not contemplating or intending actual damage, did an act specifically contemplating the plaintiff's presence, and directed against him. He left the safe position of a landowner, simply pursuing his own convenience, and assuming that no one would break the law, and thereby bring himself into danger.

Just as a man may make himself liable to a negligent plaintiff by a later negligence (Pierce v. Steamship Co., 153 Mass. 87, 89, 26 N. E. 415), he may make himself liable to a trespasser by an act that is done with reference to the trespasser's presence, and that sufficiently clearly threatens the danger which it brings to pass. A trespasser is not caput lupinum. In the present case the only element of doubt was whether the danger to the plaintiff was sufficiently obvious under the circumstances. That question properly was left to the jury.

Exceptions overruled.

HERRICK v. WIXOM.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1899. 121 Mich. 384, 80 N. W. 117.)

This was an action of trespass on the case. The defendant was possessed of and managed a tent circus. On the afternoon of September 18, 1897, when the defendant was exhibiting his circus the plaintiff went to the circus, and entered the tent, the entertainment being in progress, and took a seat on the lower tier of seats. There was testimony that the plaintiff entered without right. One feature of the entertainment consisted in the ignition and explosion of a giant firecracker attached to a pipe set in an upright position in one of the show rings. This was done by one of the clowns. There is testimony to show that plaintiff sat 30 or 40 feet from the place where the cracker was exploded, but, when the same was exploded, a part of the firecracker flew and struck plaintiff in the eye, putting it out, whereby he lost the sight and use of the eye. For this injury action was brought against defendant for damages as a result of defendant's negligence in permitting a dangerous explosive to be used in a dangerous manner, which subjected those present to hazard and risk of injury. Upon the trial a verdict was rendered for the defendant, and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff brings error. * * *

The circuit judge charged the jury as follows:

"The negligence charged in this case, gentlemen, is that Mr. Wixom exploded a firecracker, of the dimensions that the plaintiff claims this firecracker was, in the inside of this tent, and in the presence of his audience. They claim that was negligence. And that is the question for you to determine, under the evidence, and under the rules of law that I have given you and that I shall give you hereafter. Now, you must further find, in order that the plaintiff recover, that the plaintiff was in the tent, where he was injured, by the invitation of some person having authority to allow him to go in there. If he was a mere trespasser, who forced his way in, then the defendant owed him no duty that would enable him to recover under the declaration and proofs in this case. * * *[49]

MONTGOMERY, J. (after stating the facts). We think this instruction faulty in so far as it was intended to preclude recovery in any event if the plaintiff was found to be a trespasser. It is true that a trespasser who suffers an injury because of a dangerous condition of premises is without remedy. But, where a trespasser is discovered upon the premises by the owner or occupant, he is not beyond the pale of the law, and any negligence resulting in injury will render the person guilty of negligence liable to respond in damages. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 50; Whart. Neg. § 346; Marble v. Ross, 124 Mass. 44; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Sympkins, 54 Tex. 615, 38 Am. Rep. 632; Brown v. Lynn, 31 Pa. 510, 72 Am. Dec. 768; Needham v. Railroad Co., 37 Cal. 409; Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546; 1 Shear. & R. Neg. § 99. In this case the negligent act of the defendant's servant was committed after the audience was made up. The presence of plaintiff was known, and the danger to him from a negligent act was also known. The question of whether a dangerous experiment should be attempted in his presence, or whether an experiment should be conducted with due care and regard to his safety, cannot be made to depend upon whether he had forced himself into the tent. Every instinct of humanity revolts at such a suggestion.

For this error the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

DAVIS' ADM'R v. OHIO VALLEY BANKING & TRUST CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1908. 127 Ky. 800, 106 S. W. 843, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 402.)

CARROLL, J. Alleging that his intestate, Johnnie Davis, a boy about 12 years of age, was killed by the negligence of the servants of appellee in operating an elevator in its building, this suit was brought by the administrator to recover damages for his death. The petition charged that decedent lost his life "by the gross negligence of the defendant, its agents, servants, and employés while conducting and managing the said elevator." In amended petitions it was alleged that the decedent at the time of his death was, by the consent, knowledge, and permission of the agents and servants of defendant, riding on top of the elevator, and was there for the purpose of carrying dinner to his sister, who was employed in one of the office rooms of the building in which the elevator was located, and while in this dangerous position was carried to the fourth floor of the building, and brought back to the first floor, when the elevator was stopped, and while it was standing, and decedent was in the act of getting off, the employés of defendant suddenly started the elevator, with the result before stated. The answer, after controverting generally the affirmative matter in the petition, pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the decedent. * *

The elevator is situated on the ground floor of the building. The elevator cage is constructed of iron openwork, through which any person might be seen, and the top of the elevator was also made of openwork, with probably a solid piece in the center of the top. A person in the elevator could plainly see through the openwork a person riding on the top of it. Immediately by the side of the elevator is a stairway leading to the upper stories of the building, and when the elevator is standing at the ground floor a person on top of the elevator can crawl through an open space in the net work surrounding the elevator shaft onto the stairway. The elevator was in charge of a boy, but the record does not show his age. In the elevator with the operator was another boy. Johnnie Davis, who had been riding on top of the elevator, was in the act of crawling out, feet foremost, to the stairway, when the elevator, which at this moment was stationary on the ground floor, was suddenly started. His head was caught by the elevator in its upward movement, and almost severed from his body, death resulting instantly. The proof showed that Johnnie Davis was 12 years of age; that his sister was working in a telephone office in the building in which the elevator was located; and that he had gone there on the day of his death for the purpose of taking dinner to her, she being employed in one of the top stories of the building that could be conveniently reached by taking the elevator. The proof of one witness was that Johnnie Davis was in the act of getting off of the elevator, which was standing at the ground floor, through the opening in the shaft, when it suddenly started; by another witness, who had been looking at the elevator for a few minutes, that there were two boys in the elevator, and one on top of the elevator; that it went up to about the fourth story, and came down and stopped, and the boy on top of the elevator was in the act of getting out when the elevator boy started it and killed him. This witness said the boys in the elevator were laughing and talking to the boy on top of the elevator, that he heard them as the elevator went up and when it came down, that the boy on top did not try to get out until the elevator stopped. Another witness, who came in the building just as the accident happened, said he asked what was the matter, and the elevator boy said: "I have killed little Johnnie Davis, and didn't go to do it. We were just playing with the elevator, and he went to get off and got killed." The boy who was in the elevator when the accident happened said that John Gillum was the operator and that Johnnie Davis was on top; that he went up to the second floor and got on; that he could have seen him if he had been looking, and heard him talking at the fifth floor. He didn't know whether the boy operating the elevator saw him when he started the elevator or not. It will thus be seen that there was evidence conducing to establish two propositions, first, that the operator was a boy; second, that he knew Johnnie Davis was riding on top of the elevator just before he was killed, and could have seen him in the act of getting off if he had looked before starting it on its upward journey.

Counsel for appellee insist that the little boy who was killed was a trespasser, and that the operator owed him no duty except to prevent injury to him after his peril was actually discovered. The correctness of this principle, as applied to trespassers, will be conceded. It has been so adjudged in a number of cases by this court (C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Barbour's Adm'r, 93 S. W. 24, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 339; Davis v. L. H. & St. L. Ry. Co., 97 S. W. 1122, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 172), and we have no disposition to modify it. But, under the evidence, Johnnie Davis, although riding in a dangerous place not intended or set apart for passengers, was not a trespasser when he was killed, or while riding on the top of the elevator. He was there with the knowledge, and at least implied permission and consent, of the operator. The operator may not have known that he was in the act of escaping from the top of the elevator at the very time it was started, but he did know he was there a few moments before, and, knowing his perilous position, it was his duty under the circumstances to have exercised ordinary care for his safety. It would be a cruel and inhuman doctrine to announce that a person operating a dangerous instrumentality like an elevator might have actual knowledge of the fact that some person was riding on it in an unsafe place, where he was likely to be injured at any time, and yet not be responsible for his injury or death, on the theory that at the very moment of the accident, caused by his sudden starting of the machine, he did not actually know the person was yet in his perilous position, although he could have known it merely by looking in the direction. McVoy v. Oakes, 91 Wis. 214, 64 N. W. 748. Indeed we might with propriety say that, although Davis be treated as a trespasser, and the rule of nonliability be applied to him that was laid down in the Barbour and Davis Cases, yet, under the facts, this case should have gone to the jury. A trespasser is not an outlaw, nor are persons upon whose premises he intrudes at liberty to kill or cripple him at pleasure. The same care must be taken to avoid injury to him after his peril is discovered as is exercised towards other persons. The peril of Davis was discovered when the operator knew he was riding on top of the elevator. With this knowledge, it was his duty to have exercised ordinary care to prevent injury to him. We may safely add that, when an employé in charge of a dangerous agency permits persons to take places or positions in or about it that are hazardous, and that he knows or should know may result in their injury or death, if they remain where they are, the master will be responsible if the servant fails to exercise ordinary care to prevent injury to them.

Our attention is called by counsel for appellee to the case of Dalton's Adm'r v. L. & N. R. Co., 56 S. W. 657, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 97. Dalton, while riding on a freight train with the consent of the persons in charge of it, was killed in a collision between the train he was riding on and another train. In the course of the opinion, denying a recovery, the court said: "The only obligation appellant owed to him was not to injure him after knowledge of his danger. There is no allegation that anything was omitted which might have been done for the intestate's safety after the danger was discovered." The material distinction between the cases is that in the Dalton Case, as well as in L. & N. R. Co. v. Thornton, 58 S. W. 796, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 778, and in Thornton v. L. & N. R. Co., 70 S. W. 53, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 854, nothing was omitted which might have been done in the exercise of ordinary care to prevent the injury after the danger was discovered. In the case at bar the liability of appellee company grows out of the failure of its servant to exercise ordinary care to prevent injury to Johnnie Davis after his peril was discovered. Whether it did or not exercise this degree of care was a question for the jury. * * *[50]

Wherefore the case is reversed, with directions for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

LYNCH v. NURDIN.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1841. 1 Q. B. 29, 113 Reprint, 1041, 55 R. R. 191.)

Case. The declaration stated that defendant, on &c., was possessed of a cart, and of a horse then harnessed to the same. That defendant carelessly behaved and conducted himself in and about the management of said cart and horse, and carelessly, negligently, and improperly left the said cart and horse in a certain common highway without anybody to look after the same; and the said cart and horse of defendant, by and through his carelessness, negligence, and improper conduct in that behalf, then ran and struck with great force and violence against plaintiff, then lawfully being in the said highway, and with great force &c.: various injuries were then stated, by means of which plaintiff became and was sick, lame &c. Pleas, Not guilty, and that defendant was not possessed of the cart and the horse. Issues thereon. Verdict for the plaintiff. A rule nisi for a new trial was obtained and argued.[51]

Lord Denman, C. J.[52] This case was tried before my brother Williams at the sittings in the Easter Term, 1839. It was an action of tort for negligence by the defendant's servant, in leaving his cart and horse for half an hour in the open street at the door of a house where the servant remained during that period. The evidence for the plaintiff proved that, at the end of the first half hour, he, a child of very tender age, being between six and seven years old, was heard crying, and, on the approach of the witnesses, was found on the ground and a wheel of the defendant's cart going over his leg, which was thereby fractured. The defendant's counsel first applied for a nonsuit. The learned judge refused the application; and no question was made before us that these facts afforded prima facie evidence of the mischief having been occasioned by the negligence of the defendant's servant in leaving the horse and cart. Witnesses were then called to establish a defence by a fuller explanation of the facts that had occurred. They proved that, after the servant had been about a quarter of an hour in the house, the plaintiff, and several other children came up, and began to play with the horse, and climb into the cart and out of it. While the plaintiff was getting down from it, another boy made the horse move, in consequence of which, the plaintiff fell and his leg was broken as before mentioned. On this undisputed evidence, (for there was no cross examination of the witnesses), the defendant's counsel claimed the Judge's direction in his favor, contending that, as the plaintiff had obviously contributed to the calamity, it could not be said in point of law to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's servant.

[51] The reporter's statement of the facts and the arguments of counsel are omitted.

[52] Part of the opinion, dealing with other questions, is omitted.

My learned brother, however, thought himself bound to lay all the facts before the jury, and take their opinion on that general point. They found a verdict for the plaintiff. It is now complained that such direction was not given; and at all events the jury are said to have given a verdict contrary to the evidence. The case came on in the new trial paper last Term, and has been fully argued before us. * * *

A distinction may here be taken between the wilful act done by the defendant in those cases, in deliberately planting a dangerous weapon in his ground with the design of deterring trespassers, and the mere negligence of the defendant's servant in leaving his cart in the open street. But between wilful mischief and gross negligence the boundary line is hard to trace: I should rather say, impossible. The law runs them into each other, considering such a degree of negligence as some proof of malice. It is then a matter strictly within the province of a jury deciding on circumstances of each case. They would naturally enquire whether the horse was vicious or steady: whether the occasion required the servant to be so long absent from his charge, and whether in that case no assistance could have been procured to watch the horse: whether at that hour the street was likely to be clear or thronged with a noisy multitude (it appeared in the present case that Compton street was more thronged than usual, in consequence of a neighbouring street being stopped): especially whether large parties of young children might be reasonably expected to resort to the spot. If this last mentioned fact were probable, it would be hard to say that a case of gross negligence was not fully established.

But the question remains, can the plaintiff then, consistently with the authorities, maintain his action, having been at least equally in fault. The answer is that, supposing that fact ascertained by the jury, but to this extent, that he merely indulged the natural instinct of a child in amusing himself with the empty cart and deserted horse, then we think that the defendant cannot be permitted to avail himself of that fact. The most blamable carelessness of his servant having tempted the child, he ought not to reproach the child with yielding to that temptation. He has been the real and only cause of the mischief. He has been deficient in ordinary care: the child, acting without prudence, or thought, has, however, shown these qualities in as great a degree as he could be expected to possess them. His misconduct bears no proportion to that of the defendant which produced it.

For these reasons, we think that nothing appears in the case which can prevent the action from being maintained. It was properly left to the jury, with whose opinion we fully concur.

SIOUX CITY & P. R. CO. v. STOUT.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1874. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745.)

This was an action brought in the name of an infant, by his father as next friend, to recover $15,000 damages from the railroad company for an injury to the foot of the child, received while playing upon the turntable of the defendant. The action was begun in a state court in Nebraska, but was removed by the railroad company into the United States Circuit Court.

The plaintiff's petition alleged that the defendant, at the time when the injuries complained of were received, was operating a railroad through the town of Blair, in Nebraska, and in connection with this railroad used and operated a turntable which was "so constructed and arranged as to be easily turned around and revolved in a horizontal direction; that across the upper surface thereof there were fastened two large and heavy bars of iron corresponding with the iron rails of the railroad track used in connection with said turntable, and so placed and arranged that when the turntable revolved, the ends of the iron bars running across the face of the same passed by the ends of the rails on the railroad track; that said turntable was situated in a public place, and in immediate proximity to a passenger depot of the defendant"; that many children were in the habit of going upon said turntable to play; that the turntable was unfastened and in no way protected to prevent it being turned around at the pleasure of small children; that the defendant had notice of these facts; that the plaintiff was a child of tender years without judgment or discretion, and that in consequence of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant in not locking said turntable, it was revolved, and while it was being so revolved by other children, "the plaintiff had his right foot caught between the ends of one of the iron bars on said turntable and the end of one of said rails upon the railroad track" and his foot was crushed and the plaintiff permanently injured.

The defendant's answer denied all the averments of the petition and alleged that the plaintiff had no right upon the turntable, that he was a trespasser, and that neither law, nor usage, nor reasonable prudence required the defendant to keep its turntable locked or guarded.

A jury trial upon the issue thus arising resulted in a disagreement. At a second trial the following charge was given by John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge:

This is both a novel and important case. The injury for which this action is brought happened in the town of Blair, in this state, on the 29th day of March, 1869. The plaintiff was then a boy of the tender age of six years and two or three months. The undisputed testimony shows that the town of Blair was, at that time, a new place, had been recently laid off, and contained a population of about one hundred people. On the plat of the town of Blair is a tract of land of variable width, extending almost the entire length of the plat, owned and used by the defendants for their road-bed and depot grounds, and which divides the town into two portions. The cross streets of the town run up to this railroad ground and there stop, with the exception of one or two streets, which were laid out across it. On this ground, which was not enclosed, was situated the defendant's depot house, and, about one-quarter of a mile distant from the depot house, was located the turntable, on which the plaintiff was injured. There were but few houses in the immediate neighborhood of the turntable, and the plaintiff's parents lived in another portion of the town, and about three-fourths of a mile distant from the turntable.

The circumstances under which the accident to the plaintiff occurred are not in the main, if in any respect, in dispute. The plaintiff, without, as it appears, the knowledge of his parents, started with one or two other boys to go to the defendant's depot, about half a mile away, with no definite purpose in view. When the boys had arrived at the depot, it was proposed by some of them to go to the turntable to play; and the boys proceeded to the turntable, about a quarter of a mile distant, traveling along the defendant's roadbed or track. When the boys had reached the turntable, which was not attended or guarded by any employé of the company, and which was not then fastened or locked, and which revolved easily on its axis, two of them commenced to turn it, and the plaintiff, in attempting to get upon it (being at the time upon the railroad track), had the misfortune to get his foot caught between the end of the rail on the turntable, as it was revolving, and the end of the iron rail on the main track of the defendant's road, and his foot was badly cut and crushed, resulting in a serious and permanent injury.

There is the evidence of one witness (Quimby) then an employé of the company, that he had previously seen boys playing at the turntable, and had forbidden his children to play there. But this witness had no charge of the turntable, as he says, and did not, as he testified, communicate the fact to any of the officers or employés of the company having charge of the turntable. It appears, from the plaintiff's testimony, that he had not before that day been engaged in playing at the turntable. The turntable was constructed on the defendant's own land, and the testimony tends to show that it was constructed in the usual and ordinary manner.

Now the ground of complaint against the defendant, as set out in the petition, is that the turntable, as it was constructed, was of a dangerous nature and character, when unlocked or unguarded, and that being, as it is alleged, in a place much resorted to by the public, and where children were wont to go and play, it was the duty of the defendant to keep the same securely locked or fastened, so as to prevent it from being turned or played with by children, or to keep the same guarded, so as to prevent injuries such as befell the plaintiff.

The basis of this action, therefore, is that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty of this kind; that, in failing to discharge this duty, the defendant was guilty of negligence; that this neglect caused the injury to the plaintiff, and that, therefore, the defendant is liable in damages therefor.

Now, if this action had been brought, under the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, by an adult, who, himself, meddled with and set in motion the turntable which caused the injury, we should have no hesitation in saying that the law would not allow it to be maintained. And we confess that we have had serious doubts whether, under the circumstances, the action was any more maintainable, being brought by an infant of tender years.

On reflection it is our judgment, and we so instruct you, that this action may be maintained, if certain facts be established by the evidence.

In the first place, it is alleged in the petition, and it must appear by the evidence, that this turntable, in the condition, situation, and place where it then was, was a dangerous machine, one which, if left unguarded or unlocked, would be likely to cause injury to children. You have heard described the manner in which this turntable was constructed and left, and very much evidence has been adduced to show that turntables are constructed and left in this manner elsewhere; and the evidence is quite undisputed that it is not the practice of railroads to guard or lock them. The circumstance that other roads throughout the country do not guard or fasten turntables (if you find such to be the fact), is not conclusive in the defendant's favor that there was or could be no negligence on its part as respects the turntable in question, but, while not conclusive, it is still a very important fact or circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining the question of the defendant's negligence.

This action rests, and rests alone, upon the alleged negligence of the defendant, and this negligence consists, as alleged, in not keeping the turntable guarded or locked. Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable, prudent man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do; or doing something which a prudent or reasonable man would not do, under all the circumstances surrounding the particular transaction under judicial investigation.

If the turntable, in the manner it was constructed and left, was not dangerous in its nature, then of course the defendants would not be guilty of any negligence in not locking or guarding it. But even if it was dangerous in its nature in some situations, you are further to consider whether, situated as it was on the defendant's property, in a small town, and distant or somewhat remote from habitations, the defendants are guilty of negligence in not anticipating or foreseeing, if left unlocked or unguarded, that injuries to the children of the place would be likely to or would probably ensue.

The machine in question is part of the defendant's road, and was lawfully constructed where it was. If the railroad company did not know, and had no good reason to suppose, that children would resort to the turntable to play, or did not know, or had no good reason to suppose, that if they resorted there, they would be likely to get injured thereby, then you cannot find a verdict against them.

But if the defendant did know, or had good reason to believe, under the circumstances of the case, that children of the place would resort to the turntable to play, and that if they did they would or might be injured, then, if they took no means to keep the children away, and no means to prevent accidents, they would be guilty of negligence, and would be answerable for damages caused to children by such negligence. Counsel for the defendant disclaim resting their defense on the ground that the plaintiff's parents were negligent, or that the plaintiff (considering his tender age) was negligent, but rest their defense upon the ground that the company was not negligent, and claim that the injury to the plaintiff was accidental, or brought upon himself. The defendants are not insurers of the limbs of those, whether adults or children, who may resort to their grounds; and there are many injuries continually happening which involve no pecuniary liability to any one.

To find against the defendant you must find that it has been guilty of neglect, of a wrong, of a want of due and proper care in the construction of machinery of a dangerous character, and, so leaving it exposed as before explained, that, as reasonable men, the officers of the road ought to have foreseen that an accident, happening as this happened, would probably occur, or be likely to happen.

The second trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $7,500. The court signed a bill of exceptions, a writ of error was sued out, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. Here the opinion was delivered by

MR. JUSTICE HUNT. * * * Was there negligence on the part of the railway company in the management or condition of its turntable?

On this point the judge charged the jury that to maintain the action it must appear by the evidence that the turntable, in the condition, situation and place where it then was, was a dangerous machine, one which, if unguarded or unlocked, would be likely to cause injury to children; that if in its construction and the manner in which it was left it was not dangerous in its nature, the defendant was not liable for negligence; that it was further to consider whether, situated as was the defendant's property, in a small town, somewhat remote from habitations, there was negligence in not anticipating that injury might occur if it was left unlocked or unguarded; that if it did not have reason to anticipate that children would be likely to resort to it or that they would be likely to be injured if they did resort to it, then there was no negligence.

The charge was an impartial and intelligent one. Unless the defendant was entitled to an order that the plaintiff be nonsuited, or, as it is expressed in the practice of the United States courts, to an order directing a verdict in its favor, the submission was right. If, upon any construction which the jury was authorized to put upon the evidence, or by any inferences they were authorized to draw from it, the conclusion of negligence can be justified, the defendant was not entitled to this order, and the judgment cannot be disturbed. To express it affirmatively, if from the evidence given it might justly be inferred by the jury that the defendant, in the construction, location, management or condition of its machine had omitted that care and attention to prevent the occurrence of accidents which prudent and careful men ordinarily bestow, the jury was at liberty to find for the plaintiff.

That the turntable was a dangerous machine, which would be likely to cause injury to the children who resorted to it, might fairly be inferred from the injury which actually occurred to the plaintiff. There was the same liability to injury to him, and no greater, that existed with reference to all children. When the jury learned from the evidence that he had suffered a serious injury, by his foot being caught between the fixed rail of the road-bed and the turning rail of the table, they were justified in believing that there was a probability of the occurrence of such accidents.

So, in looking at the remoteness of the machine from inhabited dwellings, when it was proved to the jury that several boys from the hamlet were at play there on this occasion, and that they had been at play upon the turntable on other occasions, and within the observation and to the knowledge of the employés of the defendant, the jury were justified in believing that children would probably resort to it, and that the defendant should have anticipated that such would be the case.

As it was in fact, on this occasion, so it was to be expected that the amusement of the boys would have been found in turning this table while they were on it or about it. This could certainly have been prevented by locking the turntable when not in use by the company. It was not shown that this would cause any considerable expense or inconvenience to the defendant. It could probably have been prevented by the repair of the broken latch. This was a heavy catch which, by dropping into a socket, prevented the revolution of the table. There had been one on this table weighing some eight or ten pounds, but it had been broken off and had not been replaced. It was proved to have been usual with railroad companies to have upon their turntables a latch or bolt, or some similar instrument. The jury may well have believed that if the defendant had incurred the trifling expense of replacing this latch, and had taken the slight trouble of putting it in its place, these very small boys would not have taken the pains to lift it out, and thus the whole difficulty have been avoided. Thus reasoning, the jury would have reached the conclusion that the defendant had omitted the care and attention it ought to have given, that it was negligent, and that its negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff. The evidence is not strong and the negligence is slight, but we are not able to say that there is not evidence sufficient to justify the verdict. We are not called upon to weigh, to measure, to balance the evidence, or to ascertain how we should have decided if acting as jurors. The charge was in all respects sound and judicious, and there being sufficient evidence to justify the finding we are not authorized to disturb it. * * *[54]

Upon the whole case, the judgment must be affirmed.

FROST v. EASTERN R. R.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1886. 64 N. H. 220, 9 Atl. 790, 10 Am. St. Rep. 396.)

Case, for personal injuries from the alleged negligence of the defendants in not properly guarding and securing a turn-table. The plaintiff, who sues by his father and next friend, was seven years old when the accident occurred. Plea, the general issue. A motion for a nonsuit was denied, and the defendants excepted. Verdict for the plaintiff.[55]

CLARK J. * * * The ground of the action is, that the defendants were guilty of negligence in maintaining a turn-table insecurely [54] Parts of the opinion of Justice Hunt are omitted.

"Ownership of property may carry with it the right of the owner to use, and to exclude others from the use of, the property; but, however exclusive may be the owner's rights, he is subject always to the maxim, 'Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas.' Common prudence forbids that one may arrange, even on his own premises, that which he knows, or in the exercise of common judgment and prudence ought to know, will naturally attract others into unsuspected danger of great bodily harm. It is the apparent probability of danger, rather than rights of property, that determines the duty and measure of care required of the author of such a contrivance; for ordinarily the duty of avoiding known danger to others may, under some circumstances, operate to require care for persons who may be at the place of danger without right.

"The averments of this complaint bring the case within the influence of Railroad Co. v. Stout (1873) 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745, which is a leading authority in affirmation of the possible liability of railroad companies for negligence in cases of injury to infants trespassing on turntables. As appears from cases cited in briefs of counsel, there has been a parting of the ways of judicial opinion concerning the soundness of the decision in Stout's Case. Some courts have repudiated, though numerous others have followed, it. We adopt as sound the doctrine there announced concerning both the duty of railroad companies towards infants, and the mode in which the question of negligence should be tried." Per Sharpe, J., in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Crocker (1901) 131 Ala. 584, 31 South. 561, 563.

guarded, which, being wrongfully set in motion by older boys, caused an injury to the plaintiff, who was at that time seven years old, and was attracted to the turn-table by the noise of the older and larger boys turning and playing upon it. The turn-table was situated on the defendants' land, about sixty feet from the public street, in a cut with high, steep embankments on each side; and the land on each side was private property and fenced. It was fastened by a toggle, which prevented its being set in motion unless the toggle was drawn by a lever, to which was attached a switch padlock, which being locked prevented the lever from being used unless the staple was drawn. At the time of the accident the turn-table was fastened by the toggle, but it was a controverted point whether the padlock was then locked. When secured by the toggle and not locked with the padlock, the turn-table could not be set in motion by boys of the age and strength of the plaintiff.

Upon these facts we think the action cannot be maintained. The alleged negligence complained of relates to the construction and condition of the turn-table, and it is not claimed that the defendants were guilty of any active misconduct towards the plaintiff. The right of a landowner in the use of his own land is not limited or qualified like the enjoyment of a right or privilege in which others have an interest, as the use of a street for highway purposes under the general law, or for other purposes under special license (Moynihan v. Whidden, 143 Mass. 287, 9 N. E. 645), where care must be taken not to infringe upon the lawful rights of others. At the time of his injury the plaintiff was using the defendants' premises as a playground without right. The turn-table was required in operating the defendants' railroad. It was located on its own land so far removed from the highway as not to interfere with the convenience and safety of the public travel, and it was not a trap set for the purpose of injuring trespassers. Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 404, 16 Am. Rep. 339. Under these circumstances, the defendants owed no duty to the plaintiff; and there can be no negligence or breach of duty where there is no act or service which the party is bound to perform or fulfil. A landowner is not required to take active measures to insure the safety of intruders, nor is he liable for an injury resulting from the lawful use of his premises to one entering upon them without right. A trespasser ordinarily assumes all risk of danger from the condition of the premises; and to recover for an injury happening to him he must show that it was wantonly inflicted, or that the owner or occupant, being present and acting, might have prevented the injury by the exercise of reasonable care after discovering the danger. We are not prepared to adopt the doctrine of Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. [56] On the diversity of doctrine here see 29 Cyc. 447, 448, and the cases there cited.

The "turntable" doctrine was elaborately considered in Ryan v. Towar (1901) 128 Mich. 463, 87 N. W. 644, 55 L. R. A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481. The court, by a majority of one, ruled against the new doctrine. Said Hooker, J., speaking for the majority: "Mere toleration of a trespass does not alone constitute a license even, certainly not an invitation. 1 Thomp. Neg. (2d Ed.) § 1050, and note. The pedestrians who insist upon risking their lives by making a footpath of a railroad track, and others who habitually shorten distances by making footpaths across the corners of village lots, are none the less trespassers because the owners do not choose to resent such intrusion, and be to the expense and trouble of taking effective measures to prevent it. There is no more lawless class than children, and none more annoyingly resent an attempt to prevent their trespasses. The average citizen has learned that the surest way to be overrun by children is to give them to understand that their presence is distasteful. The consequence is that they roam at will over private premises, and, as a rule, this is tolerated so long as no damage is done. The remedy which the law affords for the trifling trespasses of children is inadequate. No one ever thinks of suing them, and to attempt to remove a crowd of boys from private premises by gently laying on of hands, and using no more force than necessary to put them off, would be a roaring farce, with all honors to the juveniles. For a corporation with an empty treasury, and overwhelmed with debt, to be required to be to the expense of preventing children from going across its lots to school, lest it be said that it invited and licensed them to do so, is to our minds an unreasonable proposition. As to this question of license or invitation, there is no difference between children and adults. * * * May a man keep a ladder, or a grindstone, or a scythe, or a plow, or a reaper, without danger of being called upon to reward trespassing children, whose parents owe and may be presumed to perform the duty of restraint? Does the new rule go still further, and make it necessary for a man to fence his gravel pit or quarry? And, if so, will an ordinary fence do, in view of the known propensity and ability of boys to climb fences? Can a man nowadays safely own a small lake or fishpond? and must he guard ravines and precipices upon his land? Such is the evolution of the law, less than 20 years after the decision of Railroad Co. v. Stout (1873) 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745, when, with due deference, we think some of the courts left the solid ground of the rule that trespassers cannot recover for injuries received, and due merely to negligence of the persons trespassed upon. * * *" trespassers. One having in his possession agricultural or mechanical tools is not responsible for injuries caused to trespassers by careless handling, nor is the owner of a fruit tree bound to cut it down or enclose it, or to exercise care in securing the staple and lock with which his ladder is fastened, for the protection of trespassing boys who may be attracted by the fruit. Neither is the owner or occupant of premises upon which there is a natural or artificial pond, or a blueberry pasture, legally required to exercise care in securing his gates and bars to guard against accidents to straying and trespassing children. The owner is under no duty to a mere trespasser to keep his premises safe; and the fact that the trespasser is an infant cannot have the effect to raise a duty where none otherwise exists. "The supposed duty has regard to the public at large, and cannot well exist as to one portion of the public and not to another, under the same circumstances. In this respect children, women, and men are upon the same footing. In cases where certain duties exist, infants may require greater care than adults, or a different care; but precautionary measures having for their object the protection of the public must as a rule have reference to all classes alike." Nolan v. N. Y. & N. H. & H. Railroad Co., 53 Conn. 461, 4 Atl. 106.

There being no evidence to charge the defendants with negligence, the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted.

COOKE v. MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN RY. OF IRELAND.

(House of Lords. [1909] A. C. 229.)

A railway company kept a turntable unlocked on their land close to a public road. The company's servants knew that children were in the habit of trespassing and playing with the turntable, to which they obtained easy access through a well-worn gap in a fence which the railway company were bound by statute to maintain. A four year old boy playing with other children on the turntable was seriously hurt under circumstances disclosed in the opinions which follow. The child by his father brought an action against the railway company for the injury thus sustained.

At the trial before Lord O'Brien, C. J., the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £550, and judgment was entered accordingly. The jury found that the fence was in a defective condition through the negligence of the defendants; that the plaintiff was allured through the hedge and up to the turntable by the negligence of the defendants; and that it was by reason of the defendants' negligence that the misfortune occurred. This judgment was affirmed by the King's Bench Division in Ireland (Palles, C. B., and Johnson, J.; Kenny, J., dissenting), but was set aside by the Court of Appeal in Ireland (Sir S.

Walker, L. C., and Fitz Gibbon and Holmes, L. JJ.). Hence this appeal by the plaintiff.[57]

LORD MACNAGHTEN. My Lords, the only question before your Lordships is this: Was there evidence of negligence on the part of the company fit to be submitted to the jury? If there was, the verdict must stand, although your Lordships might have come to a different conclusion on the same materials.

I cannot help thinking that the issue has been somewhat obscured by the extravagant importance attached to the gap in the hedge, both in the arguments of counsel and in the judgments of some of the learned judges who have had the case under consideration. That there was a gap there, that it was a good broad gap some three feet wide, is, I think, proved beyond question. But of all the circumstances attending the case it seems to me that this gap taken by itself is the least important. I have some difficulty in believing that a gap in a roadside fence is a strange and unusual spectacle in any part of Ireland. But however that may be, I quite agree that the insufficiency of the fence, though the company was bound by Act of Parliament to maintain it, cannot be regarded as the effective cause of the accident.

The question for the consideration of the jury may, I think, be stated thus: Would not a private individual of common sense and ordinary intelligence, placed in the position in which the company were placed, and possessing the knowledge which must be attributed to them, have seen that there was a likelihood of some injury happening to children resorting to the place and playing with the turntable, and would he not have thought it his plain duty either to put a stop to the practice altogether, or at least to take ordinary precautions to prevent such an accident as that which occurred?

This I think was substantially the question which the Lord Chief Justice presented to the jury. It seems to me to be in accordance with the view of the Court of Queen's Bench in Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, and the opinion expressed by Romer and Stirling, L. JJ., in McDowall v. Great Western Ry. Co., [1903] 2 K. B. 331.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland puts Lynch v. Nurdin aside. He holds that it bears no analogy to the present case, because the thing that did the mischief there was a "cart in the public street—a nuisance." But no question of nuisance was considered in Lynch v. Nurdin. That point was not suggested. The ground of the decision is a very simple proposition. "If," says Lord Denman, "I am guilty of negligence in leaving anything dangerous in a place where I know it to be extremely probable that some other person will unjustifiably set it in motion to the injury of a third, and if that injury should be so brought about, I presume that the sufferer might have redress by action against both or either of the two, but unquestionably against the first." If that proposition be sound, surely the character of the place, though, of course, an element proper to be considered, is not a matter of vital importance. It cannot make very much difference whether the place is dedicated to the use of the public or left open by a careless owner to the invasion of children who make it their playground.

I think the jury were entitled and bound to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case,—the mode in which the turntable was constructed; its close proximity to the wall by which the plaintiff's leg was crushed; the way in which it was left, unfenced, unlocked, and unfastened; the history of this bit of ground and its position, shut off as it was by an embankment from the view of the company's servants at the station, and lying half derelict. After the construction of the embankment it served no purpose in connection with the company's undertaking, except that at one time a corner of it was used as a receptacle for some timber belonging to the company, and afterwards as a site for this turntable. In other respects, and apart from these uses, it seems to have been devoted or abandoned to the sustenance of the railway inspector's goat and the diversion of the youth of Navan. It is proved that in spite of a notice board idly forbidding trespass it was a place of habitual resort for children, and that children were frequently playing with the timber, and afterwards with the turntable. At the date of the trial, twelve months after the accident, a beaten path leading from the gap bore witness both to the numbers that flocked to the spot and to the special attraction that drew children to it. It is remarkable that not a single word of cross examination as to either of these points was addressed to the principal witnesses for the plaintiff, Tully, the herd, and Gertrude Cooke, the plaintiff's sister; nor was any explanation or evidence offered on the part of the company. Now the company knew, or must be deemed to have known, all the circumstances of the case and what was going on. Yet no precaution was taken to prevent an accident of a sort that might well have been foreseen and very easily prevented. They did not close up the gap until after the accident. Then it was the first thing thought of. But it was too late. They did not summon any of the children who played there, or bring them before the magistrates, as a warning to trespassers and a proof that they were really in earnest in desiring to stop an objectional practice which had gone on so long and so openly. They did not have their turntable locked automatically in the way in which Mr. Barnes, C. E., whose evidence is uncontradicted, says it is usual to lock such machines. The table, it seems, was not even fastened. There was a bolt; but if Cooke, the father of the plaintiff is to be believed, the bolt was rusty and unworkable. * * *

It seems to me that the Chief Justice would have been wrong if he had withdrawn the case from the jury. I think the jury were entitled, in view of all the circumstances, on the evidence before them, uncon-tradicted as it was, to find that the company were guilty of negligence. I am therefore of the opinion that the finding of the jury should be upheld, and judgment under appeal reversed, with pauper costs here, and costs below; and I move your Lordships accordingly.

I will only add that I do not think that this verdict will be followed by the disastrous consequences to railway companies and landowners which the Lord Chancellor of Ireland seems to apprehend. Persons may not think it worth their while to take ordinary care of their own property, and may not be compellable to do so; but it does not seem unreasonable to hold that, if they allow their property to be open to all comers, infants as well as children of maturer age, and place upon it a machine, attractive to children and dangerous as a plaything, they may be responsible in damages to those who resort to it with their tacit permission, and who are unable, in consequence of their tender age, to take care of themselves.

Lord Collins. My Lords, this case has given rise to much difference of view, the Lord Chief Justice, who tried the case, the Lord Chief Baron, and Johnson, J., being in favour of the plaintiff, and three judges of the Court of Appeal and Kenny, J., in the Divisional Court, in favour of the defendants. I am of opinion that there was evidence of actionable negligence fit for the consideration of a jury. I think there was evidence that the turntable, fastened as it was only by a bolt so easily withdrawn, was a dangerous thing for young children to play with, and that the defendants, as reasonable men, ought to have known it; and that, situate as it was in such a conspicuous place, and frequented so largely by young people without remonstrance by the defendants, with easy access from the Bridge Road through a gap in the hedge and along a well-trodden path down the embankment, it could hardly fail to present an irresistible attraction to young persons. I think all these facts in combination were evidence from which the jury might well infer not merely a license, but an invitation, which fixed the defendants with a high responsibility towards those people to whom such an invitation would mainly appeal, namely, those who from their tender age would be deemed incapable of caution and therefore of contributory negligence. I have not forgotten the evidence that on one occasion persons playing on the spot were warned off, or that there was a notice board near the gate leading from the high road which may have contained a caution, but the bearing of these facts was for the jury. I am aware of the mischief, so much dwelt upon by Mr. Ronan in his brilliant argument, of making it difficult for landowners to admit the public to enjoy the amenities of their private domains. But every case of this kind must be dealt with on its special facts, and the line of legal immunity will, I think, be found to coincide with the line of common sense, of which juries are very capable judges. Tempting or even allowing children to make a plaything of a dangerous machine without taking adequate, or indeed any precautions, against the probable danger of mischief through their imprudence is a form of benevolence which ought not to be encouraged. The Supreme Court of America has affirmed the liability of the railway company in a case as nearly as possible identical in its facts with that under appeal: Railway Co. v. Stout (1873) 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745, and the principle of allurement in the case of children has been recognized in our own Court of Appeal: Jewson v. Gatti, 2 Times L. R. 441.

With unfeigned respect to the Court of Appeal, I think they have hardly given sufficient weight to the special considerations applicable in the case of young children as distinguished from adults.

LORD LOREBURN, L. C. My Lords, I am content to act upon the opinion of my learned and noble friend LORD MACNAGHTEN, having regard to the peculiar circumstances, namely that this place, on which the defendants had a machine, dangerous unless protected, was to the defendants' knowledge an habitual resort of children, accessible from the high road near thereto, as well as attractive to the youthful mind; and that the defendants took no steps either to prevent the children's presence or to prevent their playing on the machine, or to lock the machine so as to avoid accidents, though such locking was usual. I must add that I think this case is near the line. The evidence is very weak, though I cannot say there was none. It is the combination of the circumstances to which I have referred which alone enables me to acquiesce in the judgment proposed by my noble and learned friend LORD MACNAGHTEN. * * *[58]

Order of the Irish Court of Appeal reversed, and the verdict and judgment entered for the plaintiff by the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland restored, with pauper costs here and costs below.

ANDERSON v. FT. DODGE, D. M. & S. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1911. 150 Iowa, 465, 130 N. W. 391.)

WEAVER, J. The defendant operates an electric railway through the city of Boone. At or near its station in that city and by the side of one of its tracks the company maintains or uses a storage house or building, the roof of which is about on a level with the roof of an ordinary box car standing on the adjacent track. At the height of four feet above the top of this building there are strung some of the company's electric wires which do not appear to have been protected by insulation. The injury of which plaintiff complains occurred May 22, 1909. He was then a lad of 12 years and 3 months. On the evening in question a box car was standing near the storage building, and plaintiff, with three other boys, was idling or playing in that vicinity. Climbing to the top of the box car, one of his companions dared or "stumped" plaintiff to follow him, and jumped across the intervening space to the roof of the building. Plaintiff performed the feat, and in turning to jump back again came into contact with a wire, receiving a severe shock, and, as he claims, resulting injury. Recovery of damages from the defendant is demanded on the theory that it was negligent in the construction and maintenance of the building and track and in its manner of caring for and managing its said premises; that it was also negligent, in that with knowledge of the danger to be apprehended from said wires it placed and left its cars in such manner as to invite children to play thereon, and expose them to injury; and that it was further negligent in leaving the wires uncovered without notice or warning to put the plaintiff or other persons passing that way upon their guard to avoid injury. These allegations are stated with many repetitions, but to the same substantial effect.

The plaintiff, who seems to be a boy of average intelligence and quickness of perception, says he and other boys had frequently been at or about this railway station, and had there indulged in more or less of youthful sport and play. They had at times jumped back and forth between the station platform and standing cars, but, so far as the record shows, had never before attempted the jump from a car top to the roof of the storage building. He says he did not play there thinking he had any right to do so, and knew the railway men would drive him off if they saw him. It does not appear that he was aware of the wires strung above the roof, and either from heedlessness or from the darkness of the evening failed to discover them before his injury, though he says he knew there was danger in electric wires. The testimony of the boys who were playing with plaintiff at the time of his injury corroborates his story in most respects. The evidence tends to show that the wires were not insulated, and were not guarded to prevent contact with them by any person crossing the roof, and no warning notice was posted there. There was also expert testimony that the defendant's wires were strung lower than is usually done in building such systems, and that they are "too low to be safe."

The motion for a directed verdict which the trial court sustained was based on the grounds: (1) That the evidence did not tend to show negligence on the part of the defendant. (2) That the evidence did show plaintiff to have contributed to his injury by his own recklessness and negligence. (3) That plaintiff at the time of his injury was a trespasser and upon defendant's premises without license, and that defendant owed him no duty or care under the circumstances as shown and admitted by his own testimony.

Giving plaintiff the benefit of the most favorable construction which can be placed upon the testimony, we are compelled to hold that he failed to make a case upon which a verdict in his favor could be sustained. It is true that the courts of the several states are arrayed in apparently irreconcilable conflict upon the question how far, if at all, the ancient doctrine which exonerates a property owner from the duty of considering or caring for the safety of a trespasser upon his premises is applicable where the injured person is a young child who has been attracted to the place of danger by conditions and circumstances created or permitted by the owner, and especially where the owner knows, or as a reasonable person ought to apprehend, the danger of resultant injury to children too young and inexperienced to understand the fact or meaning of trespass or to exercise judgment or care for their own safety. This court has definitely committed itself to the doctrine first clearly affirmed in this country by Dillon, J., in Stout v. Railroad Co., 2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,504, and affirmed on appeal in 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745. That under some circumstances the rule as to injury to trespassers will not be applied to young children who are led or attracted to the premises of another by the act or omission of the owner. See Edgington v. Railroad Co., 116 Iowa, 410, 90 N. W. 95, 57 L. R. A. 561; Fishburn v. Railroad Co., 127 Iowa, 483, 103 N. W. 481. But the rule of these cases has never been so far extended as to cover injuries received in the manner disclosed by this record. The plaintiff in this case was in his thirteenth year, and, while it would perhaps be too much to say that we can assume as a matter of law that a boy of such age is sufficiently mature to be chargeable with contributory negligence, his evidence clearly discloses that he appreciated the fact that he was a trespasser, and that he would be ordered away if discovered. It shows, also, that he knew the railroad was operated by electric power, and knew the dangerous character of wires charged with electricity. So far as appears, this roof had never been used by him or any of his companions as a resort for play or frolic. There was nothing to suggest to the railway company any necessity for guarding the roof of its building against such visitors or to indicate the propriety of placarding its property with notices or warning against injury from wires stretched far above the ground where contact was possible only by climbing to the top of its storehouse.

To say that a property owner must guard against such injury to a trespassing boy simply because it is possible for him in a venturesome spirit to climb into the zone of danger would be intolerable. In every dooryard and on every street side are shade and ornamental trees. To climb trees is as natural to the average boy as to a squirrel. Such sport is always attended with danger that the climber may lose his hold or break a branch and fall to his severe injury. Not infrequently it may bring him to an elevation where he is exposed to contact with wires carrying electric currents of greater or less intensity. If he falls and breaks his bones, or if he receives a stunning shock of electricity, ought the owner of the tree to be held liable in damages because he did not guard it against the approach of the lad, or because he did not give notice or warning in some way of the dangers to be apprehended in climbing it? No court has ever gone to such an extent, and the establishment of such rule would render the ownership of real estate a very undesirable investment. See Merryman v. Railroad Co., 85 Iowa, 634, 52 N. W. 545; Masser v. Railroad Co., 68 Iowa, 602, 27 N. W. 776; Carson v. Railroad Co., 96 Iowa, 583, 65 N. W. 831; Brown v. Canning Co., 132 Iowa, 634, 110 N. W. 12; Keefe v. Electric Co., 21 R. I. 575, 43 Atl. 542; Sullivan v. Railroad Co., 156 Mass. 378, 31 N. E. 128.

As the plaintiff's own case reveals him as a conscious trespasser upon defendant's premises, and there is an utter absence of testimony that defendant kept or maintained anything on the roof of its building to attract or draw children thereto, or that it in any manner encouraged, invited, or permitted such use of the roof, he was not entitled to go to the jury, and the court did not err in directing a verdict against him. The same result would have to be reached on the ground of contributory negligence had there been anything in the record tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant.

Affirmed.

BJORK v. CITY OF TACOMA.

ELLIS, J. In this action, the plaintiff seeks to recover damages on account of the death of his minor son, alleged to have been caused through the negligence of the defendant. It is admitted that the city of Tacoma was, at the time of the accident in question, and for years had been, the owner of and operating a water system for supplying water to its inhabitants and, as a part of its system, maintained a wooden flume carrying water from the sources of supply to its reservoir. This flume runs along the middle of an uninclosed right of way between Clement and Alder streets in the city. The flume was in the form of a box about 24 inches square, and the top, at the place of the accident, was level with or a little above the surface of the ground. Prior to 1908, before the city water pipes had been laid along Clement avenue, residents of that district were accustomed, with the city's permission and for pay, to obtain water from the flume through a hole 24 inches square cut in the top of the flume. The wooden cover over this hole was on hinges and furnished with a padlock, and the people so supplied with water were provided with keys and required by the city to keep the cover at all times locked. When the city water was piped to the various residences in this section, this use of the flume was abandoned and the cover of the opening was nailed down. At the time of the accident, the hinges had rusted off, there was no padlock, and the nails which had held the cover in place had rusted and were, as one witness testified, "stubs of nails." One witness, a boy of ten, testified that this cover had been off and the hole open continuously for two or three weeks. Other witnesses contradicted this, and the plaintiff and his wife testified that they had never seen it open at any time before the accident. The water running in the flume was about 18 inches in depth. The right of way was open so that any one who desired had access to it, and it had become, prior to the accident, a regular playground for the children of the neighborhood. The plaintiff lived with his family on the east side of Clement avenue in sight of the flume, and there was no fence or obstruction of any kind between his residence and the flume right of way which ran parallel with and contiguous to the avenue on the west.

On the morning of June 23, 1911, the deceased, a child a little under three years old, and another boy of about the same age, were playing along the flume. A witness who was working on the roof of a house about 300 feet from the scene of the accident saw the boys running along the flume, and, when they came to the spot where the witness supposed the cover to be, they "took a jump," as he said, and then ran back, repeating the performance. Finally he saw only one of the boys running toward the Bjork house, evidently seeking assistance, and Mrs. Bjork, the boy's mother, came out screaming and ran toward the hole. Several persons, attracted by her cries, ran to the place where the boy had fallen in, and one of them, surmising what had happened, ran down to another opening in the flume near the power house, where, with the assistance of one of the employés of the power plant, he lifted the cover from that opening and found the child lying face downward, drowned.

At the conclusion of the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence failed to establish actionable negligence on the city's part. The motion was granted. From the judgment of nonsuit the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Eliminating the questions of notice to the city and contributory negligence of the parents of the child, which, under the evidence, were clearly for the jury, there is but one question presented for our consideration: Was the opening in the flume, exposing a constantly flowing stream of water beneath, in an unfenced right of way contiguous for a long distance to a public street in the city and permitted to be used as a common playground by the children of the neighborhood, a thing of such location and character as to be attractive and alluring to small children so that danger therefrom should have been reasonably anticipated and guarded against by the city?

The city, in the maintenance and operation of its waterworks, was acting in a proprietary and not a governmental capacity. Its liability must therefore be the same as that of a private owner under the same circumstances.

That the child, a mere baby, was a technical trespasser, or at most a mere licensee, is an immaterial circumstance. A child attracted to premises open and unguarded in a populous neighborhood by things maintained thereon enticing to the childish curiosity and instincts is not a culpable trespasser in any sound sense. This is against the weight of authority when measured in mere numbers, which holds the child to the rule applied to the adult who, when injured while trespassing upon the premises of a defendant, can recover damages only when the injury was wanton or was due to recklessly careless conduct on the defendant's part. But, as said by a candid text-writer: "This cruel and wicked doctrine, unworthy of a civilized jurisprudence, puts property above humanity, leaves entirely out of view the tender years and infirmity of understanding of the child, indeed his inability to be a trespasser in sound legal theory, and visits upon him the consequences of his trespass just as though he were an adult, and exonerates the person or corporation upon whose property he is a trespasser from any measure of duty towards him which they would not owe under the same circumstances towards an adult." 1 Thompson on Negligence (2d Ed.) § 1026. The same writer, after admitting the fact that in many jurisdictions the doctrine of trespass as a defense, even as applied to small children, must be regarded as established law, scathingly reprobating the doctrine as barbarous, says: "Nevertheless, a few decisions of enlightened and humane courts are found, more or less tending to the conclusion that the owner of any machine or other thing which, from its nature, is especially attractive to children, who are likely to play with it in obedience to their childish instincts, and yet which is especially dangerous to them, is under the duty of exercising reasonable care to the end of keeping it fastened, guarded, or protected so as to prevent them from injuring themselves while playing or coming in contact with it." 1 Thompson on Negligence (2d Ed.) § 1031.

The more humane rule, as expressed in another text, has met with our unqualified approval: "The owner of land where children are allowed or accustomed to play, particularly if it is unfenced, must use ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition, for they, being without judgment and likely to be drawn by childish curiosity into places of danger, are not to be classed with trespassers, idlers, and mere licensees." Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) § 705. "A child of tender years, who meets with an injury upon the streets or upon the premises of a private owner, though a technical trespasser, may recover for such injury if the thing causing it has been left exposed and unguarded near the playgrounds or haunts of children and is of such a character as to be alluring or attractive to them, or such as to appeal to childish curiosity and instincts; this on the principle that children of tender years, 'being without judgment and likely to be drawn by childish curiosity into places of danger, are not to be classed with trespassers, idlers, and mere licensees.'" Haynes v. Seattle, 69 Wash. 419, 125 Pac. 147.

The above quotation and the sustaining citations show that the fact that the accident there involved happened in a public street was not regarded as a controlling or even material circumstance. Ilwaco Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Hedrick, 1 Wash. 446, 25 Pac. 335, 22 Am. St. Rep. 169; McAllister v. Seattle Brewing & Malting Co., 44 Wash. 179, 87 Pac. 68.

We intentionally refrain from citing Nelson v. McLellan, 31 Wash. 208, 71 Pac. 747, 60 L. R. A. 793, 96 Am. St. Rep. 902, Akin v. Bradley Eng. & Mach. Co., 48 Wash. 97, 92 Pac. 903, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 884, the dynamite cases, as sustaining this rule, because, though they do sustain it in principle, the agency there involved was so inherently dangerous as to render those cases in any event soundly sustainable upon the ground of reckless conduct on the defendants' part.

The turntable and machinery cases, however, are in no just sense sui generis. They rest, as it seems to us, upon the one broad principle common to all cases of injury from dangerous premises and all cases of so-called "attractive nuisances"—that there is always a duty due to society upon the owner of premises to take reasonable care to so use his own as not to injure another, a failure to observe which is negligence. 1 Thompson, Negligence (2d Ed.) §§ 1033 and 1036; Hydraulic Works v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332; Bransom's Adm'r v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 14 Sup. Ct. 619, 38 L. Ed. 434; Biggs v. Consolidated Barb-Wire Co., 60 Kan. 217, 56 Pac. 4, 44 L. R. A. 655.

We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the opening in the flume was not in its nature a thing reasonably to be anticipated as enticing to young children. Whether it was or not is a question for the jury. This case is closely analogous to that of Pekin v. McMahon, Adm'r, 154 Ill. 141, 39 N. E. 484, 27 L. R. A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114. That case arose from the drowning of a child of tender years in a pond on uninclosed premises owned by the city. The pond was in a populous part of the city near a driveway where children were accustomed to play. The city was held liable upon the doctrine of the turntable cases, and the question whether the attractiveness of the dangerous premises was such as to entice children and such as to suggest to the defendant the probability of such an occurrence was held one for the jury. See, also, Price v. Atchison Water Co., 58 Kan. 551, 50 Pac. 450, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625.

We are not impressed with the argument based upon Salladay v. Old Dominion Copper Mining & Smelting Co., 12 Ariz. 124, 100 Pac. 441, in which it was held that maintaining an open flume on private premises did not render the owner liable for the drowning therein of a small child. The court seems to have been influenced by the fact that there are many open flumes and ditches in Arizona necessary to irrigation and mining, and held that it would be against public policy to extend the doctrine of the turntable cases to such flumes and ditches. But, assuming the soundness of that decision, it seems to us that a distinction between an open flume carrying a stream of shallow water or an irrigating ditch, and an inclosed box with an opening such as is here maintained on premises used as a common playground in a populous city, may be soundly made, both by reason of its location and its greater danger. A child falling into such a hole obviously had no chance either of rescue or escape

The case of Gordon v. Snoqualmie Lumber & Shingle Co., 59 Wash. 272, 109 Pac. 1044, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 88, chiefly relied upon by the respondent, though carrying the doctrine of immunity as a matter of law to a considerable extent, by no means goes as far as we are asked to extend it in this case. It was there held that the safeguards were such and the location of the barrel of hot water was such that the defendant could not reasonably be expected to anticipate the danger. In fact, there was no danger if the plug in the barrel had been secure, and there was no evidence imputing notice to the defendant that the plug was not secure. That this was the determinative factor in that case is shown by the following language there used: "It is not shown what caused the plug to come out, and there is no showing of notice or opportunity of notice to respondent of a defective condition of the barrel or plug."

In the case before us, there was evidence that the hole had been open continuously for two or three weeks before the accident—a time amply sufficient to warrant a jury in imputing notice. While there was evidence to the contrary, the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence were for the jury.

The case of Curtis v Tenino Stone Quarries, 37 Wash. 355, 79 Pac. 955, is also distinguishable. The quarry was not in a city and was 200 feet from any highway or public ground. It was not permitted to be used as a common playground, nor was it near one. The child had been driven away a short time before the accident. The distinction is plain.

We will not attempt a review of the many authorities cited from other jurisdictions. As we have seen, the rule in many jurisdictions is contrary to that adopted here, and the decisions cannot be harmonized We are constrained to hold that a cause of action was stated and supported by sufficient proof to put the respondent to its defense.

The judgment is reversed.

(B) Duty of Care Towards a Licensee

CORBY v. HILL.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1858. 4 C. B. [N. S.] 556, 114 R. R. 849, 140 Reprint, 1209.)

This was an action against the defendant for negligently leaving certain slates upon a certain road, whereby the plaintiff's horse was injured. The declaration stated that before and at the time when &c., the plaintiff was lawfully possessed of a certain carriage, and of a certain horse drawing the said carriage which said horse and carriage were under the government and direction of a servant of the plaintiff, and which said horse and carriage were then, with the consent of the owners and occupiers of the land and road and carriage line thereinafter mentioned, during the night time, under such care and government as aforesaid, lawfully in and lawfully being driven along certain land and along a certain road or carriage line, part of and crossing the said land then belonging to and occupied by certain persons other than the plaintiff and the defendant, and leading to a certain public building known as the Hanwell Lunatic Asylum, for the purpose of proceeding to the said building, that the defendant then, negligently, carelessly, and improperly kept and continued upon and across the said road or carriage line, part of the said land, a stack of slates, and divers other things and materials, without placing or keeping any light or signal near them, or adopting any means whatever to show that the said slates and other material were upon or across the said land, road or carriage line; by reason whereof it was then impossible for the servant of the plaintiff to see or avoid the said slates, materials or other things; and that, by reason thereof, the said horse, drawing the said carriage, while being driven by the said servant as aforesaid, ran into, upon, and against the said stack of slates or other materials and things, and was greatly bruised, wounded, and injured: special damage.

The fourth plea stated that the defendant had lawfully placed, kept and continued the said slates, and other things and materials across the said land and road or carriage line, by the license of the owners and occupiers of said land, road or carriage line, before the consent of the owners and occupiers of the said land, road, or carriage line as in the declaration alleged; and that the said consent so given to the defendants was in full force at the time when &c.; and that the alleged damage was not sustained by any breach of duty of the defendant. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried before Byles, J., at the sittings in London after the last Term. The facts which appeared in evidence were as follows: The carriage road or way in question was a private road leading from the turnpike road to the Hanwell Lunatic Asylum and to the residence of the superintendent, Dr. Saunders. The defendant, a builder, was employed to do certain work at the asylum, and, with the consent of the owners of the land, stacked certain slates and other materials upon a portion of the road, without taking the precaution of placing a light near them at night, in consequence of which, the plaintiff's servant, who was driving a horse and carriage along the private road to the residence of Dr. Saunders, not seeing the slates, drove against them, and seriously injured the horse.

In answer to the questions put to them by the learned Judge, the jury found that the defendant had the consent of the owners of the property for placing the slates and materials where he placed them, but upon the usual terms of properly providing for the safety of the public, or of such of the public as had permission to use the way; that there was negligence in leaving the stack without a proper light; and that negligence was chargeable upon the defendant, in conjunction with the owners of the soil.

It was insisted on the part of the defendant that the fourth plea was an answer to the action.

The learned judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him upon the fourth plea, if the court should be of opinion that the action would not lie under the circumstances.

Huddleston, Q. C., now moved to enter a verdict for the defendant pursuant to the leave reserved, or to arrest the judgment.

WILLES, J. I am of the same opinion. In substance the case is this: There was a road leading to a certain building, along which road persons having occasion to go to the building were accustomed to pass by leave of the owners of the soil, and were likely to pass; and the defendant, being engaged in some work upon the adjoining land, obtained leave to place slates and other materials there, either absolutely or modified in the way found by the jury, so as not to endanger persons using the road. Under that leave, the defendant placed certain slates across the road in such a way as to be likely to occasion injury to persons using the road. It is not suggested that the defendant did not know that the road was likely to be used in the way mentioned, or that he gave any notice or warning to the persons, including the plaintiff, who were accustomed and likely to use the road. The question is, whether there is any legal remedy for a person lawfully using the road, to whom injury results from the act of a third person in negligently placing an obstruction upon the road.

I should have thought that bare statement of the proposition was enough. The defendant had no right to set a trap for the plaintiff. One who comes upon another's land by the owner's permission or invitation has a right to expect that the owner will not dig a pit thereon, or permit another to dig a pit thereon, so that persons lawfully coming there may receive injury. That is so obvious that it is needless to dwell upon it. The form of declaration which I should have drawn upon such a state of facts, would have been something like this,—that there was a certain road over which the plaintiff and others having occasion to go to a certain building by license of the owners were accustomed and likely to pass, and that the defendant, knowing that, wrongfully and negligently placed certain slates and materials across the road in such a manner as to be likely to prove dangerous to persons driving along the road, and that the plaintiff, being lawfully on the road on his way to the building, ran against the obstruction and was injured. The objections urged by Mr. Huddleston assume that the present declaration does in substance state all these facts. As to the fourth plea, it seems to me that the defendant failed to prove that he had leave and license of the owners of the soil to place the slates across the road in the way he did. I also think there is no ground for arresting the judgment. The declaration, as I read it, discloses a perfectly good cause of action, and it is not open to any of the objections urged against it. It is true it does not allege that the defendant had knowledge of the way in which the road was used. But it is perfectly clear that he did know it, and therefore the declaration would at once be amended if it were necessary. But after the remarks of my Brother WILLIAMS, the absence of that allegation would not I think make the declaration bad.

Rule refused.[59]

GAUTRET v. EGERTON et al.

JONES v. EGERTON et al.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1867. L. R. 2 C. P. 371.)

The declaration in the first of these actions stated that the defendants were possessed of a close of land, and of a certain canal and cuttings intersecting the same, and of certain bridges across the said canal and cuttings, communicating with and leading to certain docks of the defendants, which said land and bridges had been and were from time to time used with the consent and permission of the defendants by persons proceeding towards and coming from the said docks; that the defendants, well knowing the premises, wrongfully, negligently and improperly kept and maintained the said land, canal, cuttings and bridges, and suffered them to continue and be in so improper a state and condition as to render them dangerous and unsafe for persons lawfully passing along and over said land and bridges, towards the said docks, and using the same as aforesaid; and that Leon Gautret, whilst he was lawfully in and passing and walking along the said close and over the said bridge, and using the same in the manner and for the purpose aforesaid, by and through the said wrongful, negligent and improper conduct of the defendants as aforesaid, fell into one of the said cuttings of the defendants, intersecting the said close as aforesaid, and thereby lost his life within twelve calendar months next before the suit: and the plaintiff, as administratrix, for the benefit of herself, the widow of the said Leon Gautret, and A. Gautret, &c., according to the statute in such case made and provided, claimed £2500.

The defendants demurred to the declaration, on the ground that "it does not appear that there was any legal duty or obligation on the part of the defendants to take means for preventing the said land, &c., being dangerous and unsafe." Joinder.

The declaration in Jones v. Egerton was the same as the above, and there was a like demurrer.

[59] The opinions of Cockburn, C. J., and Williams and Byles, JJ., are omitted.

Herschell, for the plaintiff Gautret: The question raised upon this declaration is, whether there is any duty on the part of the defendants towards persons using their land as the deceased here did. That may be negligence in the case of a license, which would not be negligence as against a mere trespasser: and if there can be any case in which the law would imply a duty, it is sufficiently alleged here. * * *

Potter, for the plaintiff Jones, submitted that the implied request on the part of the defendants to persons having occasion to go to the docks to pass by the way in question, raised a duty in them to keep it in a safe condition.

WILLES, J. I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants in each of these cases. The argument urged on behalf of the plaintiffs, when analyzed, amounts to this, that we ought to construe the general words of the declaration as describing whatever sort of negligence the plaintiffs can prove at the trial. The authorities, however, and reason and good sense, are the other way. The plaintiff must, in his declaration, give the defendant notice of what his complaint is. He must recover secundum allegata et probata. What is it that a declaration of this sort should state in order to fulfill these conditions? It ought to state the facts upon which the supposed duty is founded, and the duty to the plaintiff with the breach of which the defendant is charged. It is not enough to show that the defendant has been guilty of negligence, without showing in what respect he was negligent, and how he became bound to use care to prevent injury to others. All that these declarations allege is, that the defendants were possessed of land, and of a canal and cuttings intersecting the same, and of certain bridges across the canal and cuttings, communicating with and leading to certain docks of theirs; that they allowed persons going to and from the docks, whether upon the business or for the profit of the defendants or not, to pass over the land; and that the deceased persons, in pursuance of and using that permission, fell into one of the cuttings and so met their deaths. The consequences of these accidents are sought to be visited upon the defendants, because they have allowed persons to go over their land, not alleging it to have been upon the business or for the benefit of the defendants, or as the servants or agents of the defendants; nor alleging that the defendants have been guilty of any wrongful act, such as digging a trench on the land, or misrepresenting its condition, or anything equivalent to laying a trap for the unwary passengers; but simply because they permitted these persons to use a way with the condition of which, for anything that appears, those who suffered the injury were perfectly well acquainted. That is the whole sum and substance of these declarations.

If the docks to which the way in question led were public docks, the way would be a public way, and the township or parish would be bound to repair it, and no such liability as this could be cast upon the defendants merely by reason of the soil of the way being theirs. That is so not only in reason but also upon authority. It was so held in Robbins

v. Jones, 15 C. B. N. S. 221, where a way having been for a number of years dedicated to the public, we held that the owner of an adjoining house was not responsible for death resulting to a person through the giving way of the pavement, partly in consequence of its being over-weighted by a number of persons crowding upon it, and partly from its having been weakened by user.

Assuming that these were private docks, the private property of the defendants, and that they permitted persons going to or coming from the docks, whether for their own benefit or that of the defendants, to use the way, the dedication of a permission to use the way must be taken to be in the character of a gift. The principle of law as to gifts is, that the giver is not responsible for damage resulting from the insecurity of the thing, unless he knew of its evil character at the time, and omitted to caution the donee. There must be something like fraud on the part of the giver before he can be made answerable. It is quite consistent with the declarations in these cases that this land was in the same state at the time of the accident that it was at the time the permission to use it was originally given. To create a cause of action, something like fraud must be shown. No action will lie against a spiteful man, who seeing another running into a position of danger, merely omits to warn him. To bring the case within the category of actional negligence, some wrongful act must be shown, or a breach of some positive duty; otherwise, a man who allows strangers to roam over his property would be held to be answerable for not protecting them against any danger which they might encounter whilst using the license. Every man is bound not wilfully to deceive others, or to do any act which may place them in danger. It may be, as in Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. N. S. 556, that he is responsible if he puts an obstruction in the way which is likely to cause injury to those who by his permission use the way: but I cannot conceive that he would incur any responsibility merely by reason of his allowing the way to be out of repair. For these reasons I think these declarations disclose no cause of action against the defendants, and that the latter are therefore entitled to judgment.

KEATING, J. I am of the same opinion. It is not denied that a declaration of this sort must show a duty and a breach of that duty. But it is said that these declarations are so framed that it would be necessary for the plaintiffs at the trial to prove a duty. I am, however, utterly unable to discover any duty which the defendants have contracted towards the persons whom the plaintiffs represent, or what particular breach of duty is charged. It is said that the condition of the land and bridges was such as to constitute them a kind of trap. I cannot accede to that. The persons who used the way took it with all its imperfections.

Herschell asked and obtained leave to amend within ten days, on payment of costs; otherwise judgment for the defendants.

Judgment accordingly.

BRINILSON v. CHICAGO & N. W. RY. CO.

The plaintiff's intestate, a boy of the age of five and a half years, on February 22, 1906, fell into a steam and hot water pit, constructed by the defendant in a breakwater which it maintained to protect its property along the shore of Lake Michigan in the city of Milwaukee. The boy was so badly scalded by the steam and hot water discharged into this pit from the roundhouse of the defendant near by that he died on March 5, 1906. The pit into which the boy fell was in the center of a crib in the breakwater, was about three feet in diameter at the bottom, possibly five feet in diameter at the top, and six or seven feet deep. In the previous October the defendant had removed the stone from the crib so as to form the pit above described and had laid an underground conduit from the roundhouse to the center of the pit. The pit was covered by planks which were a part of the planking covering the breakwater. The child fell into the pit through an opening about a foot wide and from six to seven feet long made by the removal of part of a plank of that size in the breakwater covering. The boy and an older brother were walking over part of the breakwater and into the railroad yards, where they looked for tin plates and some colored glass thrown from the dining cars of the defendant. The complaint alleges that the breakwater was made a pleasant promenade by being covered with planking, that no obstructions were so placed as to prevent its use by the public, and that the people were not excluded from walking upon it. It is alleged that the death of the boy was due to the negligence of the defendant in permitting a dangerous hole to exist in the covering of the pit in the manner stated, and damages are asked for the death of the boy, thus caused, and for the pain and suffering endured by him in consequence of his injuries during his lifetime.

The evidence tends to show that the defendant's agents and servants knew that the public were using the breakwater and the adjacent grounds for walking, fishing, and swimming, but that notices of "No thoroughfare" were posted to warn people off the tracks, and people, boys particularly, were expelled from the tracks. There was evidence that the hole in the planking on the breakwater had existed for some weeks before and up to the time of the accident, and that it was a dangerous trap to persons walking on the breakwater. There was evidence tending to show that this opening was difficult to see because of the steam arising from the hole and from the cracks between the other planks, and because of the conditions surrounding it. The jury found that the defendant was negligent and that it caused the injury, and awarded damages. This is an appeal from the judgment on the verdict in plaintiff's favor.

SIEBECKER, J. * * * It is undisputed that the appellant maintained a breakwater at the place designated to protect its grounds from the action of the waters of the lake; that it had filled with earth the area between the breakwater and the dry land; and that it used and occupied this area for railroad purposes. As appears in the above statement of facts, the appellant had covered the surface of the breakwater with planking, which formed a firm and even walk or pathway along and above the waters of the lake, which was used by the public as a footpath to pass and repass over these grounds and for walking along the edge of the lake. Boys had made a practice of so using it and as a place for boating, fishing, and swimming. The evidence fully justified the jury in finding that appellant's agents and servants knew that the premises were being so used. It appears that there was a fence along the south line of appellant's grounds abutting on Polk street, but the evidence is in conflict as to whether or not the fence extended onto the breakwater, and the jury may well have found that this end of the breakwater was unobstructed and open so that people could pass without interference in going to and from the street onto the railroad grounds, and that an open passageway over the breakwater was thus afforded them.

In the light of such facts and circumstances, it cannot be said that persons who passed onto the breakwater and adjacent grounds were there under such forbidding circumstances as to make them trespassers. It seems reasonably clear that people customarily used this place as a footpath, and that boys especially used it as a place for the purposes of boating and swimming. These uses of the premises must be held to have been within the knowledge of the railroad's agents and servants, and that an implied permission existed which justified persons in so using the breakwater and adjacent grounds. Under these circumstances, the persons so passing over this place on these premises cannot be considered trespassers. They must be considered as having entered onto the premises with the implied permission of the railroad company for the customary purposes. The license to so use the premises implies permission to so use them, and the railroad company cannot now be heard to charge that such use constitutes a trespass. Under these circumstances, persons making such customary use of the premises are licensees. The evidence sustains the claim that the decedent at the time of injury was using this place in the customary way, namely, as a footpath in passing over the breakwater, and his relation to the railroad company was that of its licensee. See Hupfer v. National D. Co., 114 Wis. 279, 90 N. W 191; Gorr v Mittlestaedt, 96 Wis. 296, 71 N. W. 656; Muench v. Heinemann, 119 Wis. 441, 96 N. W. 800. With this relation existing between the appellant and the decedent, the legal duty devolving on the company is as recognized and declared in the Muench Case that a licensee must be deemed to take the premises as he finds them, "and the licensor owes him no duty, save to refrain from acts of active negligence rendering the premises dangerous."

The case of Klix, Adm'r, etc., v. Nieman, 68 Wis. 271, 32 N. W. 223, 60 Am. Rep. 854, is not at variance with this rule. The facts of that case show that the danger complained of was one connected with an unfenced natural pond on a private lot, but so remote from the street and sidewalk as not to make their use dangerous; nor was it shown that the owner had done anything to this pond to create a pitfall or snare liable to injure persons going onto the lot. In the instant case the facts are different, in that the alleged dangerous condition was created by the company, and the question is whether or not, in view of the fact that the company knew or ought to have known that both adults and children were resorting to and using the place for travel and amusement, the omission to keep the pit covered created a danger likely to cause injury to persons so using the premises with ordinary care. That the opening or hole in the cover of the steam pit as described in the evidence was dangerous seems self-evident from its very nature and condition. It is also clear that the hole in the planking that covered the excavation was not readily observed, and was obscured by the steam rising therefrom through this hole and the cracks between the planks covering the pit. This condition of the place made the pit a dangerous trap or pitfall to persons on the premises, and the omission to observe and repair the planking constitutes active negligence on the part of the railroad toward them.

It is contended that it is not shown that the company was negligent in permitting this hole to exist, because it had no notice or knowledge thereof prior to the day of the accident. The evidence discloses that a hole had been observed by various persons two or three months, one month, two weeks, and on the day before the accident. These evidentiary facts furnish a sufficient basis for the conclusion of the jury that the railroad company was guilty of a want of ordinary care in failing to discover the hole in the plank covering over the steam pit and in neglecting to repair it before the time of the accident.

It is probable that the decedent had not observed the hole. His conduct in this respect must be viewed in the light of his age and the surrounding conditions, and of the danger, and, when so considered, it cannot be held as matter of law to show that he was guilty of contributory negligence in producing the injuries complained of. Cases illustrating the principles and grounds of liability under the circumstances disclosed here are: Kinchlow v. Midland Elevator Co., 57 Kan. 374, 46 Pac. 703; Penso v. McCormick, 125 Ind. 116, 25 N. E. 156, 9 L. R. A. 313, 21 Am. St. Rep. 211; Railway Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 14 Sup. Ct. 619, 38 L. Ed. 434. We find no reversible error in the record.

HARRIS v. PERRY & CO.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1903] 2 K. B. 219.)

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to be due to the defendant's negligence. The trial resulted in a verdict of £150, and judgment for that amount was entered for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

COLLINS, M. R., read the following judgment:

This is a motion by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in a case tried before Wills, J., and a special jury. The action was brought for personal injuries occasioned by the negligence of the defendant. The jury answered certain questions submitted to them by the learned judge, and upon their answers he entered judgment for the plaintiff with damages.

The plaintiff was one of the inspectors appointed by the engineer for the tube railway which is now in course of construction from Waterloo to Baker Street. At the time in question the tube had been completed from Waterloo up to the neighbourhood of Baker Street, where the work of excavation was still going on. The defendant, who trades under the name of Perry & Co., was the contractor for the making of a portion of the tube and railway, and was engaged in carrying out the work of excavation at Baker Street. For the purpose of the works he had laid a temporary contractor's railway from Waterloo up to the point where the work of excavation was going on, and he employed in the works a small electric locomotive, whose function was to draw the excavated material from the works down to a shaft in the neighbourhood of Charing Cross, through which the excavated matter had to be passed up to the surface. This locomotive was not fitted or intended for the carriage of passengers. It was worked by a driver, accompanied by a person whose name was Thacker, and who filled the function of a guard, or "rope-runner," as he is described in the evidence. For the purpose of enabling the work of inspection to be carried on the contractors had placed a wooden platform all along one side of the tunnel, and on the day in question the plaintiff, who had been engaged in inspecting, was proceeding along this platform in the direction of Waterloo. In the neighbourhood of Charing Cross he was overtaken by the locomotive; and one Shaw, a timekeeper in the defendant's service, who was riding thereon, inquired where he was going, and proposed that he should ride with him on the locomotive to his destination. There was on the locomotive, in addition to the driver, the guard Thacker, and Shaw, one other person, so that the plaintiff made the fifth person on an engine which, as I have said, was designed for the purpose of traction of materials only. The plaintiff got upon the engine, which proceeded in the direction of Waterloo. After it had gone about one hundred yards it came in contact with a truck which was standing on the rails, and had upon it rails which had been taken up for the purpose of repairs on the line between Charing Cross and Waterloo, and the plaintiff sustained serious injuries, for which he has brought this action. There were lights along the tunnel at intervals of about twenty-five yards.

The defendant contended that he was under no liability to the plaintiff, on the ground that the plaintiff had got upon the engine without any permission from him, and that he was there at his own risk only and could not hold the defendant responsible for damage, the risk of which he must be taken to have accepted himself. It was proved that the proper business of the engine at the time of the accident was to draw the material and trucks between Baker Street and Charing Cross only, and that it should not have been used at all upon the part of the line between Charing Cross and Waterloo, which was, in fact, at that time undergoing repairs. There was evidence that the defendant had only visited the line himself on one or two occasions, and that he had expressly forbidden any person, other than the driver and guard, to travel upon the locomotive; but it was proved that the defendant's workmen and others were in the habit, notwithstanding this prohibition, of frequently riding upon it. The defendant had a representative called Rowell, whose business it was to supervise generally the underground works which were being carried out by the defendant. There was evidence, from which an inference might be drawn, that Rowell sanctioned the use of the locomotive by the superior officers of the contractor, of whom Shaw was one, for the purpose of transit along the line, and further, that he knew that those officers invited the officers of the company to travel with them.

The learned judge left to the jury three questions:

(1) Was the plaintiff on the engine with the permission of Rowell? (2) Was he there for his own convenience or for the benefit of the defendant? (3) Was the accident due to the negligence of the defendant's servants? The jury answered the first and third questions in the affirmative, and to the second they answered, "For his own convenience."

Without admitting that the finding that the plaintiff was a licensee was supported by the evidence, Mr. Bray, for the defendant, insisted that inasmuch as the plaintiff was at most a bare licensee, there was no evidence that the defendant had in any way fallen short of his duty to him as such so as to justify a finding of negligence causing the accident. I was very much impressed by this argument at the hearing, and was at one time disposed to think that the plaintiff, for whom a platform had been provided as the proper means of locomotion for purposes of inspection in the tunnel, in riding on the engine merely for his own convenience must be taken to have accepted all risks incident thereto. I must deal with the case, however, on the footings of the findings of the jury, unless there was no reasonable evidence upon which they could be supported. It was urged that, the plaintiff being a bare licensee, there was no higher duty imposed upon the defendant than that he should not set a trap for the plaintiff, as laid down by the late Willes, J., in his memorable judgment in Gautret v. Egerton, L. R. 2 C. P. 371; that there was in this case no evidence of anything of the kind; that the plaintiff himself ought to have known that the line was subject to repair, and that in leaving the truck and rails where they were the defendant's servants had acted quite reasonably, inasmuch as they had no reason to anticipate that the engine which they knew was employed elsewhere on that day would travel over that part of the line, and that they were in fact merely availing themselves of a proper opportunity of carrying out repairs which were necessarily frequent on a temporary line of the nature described. Wills, J., in his summing-up, gave the defendant the benefit of this latter contention, and pointed the attention of the jury to the circumstances under which the engine was allowed by those on it to proceed, as it had done, to the place where the accident occurred. I am unable to discover any flaw whatever in the summing-up. I think the learned judge, in his analysis of the evidence, put the facts quite as favourably for the defendant as they were capable of being put; and his exposition of the law leaves nothing to be desired. He suggested that the measure of duty towards a bare licensee is different, where the licensor accepts the duty of carrying him, from what it is where he merely permits him to pass through his premises; and I think the cases support this view. But there is evidence in this case that Thacker was the person from whom the driver of the locomotive was bound to take his orders, and that Thacker was aware of the fact that the line had been taken up and was under repair between Charing Cross and Waterloo, and that he did not impart this fact to the plaintiff or the other occupants of the engine, probably having forgotten it for the moment himself. I think, therefore, that, even if the standard of liability were the same as it would have been to a bare licensee merely walking across the defendant's land, there was evidence upon which the jury might have found that a trap within the meaning of the authorities had been set for the plaintiff. See Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 556. At all events, I think it was competent for the jury to find, as they must be taken to have found, a failure of that ordinary care which is due from a person who undertakes the carriage of another gratuitously. The principle in all cases of this class is that the care exercised must be reasonable; and the standard of reasonableness naturally must vary according to the circumstances of the case, the trust reposed, and the skill and appliances at the disposal of the person to whom another confides a duty. There is an obvious difference between the measure of confidence reposed and responsibility accepted in the case of a person who merely receives permission to traverse the premises of another, and in the case where a person or his property is received into the custody of another for transportation. See in the case of goods, Southcote's Case, (1601) 4 Rep. 83 b, cited in Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Sm. L. C. (11th Ed.) p. 173, and the notes thereto. In the case of persons received for carriage, Parke, B., says in Lygo v. Newbold, (1854) 9 Ex. 302, at p. 305: "A person who undertakes to provide for the conveyance of another, although he does so gratuitously, is bound to exercise due and reasonable care." In Austin v. Great Western Ry. Co., (1867) L. R. 2 Q. B. 442, at p. 445, Blackburn, J., says: "I think that what was said in the case of Marshall v. York, Newcastle and Berwick Ry. Co., (1851) 11 C. B. 655, was quite correct. It was there laid down that the right which a passenger by railway has to be carried safely does not depend on his having made a contract, but that the fact of his being a passenger casts a duty on the company to carry him safely." It seems to me that these authorities imply a larger obligation than that of merely not setting a trap: see also, per Baggallay, L. J., Foulkes v. Metropolitan District Ry. Co., (1880) 5 C. P. D. 157, at p. 165. The whole subject will be found exhaustively treated with reference to the English and American authorities in Mr. Beven's valuable work on Negligence in Law (2d Ed.) vol. 2, pp. 1154 et seq. The defendant, therefore, through Rowell, must be taken to have constructively permitted the plaintiff to travel on the engine. There was certainly evidence fit for the consideration of the jury on this point. And there was evidence of such a failure of due care on the part of the defendant's servants as to render the defendant responsible to the plaintiff for the damage arising therefrom.

I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

I have to add that STIRLING, L. J., and MATHEW, L. J., concur in the judgment that I have read.

Appeal dismissed.[61]

At an intersecting track a Lake Shore freight train negligently struck the Wabash train and P. was killed in the collision. (C) Duty of Care Towards an Invitee

INDERMAUR v. DAMES.

The judgment of the Court [of Common Pleas] [62] was delivered by WILLES, J. This was an action to recover damages for hurt sustained by the plaintiff's falling down a shaft at the defendant's place of business, through the actionable negligence, as it was alleged, of the defendant and his servants.

At the trial before the Lord Chief Justice [63] at the sittings here after Michaelmas Term, the plaintiff had a verdict for 400*l.* damages, subject to leave reserved.

A rule was obtained by the defendant in last term to enter a nonsuit, or to arrest the judgment, or for a new trial because of the verdict being against the evidence. The rule was argued during the last term, before Erle, C. J., Keating and Montague Smith, JJ., and myself, when we took time to consider. We are now of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged.

It appears that the defendant was a sugar-refiner, at whose place of business there was a shaft four feet three inches square, and twenty-nine feet three inches deep, used for moving sugar. The shaft was necessary, usual, and proper in the way of the defendant's business. Whilst it was in use, it was necessary and proper that it should be open and unfenced. When it was not in use, it was sometimes necessary, with reference to ventilation, that it should be open. It was not necessary that it should, when not in use, be unfenced; and it might then without injury to the business have been fenced by a rail. Whether it was usual to fence similar shafts when not in use did not distinctly appear; nor is it very material, because such protection was unquestionably proper, in the sense of reasonable, with reference to the safety of persons having a right to move about upon the floor

[62] Erle, C. J., and Willes, Keating, and Montague Smith, JJ.

[63] That is, Lord Chief Justice Erle, at the sittings in Middlesex. In his summing up, Erle, C. J., had remarked as follows: "The plaintiff has to establish that there was negligence on the part of the defendant; that the premises of the defendant, to which he was sent in the course of his business as a gas-fitter, were in a dangerous state; and that, as between himself and the defendant, there was a want of due and proper precaution in respect to the hole in the floor. To my mind, there would not be the least symptom of want of due care as between the defendant and a person [permanently] employed on his premises, because the sugar baking business requires a lift on the premises, which must be as well known to the persons employed there as the top of a staircase in every dwelling house. But that which may be no negligence towards men ordinarily employed upon the premises, may be negligence towards strangers lawfully coming upon the premises, in the course of their business."

where the shaft in fact was, because in its nature it formed a pitfall there. At the time of the accident it was not in use, and it was open and unfenced.

The plaintiff was a journeyman gas-fitter in the employ of a patentee who had supplied the defendant with his patent gas-regulator, to be paid for upon the terms that it effected a certain saving: and, for the purpose of ascertaining whether such a saving had been effected, the plaintiff's employer was required to test the action of the regulator. He accordingly sent the plaintiff to the defendant's place of business for that purpose; and, whilst the plaintiff was engaged upon the floor where the shaft was, he (under circumstances as to which the evidence was conflicting, but) accidentally, and, as the jury found, without any fault or negligence on his part, fell down the shaft, and was seriously hurt.

It was argued, that, as the defendant had objected to the plaintiff's working at the place upon a former occasion, he (the plaintiff) could not be considered as having been in the place with the defendant's leave at the time of the accident: but the evidence did not establish a peremptory or absolute objection to the plaintiff's being employed, so as to make the sending of him upon the occasion of the accident any more against the defendant's will than the sending of any other workman: and the employment, and the implied authority resulting therefrom to test the apparatus, were not of a character involving personal preference (dilectus personæ), so as to make it necessary that the patentee should himself attend. It was not suggested that the work was not journeyman's work.

It was also argued that the plaintiff was at best in the condition of a bare licensee or guest who, it was urged, is only entitled to use the place as he finds it, and whose complaint may be said to wear the colour of ingratitude, so long as there is no design to injure him. See Hounsell v. Smyth, 7 C. B. N. S. 371.

We think this argument fails, because the capacity in which the plaintiff was there was that of a person on lawful business, in the course of fulfilling a contract in which both the plaintiff and the defendant had an interest, and not upon bare permission. No sound distinction was suggested between the case of the servant and the case of the employer, if the latter had thought proper to go in person; nor between the case of a person engaged in doing the work for the defendant pursuant to his employment, and that of a person testing the work which he had stipulated with the defendant to be paid for if it stood the test; whereby impliedly the workman was to be allowed an onstand to apply that test, and a reasonable opportunity of doing so. Any duty to enable the workman to do the work in safety, seems equally to exist during the accessory employment of testing: and any duty to provide for the safety of the master workman, seems equally owing to the servant workman whom he may lawfully send in his place.

It is observable that in the case of Southcote v. Stanley, 1 H. & N. 247, upon which much reliance was properly placed for the defendant, Alderson, B., drew the distinction between a bare licensee and a person coming on business, and Bramwell, B., between active negligence in respect of unusual danger known to the host and not to the guest, and a bare defect of construction or repair, which the host was only negligent in not finding out or anticipating the consequence of.

There is a considerable resemblance, though not a strict analogy, between this class of cases and those founded upon the rule as to voluntary loans and gifts, that there is no remedy against the lender or giver, for damage sustained from the loan or gift, except in case of unusual danger known to and concealed by the lender or giver: Macarthy v. Younge, 6 H. & N. 329. The case of the carboy of vitriol [64] was one in which this court held answerable the bailor of an unusually dangerous chattel, the quality of which he knew, but did not tell the bailee, who did not know it, and who, as a proximate consequence of his not knowing, and without any fault on his part, suffered damage.

The cases referred to as to the liability for accidents to servants and persons employed in other capacities in a business or profession which necessarily and obviously exposes them to danger, as in Seymour v. Maddox, 16 Q. B. 326, also have their special reasons. The servant or other person so employed is supposed to undertake not only all the ordinary risks of the employment into which he enters, but also all extraordinary risks which he knows of and thinks proper to incur, including those caused by the misconduct of his fellow-servants, not however including those which can be traced to mere breach of duty on the part of the master. In the case of a statutory duty to fence, even the knowledge and reluctant submission of the servant who has sustained an injury, are held to be only elements in determining whether there has been contributory negligence: how far this is the law between master and servant, where there is danger known to the servant, and no statute for his protection, we need not now consider, because the plaintiff in this case was not a servant of the defendant, but the servant of the patentee. The question was adverted to, but not decided, in Clarke v. Holmes, 7 H. & N. 937.

The authorities respecting guests and other bare licensees, and those respecting servants and others who consent to incur a risk, being therefore inapplicable, we are to consider what is the law as to the duty of the occupier of a building with reference to persons resorting thereto in the course of business, upon his invitation, express or implied. The common case is that of a customer in a shop: but it is obvious that this is only one of a class; for, whether the customer is actually chaffering at the time, or actually buys or not, he is, according to an undoubted course of authority and practice, entitled to the exercise of reasonable care by the occupier to prevent damage from unusual danger, of which the occupier knows or ought to know, such as a trap-door left open, unfenced, and unlighted: Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby, 11 Ad. & E. 223; per cur. Chapman v. Rothwell, E. B. & E. 168, where Southcote v. Stanley,[65] was cited, and the Lord Chief Justice, then Erle, J., said: "The distinction is between the case of a visitor (as the plaintiff was in Southcote v. Stanley), who must take care of himself, and a customer, who, as one of the public, is invited for the purposes of business carried on by the defendant." This protection does not depend upon the fact of a contract being entered into in the way of the shopkeeper's business during the stay of the customer, but upon the fact that the customer has come into the shop in pursuance of a tacit invitation given by the shopkeeper, with a view to business which concerns himself. And, if a customer were, after buying goods, to go back to the shop in order to complain of the quality, or that the change was not right, he would be just as much there upon business which concerned the shopkeeper, and as much entitled to protection during this accessory visit, though it might not be for the shopkeeper's benefit, as during the principal visit, which was. And if, instead of going himself, the customer were to send his servant, the servant would be entitled to the same consideration as the master.

[64] Farrant v. Barnes (1862) 11 C. B. N. S. 553, 142 Reprint 912, 132 R. R. 667: (The defendant delivered to a carrier a carboy of nitric acid, without informing him of the dangerous nature of its contents. For the bearings of the doctrine see Salmond on Torts (2d Ed.) pp. 375, 376.)

The class to which the customer belongs includes persons who go not as mere volunteers, or licensees, or guests, or servants, or persons whose employment is such that danger may be considered as bargined for, but who go upon business which concerns the occupier, and upon his invitation, express or implied.

And, with respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows, or ought to know; and that, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as matter of fact.

In the case of Wilkinson v. Fairrie, 1 H. & C. 633, relied upon for the defendant, the distinction was pointed out between ordinary accidents, such as falling down stairs, which ought to be imputed to the carelessness or misfortune of the sufferer, and accidents from unusual, covert danger, such as that of falling down into a pit.

[65] 1 H. & N. 247 (1856) 108 R. R. 549. "Whether the invited private guest is to be classed with licensees or with invited persons is a question upon which judicial opinion is somewhat at variance. In England it is well settled that he is a licensee (Southcote v. Stanley). This, it is submitted is the true doctrine, whenever he is enjoying gratuitous hospitality. In some of our jurisdictions, however, there is a disposition to work out a species of estoppel against even a private host." Francis M. Burdick, Law of Torts (3d Ed.) 517, 518, and cases there cited.

It was ably insisted for the defendant that he could only be bound to keep his place of business in the same condition as other places of business of the like kind, according to the best known mode of construction. And this argument seems conclusive to prove that there was no absolute duty to prevent danger, but only a duty to make the place as little dangerous as such a place could reasonably be, having regard to the contrivances necessarily used in carrying on the business. But we think the argument is inapplicable to the facts of this case; first, because it was not shown, and probably could not be, that there was any usage never to fence shafts; secondly, because it was proved, that, when the shaft was not in use, a fence might be resorted to without inconvenience: and no usage could establish, that what was in fact unnecessarily dangerous was in law reasonably safe, as against persons towards whom there was a duty to be careful.

Having fully considered the notes of the Lord Chief Justice, we think there was evidence for the jury that the plaintiff was in the place by the tacit invitation of the defendant, upon business in which he was concerned; that there was by reason of the shaft unusual danger, known to the defendant; and that the plaintiff sustained damage by reason of that danger, and of the neglect of the defendant and his servants to use reasonably sufficient means to avert or warn him of it; and we cannot say that the proof of contributory negligence was so clear that we ought on this ground to set aside the verdict of the jury.

As for the argument that the plaintiff contributed to the accident by not following his guide, the answer may be that the guide, knowing the place, ought rather to have waited for him; and this point, as matter of fact, is set at rest by the verdict.

For these reasons, we think there was evidence of a cause of action in respect of which the jury were properly directed; and, as every reservation of leave to enter a nonsuit carries with it an implied condition that the Court may amend, if necessary, in such a manner as to raise the real question, leave ought to be given to the plaintiff, in the event of the defendant desiring to appeal or to bring a writ of error, to amend the declaration by stating the facts as proved,—in effect, that the defendant was the occupier of and carried on business at the place; that there was a shaft, very dangerous to persons in the place, which the defendant knew and the plaintiff did not know; that the plaintiff, by invitation and permission of the defendant, was near the shaft, upon business of the defendant, in the way of his own craft as a gas-fitter, for hire, &c., stating the circumstances, the negligence, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was injured. The details of the amendment can, if necessary, be settled at chambers. * * * Rule discharged.

Against this decision of the Court of Common Pleas, the defendant appealed.

[In the Exchequer Chamber.]

KELLY, C. B. * * * The question has been raised whether the plaintiff at the time of the accident and under the special circumstances of the case, was more than a mere volunteer. Let us see what the case really was. The work had been done on Saturday, and at the conclusion of it an appointment was made for the plaintiff's employer or some other workman to come on the following Tuesday to see if the work was in proper order, and all the parts of it acting rightly. The plaintiff by his master's directions went for that purpose, and I own I do not see any distinction between the case of a workman going upon the premises to perform his employer's contract, and that of his going after the contract is completed, but for a purpose incidental to the contract, and so intimately connected with it, that few contracts are completed without a similar act being done. The plaintiff went under circumstances such as those last mentioned, and he comes, therefore, strictly within the language used by Willes, J., "a person on lawful business in the course of fulfilling a contract, in which both the plaintiff and defendant have an interest."

What then is the duty imposed by law on the owner of these premises? They were used for the purpose of a sugar refinery, and it may very likely be true that such premises usually have holes in the floors of the different stories, and that they are left without any fence or safeguard during the day while the workpeople, who it may well be supposed are acquainted with the dangerous character of the premises, are about; but if a person occupying such premises enters into a contract, in the fulfilment of which workmen must come on the premises who probably do not know what is usual in such places, and are unacquainted with the danger they are likely to incur, is he not bound either to put up some fence or safeguard about the hole, or, if he does not, to give such workmen a reasonable notice that they must take care and avoid the danger? I think the law does impose such an obligation on him. That view was taken in the judgment in the court below, where it is said: "With respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger which he knows or ought to know; and that, when there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was such contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as a matter of fact."

It was so determined in this case, and though I am far from saying that there was not evidence that the plaintiff largely contributed to the accident by his own negligence, yet that was for the jury; and I think there was clearly some evidence for them that the defendant had not used reasonable precautions, and that the judge therefore would have been wrong if he had nonsuited the plaintiff.

CHANNELL, B., BLACKBURN, J., MELLOR, J., and PIGOTT, B., concurred.

Judgment affirmed.[66]

PLUMMER v. DILL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1892. 156 Mass. 426, 31 N. E. 128, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463.)

Tort, for personal injuries occasioned to the plaintiff by striking her head upon a projecting sign placed against a post at the outside corner of the landing of the defendant's building. A verdict was directed for the defendant; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

KNOWLTON, J. If we assume that it was the duty of the defendant to keep the entrance, stairway, and halls of his building reasonably safe for persons using them on an invitation express or implied, and if we further assume that he negligently permitted them to be unsafe, and that his negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff, and that she was in the exercise of due care,—some of which propositions are at least questionable,—we come to the inquiry whether the plaintiff was a mere licensee in the building, or was there by the defendant's implied invitation.

She did not go there to transact with any occupant of the building any kind of business in which he was engaged, or in the transaction of which the building was used or designed to be used. She was in search of a servant; and for her own convenience she went there to inquire about a matter which concerned herself alone.

It has often been held that the owner of land or a building, who has it in charge, is bound to be careful and diligent in keeping it safe for those who come there by his invitation express or implied, but that he owes no such duty to those who come there for their own convenience, or as mere licensees. Sweeny v. Old Colony & Newport Railroad, 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Metcalfe v. Cunard Steamship Co., 147 Mass. 66, 16 N. E. 701; Gordon v. Cummings, 152 Mass. 513, 25 N. E. 978, 9 L. R. A. 640, 23 Am. St. Rep. 846. One who puts a building or a part of a building to use in a business, and fits it up so as to show the use to which it is adapted, impliedly invites all persons to come there whose coming is naturally incident to the prosecution of the business. If the place is open, and there is nothing to indicate that strangers are not wanted, he impliedly permits and licenses persons to come there for their own convenience, or to gratify their curiosity. The mere fact that premises are fitted conveniently for use by the owner or his tenants, and by those who come to transact such business as is carried on there, does not constitute an implied invitation to strangers to come and use the place for purposes of their own. To such persons it gives no more than an implied license to come for any proper purpose.

It is held in England that one who comes on an express invitation to enjoy hospitality as a guest must take the house as he finds it; and that his right to recover for an injury growing out of dangers on the premises is no greater than that of a mere licensee. Southcote v. Stanley, 1 H. & N. 247. The principle of the decision seems to be that a guest, who is receiving the gratuitous favors of another, has no such relation to him as to create a duty to make the place where hospitality is tendered safer or better than it is. It is well settled there that to come under an implied invitation, as distinguished from a mere license, the visitor must come for a purpose connected with the business in which the occupant is engaged, or which he permits to be carried on there. There must at least be some mutuality of interest in the subject to which the visitor's business relates, although the particular thing which is the object of the visit may not be for the benefit of the occupant. Pollock on Torts, 417; Holmes v. North Eastern Railway, L. R. 4 Ex. 254; S. C. L. R. 6 Ex. 123; White v. France, 2 C. P. D. 308; Burchell v. Hickisson, 50 L. J. Q. B. 101.

The rule in regard to an implied invitation to places of business is held with equal strictness in New York. In Larmore v. Crown Point Iron Co., 101 N. Y. 301, 4 N. E. 752, 54 Am. St. Rep. 718, it was decided that a person, who entered on the defendant's premises to see if the defendant would give him employment, was a mere licensee, and that the defendant was not liable to him for an injury caused by the unsafe condition of the place. The diligence of counsel and an extended examination of the authorities have failed to bring to our attention any case in which the owner or occupant of a place fitted up for ordinary use in business has been held by the condition of his premises impliedly to invite persons to come there for a purpose in which the occupant had no interest, and which had no connection with the business actually or apparently carried on there. Precisely how far, under all circumstances, an implied invitation extends, in reference to the persons to be included in it, has not been the subject of very full consideration in this Commonwealth, and is hardly capable of exact statement. But in many cases there is language indicating that the invitation extends only to those who come on business connected with that carried on at the place, and for the transaction of which the place is apparently intended. In Severy v. Nickerson, 120 Mass. 306, 21 Am. Rep. 514, Mr. Justice Devens says: "There is no duty imposed upon an owner or occupant of premises to keep them in a suitable condition for those who come there for their own convenience merely, without any invitation, either express or which may fairly be implied from the preparation and adaptation of the premises for the purposes for which they are appropriated." In Marwedel v. Cook, 154 Mass. 235, 236, 28 N. E. 140, we find this language: "The general duty which the defendants owed to third persons, in respect to the passages of the building, is well expressed in the instructions to the jury at the trial: 'If the defendants leased rooms in the building to different tenants, reserving to themselves the control of the halls, stairways, and elevator, by and through which access was to be had to these rooms, and the general lighting arrangements of those passages, then the defendants were bound to take reasonable care that such approaches were safe and suitable at all times, and for all persons who were lawfully using the premises, and using due care, so far as they ought to have reasonably anticipated such use as involved in and necessarily arising out of the purposes and business for which said rooms were leased.'" In Learoyd v. Godfrey, 138 Mass. 315, 323, the plaintiff, a police officer, was expressly invited to the premises by a daughter of the occupant to arrest an intoxicated person who was making disturbance in the house. In Curtis v. Kiley, 153 Mass. 123, 26 N. E. 421, no question was considered or clearly raised about the invitation to the plaintiff. In Davis v. Central Congregational Society, 129 Mass. 367, 37 Am. Rep. 368, the plaintiff went to the defendant's church under an express invitation authorized by the defendant, and the object of her visit was among those contemplated by the defendant when the building was erected. The language used in the cases in this Commonwealth and in other States indicates that the rule in regard to the extent of the invitation implied from the preparation of property for use in business is the same here as laid down in the cases above cited from the courts of New York and of England. Sweeny v. Old Colony & Newport Railroad, 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Elliott v. Pray, 10 Allen, 378, 87 Am. Dec. 653; Carleton v. Franconia Iron & Steel Co., 99 Mass. 216; Metcalfe v. Cunard Steamship Co., 147 Mass. 66, 16 N. E. 701; Heinlein v. Boston & Providence Railroad, 147 Mass. 136, 16 N. E. 698, 9 Am. St. Rep. 676; Reardon v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 267, 21 N. E. 369; Gordon v. Cummings, 152 Mass. 513, 25 N. E. 978, 9 L. R. A. 640, 23 Am. St. Rep. 846; Curtis v. Kiley, 153 Mass. 123, 26 N. E. 421; Stevens v. Nichols, 155 Mass. 472, 29 N. E. 1150, 15 L. R. A. 459; Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co., 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503; Parker v. Portland Publishing Co., 69 Me. 173, 31 Am. Rep. 262.

In Low v. Grand Trunk Railway, 72 Me. 313, 24 Am. Rep. 331, it was held that the owner of a wharf was liable to a customhouse officer, who was upon it in the performance of his duty to prevent smuggling in the nighttime, for an injury resulting from a defective condition of the wharf. The officer was there to prevent unlawful conduct in connection with the business carried on at the wharf with the consent of the owner, and the owner might fairly be supposed to anticipate and desire, and impliedly to invite, his presence there to protect the defendant's property from those who would unlawfully use it. Neither the decision nor the cases cited in the opinion, when carefully examined, will be found to give any countenance to the view that one who visits a building for a purpose not connected with the use for which the building was fitted, or to which it is put, is impliedly invited to come there. * * *[67]

On the facts of the case before us, we are of opinion that the plaintiff was a mere licensee in the defendant's building, and that the rulings at the trial were correct.

STEISKAL v. MARSHALL FIELD & CO.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1908. 238 Ill. 92, 87 N. E. 117.)

Action on the case against Marshall Field & Company for a personal injury sustained by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of the defendant. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $10,000, upon which the trial court rendered judgment. This judgment was affirmed by the Appellate Court, and a further appeal is prosecuted in this court.

HAND, J. The declaration contained one count which alleged:

That the appellant carried on a retail dry goods and general store in its store building in the city of Chicago, and used and operated, in connection with its business therein, a certain passenger elevator to carry passengers from floor to floor in said building; that the plaintiff was rightfully in said store and a passenger in said elevator; that he entered said elevator at the ninth floor for the purpose of being carried to the first or main floor of the building; that it was the duty of the defendant to carry him safely from said ninth floor to his destination, but in this the defendant failed and was guilty of negligence, in that while the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care for his own safety and was in said elevator as a passenger, the said elevator, and the machinery by which the same was operated, broke and gave way, and precipitated said elevator, with plaintiff, into the basement of said building, and he was injured, etc.

The first contention of the appellant is that the declaration is not sufficient to support the judgment, in this: That the plaintiff has not averred facts therein which show that he was rightfully in said elevator, or that the relation of passenger and carrier existed between the plaintiff and the defendant at the time of the accident. The sufficiency of the declaration is challenged by motion in arrest of judgment. The relation averred to exist between the plaintiff and the defendant at the time the plaintiff was injured was that of passenger and carrier, and we are of the opinion the declaration, after verdict, was sufficient to support the judgment. In Chicago & Alton Railroad Co. v. Clausen, 173 Ill. 100, 50 N. E. 680, where the same contention was made as is made here, the declaration averred that the plaintiff became a passenger on a passenger train of the defendant at Dwight to be carried from that place to Gardner, and that while he, with due care, caution, and diligence, was about to alight from the train at Gardner, the defendant carelessly and negligently caused the train to be violently and suddenly moved forward, and thereby he was thrown from and off the train to and upon the wooden platform of defendant; and in different counts it was alleged that defendant did not stop the train at Gardner a sufficient length of time to receive and let off passengers, but suddenly started the train, whereby the plaintiff, who was attempting to alight, was thrown off. The averments of the declaration in that case were held sufficient after verdict, and, if that declaration was good after verdict, we are unable to see why the declaration in this case is not.

It is next contended that the facts proven do not establish that the relation of passenger and carrier existed between the parties at the time appellee was injured. The appellee testified: He went to the store of the appellant to obtain employment; that he inquired of an employé of the defendant on the first floor for the superintendent; that he was told the superintendent was on the ninth floor and was directed to take the elevator to that floor; that he got off the elevator at the ninth floor and inquired for the superintendent and was informed that he was not in his office; that he returned to the elevator, the door of which was open, and entered the elevator; that the operator closed the door behind him and turned on the power, and the elevator immediately dropped to the basement floor; that the elevator was wrecked, the operator killed, and he was severely injured. We think this evidence fairly tended to show that the appellee was rightfully in the elevator, and that the relation of passenger and carrier existed between the parties at the time the appellee was injured. In an establishment like that of the appellant there is a general invitation to persons to enter who have business with the appellant. The appellant employs a large number of persons, and it was clearly lawful for the appellee to enter its store for the purpose of seeking employment, and upon being directed to the office of the superintendent and invited to use the elevator in going to his office he clearly was rightfully upon the elevator, and upon finding the superintendent out of his office he had the right to return to the first or main floor in the elevator. There was, at least, evidence introduced by the plaintiff fairly tending to show that the relation of passenger and carrier existed between the parties at the time the elevator fell, and that the appellee was rightfully upon the elevator; and as those questions were questions of fact, or at most, of mixed law and fact (Springer v. Ford, 189 Ill. 430, 59 N. E. 953, 52 L. R. A. 930, 82 Am. St. Rep. 464), we think it cannot now, in view of the holding of the trial and Appellate Courts, be successfully contended in this court, as a matter of law, that such relation did not exist, or that the appellee was wrongfully upon the elevator, at the time it fell. This case is not like that of Walsh v.

Cullen, 235 Ill. 91, 85 N. E. 223, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 911. In that case the relation of master and servant existed between the parties, while here the appellee was a passenger, and the duty which the appellant owed the appellee was the duty growing out of the relation of carrier and passenger. This court has held (Hartford Deposit Co. v. Sollitt, 172 Ill. 222, 50 N. E. 178, 64 Am. St. Rep. 35, and Springer v. Ford, supra) that a person operating a passenger elevator, under the circumstances under which the elevator in question was being operated at the time of the accident, is a carrier of persons, and bound to exercise a high degree of care in transporting passengers, and that the fact that the elevator falls when persons are being carried thereon is evidence that the elevator was mismanaged, or was out of repair, or of faulty construction.

DUNN, J. (dissenting). The single count in the declaration alleged that the appellant carried on a store, and used and operated in connection therewith a passenger elevator for carrying passengers from floor to floor, and that the appellee was rightfully in said store and a passenger in said elevator. These averments amount to no more than a statement that the appellee was in the elevator for the purpose of being carried and was not a trespasser. The evidence showed that the appellee went to the store for the purpose of obtaining employment. It did not show that he went in response to any advertisement or request of the appellant, that the appellant desired to employ any help, or that the appellee had any reason to suppose it did. In response to his inquiry he was informed that the superintendent was on the ninth floor, and was directed to take the elevator to that floor. Finding that the superintendent was not in his office, he returned to the elevator, when it fell, and he was injured.

The operators of passenger elevators in buildings for the use of the occupants and those having business with or visiting them are common carriers of passengers, with the same obligations as carriers by other modes of conveyance. Hartford Deposit Co. v. Sollitt, 172 Ill. 222, 50 N. E. 178, 64 Am. St. Rep. 35; Springer v. Ford, 189 Ill. 430, 59 N. E. 953, 52 L. R. A. 930, 82 Am. St. Rep. 464; Beidler v. Branshaw, 200 Ill. 425, 65 N. E. 1086. But these obligations do not extend to the case of employés of the operator using the elevator in the course of their employment. Walsh v. Cullen, 235 Ill. 91, 85 N. E. 223, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 911. As to such persons and others using the elevator, not in connection with the business of the operator or the occupants of the building or by their invitation, the law does not require that high degree of care which common carriers of passengers must use. One who goes upon the premises of another to seek employment of the owner, not in response to any invitation, is not engaged in the business of the owner. He goes solely for his own benefit. There was no invitation, express or implied, for the appellee to visit the appellant's store. He went there on his own business and for his own purposes only. The appellant was under no obligation to the appellee, under such circumstances, to exercise the high degree of care required of a common carrier. Larmore v. Crown Point Iron Co., 101 N. Y. 391, 4 N. E. 752, 54 Am. Rep. 718.

CARTWRIGHT, C. J., and SCOTT, J., concur in the foregoing dissenting opinion.

COWEN v. KIRBY et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1902. 180 Mass. 504, 62 N. E. 968.)

Tort for personal injuries by Cowen against Kirby and others. A verdict was directed for the defendants. The plaintiff excepts. The facts were as follows:

The defendants kept a stable situated at the corner of two streets, and as a part of their business took in for keeping and care the vehicles and horses of those persons who might come for that service. Upon the ground floor was a large room, into which teams were driven from one of the streets, and in which horses were unhitched and hitched up and vehicles were stored. Out of this room opened a number of doors, one of which led to stalls where the horses were kept, two led to harness rooms, one to a ladies' waiting room, and one to an office. The two latter doors were near the team entrance, and the waiting room and the office had outer doors, also, giving entrance from the other street. The plaintiff drove his horse and wagon into the stable, and got out of the wagon. Hostlers unhitched the horse, and backed the wagon to the wall opposite the entrance. The plaintiff followed the wagon back, and put his driving gloves into it, and upon receiving a numbered check for his team left the stable. It does not appear that while he was there anything was said by any one. After some hours he re-entered by the carriage door, and walked across the room, intending to place some packages in his wagon, which remained where he had seen it placed. Other wagons had been put in the room in the meantime, and one of these was immediately in front of his. He passed to the left of the front wagon. About two feet to the left of his wagon was a post, and, not choosing to pass between the wagon and the post, he swung himself around the post, and then leaned towards his wagon to put his packages into it. The post was in fact a part of the apparatus of a hoisting machine used to carry vehicles between the ground floor and the upper floors of the stable. While the plaintiff was leaning towards his wagon, the hoist, loaded with a vehicle, descended upon him.

BARKER, J. (after stating the facts). Whether he can recover for his injury depends upon whether at the time and place where he was when hurt, he was more than a mere licensee, and if so, whether he was in the exercise of due care. The fact that a person enters a place of business as a customer does not give him the right to expect that every part of the premises shall be so arranged and kept that he may be in safety. He knows the purpose for which they are used, and must assume that they will be prepared and adapted for that purpose, and must take notice of that preparation and adaptation, at least so far as it is obvious. It is only those parts of the premises where customers are expected to be that the owner or occupant must keep in suitable condition for them, and in such parts only has a customer a right to assume that care has been used to protect him from injury. He enters knowing that the place is not arranged merely for his own convenience. He may expect that he will be safe in conducting himself as a customer is expected to act, but he has no right to expect that he will be safe if he oversteps that limit. The owner, without being in fault, may adapt his premises to his business, and may use them in the way for which they were designed, unless in so doing he exposes the customer to some danger which the latter has the right to expect he will not be exposed to, and the customer must expect to find such appliances and such uses of the premises as are involved in the prosecution of the business. If, without some special invitation, express or implied, a customer sees fit to pass from that part of the establishment where it is designed and expected that he shall be into other parts not designed or adapted for his use, but for the work of the place, he becomes at best a mere licensee, as to whom the owner or occupant has no duty to keep his premises safe. Severy v. Nickerson, 120 Mass. 306, 21 Am. Rep. 514; Gaffney v. Brown, 150 Mass. 479, 23 N. E. 233; Marwedel v. Cook, 154 Mass. 235, 28 N. E. 140. See Redigan v. Railroad Co., 155 Mass. 44, 28 N. E. 1133, 14 L. R. A. 276, 31 Am. St. Rep. 520; Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 428, 429, 31 N. E. 128, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463; McCarvell v. Sawyer, 173 Mass. 540, 54 N. E. 259, 73 Am. St. Rep. 318; Moffatt v. Kenny, 174 Mass. 311, 54 N. E. 850; Harobine v. Abbott, 177 Mass. 59, 58 N. E. 284.

When the plaintiff, having placed his driving gloves in the wagon, accepted the check for his team, and left the stable, no custom of business nor special invitation having been shown, he neither reserved nor obtained any right to use the stable for the purpose of placing other property in his wagon, nor to enter the room in which the wagon was, except for the purpose of reclaiming his property. In fact, although the plaintiff testified that he did not know it, a place for customer's parcels was provided in the office. However this may have been, there is nothing in the evidence to justify a finding that he had any right to expect, upon entering the stable the second time, that he would find it in such a condition that it would be safe for him to walk through it to his wagon and place in it other packages. In so doing he was visiting merely for his own convenience a part of the stable which obviously was not designed or intended for his use, but for the storage of vehicles. There was nothing to give him the right to infer or assume that by placing other articles of his own in his wagon he could charge the defendants with their custody, or that he had the right to use the room for the purpose of putting other articles in his wagon. His second visit being solely for that purpose, in making it he was at best but a mere licensee, and must take the place as he found it.

Besides this, he was not in the exercise of due care. The raised beam upon the floor over which he walked in going to his wagon, and the depression beyond it, in which the platform of the hoist rested when down; the grooved posts which guided the platform in its ascent and descent, and around one of which he swung himself; the box in which the counterweight hung; the check rope, and the double hoisting hawser of heavy rope hanging next his wagon, and within two feet of the post,—were all plainly visible, and all indicated obviously that the place where he chose to stand was used by a carriage hoist. He himself testified that if he had seen the hoisting rope hanging down and going around he would have thought there was an elevator there. We are of opinion that there were so many obvious indications that he stood in the way of a hoisting machine that he could not be found to be in the exercise of due care.

HUPFER v. NATIONAL DISTILLING CO.

This action was brought by Hupfer, as administrator of Simon Hupfer, against the National Distilling Company to recover damages for negligently causing the death of plaintiff's intestate. The complaint alleged, in effect:

That the deceased came to the defendant's distillery, as he had for some time been accustomed to do, for the purpose of purchasing and receiving slops for his cows, which slops were contained in a large circular tank about 16 feet in diameter, and raised about 6 feet above the ground, and drawn therefrom by a faucet at the bottom of the tank; that Simon drove his wagon under and by the side of the tank for the purpose of so filling his wagon with such slops; that without his knowledge or any warning to him, and through the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, the hoops which held the tank together had become rusted and weakened, so that the tank broke, and the contents thereof were precipitated upon Simon, scalding him in such a dangerous and shocking manner that he died about three hours afterwards.

The trial, under a denial and counter allegations, resulted in a special verdict for $1,000 in the plaintiff's favor, and judgment thereon in that amount. The defendant appealed.[68]

CASSODAY, C. J. It is contended that the deceased was, at the time and place of the injury, at most a mere licensee, to whom the defendant owed no duty. It is true that the defendant had in its employ at the time one John Dardell, whose special duty, among other things, was to stir up the slop in the vat and deliver the same to the defendant's customers. By the eighth and ninth findings the jury found that prior to the accident the deceased and the defendant's other customers knew that such were the duties of John Dardell. But by the sixth, seventh, and tenth findings, the jury also found that at the time of the accident it had long been an established custom for the defendant's customers, desiring to purchase such slops, to stir the same for themselves, if they desired to do so; and that such custom was known to and acquiesced in by the defendant; and that prior to the accident the defendant repeatedly suffered the deceased to step upon the back platform and stir up the slop, because it feared to lose his custom if he should be forbidden. John Dardell testified to the effect that he told the defendant's secretary that if some of the customers were not allowed to stir the slops themselves such customers would not take them; that the secretary told him not to drive customers away, but that he would rather he would stir the slops himself; that he had known the deceased for three years; that in the winter he came for slops almost every day, but seldom in the summer; that he often told the deceased that his duties required him to stir the slops, but that the deceased always stirred the slops himself; that by doing so he would get the thick slop, while other customers, who did not stir it themselves, would get thinner slop; that he knew that the deceased would not take the slop unless he stirred it himself, and so he let him stir the slop and fill his wagon rather than lose him as a customer; and that he regarded that as business. Upon such findings and testimony, can we hold that the deceased was a mere licensee within the authorities? * * * In Bennett v. Railroad Co., 102 U. S. 577, 584, 585, 26 L. Ed. 235, 238, it is said, quoting from an author, that "the principle appears to be that invitation is inferred where there is a common interest or mutual advantage, while a license is inferred where the object is the mere pleasure or benefit of the person using it." Similar views are expressed in Mr. Thompson's late Commentaries on the Law of Negligence (volume 1, § 968), citing numerous cases in support of the rule.

We must hold that, under the findings of the jury, the deceased cannot be regarded as a mere licensee, but that he was there on business for the mutual benefit of himself and the defendant: or in other words, by invitation. * * *[69]

The judgment of the superior court for Milwaukee county is reversed [for error in the admission of testimony], and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

[69] A part of Mr. Chief Justice Cassoday's opinion, including a numerous citation of authorities, is omitted. Bardeen and Marshall, JJ., concurred in the result: the latter in an elaborate opinion.

HOLMES v. DREW.

Tort for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by falling upon a private sidewalk belonging to the defendant, and negligently suffered by her to remain in a dangerous condition. At the trial there was evidence tending to prove the following facts:

The defendant was the owner of an estate abutting on West Rutland Square, a public street in the city of Boston. The buildings fronting upon this street, including that of the defendant, had been placed by their owners sixteen feet back from the street line, and a brick sidewalk had been laid by them upon the intervening space. In front of the defendant's building, this sidewalk was nowhere less than eight feet wide, of which but eight inches were included within the limits of the street, the remainder being entirely upon the defendant's land. This entire sidewalk was so constructed by the defendant as apparently to constitute a public sidewalk, with nothing to indicate any difference or line of separation between what was public and what was private. The bricks of the sidewalk at the intersection of the street with a private way, which crossed it and formed the boundary of one side of the defendant's estate, were kept in position by a board which extended from the side of the street at right angles into the defendant's land, and projected above the bricks for a height varying from an inch and a quarter to six inches and a quarter. In front of the defendant's building and upon her land, over an irregular space covering about fifteen square feet extending from this board into the sidewalk, the bricks had become loose, misplaced, and thrown into various irregular positions, and had there remained for several months before November 4, 1887. On the evening of that day, the plaintiff, while travelling along the sidewalk upon the defendant's premises towards the private way, being in the exercise of due care and supposing that the sidewalk was a part of the street, stumbled over the loose bricks and the projecting board above described, and, falling down, was severely injured. The plaintiff did not give to the defendant the notice mentioned in the Pub. Sts. c. 52, § 19. After the accident, the loose bricks on the defendant's premises were replaced in proper position, and the sidewalk put in safe condition, but it did not appear who did it.

The judge upon the above facts directed a verdict for the defendant; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

W. ALLEN, J. The jury might have inferred from the facts stated that the defendant laid out and paved the sidewalk on her own land in order that it should be used by the public as the sidewalk of the street, and allowed it to remain apparently the part of the street that was intended to be used by foot passengers. This would amount to an invitation to the public to enter upon and use as a public sidewalk the land so prepared, and the plaintiff so using it would have gone upon the defendant's land by her implied invitation, and she would owe to him the duty not to expose him to a dangerous condition of the walk which reasonable care on her part would have prevented. Sweeny v. Old Colony & Newport Railroad, 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Carleton v. Franconia Iron & Steel Co., 99 Mass. 216; Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485; Davis v. Central Congregational Society, 129 Mass. 367, 371, 37 Am. Rep. 368; Murphy v. Boston & Albany Railroad, 133 Mass. 121.

The place was not a way, and Pub. Sts. c. 52, § 19, do not apply.

The ground of the defendant's liability is not her obligation to keep a way in repair; but her obligation to use due care that her land should be reasonably safe for the use which she invited the plaintiff to make of it. Whether she invited the plaintiff to cross her land on a paved walk, whether the pavement was in such a condition as to render walking over it dangerous, whether it was in that condition through the negligence of the defendant, and whether the plaintiff was hurt in consequence while in the exercise of due care, were questions proper to be submitted to the jury.

Exceptions sustained.[70]

II. In Relation to Contractual Obligations: Whether a Duty of Care Towards Third Persons

WINTERBOTTOM v. WRIGHT.

(Court of Exchequer, 1842. 10 Mees. & W. 109, 62 R. R. 534.)

Case. The declaration stated:

That the defendant was a contractor for the supply of mail-coaches, and had in that character contracted for hire and reward with the Postmaster-General, to provide the mail-coach for the purpose of conveying the mail-bags from Hartford, in the county of Chester, to Holyhead: That the defendant, under and by virtue of said contract, had agreed with the said Postmaster-General that the said mail-coach should, during the said contract, be kept in a fit, proper, safe, and secure state and condition for the said purpose, and took upon himself, to wit, under and by virtue of the said contract, the sole and exclusive duty, charge, care, and burden of the repairs, state and condition of the said mail-coach: and it had become and was the sole and exclusive duty of the defendant, to wit, under and by virtue of his said contract, to keep and maintain the said mail-coach in a fit, proper, safe and secure state and condition for the purpose aforesaid: That Nathanial Atkinson and other persons, having notice of the said contract, were under contract with the Postmaster-General to convey the said mail-coach from Hartford to Holyhead, and to supply horses and coachmen for that purpose, and also not, on any pretence whatever, to use or employ any other coach or carriage whatever than such as should be so provided, directed and appointed by the Postmaster-General: That the plaintiff, being a mail-coachman, and thereby obtaining his livelihood, and whilst the said several contracts were in force, having notice thereof, and trusting to and confiding in the contract made between the defendant and the Postmaster-General, and believing that the said coach was in a fit, safe, secure and proper state and condition for the purpose aforesaid, and not knowing and having no means of knowing to the contrary thereof, hired himself to the said Nathanial Atkinson and his co-contractors as mail-coachman, to drive and take the conduct of the said mail-coach, which but for the said contract of the defendant he would not have done. The declaration then averred, that the defendant so improperly and negligently conducted himself, and so utterly disregarded his aforesaid contract, and so wholly neglected and failed to perform his duty in this behalf, that heretofore, to wit, on the 8th of August, 1840, whilst the plaintiff, as such mail-coachman so hired, was driving the said mail-coach from Hartford to Holyhead, the same coach being a mail-coach found and provided by the defendant under his said contract, and the defendant then acting under his said contract, and having the means of knowing and then well knowing all the aforesaid premises, the said mail-coach being then in a frail, weak, infirm, and dangerous state and condition, to wit, by and through certain latent defects in the state and condition thereof, and unsafe and unfit for the use and the purpose aforesaid, and from no other cause, circumstance, matter, or thing whatsoever, gave way and broke down, whereby the plaintiff was thrown from his seat, and, in consequence of injuries then received, had become lame for life.

[70] "There is a class of cases to which Sweeny v. Old Colony Railroad (1865) 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, and Holmes v. Drew (1890) 151 Mass. 578, 25 N. E. 22, belong, which stand on a ground peculiar to themselves. They are where the defendant, by his conduct, has induced the public to use a way in the belief that it is a street or public way which all have a right to use, and where they suppose they will be safe. The inducement or implied invitation in these cases is not to come to a place of business fitted up by the defendant for traffic to which those only are invited who will come to do business with the occupant, nor is it to come by permission or favor or license; but it is to come as one of the public, and enjoy a public right, in the enjoyment of which one may expect to be protected. The liability in such a case should be co-extensive with the inducement or implied invitation." Per Knowlton, J., in Plummer v. Dill (1892) 156 Mass. 426, 430, 31 N. E. 128, 130, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463, 467.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded several pleas, to two of which there were demurrers; but, as the court gave no opinion as to their validity, it is not necessary to state them.

Byles, for the defendant, objected that the declaration was bad in substance: This is an action brought, not against Atkinson and his co-contractors, who were the employers of the plaintiff, but against the person employed by the Postmaster-General, and totally unconnected with them or the plaintiff. Now it is a general rule, that wherever a wrong arises merely out of the breach of a contract, which is the case on the face of this declaration, whether the form in which the action be conceived be ex contractu or ex delicto, the party who made the contract alone can sue: Tollit v. Sherstone, 5 M. & W. 283. If the rule were otherwise, and privity of contract were not requisite, there would be no limit to such actions. * * * Levy v. Langridge, 4 M. & W. 337, will probably be referred to on the other side. But that case was expressly decided on the ground that the defendant, who sold the gun by which the plaintiff was injured, although he did not personally contract with the plaintiff, who was a minor, knew that it was bought to be used by him. Here there is no allegation that the defendant knew that the coach was to be driven by the plaintiff. There, moreover, fraud was alleged in the declaration, and found by the jury: and there, too, the cause of the injury was a weapon of a dangerous nature, and the defendant was alleged to have had notice of the defect in its construction. Nothing of that sort appears upon this declaration.

Peacock, contra. This case is within the principle of the decision in Levy v. Langridge. Here the defendant entered into a contract with a public officer to supply an article which, if imperfectly constructed, was necessarily dangerous, and which, from its nature and the use for which it was destined, was necessarily to be driven by a coachman. That is sufficient to bring the case within the rule established by Levy v. Langridge. In that case the contract made by the father of the plaintiff with the defendant was made on behalf of himself and his family generally, and there was nothing to show that the defendant was aware even of the existence of the particular son who was injured. Suppose a party made a contract with government for a supply of muskets, one of which, from its misconstruction, burst and injured a soldier: there it is clear that the use of the weapon by a soldier would have been contemplated, although not by the particular individual who received the injury, and could it be said, since the decision in Levy v. Langridge, that he could not maintain an action against the contractor? So, if a coachmaker, employed to put on the wheels of a carriage, did it so negligently that one of them flew off, and a child of the owner were thereby injured, the damage being the natural and immediate consequence of his negligence, he would surely be responsible. So, if a party entered into a contract to repair a church, a workhouse, or other public building, and did it so insufficiently that a person attending the former, or a pauper in the latter were injured by the falling of a stone, he could not maintain an action against any other person than the contractor; but against him he must surely have a remedy. It is like the case of a contractor who negligently leaves open a sewer, whereby a person passing along the street is injured. It is clear that no action could be maintained against the Postmaster-General: Hall v. Smith, 2 Bing. 156; Humphreys v. Mears, 1 Man. & R. 187; Priestly v. Fowler. But here the declaration alleges the accident to have happened through the defendant's negligence and want of care. The plaintiff had no opportunity of seeing that the carriage was sound and secure. (ALDERSON, B. The decision in Levy v. Langridge proceeds upon the ground of the knowledge and fraud of the defendant.) Here also there was fraud: the defendant represented the coach to be in a proper state for use, and whether he represented that which was false within his knowledge, or a fact as true which he did not know to be so, it was equally a fraud in point of law, for which he is responsible.

LORD ABINGER, C. B. I am clearly of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment. We ought not to permit a doubt to rest upon this subject, for our doing so might be the means of letting in upon us an infinity of actions. This is an action of the first impression, and it has been brought in spite of the precautions which were taken, in the judgment of this Court in the case of Levy v. Langridge, to obviate any notion that such an action could be maintained. We ought not to attempt to extend the principle of that decision, which, although it has been cited in support of this action, wholly fails as an authority in its favor; for there the gun was bought for the use of the son, the plaintiff in that action, who could not make the bargain himself, but was really and substantially the party contracting. Here the action is brought simply because the defendant was a contractor with a third person; and it is contended that thereupon he became liable to everybody who might use the carriage. If there had been any ground for such an action, there certainly would have been some precedent of it; but with the exception of actions against inn-keepers, and some few other persons, no case of a similar nature has occurred in practice. That is a strong circumstance, and is of itself a great authority against its maintenance. It is however contended, that this contract being made on the behalf of the public by the Postmaster-General, no action could be maintained against him, and therefore the plaintiff must have a remedy against the defendant. But that is by no means a necessary consequence, —he may be remediless altogether. There is no privity of contract between these parties; and if the plaintiff can sue, every passenger, or even any person passing along the road, who was injured by the upsetting of the coach, might bring a similar action. Unless we confine the operation of such contracts as this to the parties who entered into them, the most absurd and outrageous consequences, to which I can see no limit, would ensue. Where a party becomes responsible to the public, by undertaking a public duty, he is liable, though the injury may have arisen from the negligence of his servant or agent. So, in cases of public nuisances, whether the act was done by the party as a servant, or in any other capacity, you are liable to an action at the suit of any person who suffers. Those, however, are cases where the real ground of the liability is the public duty, or the commission of the public nuisance. There is also a class of cases in which the law permits a contract to be turned into a tort; but unless there has been some public duty undertaken, or public nuisance committed, they are all cases in which an action might have been maintained upon the contract. Thus, a carrier may be sued either in assumpsit or case; but there is no instance in which a party, who was not privy to the contract entered into with him, can maintain any such action. The plaintiff in this case could not have brought an action on the contract; if he could have done so, what would have been his situation, supposing the Postmaster-General had released the defendant? That would, at all events, have defeated his claim altogether. By permitting this action, we should be working this injustice, that after the defendant had done everything to the satisfaction of his employer, and after all matters between them had been adjusted, and all accounts settled on the footing of their contract, we should subject them to be ripped open by this action of tort being brought against him.

ALDERSON, B. I am of the same opinion. The contract in this case was made with the Postmaster-General alone; and the case is just the same as if he had come to the defendant and ordered a carriage, and handed it at once over to Atkinson. If we were to hold that the plaintiff could sue in such a case, there is no point at which such actions would stop. The only safe rule is to confine the right to recover to those who enter into the contract: if we go one step beyond that, there is no reason why we should not go fifty. The only real argument in favor of this action is, that this is a case of hardship; but that might have been obviated if the plaintiff had made himself a party to the contract. Then it is urged that it falls within the principle of the case of Levy v. Langridge. But the principle of that case is simply this, that the father having bought the gun for the very purpose of being used by the plaintiff, the defendant made representations by which he was induced to use it. There, a distinct fraud was committed on the plaintiff; the falsehood of the representation was also alleged to have been within the knowledge of the defendant who made it, and he was properly held liable for the consequences. How are the facts of that case applicable to those of the present? Where is the allegation of fraud or misrepresentation in this declaration? It shows nothing of the kind. Our judgment must therefore be for the defendant.

ROLFE, B. The breach of the defendant's duty, stated in the declaration, is his omission to keep the carriage in a safe condition; and when we examine the mode in which that duty is alleged to have arisen, we find a statement that the defendant took upon himself, to wit, under and by virtue of the said contract, the sole and exclusive duty, charge, care, and burden of the repairs, state, and condition of the said mail coach, and, during all the time aforesaid, it had become, and was the sole and exclusive duty of the defendant, to wit, under and by virtue of his said contract, to keep and maintain the said mail coach in a fit, proper, safe, and secure condition. The duty, therefore, is shown to have arisen solely from the contract; and the fallacy consists in the use of the word "duty." If a duty to the Postmaster-General be meant, that is true; but if a duty to the plaintiff be intended (and in that sense the word is evidently used), there was none. This is one of those unfortunate cases in which there certainly has been damnum, but it is damnum absque injuria; it is, no doubt, a hardship upon the plaintiff to be without a remedy, but by that consideration we ought not to be influenced. Hard cases, it has been frequently observed, are apt to introduce bad law.

Judgment for the defendant.

GALBRAITH v. ILLINOIS STEEL CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit. 1904. 66 C. C. A. 359, 133 Fed. 485, 2 L. R. A. [N. S.] 799.)

This was an action on the case against the Illinois Steel Company. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the court, on defendant's motion, directed a verdict for the defendant, and entered judgment thereon. The plaintiff brings error to reverse this judgment. The facts in the case were as follows:

The plaintiff, owner of a six-story business block in Chicago, contracted with the Manufacturers' Automatic Sprinkler Company to install in her building a complete sprinkler system. Among other things, the sprinkler company agreed to construct on top of the building, according to plans of Ritter & Mott, engineers, a steel framework on which to stand a wooden tank of 20,000 gallons capacity. The sprinkler company contracted with the defendant to erect the steel support. Defendant was given the drawings and specifications prepared by Ritter & Mott, and in making therefrom its shop plans, and in putting up the steel support, omitted a tie member—one side of the triangular top. Ritter & Mott's plans informed defendant that a tank 16 feet in diameter would rest upon the steel support, but did not disclose the height and capacity of the tank. Defendant did its work in the manner above stated, and left the building. Thereafter a tank company employed by the sprinkler company came upon the building and made and placed the tank. Then the sprinkler company connected the tank with the system of pipes and sprinkler heads throughout the building. The tank was filled and the system was maintained by plaintiff for 30 days before the accident occurred which gave rise to this controversy. The steel support weighed 5 tons; the tank and water, 85. The wind, blowing at 40 miles an hour against the tank surface, caused the structure to collapse. The evidence tends to prove that the collapse would not have happened, except for the absence of the tie member. Plaintiff paid out large sums in repairing the building and sprinkler system, in reimbursing tenants for damage to goods, and in settling personal injury claims. To recover these, she brought this action.

BAKER, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts). Plaintiff contends that defendant, outside and independently of its contract with the sprinkler company, owed her a duty to use reasonable care in constructing the steel support; that the evidence shows that defendant failed to exercise such care; that such failure was the proximate cause of her losses; and therefore that she has made out a good cause of action against defendant. And in support of her contention plaintiff cites numerous authorities.[71]

On the other hand, defendant insists that this case falls within the rule that a contractor, manufacturer, or vender is not liable to persons who have no contractual relations with him for negligence in the construction, manufacture, or sale of the article he handles, and illustrates its argument by comparison with many cases.[72]

If the sprinkler company had suffered from defendant's omission of the tie member, that company could have maintained against defendant an action ex contractu, for defendant had engaged to put in the tie member, or an action ex delicto, for defendant failed to discharge a duty it had assumed to the sprinkler company. In both cases the measure of right and duty would be the same, because it would be intolerable that an action ex delicto should be maintained by one contracting party against the other on account of the complete and exact performance of the contract. If defendant owed to the sprinkler company any duty to exercise care that the completed structure should withstand the wind, then, if the contract had called for the very steel support that defendant erected, full performance of the contract would be no defense to an action ex delicto for breach of the supposititious duty. It follows that the only duty owing by defendant to the sprinkler company was to perform the contract as it was made, and that the only party who could sue defendant for a breach of the duty that was created and measured by the contract was defendant's contractee, the sprinkler company.

Plaintiff cannot recover from defendant simply by showing defendant's breach of its contract with the sprinkler company, nor simply by showing defendant's breach of its duty to the sprinkler company. There was no contract relation between the parties to this case. What duty arose from the fact that defendant went upon plaintiff's building to execute its contract with the sprinkler company? There is the general maxim of the law of negligence that one, in following his business or pleasure, shall use reasonable care to avoid injury to others. That is a duty owing from everybody to everybody. And in this case, if defendant's workmen, during the erection of the steel support, had negligently dropped a girder on a passer-by in the street, or down through the roof and floors of plaintiff's building, Bickford v. Richards, 154 Mass. 163, 27 N. E. 1014, 26 Am. St. Rep. 224, and other decisions, would be good precedents for applying the maxim. In such a case there would be a breach of a duty that was not created and measured by the contract, and the inquiry whether defendant, on finally leaving the premises, had fully completed its contract, or had negligently failed in its duty in that regard, would be utterly irrelevant.

But plaintiff's case requires her to assert that defendant owed her the duty to use reasonable care to see to it, before leaving the job of erecting the steel support, that the final structure would not be apt to be blown over on account of the lack of the proper number of steel girders to make it safe. If such a duty existed, it would be one owing equally to the passer-by in the street, it would have being separate and apart from the duty that was created and measured by the contract between defendant and the sprinkler company, and it might or might not be coextensive with defendant's duty to the sprinkler company. If it were coextensive, it would be for the reason that defendant's contract with the sprinkler company called for such a steel support that the final structure would be reasonably safe. And since a duty cannot be shifted, defendant could not rely on the proposal of its customer, but would have to determine for itself, and at its own peril, whether or not the steel support shown in the proposed contract would in fact be sufficient to co-operate properly with the other parts of the system to make a reasonably safe final structure. If defendant's alleged duty to plaintiff were of different dimensions from those of its duty to the sprinkler company, it would be for the reason that defendant's contract with the sprinkler company did not call for such a steel support that the final structure would be reasonably safe. And in such a case defendant would be confronted with the situation that its performance of its duty to the sprinkler company would be a breach of its duty to the rest of the world.

Defendant's supposed duty to plaintiff being created by law, if at all, and therefore being absolute, and defendant's duty to the sprinkler company being of a size determinable by the contracting parties, the question of the two duties' coextensiveness is irrelevant, for, if defendant owed plaintiff the supposed duty, that duty could not be diminished or altered by defendant's contract with another. Hence, in inquiring into the origin, nature, and extent of defendant's duty to plaintiff, the irrelevancy of the terms of defendant's contract with the sprinkler company. And since the terms of the contract are immaterial, it is obvious that the question of performance is impertinent on the part of any one but the sprinkler company.

If defendant, constructor of one part, was bound to use reasonable care that the entirety, when turned over to the possession and use of a stranger, should withstand the winds, so were the builders of other parts. Take the tank company for example. It came upon the premises after defendant had gone. The fact was obvious that one side of a triangle was missing. The final effect of putting upon that support 85 tons' weight in the form of a sail was the blowing over of the structure. If defendant were required to look beyond its contract, and to ascertain the weight of the tank that was to be furnished by another, its capacity, the weight of the water, the sail area, and the speed of the winds, in order to determine whether the final and completed structure would be safe, it would be equally just to require the tank company to figure (and with reasonable accuracy, at its peril) on the tensile and torsional strength of steel, and the adequacy of the designs for the support on which it engaged to set its tank. If the law should hold all the builders and makers and doers in the land to a particular duty to their contractees, and at the same time to another absolute duty to use care that the thing shall be innocuous as it passes through the hands of all mankind—a duty separate and distinct from the first, which might or might not be coextensive with the first, but, whether so or not, unavailing to avoid the second—we fancy few persons would be willing to do business, in the face of the insufferable litigation that would ensue. True, the common law—that inexhaustible fount, of which the taps are in the hands of the courts—might have been turned to watering plaintiff's contention; but we think it evidence of the perception of a sound public policy that the courts, with virtual unanimity, have refrained from opening the gates.

To the rule there are exceptions. One must not, knowingly or unknowingly, fail to exercise care in the preparation or sale of an article intended to affect human life. One must not knowingly send out an instrumentality which is imminently and immediately dangerous, without notice of its nature and qualities. From the steel support, as defendant left it, no danger threatened. None came from it immediately, but only through additions and acts of the tank company, the sprinkler company, and plaintiff. This case is not within the exceptions. And furthermore the subsequent and independent intervening acts of the tank company, the sprinkler company, and plaintiff saved defendant's omission of the tie member from being the proximate cause of the accident.[73]

[73] Judge Grosscup dissented: "Now one thing seems quite sure: The plaintiff would have had, in some form, a right of action against the Sprinkler Company for the damage resulting; for the inclusion of the tie member was in the contract between them, and the Sprinkler Company was bound to see that the contract was performed. Another thing seems certain: The Sprinkler Company would have had, in some form, a right of action against the defendant for the loss to which it would thus be subjected; for the inclusion of the tie member was in the contract between the Sprinkler Company and the defendant, and the defendant was bound to perform that contract. Thus, by circumlocution at least, plaintiff's losses eventually would have reached the defendant, through a train of legal proceedings that, practically, would have made the defendant directly responsible to the plaintiff for the losses suffered. I am very much inclined to think that in such a case, where defendant is thus obligated to the Sprinkler Company, and the Sprinkler Company to the plaintiff, there exists such privity of contract as would give the plaintiff a direct right of action, ex contractu, against the defendant. But I do not rest my conclusion upon the existence of privity of contract. In matters involving, as these contracts did, the personal and property safety of others than the immediate parties to the contracts, there is, it seems to me, a duty raised to take reasonable care that the contract obligations are carried out. Public policy injects into such a relationship an obligation additional to the bare contractual obligation—an obligation running to all who are directly affected by the performance or non-performance of the contract. There is thus raised between defendant agreeing to put in an essential part of the building, according to plans and specifications, and the plaintiff affected in personal and property safety by defendant's performance of that obligation, a privity of duty that may be made the basis of an action ex delicto."

THOMAS et ux. v. WINCHESTER.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1852. 6 N. Y. [2 Seld.] 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455.)

This action was brought by Samuel Thomas and Mary Ann, his wife, against the defendants, Winchester and Gilbert, to recover damages for negligently putting up, labelling, and selling, as and for extract of dandelion, a simple and harmless medicine, a jar of extract of belladonna, a deadly poison; by means whereof, the plaintiff, Mary Ann Thomas, to whom a dose of dandelion had been prescribed by a physician, and to whom a portion of the jar of belladonna had been administered, as for extract of dandelion, had been greatly injured.

The complaint alleged, that the defendants, from the year 1843, to the first of January 1849, were engaged in putting up and vending certain vegetable extracts, at a store in the city of New York, designated as "108 John street," and that the defendant, Gilbert, had, for a long time previously thereto, been so engaged, at the same place. That among the extracts so prepared and sold by them, were those respectively known as the "extract of dandelion," and the "extract of belladonna"; the former a mild and harmless medicine and the latter a vegetable poison, which, if taken as a medicine in such quantity as might be safely administered of the former, would destroy the life, or seriously impair the health, of the person to whom the same might be administered. That, at some time between the periods above mentioned, the defendants put up and sold to James S. Aspinwall, a druggist in the city of New York, a jar of the extract of belladonna, which had been labelled by them as the extract of dandelion, and was purchased from them as such, by Aspinwall. That Aspinwall afterwards, on the 10th May 1845, relying upon the label so affixed by the defendants, sold the said jar of belladonna to Alvin Foord, a druggist of Cazenovia, in the county of Madison, as the extract of dandelion. That afterwards, on the 27th March 1849, the plaintiff, Mrs. Thomas, being sick, a portion of the extract of dandelion was prescribed for her, by her physician, and the said Alvin Foord, relying upon the label affixed by the defendants to said jar of belladonna, and believing the same to be the extract of dandelion, did, on the application of the plaintiff, Samuel Thomas, sell and deliver to him, from the said jar of belladonna, a portion of its contents, which was administered to the plaintiff, Mrs. Thomas, under the belief that it was the extract of dandelion; by which she was greatly injured, so that her life was despaired of, &c. The plaintiffs also averred that the whole injury was occasioned by the negligence and unskilfulness of the defendants in putting up and falsely labelling the jar of belladonna as the extract of dandelion, whereby the plaintiffs, as well as the druggists, and all other persons through whose hands it passed, before being administered as aforesaid, were induced to believe and did believe that it contained the extract of dandelion.

The defendants, in their answers, severally denied the allegations of the complaint, and insisted that they were not liable for the medicines sold by Aspinwall and Foord.

It was proved, on the trial before Mason, J., that Mrs. Thomas being in ill health, her physician prescribed for her a dose of dandelion. Her husband purchased what was believed to be the medicine prescribed, at the store of Dr. Foord, a physician and druggist in Cazenovia, Madison county, where the plaintiffs resided. A small quantity of the medicine thus purchased was administered to Mrs. Thomas, on whom it produced very alarming effects; such as coldness of the surface and extremities, feebleness of circulation, spasms of the muscles, giddiness of the head, dilation of the pupils of the eyes, and derangement of the mind. She recovered, however, after some time, from its effects, although for a short time her life was thought to be in great danger.

The medicine administered was belladonna and not dandelion. The jar from which it was taken was labelled "1/2lb. dandelion, prepared by A. Gilbert, No. 108 John street, N. Y. Jar 8 oz." It was sold for, and believed by Dr. Foord to be, the extract of dandelion, as labelled. Dr. Foord purchased the article as the extract of dandelion, from James S. Aspinwall, a druggist at New York. Aspinwall bought it of the defendant, as extract of dandelion, believing it to be such.

The defendant, Winchester, was engaged at 108 John street, New York, in the manufacture and sale of certain vegetable extracts for medicinal purposes, and in the purchase and sale of others. The extracts manufactured by him were put up in jars for sale, and those which he purchased were put up by him in like manner. The jars containing extracts manufactured by himself and those containing extracts purchased by him from others, were labelled alike. Both were labelled like the jar in question, as "prepared by A. Gilbert." Gilbert was a person employed by the defendant at a salary, as an assistant in his business. The jars were labelled in Gilbert's name because he had been previously engaged in the same business, on his own account, at No. 108 John street, and, probably, because Gilbert's labels rendered the articles more salable.

The extract contained in the jar sold to Aspinwall, and by him to Foord, was not manufactured by the defendant, but was purchased by him from another manufacturer or dealer. The extract of dandelion and the extract of belladonna resemble each other in color, consistence, smell and taste; but may, on careful examination, be distinguished the one from the other by those who are well acquainted with these articles. Gilbert's labels were paid for by Winchester, and used in his business with his knowledge and assent.

At the close of the testimony, the defendant's counsel moved for a nonsuit, on the following grounds:

1. That the action could not be sustained, as the defendant was the remote vendor of the article in question; and there was no connection, transaction or privity between him and the plaintiffs, or either of them. * * *

The defendant Gilbert was acquitted by the jury, and a verdict was rendered against Winchester for $800 damages; and a motion for a new trial, made at general term, upon a bill of exceptions, having been denied, and judgment perfected on the verdict, the defendant, Winchester, took this appeal.

RUGGLES, C. J. (after stating the facts). * * * The action was properly brought in the name of the husband and wife, for the personal injury and suffering of the wife; and the case was left to the jury, with the proper direction on that point. 1 Chit. Plead. 62.

The case depends on the first point taken by the defendant, on his motion for a nonsuit; and the question is, whether the defendant, being a remote vendor of the medicine, and there being no privity or connection between him and the plaintiffs, the action can be maintained. If, in labelling a poisonous drug with the name of a harmless medicine, for public market, no duty was violated by the defendant, excepting that which he owed to Aspinwall, his immediate vendee, in virtue of his contract of sale, this action cannot be maintained.

If A. build a wagon and sell it to B., who sells it to C., and C. hires it to D. who in consequence of the gross negligence of A., in building the wagon, is overturned and injured, D. cannot recover damages against A., the builder. A.'s obligation to build the wagon faithfully, arises solely out of his contract with B.; the public have nothing to do with it. Misfortune to third persons not parties to the contract, would not be a natural and necessary consequence of the builder's negligence; and such negligence is not an act imminently dangerous to human life. So, for the same reason, if a horse be defectively shod by a smith, and a person hiring the horse from the owner, is thrown and injured, in consequence of the smith's negligence in shoeing, the smith is not liable for the injury. The smith's duty in such case grows exclusively out of his contract with the owner of the horse; it was a duty which the smith owed to him alone; and to no one else. And although the injury to the rider may have happened in consequence of the negligence of the smith, the latter was not bound, either by his contract, or by any considerations of public policy or safety, to respond for his breach of duty to any one except the person he contracted with.

This was the ground on which the case of Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & Welsb. 109, was decided. A. contracted with the postmaster-general to provide a coach to convey the mail-bags along a certain line of road, and B. and others also contracted to horse the coach along the same line. B. and his co-contractors hired C., who was the plaintiff, to drive the coach. The coach, in consequence of some latent defect, broke down; the plaintiff was thrown from his seat and lamed. It was held, that C. could not maintain an action against A., for the injury thus sustained. The reason of the decision is best stated by Baron Rolfe: A.'s duty to keep the coach in good condition, was a duty to the postmaster-general, with whom he made his contract, and not a duty to the driver employed by the owners of the horses.

But the case in hand stands on a different ground. The defendant was a dealer in poisonous drugs; Gilbert was his agent in preparing them for market. The death or great bodily harm of some person, was the natural, and almost inevitable, consequence of the sale of belladonna by means of the false label. Gilbert, the defendant's agent, would have been punishable for manslaughter, if Mrs. Thomas had died, in consequence of taking the falsely-labelled medicine. Every man who by his culpable negligence, causes the death of another, although without intent to kill, is guilty of manslaughter. 2 R. S. 672. A chemist who negligently sells laudanum in a phial labelled as paregoric, and thereby causes the death of the person to whom it is administered, is guilty of manslaughter. Tessymond's Case, 1 Lewin's Crown Cases, 169. "So highly does the law value human life, that it admits of no justification, wherever life has been lost and the carelessness or negligence of one person has contributed to the death of another. Regina v. Swindall, 2 Car. & Kir. 232, 233. And this rule applies not only where the death of one is occasioned by the negligent act of another, but where it is caused by the negligent omission of a duty of that other. 2 Car. & Kir. 367, 371. Although the defendant, Winchester, may not be answerable criminally for the negligence of his agent, there can be no doubt of his liability, in a civil action, in which the act of the agent is to be regarded as the act of the principal. * * *[74]

Judgment affirmed.

HEAVEN v. PENDER.

(In the Court of Appeal, 1883. 11 Q. B. Div. 503.)

Action to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of the defendant. The action was remitted for trial before the Bow County Court, where judgment was given for the plaintiff for £20. The Queen's Bench Division, on motion by way of appeal, ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

BRETT, M. R. In this case the plaintiff was a workman in the employ of Gray, a ship painter. Gray entered into a contract with a shipowner whose ship was in the defendant's dock to paint the outside of his ship. The defendant, the dock owner, supplied, under a contract with the shipowner, an ordinary stage to be slung in the ordinary way outside the ship for the purpose of painting her. It must have been known to the defendant's servants, if they had considered the matter at all, that the stage would be put to immediate use, that it would not be used by the shipowner, but that it would be used by such a person as the plaintiff, a working ship painter. The ropes by which the stage was slung, and which were supplied as a part of the instrument by the defendant, had been scorched and were unfit for use and were supplied without a reasonably careful attention to their condition. When the plaintiff began to use the stage the ropes broke, the stage fell, and the plaintiff was injured. The Divisional Court held that the plaintiff could not recover against the defendant. The plaintiff appealed. The action is in form and substance an action for negligence. That the stage was, through want of attention of the defendant's servants, supplied in a state unsafe for use is not denied. But want of attention amounting to a want of ordinary care is not a good cause of action, although injury ensue from such want, unless the person charged with such want of ordinary care had a duty to the person complaining to use ordinary care in respect of the matter called in question. Actionable negligence consists in the neglect of the use of ordinary care or skill towards a person to whom the defendant owes the duty of observing ordinary care and skill, by which neglect the plaintiff, without contributory negligence on his part, has suffered injury to his person or property. The question in this case is whether the defendant owed such a duty to the plaintiff.

If a person contracts with another to use ordinary care or skill towards him or his property the obligation need not be considered in the light of a duty; it is an obligation of contract. It is undoubted, however, that there may be the obligation of such a duty from one person to another although there is no contract between them with regard to such duty. Two drivers meeting have no contract with each other, but under certain circumstances they have a reciprocal duty towards each other. So two ships navigating the sea. So a railway company which has contracted with one person to carry another has no contract with the person carried but has a duty towards that person. So the owner or occupier of house or land who permits a person or persons to come to his house or land has no contract with such person or persons, but has a duty towards him or them. It should be observed that the existence of a contract between two persons does not prevent the existence of the suggested duty between them also being raised by law independently of the contract, by the facts with regard to which the contract is made and to which it applies an exactly similar but a contract duty. We have not in this case to consider the circumstances in which an implied contract may arise to use ordinary care and skill to avoid danger to the safety of person or property. We have not in this case to consider the question of a fraudulent misrepresentation express or implied, which is a well recognized head of law. The questions which we have to solve in this case are—what is the proper definition of the relation between two persons other than the relation established by contract, or fraud, which imposes on the one of them a duty towards the other to observe, with regard to the person or property of such other, such ordinary care or skill as may be necessary to prevent injury to his person or property; and whether the present case falls within such definition. When two drivers or two ships are approaching each other, such a relation arises between them when they are approaching each other in such a manner that, unless they use ordinary care and skill to avoid it, there will be danger of an injurious collision between them. This relation is established in such circumstances between them, not only if it be proved that they actually know and think of this danger, but whether such proof be made or not. It is established, as it seems to me, because any one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognize that if he did not use ordinary care and skill under such circumstances there would be such danger. And every one ought by the universally recognized rules of right and wrong, to think so much with regard to the safety of others who may be jeopardized by his conduct; and if, being in such circumstances, he does not think, and in consequence neglects, or if he neglects to use ordinary care or skill, and injury ensue, the law, which takes cognizance of and enforces the rules of right and wrong, will force him to give an indemnity for the injury. In the case of a railway company carrying a passenger with whom it has not entered into the contract of carriage the law implies the duty, because it must be obvious that unless ordinary care and skill be used the personal safety of the passenger must be endangered. With regard to the condition in which an owner or occupier leaves his house or property other phraseology has been used, which it is necessary to consider. If a man opens his shop or warehouse to customers it is said that he invites them to enter, and that this invitation raises the relation between them which imposes on the inviter the duty of using reasonable care so to keep his house or warehouse that it may not endanger the person or property of the person invited. This is in a sense an accurate phrase, and as applied to the circumstances a sufficiently accurate phrase. Yet it is not accurate if the word "invitation" be used in its ordinary sense. By opening a shop you do not really invite, you do not ask A. B. to come in to buy; you intimate to him that if it pleases him to come in he will find things which you are willing to sell. So, in the case of shop, warehouse, road, or premises, the phrase has been used that if you permit a person to enter them you impose on yourself a duty not to lay a trap for him. This, again, is in a sense a true statement of the duty arising from the relation constituted by the permission to enter. It is not a statement of what causes the relation which raises the duty. What causes the relation is the permission to enter and the entry. But it is not a strictly accurate statement of the duty. To lay a trap means in ordinary language to do something with an intention. Yet it is clear that the duty extends to a danger the result of negligence without intention.

And with regard to both these phrases, though each covers the circumstances to which it is particularly applied, yet it does not cover the other set of circumstances from which an exactly similar legal liability is inferred. It follows, as it seems to me, that there must be some larger proposition which involves and covers both sets of circumstances. The logic of inductive reasoning requires that where two major propositions lead to exactly similar minor premises there must be a more remote and larger premise which embraces both of the major propositions. That, in the present consideration, is, as it seems to me, the same proposition which will cover the similar legal liability inferred in the cases of collision and carriage. The proposition which these recognized cases suggest, and which is, therefore, to be deduced from them, is that whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognize that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger. Without displacing the other propositions to which allusion has been made as applicable to the particular circumstances in respect of which they have been enunciated, this proposition includes, I think, all the recognised cases of liability. It is the only proposition which covers them all. It may, therefore, safely be affirmed to be a true proposition, unless some obvious case can be stated in which the liability must be admitted to exist, and which yet is not within this proposition. There is no such case. Let us apply this proposition to the case of one person supplying goods or machinery, or instruments or utensils, or the like, for the purpose of their being used by another person, but with whom there is no contract as to the supply. The proposition will stand thus: whenever one person supplies goods, or machinery, or the like, for the purpose of their being used by another person under such circumstances that every one of ordinary sense would, if he thought, recognise at once that unless he used ordinary care and skill with regard to the condition of the thing supplied or the mode of supplying it, there will be danger of injury to the person or property of him for whose use the thing is supplied, and who is to use it, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill as to the condition or manner of supplying such thing. And for a neglect of such ordinary care or skill whereby injury happens a legal liability arises to be enforced by an action for negligence. This includes the case of goods, &c., supplied to be used immediately by a particular person or persons or one of a class of persons, where it would be obvious to the person supplying, if he thought, that the goods would in all probability be used at once by such persons before a reasonable opportunity for discovering any defect which might exist, and where the thing supplied would be of such a nature that a neglect of ordinary care or skill as to its condition or the manner of supplying it would probably cause danger to the person or property of the person for whose use it was supplied, and who was about to use it. It would exclude a case in which the goods are supplied under circumstances in which it would be a chance by whom they would be used or whether they would be used or not, or whether they would be used before there would probably be means of observing any defect, or where the goods would be of such a nature that a want of care or skill as to their condition or the manner of supplying them would not probably produce danger of injury to person or property. The cases of vendor and purchaser and lender and hirer under contract need not be considered, as the liability arises under the contract, and not merely as a duty imposed by law, though it may not be useless to observe that it seems difficult to import the implied obligation into the contract except in cases in which if there were no contract between the parties the law would according to the rule above stated imply the duty.

Examining the rule which has been above enunciated with the cases which have been decided with regard to goods supplied for the purpose of being used by persons with whom there is no contract, the first case to be considered is inevitably Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519. It is not an easy case to act upon. It is not, it cannot be, accurately reported; the declaration is set out; the evidence is assumed to be reported: the questions left to the jury are stated. And then it is said that a motion was made to enter a nonsuit in pursuance of leave reserved on particular grounds. Those grounds do not raise the question of fraud at all, but only the question of remoteness. And although the question of fraud seems in a sense to have been left to the jury, yet no question was, according to the report, left to them as to whether the plaintiff acted on the faith of the fraudulent misrepresentation which is, nevertheless, a necessary question in a case of fraudulent misrepresentation. The report of the argument makes the object of the argument depend entirely upon an assumed motion to arrest the judgment, which raises always a discussion depending entirely on the form of the declaration, and the effect on it of a verdict, in respect of which it is assumed that all questions were left to the jury. If this was the point taken the report of the evidence and of the questions left to the jury is idle! The case was decided on the ground of the fraudulent misrepresentation as stated in the declaration. It is inferred that the defendant intended the representation to be communicated to the son. Why he should have such an intention in fact, it seems difficult to understand. His immediate object must have been to induce the father to buy and pay for the gun. It must have been wholly indifferent to him whether after the sale and payment the gun would be used or not by the son. I cannot hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the case is a wholly unsatisfactory case to act on as an authority. But taking the case to be decided on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation made hypothetically to the son, and acted upon by him, such a decision upon such a ground, in no way negatives the proposition that the action might have been supported on the ground of negligence without fraud. It seems to be a case which is within the proposition enunciated in this judgment, and in which the action might have been supported without proof of actual fraud. And this seems to be the meaning of Cleasby, B., in the observations he made on Langridge v. Levy, supra, in the case of George v. Skivington, Law Rep. 5 Ex. 1, 5. In that case the proposition laid down in this judgment is clearly adopted. The ground of the decision is that the article was, to the knowledge of the defendant, supplied for the use of the wife and for her immediate use. And certainly, if he or any one in his position had thought at all, it must have been obvious that a want of ordinary care or skill in preparing the prescription sold, would endanger the personal safety of the wife.

In Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 556, it is stated by the Lord Chief Justice that an allurement was held out to the plaintiff. And Willes, J., stated that the defendant had no right to set a trap for the plaintiff. But in the form of declaration suggested by Willes, J., on page 567, there is no mention of allurement, or invitation, or trap. The facts suggested in that form are, "that the plaintiff had license to go on the road, that he was in consequence accustomed and likely to pass along it, that the defendant knew of that custom and probability, that the defendant negligently placed slates in such a manner as to be likely to prove dangerous to persons driving along the road, that the plaintiff drove along the road, being by reason of the license lawfully on the road, and that he was injured by the obstruction." It is impossible to state a case more exactly within the proposition laid down in this judgment. In Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., Law Rep. 3 C. P. 326, the phrase is again used of invitation to the plaintiff by the defendants. Again, let it be observed that there is no objection to the phrase as applied to the case. But the real value of the phrase may not improperly be said to be, that invitation imports knowledge by the defendant of the probable use by the plaintiff of the article supplied, and therefore carries with it the relation between the parties which establishes the duty. In Indermaur v. Dames, Law Rep. 1 C. P. 274, reliance is again placed upon a supposed invitation of the plaintiff by the defendant. But again, it is hardly possible to state facts which bring a case more completely within the definition of the present judgment. In Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109, it was held that there was no duty cast upon the defendant with regard to the plaintiff. The case was decided on what was equivalent to a general demurrer to the declaration. And the declaration does not seem to shew that the defendant, if he had thought about it, must have known, or ought to have known, that the coach would be necessarily or probably driven by the plaintiff, or by any class of which he could be said to be one, or that it would be so driven within any time which would make it probable that the defect would not be observed. The declaration relied too much on contracts entered into with other persons than the plaintiff. The facts alleged did not bring the case within the proposition herein enunciated. It was an attempt to establish a duty towards all the world. The case was decided on the ground of remoteness. And it is as to too great a remoteness that the observation of Lord Abinger is pointed, when he says that the doctrine of Langridge v. Levy, supra, is not to be extended. In Francis v. Cockrell, Law Rep. 5 Q. B. 184, at page 501, the decision is put by some of the judges on an implied contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. But Cleasby, B. (page 515), puts it upon the duty raised by the knowledge of the defendant that the stand was to be used immediately by persons of whom the plaintiff was one. In other words he acts upon the rule above laid down. In Collis v. Selden, Law Rep. 3 C. P. 495, it was held that the declaration disclosed no duty. And obviously, the declaration was too uncertain. There is nothing to shew that the defendant knew more of the probability of the plaintiff rather than any other of the public being near the chandelier. There is nothing to shew that the plaintiff was more likely to be in the public-house than any other member of the public. There is nothing to shew how soon after the hanging of the chandelier any one might be expected or permitted to enter the room in which it was. The facts stated do not bring it within the rule. There is an American case: Thomas and Wife, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, cited in Mr. Horace Smith's Treatise on the Law of Negligence, p. 88, note (t), which goes a very long way. I doubt whether it does not go too far. In Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Ex. 761, a lamp was sold to the plaintiff to be used by the wife. The jury were not satisfied that the defendant knew of the defect in the lamp. If he did, there was fraud; if he did not, there seems to have been no evidence of negligence. If there was fraud, the case was more than within the rule. If there was no fraud, the case was not brought by other circumstances within the rule. In Gautret v. Egerton, Law Rep. 2 C. P. 371, at p. 374, the declaration was held by Willes, J., to be bad on demurrer, because it did not shew that the defendant had any reason to suppose that persons going to the docks would not have ample means of seeing the holes and cuttings relied on. He does not say there must be fraud in order to support the action. He says there must be something like fraud. He says: "Every man is bound not wilfully to deceive others." And then in the alternative, he says: "or to do any act which may place them in danger." There seems to be no case in conflict with the rule above deduced from well admitted cases. I am, therefore, of opinion that it is a good, safe, and just rule.

I cannot conceive that if the facts were proved which would make out the proposition I have enunciated, the law can be that there would be no liability. Unless that be true, the proposition must be true. If it be the rule the present case is clearly within it. This case is also, I agree, within that which seems to me to be a minor proposition—namely, the proposition which has been often acted upon, that there was in a sense, an invitation of the plaintiff by the defendant, to use the stage. The appeal must, in my opinion, be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff.

COTTON, L. J. Bowen, L. J., concurs in the judgment I am about to read.

In this case the defendant was the owner of a dock for the repair of ships, and provided for use in the dock the stages necessary to enable the outside of the ship to be painted while in the dock, and the stages which were to be used only in the dock were appliances provided by the dock owner as appurtenant to the dock and its use. After the stage was handed over to the shipowner it no longer remained under the control of the dock owner. But when ships were received into the dock for repair and provided with stages for the work on the ships which was to be executed there, all those who came to the vessels for the purpose of painting and otherwise repairing them were there for business in which the dock owner was interested, and they, in my opinion, must be considered as invited by the dock owner to use the dock and all appliances provided by the dock owner as incident to the use of the dock. To these persons, in my opinion, the dock owner was under an obligation to take reasonable care that at the time the appliances provided for immediate use in the dock were provided by him they were in a fit state to be used—that is, in such a state as not to expose those who might use them for the repair of the ship to any danger or risk not necessarily incident to the service in which they are employed. That this obligation exists as regards articles of which the control remains with the dock owner was decided in Indermaur v. Dames, supra, and in Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., supra, the same principle was acted on. I think that the same duty must exist as to things supplied by the dock owner for immediate use in the dock, of which the control is not retained by the dock owner, to the extent of using reasonable care as to the state of the articles when delivered by him to the ship under repair for immediate use in relation to the repairs. For any neglect of those having control of the ship and the appliances he would not be liable, and to establish his liability it must be proved that the defect which caused the accident existed at the time when the article was supplied by the dock owner. * * *

This decides this appeal in favour of the plaintiff, and I am unwilling to concur with the Master of the Rolls in laying down unnecessarily the larger principle which he entertains, inasmuch as there are many cases in which the principle was impliedly negatived.

Take for instance the case of Langridge v. Levy, supra, to which the principle if it existed would have applied. But the judges who decided that case based their judgment on the fraudulent representation made to the father of the plaintiff by the defendant. In other cases where the decision has been referred to judges have treated fraud as the ground of the decision, as was done by Coleridge, J., in Blackmore v. Bristol and Exeter Ry. Co., supra; and in Collis v. Selden, supra, Willes, J., says that the judgment in Langridge v. Levy, supra, was based on the fraud of the defendant. This impliedly negatives the existence of the larger general principle which is relied on, and the decisions in Collis v. Selden, supra, and in Longmeid v. Holliday, supra (in each of which the plaintiff failed), are in my opinion at variance with the principle contended for. The case of George v. Skivington, supra, and especially what is said by Cleasby, B., in giving judgment in that case seem to support the existence of the general principle. But it is not in terms laid down that any such principle exists, and that case was decided by Cleasby, B., on the ground that the negligence of the defendant which was his own personal negligence was equivalent, for the purposes of that action, to fraud on which (as he said) the decision in Langridge v. Levy, supra, was based.

In declining to concur in laying down the principle enunciated by the Master of the Rolls, I in no way intimate any doubt as to the principle that any one who leaves a dangerous instrument, as a gun, in such a way as to cause danger, or who without due warning supplies to others for use an instrument or thing which to his knowledge, from its construction or otherwise, is in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to the use of such an instrument or thing, is liable for injury caused to others by reason of his negligent act.

For the reasons stated I agree that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, though I do not entirely concur with the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls.

Judgment reversed.[75]

HUSET v. J. I. CASE THRESHING MACH. CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Eighth Circuit, 1903. 57 C. C. A. 237, 120 Fed. 865, 61 L. R. A. 303.)

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. This writ of error was sued out to reverse a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action against the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company. These are the facts which the complaint discloses:

The defendant was a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of threshing rigs, which consisted of an engine, a separator, a band-cutter, and self-feeder. The band-cutter and self-feeder consisted of a series of fast revolving knives covered with a sheet-iron covering and a frame designed to fit into the front of the separator in which the cylinder was located. The cylinder was made of iron and steel about 48 inches in length and 20 inches in diameter, set with rows of steel teeth and spikes projecting about two inches, and so placed as to pass between similar teeth in a concave frame in front of and under the cylinder. When the machine was in operation, this cylinder revolved at a very high rate of speed with great force, and threshed the grain. The self-feeder and band-cutter was designed to be fastened to the separator, and its sheet-iron covering fitted onto the front of the separator just above and over the front part of the cylinder so as to cover the cylinder completely. The object and design of the defendant in placing this covering over the cylinder was that it should be used by any person who might operate the machine to walk upon in passing from the top of the main part of the thresher to the self-feeder. This sheet-iron covering was made without any support, and was so pliable and easily bent that it was incapable of sustaining the least weight, and would necessarily bend and collapse when subjected to the weight of any man who might walk or step upon it. It was necessary for the operator to walk over the covering of the cylinder in operating the machine. This machine, covered in this way, was imminently and necessarily dangerous to the life and limbs of those who operated it, and it was well known to be thus dangerous by the defendant when it shipped the same and supplied it to the purchaser, J. H. Pifer; but this dangerous condition was of such a nature as not to be readily discovered by persons engaged in operating the machine or working thereon, but was concealed, and thereby rendered more dangerous still. On August 25, 1901, the defendant sold this threshing outfit to J. H. Pifer, who started to operate it on the next day, and employed the plaintiff, O. S. Huset, as a laborer to assist him in running it. It became the duty of the plaintiff to walk upon the top of the machine over the cylinder while it was in operation in order to superintend the pitching of bundles into the self-feeder, to prevent its clogging, and to oil the bearings of the parts of the cylinder and band-cutter. When he walked upon the covering of the cylinder, this covering sank so as to come in contact with the cylinder, and the plaintiff's right foot was caught thereby, and his foot and leg were drawn into it and crushed to a point above the knee joint, so that it was necessary to amputate the leg above the knee.

The demurrer to this complaint was upon the ground that the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff, who was a stranger to the transaction between the defendant, the manufacturer and vendor of the threshing machine, and the vendee Pifer. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the action.

SANBORN, Circuit Judge (after stating the case). Is a manufacturer or vendor of an article or machine which he knows, when he sells it, to be imminently dangerous, by reason of a concealed defect therein, to the life and limbs of any one who shall use it for the purpose for which it was made and intended, liable to a stranger to the contract of sale for an injury which he sustains from the concealed defect while he is lawfully applying the article or machine to its intended use?

The argument of this question has traversed the whole field in which the liability of contractors, manufacturers, and vendors to strangers to their contracts for negligence in the construction or sale of their articles has been contested. The decisions which have been cited are not entirely harmonious, and it is impossible to reconcile all of them with any established rule of law. And yet the underlying principle of the law of negligence, that it is the duty of every one to so act himself and to so use his property as to do no unnecessary damage to his neighbors, leads us fairly through the maze. With this fundamental principle in mind, if we contemplate the familiar rules that every one is liable for the natural and probable effects of his acts; that negligence is a breach of a duty; that an injury that is the natural and probable consequence of an act of negligence is actionable, while one that could not have been foreseen or reasonably anticipated as the probable effect of such an act is not actionable, because the act of negligence in such a case is the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the injury; and that, for the same reason, an injury is not actionable which would not have resulted from an act of negligence except from the interposition of an independent cause (Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha R. Co. v. Elliott, 55 Fed. 949, 5 C. C. A. 347, 20 L. R. A. 582)—nearly all the decisions upon this subject range themselves along symmetrical lines, and establish rational rules of the law of negligence consistent with the basic principles upon which it rests.

Actions for negligence are for breaches of duty. Actions on contracts are for breaches of agreements. Hence the limits of liability for negligence are not the limits of liability for breaches of contracts, and actions for negligence often accrue where actions upon contracts do not arise, and vice versa. It is a rational and fair deduction from the rules to which brief reference has been made that one who makes or sells a machine, a building, a tool, or an article of merchandise designed and fitted for a specific use is liable to the person who, in the natural course of events, uses it for the purpose for which it was made or sold, for an injury which is the natural and probable consequence of the negligence of the manufacturer or vendor in its construction or sale. But when a contractor builds a house or a bridge, or a manufacturer constructs a car or a carriage, for the owner thereof, under a special contract with him, an injury to any other person than the owner for whom the article is built and to whom it is delivered cannot ordinarily be foreseen or reasonably anticipated as the probable result of the negligence in its construction. So, when a manufacturer sells articles to the wholesale or retail dealers, or to those who are to use them, injury to third persons is not generally the natural or probable effect of negligence in their manufacture, because (1) such a result cannot ordinarily be reasonably anticipated, and because (2) an independent cause—the responsible human agency of the purchaser—without which the injury to the third person would not occur, intervenes, and, as Wharton says, "insulates" the negligence of the manufacturer from the injury to the third person. Wharton on Law of Negligence (2d Ed.) § 134. For the reason that in the cases of the character which have been mentioned the natural and probable effect of the negligence of the contractor or manufacturer will generally be limited to the party for whom the article is constructed, or to whom it is sold, and, perhaps more than all this, for the reason that a wise and conservative public policy has impressed the courts with the view that there must be a fixed and definite limitation to the liability of manufacturers and vendors for negligence in the construction and sale of complicated machines and structures which are to be operated or used by the intelligent and the ignorant, the skillful and the incompetent, the watchful and the careless, parties that cannot be known to the manufacturers or vendors, and who use the articles all over the country hundreds of miles distant from the place of their manufacture or original sale, a general rule has been adopted and has become established by repeated decisions of the courts of England and of this country that in these cases the liability of the contractor or manufacturer for negligence in the construction or sale of the articles which he makes or vends is limited to the persons to whom he is liable under his contracts of construction or sale. The limits of the liability for negligence and for breaches of contract in cases of this character are held to be identical. The general rule is that a contractor, manufacturer, or vendor is not liable to third parties who have no contractual relations with him for negligence in the construction, manufacture, or sale of the articles he handles. In these cases third parties, without any fault on their part, were injured by the negligence of the manufacturer, vendor, or furnisher of the following articles, while the parties thus injured were innocently using them for the purposes for which they were made or furnished, and the courts held that there could be no recovery, because the makers, vendors, or furnishers owed no duty to strangers to their contracts of construction, sale, or furnishing: A stagecoach, Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109; a leaky lamp, Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 764, 765; a defective chain furnished one to lead stone, Blakemore v. Ry. Co., 8 El. & Bl. 1035; an improperly hung chandelier, Collis v. Selden, L. R. 3 C. P. 495, 497; an attorney's certificate of title, Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 204, 25 L. Ed. 621; a defective valve in an oil car, Goodlander v. Standard Oil Co., 63 Fed. 401, 406, 11 C. C. A. 253, 259, 27 L. R. A. 583; a porch on a hotel, Curtin v. Somerset, 140 Pa. 70, 21 Atl. 244, 12 L. R. A. 322, 23 Am. St. Rep. 220; a defective side saddle, Bragdon v. Perkins-Campbell Co., 87 Fed. 109, 30 C. C. A. 567, 66 L. R. defective boiler, Losee v. Clute, 51 N. Y. 494, 10 Am. Rep. 638; a defective cylinder in a threshing machine, Heizer v. Kingsland & Douglass Mfg. Co., 110 Mo. 605, 615, 617, 19 S. W. 630, 15 L. R. A. 821, 33 Am. St. Rep. 481; a defective wall which fell on a pedestrian, Daugherty v. Herzog, 145 Ind. 255, 44 N. E. 457, 32 L. R. A. 837, 57 Am. St. Rep. 204; a defective rope on a derrick, Burke v. Refining Co., 11 Hun (N. Y.) 354; a defective shelf for a workman to stand upon in placing ice in a box, Swan v. Jackson, 55 Hun, 194, 7 N. Y. Supp. 821; a defective hoisting rope of an elevator, Barrett v. Mfg. Co., 31 N. Y. Super. Ct. 545; a runaway horse, Carter v. Harden, 78 Me. 528, 7 Atl. 392; a defective hook holding a heavy weight in a drop press, McCaffrey v. Mfg. Co., 23 R. I. 381, 50 Atl. 651, 55 L. R. A. 822; a defective bridge, Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, 46 N. J. Law, 19; shelves in a dry goods store, whose fall injured a customer, Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767; a staging erected by a contractor for the use of his employés, Maguire v. Magee (Pa.) 13 Atl. 551; defective wheels, J. I. Case Plow Works v. Niles & Scott Co., 90 Wis. 590, 63 N. W. 1013.

In the leading case of Winterbottom v. Wright this rule is placed upon the ground of public policy, upon the ground that there would be no end of litigation if contractors and manufacturers were to be held liable to third persons for every act of negligence in the construction of the articles or machines they make after the parties to whom they have sold them have received and accepted them. In that case the defendant had made a contract with the Postmaster General to provide and keep in repair the stagecoach used to convey the mail from Hartford to Holyhead. The coach broke down, overturned, and injured the driver, who sued the contractor for the injury resulting from his negligence. Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "There is no privity of contract between these parties; and, if the plaintiff can sue, every passenger, or even any person passing along the road, who was injured by the upsetting of the coach, might bring a similar action. Unless we confine the operation of such contracts as this to the parties who entered into them, the most absurd and outrageous consequences, to which I can see no limit, would ensue." Baron Alderson said: "I am of the same opinion. The contract in this case was made with the Postmaster General alone; and the case is just the same as if he had come to the defendant and ordered a carriage, and handed it at once over to Atkinson. If we were to hold that the plaintiff could sue in such a case, there is no point at which such actions would stop. The only safe rule is to confine the right to recover to those who enter into the contract. If we go one step beyond that, there is no reason why we should not go fifty."

The views expressed by the judges in this case have prevailed in England and in the United States, with the exception of two decisions which are in conflict with the leading case and with all the decisions to which reference has been made. Those cases are Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311, in which Smith, a painter, employed Stevenson, a contractor, to build a scaffold 90 feet in height, for the express purpose of enabling the painter's workmen to stand upon it to paint the interior of the dome of a building, and the Court of Appeals of New York held that Stevenson was liable to a workman of Smith, the painter, who was injured by a fall, caused by the negligence of Stevenson in the construction of the scaffold upon which he was working; and Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co., 49 Minn. 331, 51 N. W. 1103, 15 L. R. A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, in which a painter purchased of a manufacturer a stepladder, and one of the painter's employés, who was injured by the breaking of a step caused by the negligence of the manufacturer, was permitted to recover of the latter for the injuries he had sustained. The decision in Devlin v. Smith may, perhaps, be sustained on the ground that the workmen of Smith were the real parties in interest in the contract, since Stevenson was employed and expressly agreed to construct the scaffold for their use. But the case of Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co. is in direct conflict with the side saddle case, Bragdon v. Perkins-Campbell Co., 87 Fed. 109, 30 C. C. A. 567, 66 L. R. A. 924; the porch case, Curtin v. Somerset, 140 Pa. 70, 21 Atl. 244, 12 L. R. A. 322, 23 Am. St. Rep. 220; the defective cylinder case, Heizer v. Kingsland & Douglass Mfg. Co., 110 Mo. 617, 19 S. W. 630, 15 L. R. A. 821, 33 Am. St. Rep. 481; the defective hook case, McCaffrey v. Mfg. Co., 23 R. I. 381, 50 Atl. 651, 55 L. R. A. 822; and with the general rule upon which all these cases stand.

It is, perhaps, more remarkable that the current of decisions throughout all the courts of England and the United States should be so uniform and conclusive in support of this rule, and that there should, in the multitude of opinions, be but one or two in conflict with it, than it is that such sporadic cases should be found. They are insufficient in themselves, or in the reasoning they contain, to overthrow or shake the established rule which prevails throughout the English speaking nations.

But while this general rule is both established and settled, there are, as is usually the case, exceptions to it as well defined and settled as the rule itself. There are three exceptions to this rule.

The first is that an act of negligence of a manufacturer or vendor which is imminently dangerous to the life or health of mankind, and which is committed in the preparation or sale of an article intended to preserve, destroy, or affect human life, is actionable by third parties who suffer from the negligence. Dixon v. Bell, 5 Maule & Sel. 198; Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455; Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 8 Am. Rep. 298; Elkins v. McKean, 79 Pa. 493, 502; Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 1 N. E. 154, 52 Am. Rep. 715; Peters v. Johnson, 50 W. Va. 644, 41 S. E. 190, 191, 57 L. R. A. 428, 88 Am. St. Rep. 909. The leading case upon this subject is Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455. A dealer in drugs sold to a druggist a jar of belladonna, a deadly poison, and labeled it "Extract of Dandelion." The druggist filled a prescription of extract of dandelion, prepared by a physician for his patient. The patient took the prescription thus filled, and recovered of the wholesale dealer for the injuries she sustained. In Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 8 Am. Rep. 298, a recovery was had by a third party for the sale of laudanum as rhubarb; in Bishop v. Weber, for the furnishing of poisonous food for wholesome food; in Peters v. Johnson, for the sale of saltpetre for epsom salts; and in Dixon v. Bell, for placing a loaded gun in the hands of a child. In all these cases of sale the natural and probable result of the act of negligence—nay, the inevitable result of it—was not an injury to the party to whom the sales were made, but to those who, after the purchasers had disposed of the articles, should consume them. Hence these cases stand upon two well-established principles of law: (1) That every one is bound to avoid acts or omissions imminently dangerous to the lives of others, and (2) that an injury which is the natural and probable result of an act of negligence is actionable. It was the natural and probable result of the negligence in these cases that the vendees would not suffer, but that those who subsequently purchased the deleterious articles would sustain the injuries resulting from the negligence of the manufacturers or dealers who furnished them.

The second exception is that an owner's act of negligence which causes injury to one who is invited by him to use his defective appliance upon the owner's premises may form the basis of an action against the owner. Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co., 56 N. Y. 124, 15 Am. Rep. 387; Bright v. Barnett & Record Co., 88 Wis. 299, 60 N. W. 418, 420, 26 L. R. A. 524; Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503; Roddy v. Railway Co., 104 Mo. 234, 241, 15 S. W. 1112, 12 L. R. A. 746, 24 Am. St. Rep. 333. In Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co., 56 N. Y. 124, 15 Am. Rep. 387, the owner of a building employed Osborn & Martin to construct a cornice, and agreed with them to furnish a scaffold upon which their men could perform the work. He furnished the scaffold, and one of the employés of the contractors was injured by the negligence of the owner in constructing the scaffold. The court held that the act of the owner was an implied invitation to the employés of Osborn & Martin to use the scaffold, and imposed upon him a liability for negligence in its erection. The other cases cited to this exception are of a similar character.

The third exception to the rule is that one who sells or delivers an article which he knows to be imminently dangerous to life or limb to another without notice of its qualities is liable to any person who suffers an injury therefrom which might have been reasonably anticipated, whether there were any contractual relations between the parties or not. Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519, 4 M. & W. 337; Wellington v. Oil Co., 104 Mass. 64, 67; Lewis v. Terry, 111 Cal. 39, 43 Pac. 398, 31 L. R. A. 220, 52 Am. St. Rep. 146. In Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519, a dealer sold a gun to the father for the use of the son, and represented that it was a safe gun, and made by one Nock. It was not made by Nock, was a defective gun, and when the son discharged it, it exploded and injured him. The son was permitted to recover, because the defendant had knowingly sold the gun to the father for the purpose of being used by the plaintiff by loading and discharging it, and had knowingly made a false warranty that this might be safely done, and the plaintiff, on the faith of that warranty, and believing it to be true, had used the gun, and sustained the damages. The court said in conclusion: "We therefore think that, as there is fraud, and damage, the result of that fraud, not from an act remote and consequential, but one contemplated by the defendant at the time as one of its results, the party guilty of the fraud is responsible to the party injured." This case was affirmed in 4 M. & W. 337, on the ground that the sale of the gun to the father for the use of the son with the knowledge that it was not as represented was a fraud, which entitled the son to recover the damages he had sustained.

In Wellington v. Oil Co., the defendants knowingly sold to one Chase, a retail dealer, to be sold by him to his customers as oil, naphtha, a dangerous and explosive liquid. Chase sold the naphtha as oil, the plaintiff used it in a lamp for illuminating purposes, it ignited and exploded, and he recovered of the wholesale dealer. Judge Gray, later Mr. Justice Gray of the Supreme Court, said: "It is well settled that a man who delivers an article, which he knows to be dangerous or noxious, to another person, without notice of its nature and qualities, is liable for an injury which may reasonably be contemplated as likely to result, and which does in fact result, therefrom, to that person or any other, who is not himself in fault. Thus a person who delivers a carboy, which he knows to contain nitric acid, to a carrier, without informing him of the nature of its contents, is liable for an injury occasioned by the leaking out of the acid upon another carrier, to whom it is delivered by the first in the ordinary course of business, to be carried to its destination. Farrant v. Barnes, 11 C. B. (N. S.) 553. So a chemist who sells a bottle of liquid, made up of ingredients known only to himself, representing it to be fit to be used for washing the hair, and knowing that it is to be used by the purchaser's wife, is liable for an injury occasioned to her by using it for washing her hair. George v. Skivington, Law Rep. 5 Ex. 1."

In Lewis v. Terry, 111 Cal. 39, 43 Pac. 398, 31 L. R. A. 220, 52 Am. St. Rep. 146, a dealer, knowing a folding bed to be defective and unsafe, sold it to a Mr. Apperson without informing him of the fact. His wife suffered a broken arm and other severe injuries from the negligence of the dealer in the sale of the bed, and recovered of him the damages she sustained.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, in Heizer v. Kingsland & Douglass Mfg. Co., in which they held that the manufacturer was not liable to a third person for negligence in the construction of the cylinder of a threshing machine, which burst and injured him, said: "Had the defendant sold this machine to Ellis, knowing that the cyclinder was defective, and for that reason dangerous, without informing him of the defect, then the defendant would be liable even to third persons not themselves in fault. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (4th Ed.) § 117."

Turning now to the case in hand, it is no longer difficult to dispose of it. The allegations of the complaint are that the defendant prepared a covering for the cylinder of the threshing machine, which was customarily and necessarily used by those who operated it to walk upon, and which was so incapable of sustaining the least weight that it would bend and collapse whenever any one stepped upon it; that it concealed this defective and dangerous condition of the threshing rig so that it could not be readily discovered by persons engaged in operating or working upon it; that it knew that the machine was in this imminently dangerous condition when it shipped and supplied it to the employer of the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff has sustained serious injury through this defect in its construction. The case falls fairly within the third exception. It portrays a negligence imminently dangerous to the lives and limbs of those who should use the machine, a machine imminently dangerous to the lives and limbs of all who should undertake to operate it, a concealment of this dangerous condition, a knowledge of the defendant when it was shipped and supplied to the employer of the plaintiff that the rig was imminently dangerous to all who should use it for the purpose for which it was made and sold, and consequent damage to the plaintiff. It falls directly within the rule stated by Mr. Justice Gray that when one delivers an article, which he knows to be dangerous to another person, without notice of its nature and qualities, he is liable for an injury which may be reasonably contemplated as likely to result, and which does in fact result therefrom, to that person or to any other who is not himself in fault. The natural, probable, and inevitable result of the negligence portrayed by this complaint in delivering this machine when it was known to be in a condition so imminently dangerous to the lives and limbs of those who should undertake to use it for the purpose for which it was constructed was the death, or loss of one or more of the limbs, of some of the operators. It is perhaps improbable that the defendant was possessed of the knowledge of the imminently dangerous character of this threshing machine when it delivered it, and that upon the trial of the case it will be found to fall under the general rule which has been announced in an earlier part of this opinion. But upon the facts alleged in this complaint, the act of delivering it to the purchaser with a knowledge and a concealment of its dangerous condition was so flagrant a disregard of the rule that one is bound to avoid any act imminently dangerous to the lives and health of his fellows that it forms the basis of a good cause of action in favor of any one who sustained injury therefrom.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause must be remanded to the court below for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views expressed in this opinion.

EARL v. LUBBOCK.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1905] 1 K. B. 253.)

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court affirming an order of the judge of the Lambeth County Court.

The action was brought in the county court to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, and alleged to be due to the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff was a driver in the employment of a firm who owned a number of vans. The defendant was a master wheelwright, and he entered into a contract with the firm to keep their vans in good and substantial repair. In pursuance of his contract the defendant sent his men frequently to the premises of the firm to examine into the condition of the vans and to do the necessary repairs. On one occasion, upon the complaint of the plaintiff that the van he drove ran heavily, one of the defendant's men took off the wheel and oiled and replaced it, but, being unable to replace the cap of the axle, he nailed a piece of zinc over the box of the wheel to keep the cap from falling off. A fortnight later the wheel was again attended to by one of the defendant's men. After this had been done and on the same day the plaintiff while driving the van was thrown to the ground by reason of the wheel coming off, and he sustained the injuries in respect of which he sued. The allegation in the particulars of claim was that the defendant's man negligently failed to properly inspect the wheel and repair its defective condition, and that the repairs to the wheel were done in a negligent and unskillful manner, whereby the accident to the plaintiff happened. The action was tried before the judge and a jury, and at the close of the plaintiff's case it was submitted that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, and that even if there was evidence of negligence the defendant was not liable in the action as he owed no duty to the plaintiff, his only duty being to the firm with whom he had contracted. Upon this latter ground the county court judge entered judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed, and a Divisional Court, consisting of Lord Alverstone, C. J., Wills, J., and Kennedy, J., affirmed the decision of the county court judge.

The plaintiff appealed.

Arthur Powell, K. C., and W. M. Thompson, for the plaintiff. The case for the plaintiff does not rest upon contract or upon negligence of omission, but on the negligence of the defendant in an act done by his servant in the course of his employment. * * * This case comes within the conditions as to liability stated by Cotton, L. J., and agreed to by Bowen, L. J., in Heaven v. Pender (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 503, and it is not necessary to rely on the broader view taken by Lord Esher, M. R., in that case, though that would certainly cover the present case. * * *

COLLINS, M. R. * * * In my opinion this case is concluded by the authority of Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109, the circumstances of which are indistinguishable from those of the present case, and that decision, since the year 1842, in which it was given, has stood the test of repeated discussion. Under these circumstances it would, in my opinion, be a waste of time to go through the numerous cases that have been cited, for the principles laid down by Lord Abinger, C. B., in the case that I have mentioned appear to me to be based upon sound reasoning, and to be conclusive in this case.[76] * * * In my judgment no question arises here as to the delivery of a dangerous thing, which is one of the circumstances that can give rise to a cause of action in a person who is not a party to the contract. Such a case is dealt with by Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Ex. 761, at page 767, thus: "And it may be the same"—that is, responsibility may arise —"when anyone delivers to another without notice an instrument in its nature dangerous, or under particular circumstances, as a loaded gun which he himself loaded, and that other person to whom it is delivered is injured thereby, or if he places it in a situation easily accessible to a third person, who sustains damage from it. A very strong case to that effect is Dixon v. Bell (1816) 5 M. & S. 198. But it would be going too far to say that so much care is required in the ordinary intercourse of life between one individual and another, that if a machine not in its nature dangerous—a carriage, for instance—but which might become so by a latent defect entirely unknown, although discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care, should be lent or given by one person, even by the person who manufactured it, to another the former should be answerable to the latter for a subsequent damage accruing by the use of it." Here there is the case of a carriage which, so far as the evidence goes, was not visibly out of repair. Apparently the wheel required oiling, and for that purpose the cap was removed, and, as it was defective, a piece of zinc was nailed onto the wheel. That had nothing to do with the accident, but was done to supply a better means of oiling the wheel; and, in my opinion, the van cannot fall within the category of dangerous articles to which Parke, B., alludes.

[76] The learned Master of the Rolls here quoted the remarks of Lord Abinger, C. B., in Winterbottom v. Wright (see ante, p. 1043), as showing the view taken by the Court and laying down a principle which was conclusive in the case at bar.

One other ground was suggested upon which the defendant might be held to be liable. That is the principle affirmed in Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503, that where a person having a common interest with another invites that person to use certain premises or chattels, the person so inviting incurs a responsibility with regard to the condition of the premises or of the chattels, as the case may be. Nothing of that kind can be set up in this case. It was hardly contended that such considerations were applicable to this case; but it was said that it came within the dictum enunciated by Lord Esher in his judgment, as to the duty to use ordinary care and skill to avoid a danger to another that a person of ordinary sense would recognize as likely to arise if he did not use that ordinary care and skill in his own conduct. That, however, was not a decision of the Court, and it was subsequently qualified and explained by Lord Esher himself. See Le Lievre v. Gould, [1893] 1 Q. B. 491, at page 497. I have pointed out what was the judgment of the Court, and the plaintiff has entirely failed to bring his case within the principle of that judgment, and this appeal must fail.

STIRLING, L. J. I am of the same opinion. In order to succeed in this action the plaintiff must bring his case within the proposition enunciated by Cotton, L. J., and agreed to by Bowen, L. J., in Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503, at page 517, to the effect that "any one who leaves a dangerous instrument, as a gun, in such a way as to cause danger, or who without due warning supplies to others for use an instrument or thing which to his knowledge, from its construction or otherwise, is in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to the use of such an instrument or thing, is liable for injury caused to others by reason of his negligent act." That passage was cited to the county court judge, and was relied on in this Court by counsel for the plaintiff. As to the first part of that proposition, with regard to a dangerous instrument, I take it that the reference is to a thing dangerous in itself, and that is shewn by the illustration that is given, and also by what is stated in the second part of the proposition which treats of an instrument or thing in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to its use. I think, therefore, that the van which the plaintiff was driving does not fall within the first branch of the sentence that I have quoted, and that to succeed the plaintiff must bring the case within the second part. In that case he must adduce evidence to shew that to the knowledge of the defendant the van was in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to its use. It appears to me that the plaintiff was not in a position to do this, and consequently he failed in establishing the liability of the defendant, and this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The argument of counsel for the plaintiff was that the defendant's servants had been negligent in the performance of the contract with the owners of the van, and that it followed as a matter of law that anyone in their employment, or, indeed, anyone else who sustained an injury traceable to that negligence, had a cause of action against the defendant. It is impossible to accept such a wide proposition, and, indeed, it is difficult to see how, if it were the law, trade could be carried on. No prudent man would contract to make or repair what the employer intended to permit others to use in the way of his trade. There was in this case no evidence before the learned county court judge that this van was in a state that made the defendant liable under any of the conditions of liability that have been laid down in the cases to which reference has been made. Further, there was no evidence that the plaintiff was invited by the defendant to use the van. I concur in thinking that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BATES v. BATEY & CO., Limited.

(King's Bench Division. [1913] 3 K. B. 351.)

The defendants manufactured ginger beer, which they put into bottles bought from another firm. They sold this bottled ginger beer to a shopkeeper from whom the plaintiff, a twelve year old boy, bought one bottle. Because of a defect in the bottle it burst when the plaintiff was opening it, and injured him so seriously that he lost the sight of one eye.

The plaintiff claims that his injury was caused by negligence on the part of the defendants in that it was their duty to take care that the bottle of ginger beer sent out by them for sale should be fit and proper and safe to be handled by a person opening it, and that they had sent the bottle out in such a defective condition that it was not strong enough for its purpose.

The jury found (1) that there was a defect in the bottle, which defect caused the accident; (2) that the defect was not a latent defect which could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care and skill; and (3) that the defect was owing to the negligence of the defendants. The damages for the injury to the boy were assessed at £275.

It was agreed that, upon further consideration, the learned judge should draw any further inferences of fact. He held that a bottle of ginger beer was not in itself a dangerous thing, and that, even if it was, the shopkeeper must have known that it was a dangerous thing; that the bottle of ginger beer, inasmuch as the bottle was defective, was a dangerous thing; but that the defendants did not know of the defect although by the exercise of reasonable care they could have discovered it.

HORRIDGE, J. * * * The law on this question is to be found in the judgment of Parke, B., in Longmeid v. Holliday (1851) 6 Ex. 761, 768, where he says: "But it would be going much too far to say that so much care is required in the ordinary intercourse of life between one individual and another that if a machine, not in its nature dangerous, a carriage for instance, but which might become so by a latent defect entirely unknown, although discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care, should be lent or given by one person, even by the person who manufactured it, to another, the former should be answerable to the latter for a subsequent damage accruing by the use of it." This passage is quoted with approval by Collins, M. R., in the case of Earl v. Lubbock, [1905] 1 K. B. 253, 257. In the same case Stirling, L. J., Ibid. at p. 258, after quoting a passage from the judgment of Cotton and Bowen, L. JJ., in Heaven v. Pender (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 503, 517, to the effect "that any one who leaves a dangerous instrument, as a gun, in such a way as to cause danger, or who without due warning supplies to others for use an instrument or thing which to his knowledge, from its construction or otherwise, is in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to the use of such an instrument or thing, is liable for injury caused to others by reason of his negligent act," goes on to say with regard to these words: "As to the first part of that proposition, with regard to a dangerous instrument, I take it that the reference is to a thing dangerous in itself, and that is shewn by the illustration that is given, and also by what is stated in the second part of the proposition which treats of an instrument or thing in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to its use. I think, therefore, that the van which the plaintiff was driving does not fall within the first branch of the sentence that I have quoted, and that to succeed the plaintiff must bring the case within the second part. In that case he must adduce evidence to shew that to the knowledge of the defendant the van was in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to its use. It appears to me that the plaintiff was not in a position to do this, and consequently he failed in establishing the liability of the defendant."

The negligence there alleged was a failure to properly inspect the wheel and to report its defective condition. If, however, the failure to obtain knowledge which could by reasonable care have been obtained is equivalent to knowledge, it seems to me the Court of Appeal would have sent that case down to the county court judge to be heard by him on the question of whether or not the defendant must be taken to have knowledge because he failed to make proper use of the means of discovery at his disposal; and I think this case is a direct decision of the Court of Appeal, following Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Ex. 761, that even where the defect is discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care the defendant is not liable, apart from contract, unless he in fact had actual knowledge.

My greatest difficulty has been that, in White v. Steadman, [1913] 3 K. B. 340, Lush, J., held, in the case of a vicious horse, that a person who has the means of knowledge and only does not know that the animal or chattel which he supplies is dangerous because he does not take ordinary care to avail himself of his opportunity of knowledge is in precisely the same position as the person who knows. I do not think that Lush, J., in that case can have intended to decide that, where a thing not dangerous in itself becomes dangerous through a defect occasioned by breach of contract in its manufacture or delivery, the person handing it over must be held liable to a third party because, although he did not know, he might by the exercise of reasonable care have known its condition. I think this must be so because he was a party to the decision of Blacker v. Lake, 106 L. T. 533, 537,—and I find that in that case Hamilton, J., lays down this proposition: "In the present case all that can be said is that the defendants did not know that their lamp was not perfectly safe and had no reason to believe that it was not so, in the sense that no one had drawn their attention to the fact, but that had they been wiser men or more experienced engineers they would then have known what the plaintiff's experts say that they ought to have known."

In any case the decision in White v. Steadman, [1913] 3 K. B. 340, was not a decision with regard to a defect arising from breach of contract, but had reference to a vicious horse. I express no opinion with regard to that decision, but I think that the judgment of Parke, B., in Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Ex. 761, of Cotton and Bowen, L. JJ., in Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503, of Stirling, L. J., in Earl v. Lubbock, [1905] 1 K. B. 253, and of Hamilton, J., in Blacker v. Lake, 106 L. T. 533, 537 make it clear that in this case the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. I have not felt myself bound by George v. Skivington (1869) L. R. 5 Ex. 1, as that case was not followed by Hamilton and Lush, JJ., in Blacker v. Lake, 106 L. T. 533, 537.

I give judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for defendants.[77]

MAZETTI et al. v. ARMOUR & CO. et al.

CHADWICK, J. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs were operating a profitable restaurant in the city of Seattle, and dealing with the general public as their patrons; that defendant Armour & Co. is engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling to the public generally meats and products to be used as food; that it maintains a place of business in Seattle, Wash., from which it sells and distributes its goods, representing and holding out to the general public that its goods are pure, wholesome, and fit food for human beings; that on June 16, 1912, plaintiffs, in the usual course and conduct of their business, purchased from the Seattle Grocery Company a carton of cooked tongue, prepared and ready to be used as food without further cooking or labor; that such package had been manufactured and prepared by defendant Armour & Co., that the carton or container bore its name, and that it was purchased to be sold to plaintiffs' customers; that in making such purchase plaintiffs relied upon the representations of Armour & Co. that said food was pure and wholesome and fit for food; that Armour & Co. was guilty of negligence in manufacturing and preparing the foods purchased, in that in the center of the carton was a foul, filthy, nauseating and poisonous substance; that in the due course of trade plaintiffs served to one of their patrons a portion of the tongue; that the patron ate of it; that he then and there became sick and nauseated, and did then and there in the presence of other persons publicly expose and denounce the service to him of such foul and poisonous food; that the incident became known to the public generally; that plaintiffs had no knowledge or means of knowing the character of the food served; that its condition could not be discovered until it was served for use—all to the damage of the plaintiffs, etc., for loss of reputation, business, and lost profits during the life of their lease. Defendants demurred to the complaint. The demurrer of Armour & Co. was sustained, and plaintiffs have appealed.

It has been accepted as a general rule that a manufacturer is not liable to any person other than his immediate vendee; that the action is necessarily one upon an implied or express warranty, and that without privity of contract no suit can be maintained; that each purchaser must resort to his immediate vendor. To this rule certain exceptions have been organized: (1) Where the thing causing the injury is of a noxious or dangerous kind. (2) Where the defendant has been guilty of fraud or deceit in passing off the article. (3) Where the defendant has been negligent in some respect with reference to the sale or construction of a thing not imminently dangerous.

Within one of these exceptions is to be found the reason for holding the manufacturer of patent or proprietary medicines to answer at the suit of the ultimate consumer. Direct actions are allowed in such cases because the manufacture of medicines is generally shrouded in mystery, and sometimes, if not generally, they contain poisons which may produce injurious results. They are prepared by the manufacturer for sale and distribution to the general public, and one purchasing them has a right to rely upon the implied obligation of the manufacturer that he will not use ingredients which if taken in prescribed doses will bring harmful results. Reference may be had to the following cases which sustain, and in which many other cases are cited which sustain, this exception: Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455; Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, 83 Ga. 457, 10 S. E. 118, 5 L. R. A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324; Weiser v. Holzman, 33 Wash. 87, 73 Pac. 797, 99 Am. St. Rep. 932.

Another exception—the doctrine is comparatively recent—is refera-ble to the modern method of preparing food for use by the consumer, and the more general and ever-increasing use of prepared food products. The following are among the more recent cases holding that the ultimate consumer may bring his action direct against the manufacturer: Meshbesher v. Channellene Oil & Mfg. Co., 107 Minn. 104, 119 N. W. 428, 131 Am. St. Rep. 441; Tomlinson v. Armour, 75 N. J. Law, 748, 70 Atl. 314, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 923; Salmon v. Libby, 219 Ill. 421, 76 N. E. 573; Haley v. Swift, 152 Wis. 570, 140 N. W. 292; Watson v. Augusta, 124 Ga. 121, 52 S. E. 152, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1178, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157; Ketterer v. Armour (D. C.) 200 Fed. 322. The contrary is held in the case of Nelson v. Armour, 76 Ark. 352, 90 S. W. 288, 6 Ann. Cas. 237. This case, though well reasoned along the lines of those cases which hold that the rule of caveat emptor applies, is not in touch with the modern drift of authority. Some of the cases hold that the action is for breach of warranty; others that it is to be sustained upon the ground of negligence. A few courts have attributed the growth of this exception to the general public policy as declared in the pure food laws (Meshbesher v. Channellene, etc., supra), while others say that the liability for furnishing provisions which endanger human life rests upon the same grounds as the manufacturing of patent or proprietary medicine. Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 1 N. E. 154, 52 Am. Rep. 715; Haley v. Swift, supra; Tomlinson v. Armour, supra; Meshbesher v. Channellene, supra; Salmon v. Libby, supra; Watson v. Augusta, supra; Ketterer v. Armour, supra. In the case of Weiser v. Holzman, this court said: "The rule does not rest upon any principle of contract, or contractual relation existing between the person delivering the article and the person injured, for there is no contract or contractual relation between them. It rests on the principle that the original act of delivering the article is wrongful, and that every one is responsible for the natural consequences of his wrongful acts." Although the cases differ in their reasoning, all agree that there is a liability in such cases irrespective of any privity of contract in the sense of immediate contract between the parties.

Indeed, we understand that respondent does not claim that the ultimate consumer, the person who ate the unfit food, would be denied a right of recovery under modern authority; but it is strenuously contended that such actions are sustained because the consumer has been injured in health and comfort, that the exception should not be carried to the extent of allowing a retailer of the goods to sue direct and recover for injury to his business and loss of reputation, that in such cases there must still be privity of contract. It seems that the test should not rest in finding the plaintiff's damage in health or business, but in answering the question whether there has been a damage which may be justly attributed to the negligence or a breach of duty on the part of the one who had power and whose duty it was to prevent the wrong.

Counsel on either side have been zealous in searching the books, but only one case is submitted that goes directly to the right of the retailer or middleman to sue in the first instance—Neiman v. Channellene Oil & Mfg. Co., 112 Minn. 13, 127 N. W. 394, 140 Am. St. Rep. 458. The right to recover for loss of trade consequent upon the selling of impure food was sustained; the court saying, "A company which advertises itself as a manufacturer and seller of pure articles of food must be deemed to have knowledge of the contents of the articles offered for sale." The court held to the doctrine of implied warranty. The suit was brought by the retailer against his immediate vendor, so that we still have to meet the question of whether the retailer who has lost his trade can sue over the head of his immediate vendor, or join him with the manufacturer as in this case. In the light of modern conditions we see no reason why he should not. He has been damaged. He and all others who in the course of trade handled the unwholesome goods purchased them relying upon the name and reputation of the manufacturer. The goods were designed for ultimate consumption by an individual patron, and packed to facilitate and make convenient such resales as might be made pending ultimate consumption. Every tradesman, whether wholesaler or retailer, is in a sense a consumer, for he buys to resell. In a way he risks his reputation. He stakes it upon either an express warranty, as printed on the package, or an implied warranty that the goods are wholesome and fit for food. He is injured by the fault or a breach of duty of the manufacturer, for his immediate vendor, like himself, has no way to test every sealed package. "Remedies of injured consumers ought not to be made to depend upon the intricacies of the law of sales. The obligation of the manufacturer should not be based alone on privity of contract. It should rest, as was once said, upon 'the demands of social justice.'" Ketterer v. Armour, supra. "We may judicially recognize that the contents are sealed up, not open to the inspection or test, either of the retailer or of the consumer, until they are opened for use, and not then susceptible to practical test, except the test of eating. When the manufacturer puts the goods upon the market in this form for sale and consumption, he, in effect, represents to each purchaser that the contents of the can are suited to the purpose for which it is sold, the same as if an express representation to that effect were imprinted upon a label. Under these circumstances, the fundamental condition upon which the common-law doctrine of caveat emptor is based—that the buyer should 'look out for himself'—is conspicuously absent." Tomlinson v. Armour, supra, 75 N. J. Law, 748, 70 Atl. 314, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 923.

In Pantaze v. West, 7 Ala. App. 599, 61 South. 42, the suit was brought against the retailer. In discussing the obligations of the retailer, the court treats him as a consumer within the law, saying: "The fact was established without controversy that the defendant was the keeper of a public eating place, engaged in the business of serving food to his customers, the public, and, being thus engaged, and holding himself out as a public purveyor, he was bound to use due care to see that the foodstuffs served at his place of business to his customers were fit for human consumption, and could be partaken of without causing sickness or endangering human life or health because of their unwholesome and deleterious condition, and, for any negligence in this particular in failing to observe this duty which proximately resulted in injury to one of the patrons of the place, the defendant would be responsible."

Now, under all authority the immediate vendor would be liable upon one theory or another to the consumer. This being so, it should not be held that the vendor could not sue the manufacturer except to recoup against a judgment. He might thus be left without remedy. In denying the right to sue an immediate vendor, Spear, J., in Bigelow v. Maine Central Ry. Co., 110 Me. 105, 85 Atl. 396, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 627, observed the wonderful discoveries of the past century and the amazing progress in perfecting known devices. He recalls the boast of the common law that it was able to adjust itself to the inevitable vicissitudes and changes that occur in the development of human affairs. "The principles of the common law have adapted themselves so aptly as to render almost imperceptible the radical transitions that have taken place. Of little less importance than the appearance of the great achievements referred to is the establishment and development of the canning industry in this country and in other parts of the world. It may be said that the art of canning, if not invented within the last century, has, at least, assumed the vast proportions which it has now attained within a comparatively few years. It involves a unique and peculiar method of distributing for domestic and foreign use almost every product known to the art of husbandry. The wholesaler, the retailer, and the user of these goods, whether in the capacity of caterer, seller, or host, sustain an entirely different duty, respecting a knowledge of their contents and quality, than prevails with regard to knowing the quality of those food products which are open to the inspection of the seller or victualer. With reference to these it may well be considered, as has been held, that, having an opportunity to investigate and thereby to know the quality of their merchandise, they are charged with a responsibility amounting to a practical guaranty. The early rules of law were formulated upon the theory that the provision dealer and the victualer, having an opportunity to observe and inspect the appearance and quality of the food products they offered to the public, were accordingly charged with knowledge of their imperfections. Winsor v. Lombard, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 57; Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 1 N. E. 154, 52 Am. Rep. 715. But, upon the state of facts in the case at bar, a situation arises that cannot in the practical conduct of the canning business fall within these rules. No knowledge of the original or present contents of a perfect appearing can is possible in the practical use of canned products. They cannot be chemically analyzed every time they are used. Accordingly, the reason for the rule having ceased, a new rule should be applied to the sale and use of canned goods that will more nearly harmonize with what is rational and just.

To the old rule that a manufacturer is not liable to third persons who have no contractual relations with him for negligence in the manufacture of an article should be added another exception, not one arbitrarily worked by the courts, but arising, as did the three to which we have heretofore alluded, from the changing conditions of society. An exception to a rule will be declared by courts when the case is not an isolated instance, but general in its character, and the existing rule does not square with justice. Under such circumstances a court will, if free from the restraint of some statute, declare a rule that will meet the full intendment of the law. No case has been cited that is squarely in point with the instant case; but there is enough in the adjudged cases to warrant us in our conclusion.

The facts stated in the complaint are admitted by demurrer. Plaintiffs have been injured. No other person or firm had an opportunity to check the offensive package after it was sealed and sent on its way. Right and reason demand that any party injured should have a right of recovery against the first offender without resorting to that circumlocution of action against intervening agents (a doubtful right at best, Bigelow v. Maine Central Ry. Co., supra), which is demanded where the product as well as the market is open, and the rule of caveat emptor should in justice apply.

Plaintiffs' argument is also based on the pure food law. It is contended that the negligence of defendant is presumed if a violation of the pure food law be shown. This is admitted as a general proposition by defendant; but it says that the rule applies only where the statute was intended for the benefit of the party who brings the suit; that the pure food laws are intended for the benefit of the consumer alone.

This opinion is already too long drawn out, and we are not disposed to go into this phase of the case, except to say that it seems to us that the plaintiffs would not be barred by the argument made by defendant. The consumer purchases prepared food products to sustain life and health. The retailer purchases the same products, depending upon established brands to sustain his reputation as a dealer in clean and wholesome food. We would be disposed to hold on this question that, where sealed packages are put out, and it is made to appear that the fault, if any, is that of the manufacturer, the product was intended for the use of all those who handle it in trade as well as those who consume it. Our holding is that, in the absence of an express warranty of quality, a manufacturer of food products under modern conditions impliedly warrants his goods when dispensed in original packages, and that such warranty is available to all who may be damaged by reason of their use in the legitimate channels of trade.

We regard this case, in so far as the dealer is permitted to sue the manufacturer, as one of first impression. We think the complaint states a cause of action. If there is no authority for the remedy, "it is high time for such an authority." Ketterer v. Armour, supra.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer.[78]

TOM v. NICHOLS-FIFIELD SHOE MACH. CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1914. 132 C. C. A. 221, 215 Fed. 881.)

In Error to the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

This was an action by Jacob Tom against the Shoe Machinery Company, for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in the employ of Habid Tom, and engaged in operating a die-cutting machine which had been sold and delivered to Habid Tom by the defendants and set up by them in his factory in contemplation of its being operated by the plaintiff. The judgment below was for the defendants, and plaintiff brings error.[79]

BINGHAM, Circuit Judge. * * * We are also of the opinion that the circumstances disclosed by the case show that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty to exercise care in setting up the machine, and that this duty did not arise out of the contract of sale between the defendant and Tom, but out of the relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and irrespective of the contract of sale. "The law governing actions for negligence has for its foundation the rule of reasonable conduct." That rule "necessarily includes two persons, or one person and some right or property of another. It has to do with one's acts in reference to the person, property, or rights of another. It is a rule of relation. If there be no relation there is nothing upon which the rule can operate." Garland v. Railroad, 76 N. H. 556, 86 Atl. 141, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 338, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 924. When, however, one knows or has reason to believe that his conduct may affect injuriously the person or property or rights of another, then a duty arises requiring him to exercise reasonable care to see that his acts do not result injuriously to the person or property or rights of that other. So in this case, when the defendant set up the machine in the factory, knowing or having reason to anticipate that the plaintiff and his fellow employés were to operate it, the law imposed a duty upon the defendant, with relation to the plaintiff and these men, to exercise reasonable care in setting up the machine, and rendered it liable in damages for a breach of the duty in case one of them was injured while operating the machine and as a result of its having been negligently set up. Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 479, 7 Am. Rep. 548; Baird v. Daly, 57 N. Y. 236, 15 Am. Rep. 488; Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 478, 42 Am. Rep. 311; Pittsfield Co. v. Shoe Co., 71 N. H. 522, 53 Atl. 807, 60 L. R. A. 116; Id., 72 N. H. 546, 58 Atl. 242; Hubbard v. Gould, 74 N. H. 25, 28, 64 Atl. 668; Dustin v. Curtis, 74 N. H. 266, 268, 269, 67 Atl. 220, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 504, 13 Ann. Cas. 169; Burnham v. Stillings, 76 N. H. 122, 123, 79 Atl. 987.

[78] For the argument which may be based on this allegation, admitted as it is by the demurrer, see Blood Balm Company v. Cooper (1889) 83 Ga. 457, 10 S. E. 118, 5 L. R. A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324.

[79] The statement of facts is rewritten, and only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point.

Whether the defendant's act in negligently setting up the machine was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was a question of fact for the jury, there being evidence from which such a conclusion might reasonably be drawn. It appeared that the defendant's men went to the factory of the purchaser, saw the place where the machine was to be operated, saw that a number of men, including the plaintiff, were employed there, and knew that they were likely to be called upon to run the machine. Under these circumstances, it could not be said as a matter of law that the defendant had no reason to anticipate that the plaintiff would be set to work on the machine, or that the injury which he received was not the proximate result of its negligence in improperly setting it up. Ela v. Cable Co., 71 N. H. 1, 3, 51 Atl. 281.

The judgment is reversed, the verdict is set aside, the case is remanded to the District Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion, and the plaintiff in error recovers his costs of appeal.

III. In the Absence of Contractual and Property Obligation

It has repeatedly been proposed to amend the common law by legislation, so that certain duties hitherto regarded as merely moral obligations shall hereafter be legal duties, whose nonperformance shall be punished by criminal law. The contention is, that the law should, to a certain extent, compel active beneficence by one man towards another in cases where "the only relation between the parties is that both are human beings." While it is not usually claimed that the law should recognize and enforce "a general duty to act as a good Samaritan," it is asserted that the law should recognize some humanitarian duties as legal duties.

Jeremiah Smith, Cases on Torts (2d Ed.) 165.[80]

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. WOOD et ux.

(Supreme Court of Texas, 1902. 95 Tex. 223, 66 S. W. 449, 56 L. R. A. 592, 93 Am. St. Rep. 834. Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, 1902. 68 S. W. 802.)

Action by Wood and his wife against the railway company. The trial resulted in a judgment against the railway company, who appeal.

It appeared in the case that an employé of the company, Dickson by name, had developed smallpox; that the company took charge of him and placed him in their smallpox camp; that the company's physician, having taken charge of Dickson on behalf of the company, "negligently employed an incompetent Mexican to guard and nurse Dickson"; that at the time the Mexican was put in charge "Dickson was delirious with fever, and it was known that persons thus suffering would likely escape; that while Dickson was in this delirious condition the Mexican went to sleep, and negligently permitted him to escape from the camp, and to wander upon the premises of the plaintiffs, and communicate smallpox to them and their little child.

BROWN, J. * * * Counsel urge the proposition that the railroad company owed no duty to the appellee; therefore there was no liability for Dickson's escape. House v. Waterworks Co., 88 Tex. 233, 31 S. W. 179, 28 L. R. A. 532, is relied upon to sustain that position, but the cases are so dissimilar that the principles announced in that case are not applicable in this. In House v. Waterworks Co. the two classes of cases are distinguished upon authorities cited and discussed. Nonliability for a failure to perform a duty due to the public as such is there commented upon and contrasted with the class of duties which are intended to benefit the individuals composing the public. This case belongs to the latter class, because whatever affects the health of the community necessarily affects the individual members thereof; and, when the duty to prevent the spread of a contagious disease rests upon a private corporation or person, an obligation arises in favor of each member of the community, and a right of action exists in favor of him who suffers from its breach.

But counsel for the railroad company earnestly insist that it is not liable for the act of Dickson in going away from the camp, although he was at the time delirious to the extent of being incapable of self-control. In Board of Bisshopp, 2 C. P. Div. 192, Denman, J., stated and answered the question thus: "Can a man be said to 'expose' or to 'be in charge of' one who is of full age and a free agent? A man weakened by disease may fairly be said to be 'exposed' by the person who is attending upon him. The statute cannot be limited to legal control, or it will become a dead letter." That case proceeded before the court on the ground that the defendant had exposed one infected with a contagious disease by going with him through the streets and in public places, but the defendant was acquitted because he had used proper care in doing so. The case answers the objection made that the escape of Dickson and his going upon the premises of the appellee could not be charged to the railroad company. Whenever the duty of restraining another arises, and the power of control over him exists, liability will follow upon a failure to perform the duty. In District v. Hill, 6 App. Cas. 204, Lord Blackburn said: "When the disease is infectious there is a legal obligation on the sick person and on those who have the custody of him not to do anything that can be avoided which shall tend to spread the infection; and, if either do so,—as by bringing the infected person into a public thoroughfare,—it is an indictable offense, though it will be a defense to an indictment if it can be shown that there was sufficient cause to excuse what is prima facie wrong."

[80] Judge Smith here refers to Professor Bohlen's article on "The Moral Duty to Aid Others as a Basis of Tort Liability," 56 Univ. of Pa. Law Rev. 217, 316, and to Professor Ames' article on "Law and Morals," 22 Harv. Law Rev. 97, 111–113, and sets forth (1) article 450 of the Dutch Penal Code; (2) Bentham's proposals for legislation; (3) article 481 in Livingston's Draft Code for Louisiana; and (4) Macaulay's elaborate statement of reasons for refusing to incorporate in the Indian Penal Code such views as Bentham's and Livingston's.

The same principle obtains in reference to animals of known vicious character which the owner is required to restrain to prevent them from inflicting injury on others; and the owners of animals known to be infected with contagious diseases must control them in such manner as to prevent them from communicating the disease to the animals of other persons. Agency Co. v. McClelland, 89 Tex. 490, 34 S. W. 98, 35 S. W. 474, 31 L. R. A. 669, 59 Am. St. Rep. 70. If the railroad company had undertaken to keep a horse known to be affected with a contagious disease at the same place and by the same means, and the horse had been permitted, through the negligence of the attendant, to escape, and had communicated the disease to a horse, the property of the appellee, there would be no doubt of the liability of the railroad company for the damages.

If there be a sound reason for denying to Wood as great a security for his wife and children against the diseased man as would have been accorded to him in favor of his beasts against a diseased horse, it has not been suggested by counsel for the appellant, and we are unable to discover any tenable basis for the distinction.

The quantum of diligence which was required of the appellant depended upon the character of the disease and the danger of communicating it to others. "If the business be hazardous to the lives of others, the care to be used must be of a nature more exacting than required when no such hazard exists. The greater the hazard the more complete must be the exercise of care." Railroad Co. v. Hewitt, 67 Tex. 478, 3 S. W. 705, 60 Am. Rep. 32. Smallpox is commonly known to be a highly contagious disease, and very dangerous to human life, and isolation of the infected person is generally recognized as necessary to afford protection to the community in which he may be found. The Court of Civil Appeals found as a fact that it is a characteristic of smallpox, known to the appellant's agent, that the patient is liable to become delirious to the degree of irresponsibility, and to wander from the place of confinement, being thereby liable to come into contact with persons in the neighborhood. The object of placing Dickson in the tent and supplying a nurse and guard for him was not alone to care for and provide for him, but also to protect the public against infection by contact; and when the railroad company undertook to treat Dickson for the disease, and to care for him at the place designated by the Mayor of Greenville, it assumed the duty of using ordinary care to prevent Dickson from exposing himself in delirium, or from being exposed otherwise, so as to communicate the disease to other persons; and, having failed, through the negligence of its employés, to use such care, and by reason of its negligence Dickson having escaped and communicated the disease to the appellee's family, the railroad company was liable for the damage caused thereby. Rex. v. Vantandillo, 4 Maule & S. 75; Rex. v. Burnett, Id. 273; Haag v. Board, 60 Ind. 511, 28 Am. Rep. 654; Smith v. Baker (C. C.) 20 Fed. 709; District v. Hill, 6 App. Cas. 204.

To both questions we answer that under the facts stated the railroad company was liable to the appellee Wood for the damages caused to him by reason of the smallpox being communicated to him and his family by Dickson through the negligence of the agent of the railroad company.[81]

DEPUE v. FLATAU et al.

BROWN, J. The facts in this somewhat unusual case are as follows: Plaintiff was a cattle buyer, and accustomed to drive through the country in the pursuit of his business, buying cattle, hides, and furs from the farmers. On the evening of January 23, 1905, about 5 or 5:30 o'clock, after having been out a day or two in the country, he called at the house of the defendants, about seven miles from

The opinion is from the Supreme Court, to which the questions involved in this case were certified by the Court of Civil Appeals. Only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point. Madelia, where he resided. His object was to inspect some cattle which Flatau, Sr., had for sale, and, if arrangements could be made, to purchase the same. It was dark at the time of his arrival, but he inspected the cattle in the barn, and suggested to defendant that, being unable to determine their value by reason of the darkness, he was not prepared to make an offer for the cattle, and requested the privilege of remaining overnight, to the end that a bargain might be made understandingly in the morning. His request was not granted. Plaintiff then bought some furs from other members of the defendant's family, and Flatau, Sr., invited him to remain for supper. Under this invitation plaintiff entered the house, paid for the furs and was given supper with the family. After the evening meal, plaintiff and both defendants repaired to the sitting-room of the house, and plaintiff made preparation to depart for his home. His team had not been unhitched from the cutter, but was tied to a hitching post near the house.

The testimony from this point leaves the facts in some doubt. Plaintiff testified that soon after reaching the sitting room he was taken with a fainting spell and fell to the floor. He remembers very little of what occurred after that, though he does recall that, after fainting, he again requested permission to remain at defendants' overnight, and that his request was refused. Defendants both deny that this request was made, and testified, when called for cross-examination on the trial, that plaintiff put on his overshoes and buffalo coat unaided, and that, while adjusting a shawl about his neck, he stumbled against a partition between the dining room and the sitting room, but that he did not fall to the floor. Defendant Flatau, Jr., assisted him in arranging his shawl, and the evidence tends to show that he conducted him from the house out of doors and assisted him into his cutter, adjusting the robes about him and attending to other details preparatory to starting the team on its journey. Though the evidence is somewhat in doubt as to the cause of plaintiff's condition while in defendants' home, it is clear that he was seriously ill and too weak to take care of himself. He was in this condition when Flatau, Jr., assisted him into the cutter. He was unable to hold the reins to guide his team, and young Flatau threw them over his shoulders and started the team towards home, going a short distance, as he testified, for the purpose of seeing that the horses took the right road to Madelia. Plaintiff was found early next morning by the roadside, about three-quarters of a mile from defendants' home, nearly frozen to death. He had been taken with another fainting spell soon after leaving defendants' premises, and had fallen from his cutter, where he remained the entire night. He was discovered by a passing farmer, taken to his home, and revived. The result of his experience necessitated the amputation of several of his fingers, and he was otherwise physically injured and his health impaired.

Plaintiff thereafter brought this action against defendants, father and son, on the theory that his injuries were occasioned solely by their negligent and wrongful conduct in refusing him accommodations for the night, and knowing his weak physical condition, or at least having reasonable grounds for knowing it, by reason of which he was unable to care for himself, in sending him out unattended to make his way to Madelia the best he could. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, the trial court dismissed the action, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify a recovery. Plaintiff appealed from an order denying a new trial.

Two questions are presented for consideration: (1) Whether, under the facts stated, defendants owed any duty to plaintiff which they negligently violated; and (2) whether the evidence is sufficient to take the case to the jury upon the question whether defendants knew, or under the circumstances disclosed ought to have known, of his weak physical condition, and that it would endanger his life to send him home unattended.

The case is an unusual one on its facts, and "all-four" precedents are difficult to find in the books. In fact, after considerable research, we have found no case whose facts are identical with those at bar. It is insisted by defendants that they owed plaintiff no duty to entertain him during the night in question, and were not guilty of any negligent misconduct in refusing him accommodations, or in sending him home under the circumstances disclosed. Reliance is had for support of this contention upon the general rule as stated in Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Cappier, 66 Kan. 649, 72 Pac. 281, 69 L. R. A. 513, where the court said: "Those duties which are dictated merely by good morals or by humane considerations are not within the domain of the law. Feelings of kindness and sympathy may move the Good Samaritan to minister to the sick and wounded at the roadside, but the law imposes no such obligation; and suffering humanity has no legal complaint against those who pass by on the other side. * * * Unless a relation exists between the sick, helpless, or injured and those who witness their distress, of a nature to require and impose upon them the duty of providing the necessary relief, there is neither legal obligation to minister on the one hand, nor cause for legal complaint on the other." This is no doubt a correct statement of the general rule applicable to the Good Samaritan, but it by no means controls a case like that at bar.

The facts of this case bring it within the more comprehensive principle that whenever a person is placed in such a position with regard to another that it is obvious that, if he does not use due care in his own conduct, he will cause injury to that person, the duty at once arises to exercise care commensurate with the situation in which he thus finds himself, and with which he is confronted, to avoid such danger; and a negligent failure to perform the duty renders him liable for the consequences of his neglect. This principle applies to varied situations arising from noncontract relations. It protects the trespasser from wanton or willful injury. It extends to the licensee, and requires the exercise of reasonable care to avoid an unnecessary injury to him. It imposes upon the owner of premises, which he expressly or impliedly invites persons to visit, whether for the transaction of business or otherwise, the obligation to keep the same in reasonably safe condition for use, though it does not embrace those sentimental or social duties often prompting human action. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 471; Barrows on Negligence, 4. Those entering the premises of another by invitation are entitled to a higher degree of care than those who are present by mere sufferance. Barrows on Negligence, 304. The rule stated is supported by a long list of authorities, both in England and this country, and is expressed in the familiar maxim, "Sic utere tuo," etc. They will be found collected in the works above cited, and also in 2 Thompson on Negligence, 1702. It is thus stated in Heaven v. Pender, 11 L. R. Q. B. Div. 496: "The proposition which these recognized cases suggest, and which is, therefore, to be deduced from them, is that, whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognize that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger." It applies with greater strictness to conduct towards persons under disability, and imposes the obligation as a matter of law, not mere sentiment, at least to refrain from any affirmative action that might result in injury to them. A valuable note to Railway Co. v. Cappier, 69 L. R. A. 513, discusses at length the character of the duty and obligation of those coming into relation with sick and disabled persons, and numerous analogous cases are collected and analyzed.

In the case at bar defendants were under no contract obligation to minister to plaintiff in his distress; but humanity demanded that they do so, if they understood and appreciated his condition. And, though those acts which humanity demands are not always legal obligations, the rule to which we have adverted applied to the relation existing between these parties on this occasion and protected plaintiff from acts at their hands that would expose him to personal harm. He was not a trespasser upon their premises, but, on the contrary, was there by the express invitation of Flatau, Sr. He was taken suddenly ill while their guest, and the law, as well as humanity, required that he be not exposed in his helpless condition to the merciless elements. The case, in its substantial facts, is not unlike that of Railway Co. v. Marrs, 119 Ky. 954, 85 S. W. 188, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 388, 70 L. R. A. 291, 115 Am. St. Rep. 289. In that case it appears that one Marrs was found asleep in the yards of the railway company in an intoxicated condition. The yard employés discovered him, aroused him from his stupor, and ordered him off the tracks. They knew that he was intoxicated, and that he had left a train recently arrived at the station, and he appeared to them dazed and lost. About 40 minutes later, while the yard employés were engaged in switching, they ran over him and killed him. He had again fallen asleep on one of the tracks. The court held the railway company liable; that, under the circumstances disclosed, it was the duty of the yard employés to see that Marrs was safely out of the yards, or, in default of that, to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring him; and that it was reasonable to require them to anticipate his probable continued presence in the yards. The case at bar is much stronger, for here plaintiff was not intoxicated, nor a trespasser, but, on the contrary, was in defendants' house as their guest, and was there taken suddenly ill in their presence, and, if his physical condition was known and appreciated, they must have known that to compel him to leave their home unattended would expose him to serious danger.

We understand from the record that the learned trial court held in harmony with the view of the law here expressed, but dismissed the action for the reason, as stated in the memorandum denying a new trial, that there was no evidence that either of the defendants knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, plaintiff's physical condition, or that allowing him to proceed on his journey would expose him to danger. Of course, to make the act of defendants a violation of their duty in the premises, it should appear that they knew and appreciated his serious condition. The evidence on this feature of the case is not so clear as might be desired, but a majority of the court are of opinion that it is sufficient to charge both defendants with knowledge of plaintiff's condition—at least, that the question should have been submitted to the jury. Defendant Flatau, Sr., testified that he was in the room at all times while plaintiff was in the house and observed his demeanor, and, though he denied that plaintiff fell to the floor in a faint or otherwise, yet the fact that plaintiff was seriously ill cannot be questioned. Flatau, Jr., conducted him to his cutter, assisted him in, observed that he was incapable of holding the reins to guide his team, and for that reason threw them over his shoulders. If defendants knew and appreciated his condition, their act in sending him out to make his way to Madelia the best he could was wrongful and rendered them liable in damages. We do not wish to be understood as holding that defendants were under absolute duty to entertain plaintiff during the night. Whether they could conveniently do so does not appear. What they should or could have done in the premises can only be determined from a full view of the evidence disclosing their situation, and their facilities for communicating his condition to his friends, or near neighbors, if any there were. All these facts will enable the jury to determine whether, within the rules of negligence applicable to the case, defendants neglected any duty they owed plaintiff.

Order reversed.[82]

SECTION 4.—EXCUSABLE NEGLIGENCE

I. Accident as an Excuse

CHRISTIE v. GRIGGS.

(At Nisi Prius, Adjourned Sittings in London, 1809. 2 Camp. 79.)

This was an action of assumpsit against the defendant as owner of the Blackwall stage, on which the plaintiff, a pilot, was travelling to London, when it broke down, and he was greatly bruised. The first count imputed the accident to the negligence of the driver; the second, to the insufficiency of the carriage.

The plaintiff having proved that the axle-tree snapped asunder at a place where there is a slight descent, from the kennel crossing the road; that he was, in consequence, precipitated from the top of the coach; and that the bruises he received confined him several weeks to his bed, there rested his case.

Best, Serjeant, contended strenuously that the plaintiff was bound to proceed farther, and give evidence, either of the driver being unskillful, or of the coach being insufficient.

Sir James Mansfield, C. J. I think the plaintiff has made a prima facie case by proving his going on the coach, the accident, and the damage he has suffered. It now lies on the other side to show, that the coach was as good a coach as could be made, and that the driver was as skillful a driver as could anywhere be found. What other evidence can the plaintiff give? The passengers were probably all sailors like himself; and how do they know whether the coach was well built, or whether the coachman drove skillfully? In many other cases of this sort, it must be equally impossible for the plaintiff to give the evidence required. But when the breaking down or overturning of a coach is proved, negligence on the part of the owner is implied. He has always the means to rebut this presumption, if it be unfounded; and it is now incumbent on the defendant to make out, that the damage in this case arose from what the law considers a mere accident.

[82] Compare: Hunicke v. Meramec Quarry Co. (Mo. 1914) 172 S. W. 43: (Action to recover for the death of plaintiff's intestate, H., caused by the alleged negligence of D. in failing to procure a physician or surgeon to attend and treat H., who had received severe personal injuries through the act of S. while H. was acting in the employ of D. Reviewing the authorities, Woodson, P. J., remarks: "In my opinion there is no possibility of doubt but what the law is that whenever one person employs another to perform dangerous work, and that, while performing that work, he is so badly injured as to incapacitate him from caring for himself, then the duty of providing medical treatment for him is devolved upon the employer.")

The defendant then called several witnesses, who swore that the axle-tree had been examined a few days before it broke, without any flaw being discovered in it; and that when the accident happened, the coachman, a very skillful driver, was driving in the usual track and at a moderate pace.

Sir James Mansfield said, as the driver had been cleared of everything like negligence, the question for the jury would be as to the sufficiency of the coach. If the axle-tree was sound, as far as human eye could discover, the defendant was not liable. There was a difference between a contract to carry goods, and a contract to carry passengers. For the goods the carrier was answerable at all events. But he did not warrant the safety of the passengers. His undertaking, as to them, went no farther than this, that as far as human care and foresight could go, he would provide for their safe conveyance. Therefore, if the breaking down of the coach was purely accidental, the plaintiff had no remedy for the misfortune he had encountered.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

HYMAN et ux. v. NYE & SONS.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1881. L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 685.)

Statement of Claim—that the defendant was a jobmaster, carrying on business at Brighton, and that the plaintiff was lawfully traveling in and using a carriage of the defendant in the custody and care of the defendant's servant, when, through the negligence and default, or through the want of care and skill of the defendant, the carriage was upset and the plaintiff thrown from it and injured. Defence denying the negligence. Joinder of issue.

At the trial before Hawkins, J., at the Middlesex sittings in July, 1880, there was a verdict for the defendant. A rule was obtained calling upon the defendant to shew cause why there should not be a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

Lindley, J. The defendant in this case was a job-master at Brighton, letting out carriages and horses for hire. The plaintiff hired of him a landau, and a pair of horses, and a driver, for a drive from Brighton to Shoreham and back. After having driven some way, and whilst the carriage was going down hill and slowly over a newly mended part of the road, a bolt in the underpart of the carriage broke. The splinter-bar became displaced; the horses started off; the carriage was upset; the plaintiff was thrown out and injured, and he brought this action for compensation.

It was proved at the trial that no fault could be imputed to the horses or to the driver; and although the plaintiff was charged with having caused the accident by pulling the reins, the jury found in the plaintiff's favor on this point, and nothing now turns upon it.

It further appeared that the carriage had been built by a good builder some eight or nine years before the accident; had been repaired by a competent person about fifteen months before it; that the defendant had no reason to suppose that there was any defect in the carriage or in any of its bolts; and that the defect, if any, in the bolt which broke could not have been discovered by any ordinary inspection. The bolt itself was not produced at the trial, and the nature of the defect, if any, in it when the carriage started was not proved.

The learned judge at the trial told the jury in substance that the plaintiff was bound to prove that the injury which he had sustained was caused by the negligence of the defendant; and if in their opinion the defendant took all reasonable care to provide a fit and proper carriage their verdict ought to be for him. Being thus directed the jury found a verdict for the defendant; and in particular they found that the carriage was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was hired, and that the defect in the bolt could not have been discovered by the defendant by ordinary care and attention. The plaintiff complains of this direction, and the verdict founded upon it, and we have to consider whether the direction was correct. * * * A person who lets out carriages is not, in my opinion, responsible for all defects discoverable or not; he is not an insurer against all defects; nor is he bound to take more care than coach proprietors or railway companies who provide carriages for the public to travel in; but in my opinion, he is bound to take as much care as they; and although not an insurer against all defects, he is an insurer against all defects which care and skill can guard against. His duty appears to me to be to supply a carriage as fit for the purpose for which it is hired as care and skill can render it; and if whilst the carriage is being properly used for such purpose it breaks down, it becomes incumbent on the person who has let it out to shew that the breakdown was in the proper sense of the word an accident not preventable by any care or skill. If he can prove this, as the defendant did in Christie v. Griggs, 2 Camp. 80, and as the railway company did in Redhead v. Midland Ry. Co., Law Rep. 2 Q. B. 412, he will not be liable; but no proof short of this will exonerate him. Nor does it appear to me to be at all unreasonable to exact such vigilance from a person who makes it his business to let out carriages for hire. As between him and the hirer the risk of defects in the carriage, so far as care and skill can avoid them, ought to be thrown on the owner of the carriage. The hirer trusts him to supply a fit and proper carriage; the lender has it in his power not only to see that it is in a proper state, and to keep it so, and thus protect himself from risk, but also to charge his customers enough to cover his expenses.

Such being, in my opinion, the law applicable to the case, it follows that the directions given to the jury did not go far enough, and that it was not sufficient, in order to exonerate the defendant from liability for him to prove that he did not know of any defect in the bolt; had no reason to suppose it was weak, and could not see that it was by ordinary inspection of the carriage. It further follows that, in my opinion, the evidence was not such as to warrant the finding that the carriage was in a fit and proper state when it left the defendant's yard.

In many of the cases bearing on this subject, the expression "reasonably fit and proper" is used. This is a little ambiguous and requires explanation. In a case like the present, a carriage to be reasonably fit and proper must be as fit and proper as care and skill can make it for use in a reasonable and proper manner, i. e., as fit and proper as care and skill can make it to carry a reasonable number of people, conducting themselves in a reasonable manner, and going at a reasonable pace on the journey for which the carriage was hired; or (if no journey was specified) along roads, or over ground reasonably fit for carriages. A carriage not fit and proper in this sense would not be reasonably fit and proper, and vice versâ. The expression "reasonably fit" denotes something short of absolutely fit; but in a case of this description the difference between the two expressions is not great.

It was objected on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff had in his statement of claim based his case on negligence on the part of the defendant, and not on any breach of warranty express or implied, and consequently that the plaintiff could not recover in this action, at least without amending. But the absence of such care as a person is by law bound to take is negligence; and whether the plaintiff sues the defendant in tort for negligence in not having supplied such a fit and proper carriage as he ought to have supplied, or whether the plaintiff sues him in contract for the breach of an implied warranty that the carriage was as fit and proper as it ought to have been, appears to me wholly immaterial. Upon this point I adopt the opinion of Baron Martin in Francis v. Cockrell, Law Rep. 5 Q. B. 509, which is based upon and warranted by Brown v. Boorman, 11 Cl. & Fin. 1.

The plaintiff's pleadings would have been free from all objection if he had stated in his statement of claim that he hired the carriage of the defendant, and not merely that the plaintiff was lawfully in the carriage. But the defendant knew under what circumstances the plaintiff was lawfully in it; and there was no surprise or miscarriage of justice occasioned by the omission of the statement of the fact of hiring. It appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiff ought not to be precluded from recovering in this action as the pleadings stand, if the facts come out in his favor.

For the above reasons I am of opinion that there should be a new trial, and that the costs of the first trial, and of this rule, should abide the event.

II. Contributory Negligence as an Excuse[84]

BUTTERFIELD v. FORRESTER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1809. 11 East, 60, 10 R. R. 433, 103 Reprint, 926.)

This was an action on the case for obstructing a highway, by means of which obstruction the plaintiff, who was riding along the road, was thrown down with his horse, and injured, &c. At the trial before Bayley, J., at Derby, it appeared that the defendant, for the purpose of making some repairs to his house, which was close by the road side at one end of the town, had put up a pole across this part of the road, a free passage being left by another branch or street in the same direction. That the plaintiff left a public house not far distant from the place in question at 8 o'clock in the evening in August, when they were just beginning to light candles, but while there was light enough left to discern the obstruction at 100 yards distance: and the witness who proved this, said that if the plaintiff had not been riding very hard he might have observed and avoided it: the plaintiff however, who was riding violently, did not observe it, but rode against it, and fell with his horse, and was much hurt in consequence of the accident; and there was no evidence of his being intoxicated at the time. On this evidence Bayley, J., directed the jury, that if a person riding with reasonable and ordinary care could have seen and avoided the obstruction; and if they were satisfied that the plaintiff was riding along the street extremely hard, and without ordinary care, they should find a verdict for the defendant: which they accordingly did.

Vaughan, Serjt., now objected to this direction, on moving for a new trial; and referred to Buller's Ni. Pri. 26, where the rule is laid down, that "if a man lay logs of wood across a highway; though a person may with care ride safely by, yet if by means thereof my horse stumble and fling me, I may bring an action."

Bayley, J. The plaintiff was proved to be riding as fast as his horse could go, and this was through the streets of Derby. If he had used ordinary care he must have seen the obstruction; so that the accident appeared to happen entirely from his own fault.

Lord Ellenborough, C. J. A party is not to cast himself upon an obstruction which has been made by the fault of another, and avail himself of it, if he do not himself use common and ordinary caution to be in the right. In cases of persons riding upon what is considered to be the wrong side of the road, that would not authorize another purposely to ride up against them. One person being in fault will not dispense with another's using ordinary care for himself. Two things must concur to support this action, an obstruction in the road by the fault of the defendant, and no want of ordinary care to avoid it on the part of the plaintiff.[85]

PER CURIAM. Rule refused.

GEE v. METROPOLITAN RY. CO.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1872. In the Exchequer Chamber, 1873. L. R. 8 Q. B. 161.)

Declaration that the plaintiff was a passenger on the defendants' railway to be safely carried; that the defendants so negligently conducted themselves in carrying the plaintiff and managing the carriage in which the plaintiff traveled, that the plaintiff fell out and was injured. Plea, Not guilty; issue joined. * * *

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case it was submitted on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and the Chief Justice reserved to the defendants leave to enter a verdict for them or a nonsuit. The defendants did not offer any evidence, and the plaintiff then had a verdict for £250.

A rule was afterwards obtained to enter the verdict for the defendants or a nonsuit pursuant to the leave reserved, on the ground that there was no evidence of liability of the defendants; or for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.[86]

COCKBURN, J. I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The facts are simple. The plaintiff and his brother were travelling as passengers on the defendants' railway. In carriages of that railway there is a bar across the window to prevent persons from putting their heads to more than a small extent out of the window. The plaintiff and his brother had been conversing as to signals used on the line, and the plaintiff was explaining the mode in which they were worked; and told his brother that he would show him how it was done; and as soon as the lights of the station were visible the plaintiff stood up and put his hand on the rod of the window, and it so happened that the door, having been left insecurely fastened, flew open, and the plaintiff was thrown out and injured. Under these circumstances are the defendants liable? We must take it that there was negligence in not securely fastening the door; but it is said that that negligence alone did not cause the accident; the proximate cause of the accident was the plaintiff pressing against the door. It is said that the duty of the company is to carry a passenger safely as long as he sits quietly in the carriage; and if an accident happens from any act of his inconsistent with the ordinary behavior of passengers, he has only himself to thank, and the company are not liable.

I quite agree that the passenger must not do anything inconsistent with what passengers ordinarily do on a journey. Adams v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry. Co., Law Rep. 4 C. P. 739, was cited for the defendants. * * * There the decision turned on the passenger committing an act of imprudence which was uncalled for; that case therefore has no application to the present. Here, assuming that the company had done their duty, the passenger did nothing more than that which came within the scope of his enjoyment while travelling, without committing any imprudence; in passing through a beautiful country he certainly is at liberty to stand up and look at the view, not in a negligent but in the ordinary manner of people travelling for pleasure. Here the defendant was simply looking at the signal lights, and there was nothing in his conduct which can be imputed to him as negligence or imprudence.[87]

From this decision of the Queens Bench, discharging the rule, there was an appeal to the Exchequer Chamber.[86]

KELLY, C. B. I am of opinon that this judgment must be affirmed. The question for our consideration is, whether there is any evidence of the liability of defendants, the rule being to enter a verdict for the defendants on the sole ground that there was no evidence of the liability of the defendants. Now what is the evidence? It appears that the plaintiff was a passenger by the defendants' train, and that, as he was passing from one station to another, with a view of looking out of the window he rose from his seat and took hold of the bar of the window and pressed against it. The pressure, such as it was, of some part of his body, upon his taking hold of the bar, caused the door to open, and the motion of the train to throw him out of the carriage, whereby he sustained the injury complained of. These are all the facts, and the first question is, whether there was any evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants; and the second question which must necessarily arise from the terms of the reservation,—viz., that there was no evidence of liability, not merely of negligence, on the part of the defendants,—is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury that the mischief which befell the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of the defendants.

First, was there any evidence of negligence at all on the part of the defendants? I am of opinion that there was evidence for the jury to consider, whether the defendants' servants had not, when this train left the station from which it started on its journey, failed to see that the door was properly fastened in the ordinary manner in which such railway carriage doors are fastened. There was evidence to go to the jury that they had failed in the performance of that duty. But the preliminary question arises, is it their duty? I am of opinion that it is—that it is the duty of the railway company, by its servants, before the train starts upon its journey, to see that the door of every carriage is properly fastened. Here was evidence that this door was not properly fastened: for if it had been, it would not have flown open upon the degree of pressure that was applied to it by the plaintiff; and therefore there was evidence to go to the jury, upon which they were justified in finding that there was negligence on the part of the defendants.

But then, I agree, we must go further, and inquire whether there was evidence of "liability": in other words, whether there was evidence also that the negligence of the company was the cause of the mischief which occurred to the plaintiff. I am of opinion that there was evidence. Certainly the mischief would not have befallen him if that door had been properly fastened. The question is, therefore, whether he did anything which it was not lawful for him to do, and which we should be satisfied, taking the whole evidence together, was the cause of the mischief which befell him. If he did, I agree that the case fails on the part of the plaintiff. But why? Because, though he has proved that the defendants were guilty of negligence, he has not proved that that negligence was the cause of the mischief which befell him. The question of what has been termed contributory negligence does not, in my opinion, arise: first, because I am clearly of opinion upon the facts that there was no evidence of contributory negligence; but even if there were evidence of contributory negligence, the rule is not for a new trial on the ground that the learned judge did not leave that question to the jury or that it was a verdict against the weight of evidence: and there was no right to entertain any such question. And, therefore, upon this case, and on the facts that are before us, no question whatever of contributory negligence arises. The question is, whether there was evidence of negligence on the part of the company which caused the accident. I have already shewn that there was evidence of negligence and that there was evidence to go to the jury that their leaving the door not properly fastened was the cause of the injury which the plaintiff sustained without any improper act on the part of the plaintiff. Because I am of opinion that any passenger in a railway carriage, who rises for the purpose either of looking out of the window, or of dealing with, and touching, and bringing his body in contact with the door for any lawful purpose whatsoever, has a right to assume, and is justified in assuming, that the door is properly fastened; and if by reason of its not being properly fastened his lawful act causes the door to fly open, the accident is caused by the defendants' negligence.

I think, therefore, the Court of Queen's Bench were right in discharging the rule, and the judgment must be affirmed.[88]

SMITHWICK v. HALL & UPSON CO.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1890. 59 Conn. 261, 21 Atl. 924, 12 L. R. A. 279, 21 Am. St. Rep. 104.)

This action, against the Hall & Upson Company, for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant, was brought in the District Court of Waterbury and appealed to the Supreme Court of New Haven County. The defendant suffered a default in that court and the case was heard in damages before Fenn, J. Facts found and damages assessed at $1,000 if on the facts the plaintiff was to be regarded as not guilty of contributory negligence, and at nominal damages if he was to be regarded as guilty of such negligence; and the case was reserved upon the facts for the advice of this court.

TORRANCE, J. The general question reserved for our advice in this case, is, whether the plaintiff upon the facts found is entitled to the substantial damages or only to the nominal damages found by the court below.

Inasmuch as that court has expressly found that the negligence of the defendant caused or contributed to the injury for which the plaintiff seeks to recover, the decision of the above general question depends upon this single point, namely, whether the acts and conduct of the plaintiff as set forth upon the record constitute or amount to such contributory negligence on his part as will bar his right to substantial damages. The facts found, so far as they bear upon the question for decision, are in substance the following:

The plaintiff was a workman in the service of the defendant, and at the time of the injury complained of was engaged in helping to store ice for the defendant in a certain brick building. In doing this work the plaintiff stood upon a platform about five feet wide and seventeen feet long, raised fifteen feet above the ground, and extending from the west side of the building easterly to a point about two feet east of the door or aperture through which the ice was taken into the building. A stout plank of suitable height and strength extended along the outer side of the platform as far as the west side of the door and served as a protective railing or guard to that portion of the platform. In front of the door and east of it the platform was without guard or railing of any kind. A short time prior to the injury the foreman stationed the plaintiff on the platform just west of the door and inside the railing, and showed him what his duties were there, and told him "not to go upon the east end of the platform east of the slide and door, as it was not safe to stand there." He did not tell the plaintiff why it was not safe, but the danger which he had in mind was the narrowness and unrailed condition of the platform and the liability by inadvertence to misstep or fall or slip off, the latter being aggravated by the liability of the platform to become slippery from broken ice. These dangers were all manifest. The peril resulting from the accident which happened to the building was not in contemplation.

After the foreman went away the plaintiff, in spite of the orders so given to him, and for reasons of his own apparently, went over to the east end of the platform and worked there. It is found that there was no sufficient reason or excuse for the change of position. One of his fellow workmen, seeing the plaintiff in that place, told him that "it was not safe, and to stand on the other side," but the plaintiff, notwithstanding such warning, remained at work there.

While so at work the brick wall of the building above the platform, in consequence of the negligence of the defendant, gave way, the brick falling upon the platform and thence to the ground. The plaintiff was struck by portions of the descending mass and fell to the earth. He was either knocked off, or his fall, in the condition in which he stood, was inevitable; indeed, had he not fallen when he did, his injuries, which were very serious, would have been worse. Most of the injuries which he actually sustained were occasioned by the fall.

The plaintiff had no knowledge that the wall would be likely to fall or was in any way unsafe, and it is found that "no fault or negligence can be imputed to him in this regard."

In contemplation of the peril from the falling wall, it is found that "the spot where the plaintiff stood could not have been considered more dangerous than the place where he was directed to stand, though in fact most of the brick fell upon the side where he stood, and the result demonstrated therefore that the other side would have been safer in the event which occurred."

Upon these facts the defendant contends that the plaintiff, in going to and remaining on the east end of the platform, contrary to the orders and in spite of the warning given him, and in view of the obvious and manifest danger in so doing, was guilty of such contributory negligence as bars him of his right to recover more than nominal damages.

If the plaintiff's injuries had resulted from any of the perils and dangers attendant upon the mere fact of his standing and working on the east end of the platform, which were obvious and manifest to any one in his place, which were in the mind of the foreman when he told the plaintiff not to go there, and in view of which his fellow workman warned him, then this claim of the defendant would be a valid one. But upon the facts found it is without foundation.

The injury to the plaintiff was not the result of any such dangers, but was caused through the negligence of the defendant by the falling walls. This was a source of danger of which he had no knowledge whatever. He was justified in supposing that the wall was safe and would not be likely to fall upon him, no matter where he stood on the platform. He had no reason to anticipate even the slightest danger from that source before or after he changed his position. This being so, he could be guilty of no negligence with respect to this source of danger by changing his position contrary to orders; for negligence presupposes a duty of taking care, and this in turn presupposes knowledge or its legal equivalent.

With respect to that danger the plaintiff upon the facts found must be held to have acted as any reasonably careful man would have acted under the same circumstances. In changing his position contrary to orders he voluntarily took the risk of all perils and dangers which a man of ordinary care in his place ought to have known or could reasonably have anticipated; but as to dangers arising through the defendant's negligence from other sources—dangers which he was not bound to anticipate and of whose existence he had no knowledge, he took no risk and assumed no duty of taking care. It was the duty of the defendant on the facts found to warn the plaintiff against the danger from the falling wall.

Now the act or omission of a party injured which amounts to what is called contributory negligence, must be a negligent act or omission, and in the production of the injury it must operate as a proximate cause or one of the proximate causes and not merely as a condition.

In the case at bar the conduct of the plaintiff, as we have seen, was, with respect to the danger from the falling wall, not negligent for the want of knowledge or its equivalent on the part of the plaintiff.

Nor was his conduct, legally considered, a cause of the injury. It was a condition rather.

If he had not changed his position he might not have been hurt. And so too if he had never been born, or had remained at home on the day of the injury, it would not have happened; yet no one would claim that his birth or his not remaining at home that day, can in any just or legal sense be deemed a cause of the injury.

The court below has found that the plaintiff's fall in the position in which he stood was due to the giving way of the wall, and that most of his injuries were occasioned by the fall. His position there, upon the facts found, can no more be considered as a cause of the injury, than it could be in a case where the defendant, in doing some act near the platform without the plaintiff's knowledge, had negligently knocked him to the ground, or had negligently hit him with a stone. Had the injury been occasioned by a misstep or slip from the platform by the carelessness of the plaintiff, or for the want of a railing, the causal connection between the change of position and the injury would, legally speaking, be quite obvious; but from a legal point of view no such connection exists between the change of position and the giving way of the wall.

The plaintiff had full knowledge and was abundantly cautioned against certain particular sources of peril and danger, and he voluntarily neglected the warnings and took the risk of those perils and dangers. He was injured through the negligence of the defendant from an entirely different source of danger, of which he knew and could know nothing, and of whose existence it was the duty of the defendant to warn him. * * *

The defendant seems to claim however that, although some of the plaintiff's injuries were caused by falling bricks, yet most of them were caused by his fall; and that as he probably would not have fallen had he remained behind the railing, he contributed to the injury by placing himself where in case of such accident there was nothing to prevent his fall.

Whether this claim that he probably would not have fallen had he remained where he was stationed be true or not, must forever remain matter of conjecture. But if its truth could be demonstrated it would not, as we have seen, change the relation of the plaintiff's act to the legal cause of his injury, or make that act, from a legal standpoint, a contributing cause when it was but a condition.

And if the claim means that the plaintiff by his act increased the injury merely, then if this were true it would not be such contributory negligence as would defeat the action. To have that effect it must be an act or omission which contributes to the happening of the act or event which caused the injury. An act or omission that merely increases or adds to the extent of the loss or injury will not have that effect, though of course it may affect the amount of damages recovered in a given case. Gould v. McKenna, 86 Pa. 297, 27 Am. Rep. 705; Stebbins v. Central R. R. Co., 54 Vt. 464, 41 Am. Rep. 855. This claim however, on the facts found, is wholly without foundation.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment in his favor for one thousand dollars, and the Superior Court is so advised.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.[89]

BLACK v. NEW YORK, N. H. & H. R. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1907. 193 Mass. 448, 79 N. E. 797, 7 L. R. A. [N. S.] 148, 9 Ann. Cas. 485.)

ant's servants. The plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train which ran from Boston through Ashmont on the evening of February 7, 1903. He testified to having become so intoxicated that he had no recollection of anything that occurred after leaving a cigar store in Boston, until he awoke in the Boston City Hospital, about 4 o'clock the next day. One Thompson testified "that he took the 9:23 train on the evening of February 7, 1903, at the South Station in Boston, for Ashmont, and occupied a seat near the rear of the last car of the train; that there were about 20 passengers in the car, and he noticed Black sitting in the seat opposite, very erect, with his eyes closed. When the conductor came through Mr. Black went through his pockets as if he were looking for a ticket, and not being able to find it, tendered a 50-cent piece in payment for his fare. The conductor began to name off the stations, from Field's Corner first, and then Ashmont, and when he said Ashmont Mr. Black nodded his head. The conductor gave him his change and his rebate check. At Ashmont, where the train stops, there is a gravel walk running the whole length as a platform, then there is a flight of steps—10 or 12—that leads up to the asphalt walk around the station; so when you go up from the steps you have to walk along this walk. The conductor and brakeman took Black out of the car, one on each side. The distance from the steps of the car to the steps that lead up to the station was 25 feet. As they went along the platform the conductor and trainman were on each side of him. They tried to stand him up, but his legs would sink away from him. They sort of helped him up, and carried him to the bottom of the steps. When they went to the bottom of the steps they continued one on each side of him. Then one of the men got on one side, with his arm around him, and the other back of him, sort of pushing him, and they took him up about the fifth or sixth step, and after they got him up there they turned around and left him and went down the steps. Mr. Black sort of balanced himself there, just a minute, and then fell completely backward. He turned a complete somersault, and struck on the back of his head. The railroad men just had time to get down to the foot of the steps. There was a railing that led up those steps and the steps were about 10 feet wide. Mr. Black was upon the right-hand side, going up, and he was left right near the railing. When he fell he did not seize hold of anything. His arms were at his side."

On this testimony the jury might find that the plaintiff was so intoxicated as to be incapable of standing, or walking, or caring for himself in any way, and that the defendant's servants knowing his condition, left him near the top of the steps, where they knew, or ought to have known, that he was in great danger of falling and being seriously injured. They were under no obligation to remove him from the car, or to provide for his safety after he left the car. But they voluntarily undertook to help him from the car, and they were bound to use ordinary care in what they did that might affect his safety. Not only in the act of removal, but in the place where they left him, it was their duty to have reasonable regard for his safety in view of his manifest condition. The jury might have found that they were negligent in leaving him on the steps where a fall would be likely to do him much harm. Moody v. Boston & Maine R. R., 189 Mass. 277, 75 N. E. 631.

The defense rests principally upon the fact that the plaintiff was intoxicated, and was incapable of caring for himself after he was taken from the train, and therefore was not in the exercise of due care. If his voluntary intoxication was a direct and proximate cause of the injury, he cannot recover. The plaintiff contends that it was not a cause, but a mere condition, well known to the defendant's servants, and that their act was the direct and proximate cause of the injury, with which no other act or omission had any causal connection. The distinction here referred to is well recognized in law. Negligence of a plaintiff at the time of an injury caused by the negligence of another is no bar to his recovery from the other, unless it was a direct, contributing cause to the injury, as distinguished from a mere condition, in the absence of which the injury would not have occurred. This is pointed out in Steele v. Burkhardt, 104 Mass. 59, 6 Am. Rep. 191, and Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455, 3 Am. Rep. 390. It is also considered at some length in Newcomb v. Boston Protective Department, 146 Mass. 596, 16 N. E. 555, 4 Am. St. Rep. 354. See, also, Marble v. Ross, 124 Mass. 44; Spofford v. Harlow, 3 Allen, 176; Hall v. Ripley, 119 Mass. 135; Stone v. Boston & Albany R. R. Co., 171 Mass. 536–544, 51 N. E. 1, 41 L. R. A. 794.

The application of this rule sometimes gives rise to difficult questions. But in this connection the doctrine has been established that, when the plaintiff's negligence or wrongdoing has placed his person or property in a dangerous situation which is beyond his immediate control, and the defendant, having full knowledge of the dangerous situation, and full opportunity, by the exercise of reasonable care, to avoid any injury, nevertheless causes an injury, he is liable for the injury. This is because the plaintiff's former negligence is only remotely connected with the accident, while the defendant's conduct is the sole, direct and proximate cause of it. The principle was recognized by Mr. Justice Wells in Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455, 3 Am. Rep. 390, in these words: "The last part of the instructions prayed for suggests another question which, in certain conditions of facts, may require care and consideration, to wit: how far the obligations and liabilities of one party are modified towards the other, after knowledge of a negligent exposure by the latter, to danger from the acts or neglect of the former. In such case, what would otherwise have been mere negligence may become willful or wanton wrong, or may take the place of the sole, direct or proximate cause, the negligence of the other party being then regarded as a remote, and not a contributory, cause." In Hibbard v. Thompson, 109 Mass. 286, we find this language: "A physician may be called to prescribe for cases which originated in the carelessness of the patient, and though such carelessness would remotely contribute to the injury sued for, it would not relieve the physician from liability for his distinct negligence and the separate injury occasioned thereby. * * * In such cases the plaintiff's fault does not directly contribute to produce the injury sued for." So in Pierce v. Cunard Steamship Company, 153 Mass. 87, 26 N. E. 416, this court said: "But here the ground is not the fire, but an act done by the defendant after Pierce had got into the dangerous position. * * * The plaintiff's previous negligence is not a sufficient excuse for knowingly inflicting an injury upon him, or short of that, for omitting the use of such care as is reasonable under the circumstances, to avoid injuring him, even whether the harm is not expected in terms."

The rule applies, in like manner, where the plaintiff's act is illegal as distinguished from negligent, so that the defendant's liability is only for wanton and reckless conduct to the plaintiff's injury. McKeon v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R. Co., 183 Mass. 271, 67 N. E. 329, 97 Am. St. Rep. 437; Palmer v. Gordon, 173 Mass. 410, 53 N. E. 909, 73 Am. St. Rep. 302; Lovett v. Salem, etc., R. R. Co., 9 Allen, 557–563. In this latter class of cases, where the negligence is wanton and reckless to such a degree as to be in its nature a willful wrong, it is held that, although the plaintiff makes an averment of due care on his part, this means only due care in reference to the direct and proximate cause of the injury, and, such a gross wrong of the defendant being shown to be the cause, it prima facie so far excludes participation in it by the plaintiff, as to relieve him from the necessity of offering affirmative evidence of his care. Aiken v. Holyoke St. Ry. Co., 184 Mass. 269, 68 N. E. 238; Bjornquist v. Boston & Albany R. R. Co., 185 Mass. 130, 70 N. E. 53, 102 Am. St. Rep. 332; Banks v. Braman, 188 Mass. 367, 74 N. E. 594. The fundamental principle is the same in both classes of cases. It is that the plaintiff's condition, resulting from his prior negligence or wrong, is not a direct and proximate cause of the latter injury, inflicted by one who acts independently, with knowledge of this condition and in reference to it. The principle has been generally recognized, both in England and America.[90] * * *

We are of opinion that the jury in the present case might have found that the plaintiff was free from any negligence that was a direct and proximate cause of the injury.

VANDALIA R. CO. v. CLEM.

Action against the railway company for damages caused by the defendant's train running into and killing the plaintiff's team, and destroying his wagon, while standing in defendant's freight yards. A demurrer to the complaint for lack of facts was overruled. The defendant then answered in denial. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff.

The complaint, after setting out the circumstances attending the entry of the plaintiff's team upon the defendant's property, and the resulting accident contained these averments:

"That within a few minutes after the plaintiff's said team had so entered upon defendant's said railroad track at said place, and at about 5:30 o'clock in the evening, and while it was too dark to see said team and wagon, without light, at a sufficient distance ahead of said engine as it approached them from the west to stop said train, at the rate of speed at which it was then running—30 miles per hour—and prevent its running over said team and wagon, said defendant, without a light, and without a lookout on said engine, and without said yards being in any way lighted, recklessly, wantonly, and willfully, and without seeing or endeavoring to see said wagon and team so confined upon its tracks and switchyard, and without any care or regard for the lives or safety of persons or teams upon said yards or tracks, recklessly and willfully ran said train on, against, and over said team, wagon, and harness while it was so confined upon said defendant's main track in or adjoining to its switchyards, and thereby willfully and wantonly crushed and killed both of plaintiff's said horses, and destroyed said wagon and harness, to his damage in the sum of $350, all of which occurred through the willfulness and recklessness of said defendant in so operating its said train, without any fault or negligence whatever on the part of this plaintiff."

ADAMS, J. * * * In the complaint before us, it is averred that the defendant "recklessly and willfully ran said train against and over said team." If the train was willfully run over the team, it implies that the injury was committed not only with purpose and in-

The rule has often been applied in favor of plaintiffs whose intoxication prevented them from using care to protect themselves from the consequences of a subsequent act of negligence of another person, done with knowledge of their intoxication. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. (1900) 70 N. H. 607, 50 Atl. 103, 54 L. R. A. 955; Kean v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. (1884) 61 Md. 154; Fox v. Michigan Central R. R. Co. (1904) 138 Mich. 433, 101 N. tent, but with knowledge as well. Such is the meaning of "willful." 8 Words and Phrases, 7468. This charge, standing alone, we think would make the complaint good as an action for willful injury, but it does not stand alone. In the same sentence it is averred that the train was run "without seeing or endeavoring to see said wagon and team." This would be negligence. But, there are no degrees of negligence, and negligence, no matter how reprehensible, can never approximate willfulness. The two conditions have nothing in common and everything in conflict. The specific averment that defendant did not see nor try to see the team charges negligence, and must control the general averment that the injury was willfully committed.

We therefore conclude that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for willful injury, and, as contributory negligence affirmatively appears by the complaint, it does not state a cause of action for negligence. * * *

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to grant a new trial and to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.[91]

DOHR v. WISCONSIN CENT. RY. CO.

This was an action to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate through the alleged negligence of the defendant railway company. There was a judgment below for the plaintiff; the defendant appeals.

TIMLIN, J. In this case the jury found the decedent and the defendant each guilty of negligence contributing to cause death, and that the negligence for which the defendant was responsible was greater than that of the decedent, and contributed in a greater degree to the injury and death of decedent. The case is presented by counsel for the appellant describing the negligence of decedent as gross negligence, or a very high degree of ordinary negligence, while the counsel for respondent minimizes this and contends that the facts show gross negligence on the part of the other erring servant of the appellant.

As we look at the facts, neither of these contentions can be upheld. On a very dark, foggy morning on September 12, 1908, the decedent, section foreman for defendant, started out at 7 o'clock with another section man on his hand car, bound west from Sherwood Station to a point called High Cliff Junction about 1½ miles distant. Between Sherwood and High Cliff, and a mile west of Sherwood, there is a whistling post for that station; a quarter of a mile further west a highway crossing. The first regular train from the west was due at Sherwood at 7:42 o'clock that morning, and this would give the hand car time to reach High Cliff. Decedent went on the hand car at the usual hour of going to work in the discharge of his duty, and he had on the hand car some tools and implements and lunch pails, and proceeded at a moderate rate of speed without stopping until the moment of collision, but looking and listening for an approaching train. Irregular trains were liable to be sent over this road at any time. The section men were requested to look out for all passing trains and were furnished with time-tables of regular trains. The collision was with an irregular train. The verdict of the jury that the deceased was guilty of lack of ordinary care, which contributed to cause his death, is well supported on this evidence, but there was nothing of extraordinary recklessness in going out to work on a very foggy morning in this way. At 6:50 o'clock there left Menasha, or Menasha Junction, east-bound, a locomotive engine and caboose, which collided with this hand car at a point about 4,000 feet west of Sherwood. There was evidence tending to show that the locomotive engineer failed to sound his whistle at the first highway crossing west of Sherwood, or at the milepost one mile west of Sherwood, and was proceeding eastwardly at the rate of 22 miles per hour in this dense fog. There was also evidence tending to show that the headlight of this locomotive engine had been accidentally extinguished prior to the collision, and also that it was not feasible to tell, from the engineer's position in the cab on a foggy day, whether or not the headlight was burning. There was here no more than ordinary negligence. The rate of speed was not unusual, although rather high for an irregular train in such a fog; the failure to sound the whistle was to some degree explained, but not excused, by the difficulty of determining the exact location of the engine in the fog. The lack of headlight was not known to the engineer. He was running ahead of the passenger train. So that instead of measuring gross negligence, or a very high degree of ordinary negligence, against the like we are measuring ordinary negligence against ordinary negligence and the question is, Was there, as required by our statute, evidence from which the jury might say that the negligence of the decedent was slighter than that of the engineer, and the negligence of the engineer contributed in a greater degree than did that of decedent to cause the death of the latter?

Each of these employés of the defendant was, we presume, discharging his duty as such in good faith. The decedent took the chances of going against an irregular train in this fog, relying upon his ability to escape and remove his hand car after hearing the whistle or seeing the headlight. He had full information that he was expected to protect himself against any irregular train that might happen along. This lack of care had the proper causal connection with his death, recognized in the law as proximate cause. The engineer should have known that there might be travelers making the crossing, or section men working on the track, and he should have sounded his whistle at the crossing and at the milepost, and in case he could not see the crossing post or milepost, he should have sounded his whistle quite continuously, as a warning to section men, and perhaps should also have decreased his speed to about that of an ordinary vehicle.

When there is a collision between two vehicles traveling in opposite directions on the same track and the ordinary negligence of the person in charge of each vehicle has caused the collision, and one of such persons is injured or killed, the court must, notwithstanding subdivision 5 of section 1816, St., as amended by chapter 254, Laws 1907, when the point is properly raised, search the evidence and ascertain whether anything appears from which the jury would be authorized to find that the negligence of the injurer was greater and contributed in a greater degree to cause the injury, than that of the injured servant. Kiley v. R. R. Co., 138 Wis. 215, 119 N. W. 309, 120 N. W. 756. * * *

For the instant case, it is enough to say that here each servant of the railroad company, the injured and the injurer, was of equal rank and authority in the management of the vehicle used and controlled by him. The responsibility resting on each for his safety and the safety of the group co-operating with him, and for the safety of the other negligent servant and his co-operating group, and for the safety of passenger trains, was at least equal. The opportunities for anticipating and avoiding danger were at least equal. The necessity for the injurer to continue his course without stopping was more imperative and necessary. The rules of employment required the injured servant to exercise diligence to keep out of the way of the injurer. The actionable fact, death, resulted from the collision of the two vehicles the simultaneous and indivisible result of two vehicles negligently moved in opposite directions, to a meeting point on the same track. Ordinary care on the part of the injured servant in the very particular in which the jury must have found him negligent would have avoided the injury, notwithstanding the negligence of the injurer. The culpability of the injurer in forgetting or failing to blow his locomotive whistle more frequently as a warning to the trackmen was equal to the culpability of the injured in taking out his subordinate on a hand car and proceeding along the track in the unusual fog, when a train might be expected to move down upon them. We may presume the injured relied on his ability to get out of the way after hearing the whistle and the injurer on the rule of the employment, that the injured must keep out of the way of trains. Under such circumstances, there is no evidence from which a court or a jury can say that the negligence of the injured was slighter than that of the injurer. The judgment must therefore be reversed.

This makes it unnecessary to decide whether, in the instant case, there was any evidence from which the jury might infer that the negligence of the injurer contributed in a greater degree than the negligence of the injured to cause the injury. Whether the jury could consider the greater weight and impact of the locomotive as a more potent cause of the injury and thus contributing in a greater degree, or the failure to sound the whistle as expected, and the tendency of such failure to induce the injured servant to continue in his careless course on the track, or the more imperative duty to continue resting upon the injurer, or the rule of the railroad by which the injured was informed that he must rely on himself to keep out of the way of trains, as bearing on this second requirement of the statute, need not be decided.

Judgment reversed and the cause remanded with directions to enter judgment for defendant.

WINSLOW, C. J. As I see this case, duty compels me to dissent.

When two persons are negligent and injury to one proximately results from the combined negligence of both, it must often be a very delicate and difficult question to decide whether the negligence of one was greater than that of the other, and contributed in a greater degree to produce the injury. There is no yardstick with which to measure the two acts of negligence, nor scales with which to weigh them. However, the Legislature has determined that in certain classes of cases this delicate question shall be decided, and that upon its decision shall depend liability, and this court has sustained and applied that law. It is not inherently more difficult to decide, than many another question which courts and juries are daily compelled to decide. * * *

In the present case it seems to me there are unquestionably facts from which reasonable minds might draw different conclusions, both as to the quantum of negligence on each side and as to the degree in which such negligence proximately contributed to cause the injury.

The deceased and his comrades were going to their work as their duty required, and they were going in the way they were expected to go. The evidence tends to show that they were proceeding slowly and carefully; their car was light and could be quickly stopped and lifted from the track out of danger; they knew that no regular train was due; they also knew there were two or three highway crossings directly ahead of them, as well as the station whistling post, and that any approaching locomotive was required to whistle at all of these places. On the other hand, the engineer of the approaching engine knew that he was running wild; he knew, or should have known, that section men would probably be on their way to work; he was driving his engine through the fog at a speed of over 20 miles an hour without whistling at the road crossings; he was in charge, not of a light vehicle which could be stopped in few feet distance and taken from the track, but of a ponderous mass of steel and iron, which was hurtling over the rails at a speed which rendered it impossible of ready control, and which would probably deal death and destruction to any one rightfully on the crossings or on the track, and did not know of its approach till it emerged from the fog. Knowing all these things, he sounded no whistle and came upon the deceased and his fellow workmen with his engine of death, like a ball shot from a cannon.

Grant that it must be said that the deceased and his colleagues were guilty of negligence, is there no room upon these facts for a reasonable mind to conclude that the negligence of the engineer was not only greater, but contributed in a greater degree, to the injury? I think there is ample room for such a conclusion, and so thinking, I cannot agree with the result reached by the court in this case.[92]

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice SIEBECKER agrees with the views expressed in this opinion.

[92] A portion of the opinion of Timlin, J., citing and commenting on a number of cases, is omitted, as is also part of the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice.

"The doctrine of comparative negligence has been stated as follows: 'The degrees of negligence must be measured and considered, and whenever it shall appear that the plaintiff's negligence is comparatively slight and that of the defendant gross, he should not be deprived of his action.' Galena Ry. v. Jacobs [1858] 20 Ill. 478. This doctrine was made part of the law of Wisconsin by statute in 1907, and a similar doctrine has been enunciated in the statutes of Florida and Georgia. See also the remark of Robertson, C., in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Elsing (1913) 37 Okl. 333, 132 Pac. 483, 486: "Evidently it was not the intention of the court to instruct on either of these doctrines of negligence but on the doctrine of comparative negligence, which provides that plaintiff may recover, although he is himself guilty of contributory negligence, if that negligence is slight and if the negligence of the defendant is gross in comparison. We are forced to this conclusion by the language of the instruction itself, especially the last sentence thereof, which provides that the negligence of the plaintiff, may be considered by the jury in mitigation of damages, which in effect means that the jury may weigh and apportion the concurring acts of negligence of both plaintiff and defendant. The jury under this instruction, to say the least, were inferentially, or impliedly, given authority to determine the degree of negligence of both parties and to apportion the same between them in order to correctly estimate the amount of plaintiff's recovery, and they were thereby in effect told that the defendant was not entitled to its defense of contributory negligence which is granted to it, and to all other litigants, under our Constitution and laws. This instruction is therefore erroneous and does not state the law in this state, for here there can be no recovery by a plaintiff who is guilty of contributory negligence. The doctrine of comparative negligence has no place in the consideration of this case and should not have been given by the court in its charge to the jury as was done in this instruction. The doctrine of comparative negligence has been adopted by statutory provision in several of the states, to wit, Florida (Act June 7, 1887, c. 3744), Georgia (Civ. Code 1895, 2322), Mississippi (Laws 1910, c. 135) Texas (Acts 31st Leg. [1st Ex. Sess.] c. 10), and Wisconsin (Laws 1907, c. 254). This doctrine was recognized by the courts of Illinois until recently. It is now repudiated there. Krieger v. Railroad Co. [1909] 242 Ill. 544, 90 N. E. 266; Vittum v. Drury [1911] 161 Ill. App. 603. It has been said to have obtained in Kansas. This, however, is erroneous. See Railway Co. v. Walters [1908] 78 Kan. 39, 96 Pac. 346."

SMITH et al. v. CITY OF SHAKOPEE.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Eighth Circuit, 1900. 44 C. C. A. 1, 103 Fed. 240.)

This was an admiralty case which originated in the state of Minnesota and grew out of damage to the steamer Daisy, caused by running into the draw of a bridge across the Minnesota river. This bridge had been constructed by the defendant, the city of Shakopee. The libelants allege in substance:

That they were the owners of the steamer Daisy, and that on June 15, 1896, at the hour of 2 o'clock a. m., as the said steamer was proceeding down the Minnesota river with an excursion party from St. Paul, which had been spending the day at Chaska, she ran into the draw of the aforesaid bridge, and carried away her smokestack and injured her pilot house and some of her upper works. It was alleged that the collision in question, and the consequent injuries to the steamer, were occasioned because the lights on said bridge were at the time insufficient to disclose the position of the draw, and because the draw was carelessly and negligently opened by the bridge tender who was in the employ of the City of Shakopee, and because the lights on the draw were so negligently displayed as to deceive the pilot and master as to the position of the draw.[93]

The District Court directed that the libel be dismissed. The libelants appealed.

THAYER, Circuit Judge. * * * In our former decision[94] we said in substance that the proximate or efficient cause of the collision with the bridge seems to have been that the pilot attempted to pass through the draw before he was assured that it was fully opened. This conclusion was induced, however, by the finding that the bridge was provided with adequate lights, considering its location and the amount of navigation on the Minnesota river, to meet the requirements of the common law. The same conclusion cannot be formed on the present occasion, since it was the duty of the city to provide such lights as are required by the regulations of the lighthouse board, and, if such lights had been provided, the position of the three green lights would have shown at a glance when the draw was fully swung. The city was at fault, therefore, in not furnishing the requisite lights.

On the other hand, we think that the pilot and the captain, one or both of them, did not exercise that degree of care and circumspection which they should have exercised, in attempting to pass through the draw before they were assured that it was fully swung. Even if the city was at fault in failing to provide the requisite lights, those in charge of the steamer had no right to attempt to pass through the bridge until they had taken the precaution to ascertain that the passage could be made in safety. The conditions were such that the steamer could have been held at a safe distance from the bridge until the men who were in charge of the draw had advised the pilot that the draw was fully swung and ready for the passage of the steamer; and such action, we think, should have been taken. The case is one, in our judgment, where the accident was occasioned by the concurring negligence of both parties, and in such cases the admiralty rule is to divide the damages. The Max Morris, 137 U. S. 1, 9, 11 Sup. Ct. 29, 34 L. Ed. 536; The Britannia, 153 U. S. 130, 144, 14 Sup. Ct. 795, 38 L. Ed. 660; The Lisbonense, 53 Fed. 293, 3 C. C. A. 539.

[93] The statement of facts is slightly abridged.

[94] Part of the opinion is omitted. The "former decision" will be found in 97 Fed. 974, 38 C. C. A. 617 (1899).

There is some uncertainty in the proof as to the true amount of the damages that were occasioned by the collision, but we are satisfied by an investigation of the evidence on that point that they did not exceed $1,000. The decree of the district court directing that the libel be dismissed is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court with directions to vacate said decree, and in lieu thereof to enter a decree in favor of the libelants for the sum of $500 and costs.[95]

III. Assumption of Risk as an Excuse

The doctrine of volenti non fit injuria stands outside the defence of contributory negligence and is in no way limited by it. In individual instances the two ideas sometimes seem to cover the same ground, but carelessness is not the same thing as intelligent choice, and the Latin maxim often applies when there has been no carelessness at all. A confusion of ideas has frequently been created in accident cases by an assumption that negligence to the many who are ignorant may be properly treated as negligence as regards the one individual who knows and runs the risk, and by dealing with the case as if it turned only on a subsequent investigation into contributory negligence. In many instances it is immaterial to distinguish between the two defences, but the importance of the distinction was pointed out both by Erle, C. J., in his summing up to the jury in Indermaur v. Dames, Law Rep. 1 C. P. at 277, and by Cockburn, C. J., in Woodley v. Metropolitan District Ry. Co., 2 Ex. D. 384.[96]

[96] Compare the remark of Erle J., Id. p. 277: "To my mind, there would not be the least symptom of want of due care as between the defendant and a person (permanently) employed on his premises, because the sugar-baking business requires a lift on the premises, which must be as well known to the persons employed there as the top of a staircase in every dwelling house. But that which may be no negligence towards men ordinarily employed upon the premises, may be negligence towards strangers lawfully coming upon the premises in the course of their business."

Compare the remark of Cockburn, C. J., Id. p. 390: "That which would be negligence in a company, with reference to the state of their premises

COOK v. JOHNSTON.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1885. 58 Mich. 437, 25 N. W. 388, 55 Am. Rep. 703.)

Case. Defendant brings error.

CAMPBELL, J. Plaintiff recovered damages in the sum of $3,000 for personal injuries claimed to have been caused by defendant's negligence whereby it is alleged a fire was set in a shed occupied by the plaintiff. The facts as relied upon were that plaintiff's husband was a tenant of defendant, occupying a wing of her house at the corner of Sixteenth and Canfield streets in Detroit. Behind the house was a low shed divided into three parts by internal partitions from five to six feet high, of which defendant occupied the middle one, and plaintiff's husband the adjoining one at the north end. In the middle partition was a water-closet used by defendant and her tenants jointly. In this middle part, on the side furthest from Mr. Cook's, was an ash barrel, which Mr. Cook described as a stout, iron-bound cask, such as is used for liquids. Plaintiff claims that the fire was caused by ashes in this barrel. She and her husband, as they testify, were awakened by the light of the fire burning through the top of this middle part, and as soon as they could they went into their own part and undertook to get out their horse, that was lying down so that she could not easily loose the halter. While trying to do this the fire swept over the partition and burned her very severely, so as to nearly or quite disable her from doing her accustomed work.

The principal question in the case was upon the liability of the defendant if the fire took from negligence for which she may have been chargeable for the damages on which recovery was had in this case.

The plaintiff showed by her testimony that she and her husband saw the ash-barrel daily and knew all about its position. It also appears by the showing of both that the shed, which was entirely open within from end to end, above the partitions, was burning so brightly as to wake them up, and continued burning when they entered to loose the horse and get out the buggy. The danger was before their eyes, and what happened by the sweeping down of the flames was or the manner of conducting their business, so as to give a right to compensation for an injury resulting therefrom to a stranger lawfully resorting to their premises in ignorance of the existence of the danger, will give no such right to one, who being aware of the danger, voluntarily encounters it, and fails to take the extra care necessary for avoiding it. The same observation arises as before: with full knowledge of the manner in which the traffic was carried on, and of the danger attendant on it, the plaintiff thought proper to remain in the employment. No doubt he thought that by the exercise of extra vigilance and care on his part the danger might be avoided. By a want of particular care in depositing one of his tools he exposed himself to the danger, and unfortunately suffered from it. He cannot, I think, make the company liable for injury arising from danger to which he voluntarily exposed himself."

as likely to happen as not. It is not very important by what name the action of plaintiff should be called. It was such a risk as she chose to take, to save her husband's property. But it was a plain and palpable risk nevertheless, and the injury would not have occurred unless for her voluntary act in assuming the exposure.

There is some conflict in the cases concerning what damages have been held not too remote for recovery. But it would be going beyond all reason to hold a person liable for bodily injuries suffered by another in voluntarily and deliberately entering a burning wooden shed not divided into detached parts, and reached by the flames while at work within it. The loss of presence of mind under such circumstances is one of the commonest and most likely incidents of incurring such an exposure. The act in which she was engaged may have been such as she may have thought proper and laudable, and worth some risk, but defendant's responsibility cannot be created or increased by such independent and voluntary conduct of plaintiff in putting herself in harm's way.

We think that no recovery should have been had on the facts as shown by plaintiff herself, and that the case should not have gone to the jury.

The judgment must be reversed with costs and a new trial granted.

OSBORNE v. LONDON & N. W. RY. CO.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1888. 21 Q. B. Div. 220.)

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the Judge of the County Court at Birmingham in an action to recover damages for personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants in allowing a flight of steps to be in a dangerous condition.

The plaintiff in his evidence at the trial stated that he was a season-ticket holder on the defendants' line, that on the morning of March 21, 1887, he went down the steps to the platform of the station at Perry Barr to take the train to Birmingham, that he went down a flight of stone steps leading to the platform, which were covered with a light layer of snow which had been trodden down and frozen over, that the steps were worn and hollowed, and were slippery, that he went down carefully and not in a hurry, but slipped on the steps, and fell, and dislocated his wrist.

In cross-examination he said that there were wooden steps leading to the platform on the other side of the line, that his train started from the platform to which the wooden steps led, that sometimes he went one way and sometimes the other, that the stone steps were on the side nearest to his house, that by going down the stone steps and crossing the line he saved going round by the bridge by which the road was carried over the railway, that the steps were dangerous without snow, that he thought it was dangerous to go down, and went down carefully, and took hold of the rail to prevent slipping, that he thought holding the rail was sufficient.

The County Court Judge was of opinion that the accident was primarily caused by the worn and defective state of the steps, which was aggravated by the frosty weather, which made them slippery in addition, that the steps had not been properly and efficiently swept and cleaned from the caked snow, which, added to the worn condition of the steps, caused the plaintiff to fall, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £25, the amount being agreed.

Alfred Young, for the defendants. Notwithstanding the findings of fact as to negligence the defendants are entitled to judgment. The plaintiff's own admission that he knew there was some danger shows that he voluntarily elected to go down the stone steps with full knowledge of the risk he was incurring. The maxim "Volenti non fit injuria" therefore applies, and prevents the plaintiff from being entitled to recover: Thomas v. Quartermaine, 17 Q. B. D. 414, affirmed 18 Q. B. D. 685. It is true that the burden of proof lies upon the defendants, but they have satisfied the burden of proof by the plaintiff's own evidence, and for the purpose of establishing this defence it is unnecessary to rely on the evidence of the witnesses called for the defendants.

WILLS, J. * * * For the purposes of the present case it is enough to take the view expressed by Lord Esher, M. R., in Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q. B. D. at p. 657, where he says: "I see nothing in the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine, 18 Q. B. D. 685, to prevent the plaintiff from recovering in this case, unless the circumstances were such as to warrant a jury in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran, impliedly agreed to incur it."

It seems to me to follow that in such a case as the present, where the existence of negligence on the part of the defendants, and the absence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, are specifically found as matters of fact, if the defendants desire to succeed on the ground that the maxim "Volenti non fit injuria" is applicable, they must obtain a finding of fact "that the plaintiff freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran, impliedly agreed to incur it." I agree with Mr. Wills that this is a question of fact, and, this being so, it follows that the defendants could not succeed unless either they had a finding of fact in their favour, or we had all the facts before us, so that we were in a position to decide the question. I entertain some doubt as to how far this question has been dealt with by the County Court Judge. Mr. Young says it was argued before him, but it does not appear that he gave any specific decision on it. It may be that he said nothing about the question because it seemed to him to be quite clear, and if that were so he would not have found the fact in favour of the defendants; or he may have inadvertently omitted to refer to the point, in which case it would be open to us to deal with it. If I had had to decide this point as a question of fact I should have thought it necessary that the plaintiff should be asked more questions than he was asked in cross-examination. It is clear from his evidence that he knew there was some danger, but the contention on behalf of the defendants, that this circumstance is sufficient to entitle them to succeed, entirely gives the go-by to the observations of Lord Esher, M. R., in Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q. B. D. at p. 657, which I have already quoted, and those of Bowen, L. J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine, 18 Q. B. D. at p. 696, which were referred to in the course of the argument. Those observations go far to make it hard for a defendant to succeed on such a defence as that relied on here, for it is probable that juries would often find for plaintiffs on the ground that they had not full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk, but that cannot be helped. These judgments introduce an important qualification of the maxim "Volenti non fit injuria."

In the present case the plaintiff may well have misapprehended the extent of the difficulty and danger which he would encounter in descending the steps; for instance, he might easily be deceived as to the condition of the snow; I know quite enough about ice and snow to know how easy it is to make such a mistake, and it is one that has cost many a man his life. In order to succeed the defendants should have gone further in cross-examination, for, unless the question of fact had been found in their favour, the application of the maxim on which they relied could not be established. The County Court Judge has not found the fact the defendants need; and upon the present materials I certainly am not prepared to supply the deficiency.

For these reasons, the onus of proof being on the defendants, I think that on the evidence as it stands their defence is not made out, and therefore their appeal must be dismissed.[97]

[97] Part of the opinion of Wills, J., and all of the opinion of Grantham, J., are omitted.

Compare the remark of Bowen, L. J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine (1887) 18 Q. B. D. 685, 696: "It is no doubt true that the knowledge on the part of the injured person which will prevent him from alleging negligence against the occupier must be a knowledge under such circumstances as leads necessarily to the conclusion that the whole risk was voluntarily incurred. The maxim, be it observed, is not 'scienti non fit injuria,' but 'volenti.' It is plain that mere knowledge may not be a conclusive defence."

And see 1 Beven's Negligence (3d Ed.) 632: "It [the maxim 'Volenti non fit injuria'] is found also in the Canon Law; where it appears in the form 'Scienti et consentienti non fit injuria neque dolus.' This is a notable testimony to Bowen, L. J.'s legal insight, according exactly with his observation that the 'maxim is not "scienti non fit injuria," but "volenti"'; that 'mere knowledge may not be a conclusive defence.'"

Accord: Ward v. Dampskibselskabet Kjoebenhaven (D. C., 1905) 136 Fed. 502: (The plaintiff's intestate, Dr. Ward, went on board the defendant's steamship, lying at quarantine, in the performance of his duty as quaran-

WRIGHT v. CITY OF ST. CLOUD.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 54 Minn. 94, 55 N. W. 819.)

Action against the city of St. Cloud to recover for a personal injury received by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff had judgment; the defendant appeals.

MITCHELL, J. This was an action to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant, in permitting snow and ice to accumulate and remain upon a public sidewalk so as to render it unsafe for travel. The only question is whether the evidence justified the verdict. The accident occurred in the latter part of February, in the residence part of the city, about seven squares from its business center. Abutting this part of the sidewalk there was unoccupied property about 80 feet in width. On either side the occupants had kept the sidewalk in good order, but opposite this property the snow had not been removed during the entire winter, and the result was that it had gradually accumulated to the depth of from one to two feet, through which pedestrians had trodden a narrow, irregular path. As the result of successive falls and drifting of snow, and alternate thawing and freezing, in connection with the continual travel, this path had become quite rough, uneven, and icy, having gradually grown worse as the winter advanced. As different witnesses described it, "it had hollowed out, and left ridges;" "the humps, holes, and hollows were quite noticeable;" "it had hollowed tine physician. It was at night, dark and misty. The hatches of the ship were open, for she was coaling, which was unusual at night. After performing his duties, Dr. Ward, with the master of the vessel and a Capt. Bellevou, who was superintending the coaling of the vessel, started to return from the cabin aft by the open hatch, and after walking about 12 feet were stopped to permit the workmen to pass a bucket of coal to the hatch. The open hatch was about 40 feet from the master's cabin, 3 feet wide by 5 feet long, and the passageway between it and the rail on the starboard side was 2 feet 5½ inches wide at its narrowest and 2 feet 11½ inches at the widest point. At a point 2 feet 4 inches aft the aft end of the open hatch, a smokestack guy, fastened to the deck near the rail, led off toward the port side at an angle requiring a man either to stoop or move in the direction of the open hatch to pass under it. After stopping to permit the bucket of coal to pass, Capt. Bellevou and the doctor continued their return journey, the master remaining behind. The captain was slightly in the rear of the doctor, and nearer the rail, and had his hand upon the doctor's shoulder. As they neared the hatch, Capt. Bellevou said to him, "Doctor, be careful;" he answered, "That is all right." The captain again said, "Doctor, mind the hatch;" and he responded, "That's all right, captain." They had proceeded to the aft end of the hatch, when Dr. Ward stepped into the open hatchway, and fell 35 feet to the bottom of the vessel. The hatch coverings had been placed in the passageway over which they traveled, filling the passage nearly to the top coaming of the hatch. Dr. Ward had been on the vessel before in his official capacity, but was not thoroughly acquainted with its arrangement. He had been told the hatch was open, and no doubt saw it, but under circumstances with no light shining out of the hatch to show him exactly the dimensions and extent of the opening, and only a diffused light above, the rays of which were not especially directed to the opening, and so located as to rather blind the inexperienced.)

out places sort of sidling and saucer shaped;" "was full of holes and hummocks from two to four inches deep;" "the bottom was uneven and sidling." These and similar descriptions clearly photograph in the mind of any one familiar with such things a distinct picture of the irregular and uneven path trodden by pedestrians through snow as frequently seen on neglected sidewalks, in the winter time, in the residence portions of most towns, the condition of which grows gradually worse as the winter advances. About noon on a somewhat cold, but bright and pleasant, day, the plaintiff was traveling this walk, on her way home from church. She had not traveled this side of the street that winter, and had no previous knowledge of its condition. On reaching this part of the walk she admits that she looked at it, and saw its condition before she started across. She says she "had no idea it was as bad as it was," but it is impossible, under the circumstances, that she did not see and understand its general character, and the consequent difficulty in traveling it, and the danger of slipping and falling in doing so. In fact she admits that she saw these ridges and hollows, and that it occurred to her, the minute she reached it, that it was a dangerous place to walk. She knew that the sidewalk on the opposite side of the street (on which her residence was) was in good condition, and that she could entirely avoid the danger by retracing her steps 100 feet to a street crossing, and going over to the other side of the street; but instead of doing so she proceeded, and, in going across, slipped and fell, and sustained the injuries complained of. The defendant's contentions are (1) that there was no evidence of its negligence; and (2) that the evidence conclusively showed that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. * * *

But conceding, what we think the evidence tends to show, that the city was negligent, we think it also appears clearly that the plaintiff herself was lacking in ordinary care. We have held, in common with every other court, that the mere fact that a person attempts to travel a highway after notice that it is out of repair is not necessarily negligence; that this depends on circumstances. Erd v. City of St. Paul, 22 Minn. 443; Estelle v. Village of Lake Crystal, 27 Minn. 243, 6 N. W. 775; Kelly v. Railway Co., 28 Minn. 98, 9 N. W. 588; McKenzie v. City of Northfield, 30 Minn. 456, 16 N. W. 264; Nichols v. Minneapolis, 33 Minn. 430, 23 N. W. 868, 53 Am. Rep. 56. But none of these cases were altogether analogous in their facts to the present one. In all of them it will be found either that the traveler had no other practicable road, and had either to pass over the defective way, or abandon his journey, or that, although aware that the road or walk was out of repair, he had no knowledge of the existence of the particular defect which caused the injury, or that the accident occurred in the dark, and that the traveler, although having previous knowledge of the situation, had not presently in mind the existence of the defect, or the consequent risk. But in the present case, while plaintiff might not have known of the existence or location of any particular hollow or hole in this path, it is very clear from her own testimony that she had full and present knowledge of the precise condition of this part of the sidewalk, and of the risk incident to traveling over it. The only risk was that of slipping and falling, and that was perfectly patent to any one of ordinary intelligence. She simply overestimated her own ability to travel across it without falling. There was no necessity of her going over the defect, but she could have easily, and without appreciable inconvenience, have avoided it, by going across to the other side of the street, where the walk was perfectly safe. Under such circumstances she was not in the exercise of reasonable care, but must be presumed to have taken her chances, and having done so, and an injury having resulted, she cannot recover from the city. No different rule as to contributory negligence, or assumption of risks, whichever it is called, is to be applied from that which would be applied to any other case; and, if the plaintiff had exercised half as much care for her own safety as she exacts from the city for the safety of travelers, the accident would never have occurred. Wilson v. City of Charlestown, 8 Allen (Mass.) 137, 85 Am. Dec. 693; Schaefler v. Sandusky, 33 Ohio St. 246, 31 Am. Rep. 533; Horton v. Inhabitants of Ipswich, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 488; City of Quincy v. Barker, 81 Ill. 300, 25 Am. Rep. 278.

Judgment reversed.[98]

MALOY v. CITY OF ST. PAUL.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 54 Minn. 398, 56 N. W. 94.)

Action against the city of St. Paul to recover for a personal injury received by the plaintiff because of a defective sidewalk. Plaintiff had a verdict, and appeals from an order granting a new trial.

COLLINS, J. * * * The defect was in the walk in front of the lot on which plaintiff resided with her husband, and close by their dwelling. The planks in the walk at this particular point had been laid lengthwise, and one had been broken down, so that there was a hole about 18 inches long and about 6 inches in width, at the widest place. The walk had been laid 6 inches above the surface of the ground. It had been in this defective condition for more than three months, and plaintiff had known of this all of the time. She had passed by this break or hole daily for more than two months prior to the evening of this accident, carefully avoiding the dangerous place. When the accident occurred, there was a light snow upon the walk, partly filling the hole, and the snow was still falling. About dark, plaintiff, who was 50 years of age, having occasion to go to a neighbor's went out on the walk, and, stepping into the hole, was thrown down, thus receiving the injuries complained of. She testified that the falling snow was blown into her eyes so that her vision was obstructed, and also that she did not think of the defect as she walked along. It did not appear from the testimony that there was anything to distract her attention, and, because there was nothing justifying or excusing inattention to the well-known condition of the walk, the court below ordered a new trial.

In accordance with the prevailing rule everywhere, it has again and again been held by this court that previous knowledge of the condition of a street or sidewalk is not conclusive evidence of contributory negligence, so as to bar a recovery by a person injured in consequence of its being out of repair; and the cases were collated very recently in Wright v. City of St. Cloud, 54 Minn. 94, 55 N. W. 820, in which a recovery was denied because it was apparent from plaintiff's own testimony that she had full and present knowledge of the exact condition of the walk, and the risk incident to traveling upon it, and could easily have avoided it, and simply overestimated her own ability to go across, in broad daylight, without falling. On the facts the case at bar is not analogous. The defect here was not such as would or should have turned the prudent traveler off from the walk to seek a better route. The accident happened in the evening, when the snow was falling, blowing, and to some extent obscuring the vision of the plaintiff, and filling the hole in the walk. Although advised of the defect, she did not have it presently in mind. Nor is it necessary that the thoughts of a traveler should be at all times fixed upon defects in the street or sidewalk, of which he may have notice. George v. Haverhill, 110 Mass. 506; Barton v. City of Springfield, 110 Mass. 131. It is certain that previous knowledge of the existence of a defect has an important, and oftentimes a decisive, bearing upon the question of contributory negligence; but mere inattention to a known danger, on the part of this plaintiff, cannot be held to conclude her. * * *

JUDSON v. GIANT POWDER CO.

(Supreme Court of California, 1895. 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146.)

In an action against the Powder Company for damages caused by explosion resulting from its alleged negligence, the plaintiff below recovered judgment for $41,165.75. From this judgment, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, the Powder Company appeals.

GAROUTTE, J. * * * The damages to respondents' property were occasioned by an explosion of nitro-glycerine, in process of manufacture into dynamite, in appellant's powder factory, situated upon the shore of the bay of San Francisco. Appellant's factory buildings were arranged around the slope of a hill facing the bay. Nearest to respondents' property was the nitro-glycerine house; next was the washing-house; next were the mixing houses; then came the packing-houses, and finally the two magazines used for storing dynamite. These various buildings were situated from 50 to 150 feet apart, and a tramway ran in front of them. The explosion occurred in the morning during working hours, and originated in the nitro-glycerine house. There followed, within a few moments of time, in regular order, the explosion of the other buildings, the two magazines coming last; but, though last, they were not least, for their explosion caused the entire downfall and destruction of respondents' factory, residences, and stock on hand. There is no question but that the cause of this series of explosions following the first is directly traceable, by reason of fire or concussion, to the nitro-glycerine explosion. Of the many employés of appellant engaged in and about the nitro-glycerine factory at the time of the disaster none were left to tell the tale. Hence, any positive testimony as to the direct cause of the explosion is not to be had. The witnesses who saw and knew, like all things else around, save the earth itself, were scattered to the four winds.

1. Respondents sold the premises to appellant for the manufacture of dynamite, and it is claimed that the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, applies, and therefore no recovery can be had. We attach but little importance to this contention. The grant of these premises for the purpose of a dynamite factory in no way carried to appellant the right to conduct its factory, as against the grantors, in any and every way it might see fit. There is no principle of law sustaining such a proposition. Let it be conceded that respondents, by reason of their grant, could not invoke the aid of a court of equity to prevent the appellant from conducting its business; still that concession proves nothing. This action is not based upon the theory that appellant's business is a nuisance per se, but negligence in the manner in which the business was conducted was alleged in the complaint, and is now insisted upon as having been proved at the trial. In making the grant respondents had a right to assume that due care would be exercised in the conduct of the business, and certainly they have a right to demand that such care be exercised.

It is argued that the explosion of all powder-works is a mere matter of time; that such explosions are necessarily contemplated by every one who builds beside such works, or who brings dynamite into his dooryard. It is further contended that appellant gave to respondents actual notice of the dangerous character of its business by a previous explosion, which damaged respondents' property, and that respondents, by still continuing in business after such notice, in a degree assumed and ratified the risk, and cannot now be heard to complain. The only element of strength in this line of argument is its originality. The contention that in the ordinary course of events all powder-factories explode, conceding such to be the fact, presents an element foreign to the case. The doctrine of fatalism is not here involved. In the ordinary course of events the time for this explosion had not arrived, and appellant had no legal right to hasten that event by its negligent acts. Neither do we think respondents lost any legal rights by continuing to do business in this locality after being served with notice of the danger that surrounded them. While the notice was in the form of an object lesson, which came to them in no uncertain tones, yet appellant was not justified in serving it, nor were respondents negligent in disregarding it. Respondents were not bound to abandon their property, though negligence of appellant in the conduct of his factory was ever a menace and danger to their lives and property. Conceding that respondents, by their grant, thereby assumed certain risks and dangers which may be said to always surround the manufacture of dynamite, still they assumed no risks and waived no action for damages which might arise through appellant's negligence. Both reason and authority support this conclusion. * * *[1]

Judgment and order affirmed.

MAGAR v. HAMMOND.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1902. 171 N. Y. 377, 64 N. E. 150, 59 L. R. A. 315.)

Appeal from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a verdict and an order denying a motion for a new trial.

O'BRIEN, J. There is very little dispute with respect to the leading and important facts of this case, but the rule of law to be applied to the facts is not so clear. The defendant Hammond and his servant have been sued jointly in an action based upon a personal injury that the plaintiff sustained resulting from the servant's negligence, as is claimed. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff of $15,000 and the judgment has been unanimously affirmed below.

In the year 1893 Hammond purchased over three hundred acres of wild forest land in Sullivan county. By damming up small streams or springs and other operations he created an artificial lake upon the property of considerable dimensions. There was some low land free from timber which it seems furnished a natural bed for the lake, and it was surrounded by a dense growth of timber and bushes. Having created the lake he proceeded to stock it with trout. It seems that it was impossible for the fish to get into the lake through the dams on the surrounding springs or streams, but the fish were propogated by artificial means, and it became an industry that produced some revenue to the owner by selling the trout and permitting people to fish there for a compensation. He also built a house, boathouse and hatchery for trout spawn, in which it is said two million of the same were produced annually. He had to employ men to attend to the hatchery and otherwise in and about the property, and to prevent vermin from destroying the eggs. He prepared and posted notices around the tract to warn off trespassers, as prescribed by the statutes of the state.

[1] In the omitted portion of the opinion, the court reaches the conclusion, after an elaborate consideration of authority, that although all the witnesses of the accident had "been scattered to the four winds," there was still a prima facie case of negligence, in the principle of res ipsa loquitur.

The owner's co-defendant in this action was the night watchman, whose business it was to be on the lake at night to protect the fish from poachers and wild animals that frequently came to the place to take the fish. The owner had two guns, one a shotgun and the other a rifle. The watchman had been in the habit of carrying one or the other of the guns with him when on the lake in a boat for the purpose of killing muskrats, mink and other animals about the lake. He sometimes fired into the air in order to frighten off poachers. On the 9th day of June, 1899, the plaintiff and two other young men went to the lake to take fish, and were there after 10 o'clock in the evening, the night being very dark. They did some fishing and retired into the thick woods on the shore. It does not appear that the watchman had seen them or knew that they had been fishing, but the crackling of the brush in the woods indicated to him that some one was there, or at least the jury could have so found. There is no claim that the watchman knew that the plaintiff was in the woods, but there was some evidence tending to show that he knew or should have known that some human being was there, and the verdict affirms this proposition. The watchman had the rifle, and on hearing the noise in the woods fired at least three shots in the direction, and one of the bullets struck the plaintiff in the hip, inflicting a very serious if not permanent injury. The master was not present and knew nothing of the transaction, but he did know that the guns were on the premises and that the watchman was accustomed to use them in the manner and for the purposes described, and if he is responsible at all for the act of the servant it must be implied from these facts.

There were several propositions decided by the learned trial judge at the close of the case, which for all the purposes of this appeal must be treated as the law of the case. He ruled that there was no question for the jury and it could not be found that the shooting was willful or malicious, and the only question was whether the watchman was negligent and the owner responsible for such negligence. He instructed the jury that the plaintiff was guilty of a crime in going upon the defendant's premises to fish in the manner described, and that the defendant owed him no duty except to refrain from intentionally doing him an unnecessary injury or an injury through wanton or reckless negligence; that the owner gave no express authority to the watchman to shoot at any human being, but on the contrary ordered him not to shoot at any human being, and that there was no evidence that it was within the scope of his employment to so shoot; that there was no evidence in the case that either of the defendants intended or desired to injure any human being or expected that the shooting would result in such injury. The theory upon which the case was submitted to the jury will clearly appear by the following passage from the charge:

"Now the question which I will leave to you in this case, gentlemen, is this, and I hope you will understand it: Did this man Tompkins, when he fired in the night and into the woods as he did, have reason to believe that there were human beings there, or did he in fact know they were there? Did he know, when he fired into the woods as he did, that human beings were where he fired, or by the exercise of ordinary care could he have ascertained from what has been described here as having happened, that human beings were there, and knowing they were there, or having the ability to find out by the exercise of ordinary care, did he, notwithstanding that, wantonly, recklessly, fire in the direction where these human beings were? That is the vital question in this case. Because, as I have stated, this defendant had a right to have a watchman. The watchman had a right to have a gun. He had a right to have a rifle loaded with a bullet. He had a right to fire his gun in the night anywhere and as often as he pleased on his own land. But did Tompkins, when he fired on that occasion, know he was firing where there were human beings, or in the immediate proximity of where there were human beings, and knowing that, or being able to find it out by the exercise of ordinary care, did he still, recklessly and wantonly, discharge his bullet in the direction where these human beings were?"

It will be seen that the learned judge excluded from the jury very important elements tending to support the plaintiff's case. Willfulness, malice, intention to injure or desire or motive to do so, express authority from the owner and perhaps other elements were eliminated from the case. It is not very plain how the jury could, with all these elements excluded, have found that the shooting was wanton or reckless, assuming always that the watchman had the right to do all the things that the court held that he had, but it is quite likely that the form in which the case comes here precludes any discussion in this court upon the question. There is, however, an exception in the case that we think is fatal to the judgment.

The defendants' counsel asked the court to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff knew that the watchman on the lake was in the habit of discharging a gun and went there after receiving such information he cannot recover, even if the defendants or either of them were negligent, and that if the plaintiff knew or had heard that the lake was generally protected by a watchman who had and discharged a gun, there could be no recovery. The court refused to so charge, and the defendants' counsel excepted. This request embodied the general rule that where the negligence or misconduct of the injured party is a contributing cause of the injury he cannot recover, even though negligence could be imputed to the defendants. With all the elements to which reference has been made excluded from the case, the defendants were entitled to have the jury instructed that if the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to a known danger he could not recover for the act of the watchman, though this act, in defense of the master's property, was without due care, and that is the fair construction of the request. There was proof in the case, aside from the statutory notices warning intruders, which every one could see, that the plaintiff knew what other precautions the defendants had adopted for the protection of their property, including the use of firearms, and since the proposition amounted to a request to apply the general rule of law to these facts it was not a mere abstract one, but was applicable to the proofs in the case, and should have been given to the jury. It follows that the judgment must be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

Judgment reversed.[2]

DIXON v. NEW YORK, N. H. & H. R. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1910. 207 Mass. 126, 92 N. E. 1039.)

Tort against the railway company for personal injuries to the plaintiff in the defendant's freight yard. Coombs, a teamster, had lawfully driven into the yard. His horse, frightened at an approaching engine, was rearing and plunging, when the plaintiff went to the assistance of Coombs, and received the injuries complained of. The [2] Parker, C. J., and Gray, Haight, and Vann, JJ. (Bartlett, J., in result) concur. Martin, J., not voting.

This case came before the Court of Appeals again, in 1906. Magar v. Hammond (1906) 183 N. Y. 387, 76 N. E. 474, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1038. Here Cullen, C. J., delivering the opinion, remarked, "On the previous appeal we reversed the judgment recovered because of the refusal of the trial court to submit to the jury the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence. It will be seen, however, on an examination of the record then before us, that the case went to the jury on the theory of negligence, and that the question of whether such a theory could be upheld was not before us. If the defendants were to be held liable for negligence we held that to that liability the plaintiff's contributory negligence was a bar. Under the views that we have now expressed, however, that no liability of the defendants can be predicated on negligence, the contributory negligence or positive wrong of the plaintiff in trespassing on the premises becomes immaterial, for it was not the proximate cause of the injury for which he seeks to recover, and contributory negligence is not a defense to a willful or wanton wrong."

first count charged the defendant with a failure to use reasonable care; the second count charged it with reckless and wanton negligence. There was a verdict for plaintiff; the defendant excepts.

SHELDON, J. The jury could find on the evidence that Coombs was in a position of imminent peril, struggling to restrain a plunging horse upon or close to a track of the defendant upon which a train was approaching, and that the plaintiff came to his assistance for the purpose of rescuing him from the peril. The contention of the defendant that Coombs was endeavoring merely to save his master's property and that the plaintiff went upon the track for the sole purpose of assisting Coombs in this effort was for the jury to determine. It was not necessarily and as matter of law a trespass or a negligent act for the plaintiff to attempt to rescue Coombs from the impending danger, even at the risk of his own life. It was for the jury to say whether under the existing circumstances the plaintiff's act was so rash and reckless as to preclude a finding that he was in the exercise of due care and was justified in going upon the track. This is the doctrine of Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506, 30 Am. Rep. 692. And there is a great body of authority in other courts for the proposition that it may not be negligence for one not acting rashly or recklessly to expose himself voluntarily to great danger, even to the risk of life and limb, in order to rescue another from a like peril, and that such a voluntary exposure is not to be regarded as rash or reckless if there appears to be a fair chance of success, whether the person in danger is or is not a child or an aged or decrepit person, and even though the person attempting the rescue knows that it involves great hazard to himself without a certainty of accomplishing the intended rescue. The leading case is Eckert v. Long Island Railroad, 43 N. Y. 502, 3 Am. Rep. 721, and 57 Barb. (N. Y.) 555, the doctrine of which has been generally followed. * * *[3]

It is true, as was held in Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506, 30 Am. Rep. 692, and in many of the other cases above cited, that it is for the jury to say, upon all the circumstances, including the existing emergency and the need of immediate action under which they may find that the plaintiff acted, whether in fact his conduct was that of a reasonably prudent man; and it may be that the judge in his charge did not go far enough in requiring the jury, upon this issue, only to find whether the plaintiff "saw and as a reasonable man believed that Coombs was in imminent danger of his life," and "believed that he could rescue Coombs and at the same time avoid danger to himself." But it is not clear that this question was intended to be saved; it has not been argued by the defendant; and we need not consider it.

But it is necessary in this case, as in all similar actions, that negligence on the part of the defendant or its servants should be shown, even though the plaintiff was himself free from all blame. Hirsch-

man v. Dry Dock Railroad, 46 App. Div. 621, 61 N. Y. Supp. 304; De Mahy v. Morgan's Louisiana Co., 45 La. Ann. 1329, 14 South. 61; Spooner v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, 115 N. Y. 22, 21 N. E. 696; Evansville & Crawfordsville Railroad v. Hiatt, 17 Ind. 102; Thomason v. Southern Railway, 113 Fed. 80, 51 C. C. A. 67. In such a case as this, however, it is enough to hold the defendant if there was negligence on its part towards either Coombs or the plaintiff. Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 88 Md. 482, 42 Atl. 60, 42 L. R. A. 842, 71 Am. St. Rep. 441; Saylor v. Parsons, 122 Iowa, 679, 98 N. W. 500, 64 L. R. A. 542, 101 Am. St. Rep. 283; Donahoe v. Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway, 83 Mo. 560, 53 Am. Rep. 594. Its negligence towards Coombs will be treated as directly inducing the attempt to rescue him and thereby causing the injury to the plaintiff. Such negligence could be found if the defendant was running its train in a manner likely to cause injury to any one properly in that vicinity. That was the only negligence that was shown in many of the cases already referred to. In our opinion there was such evidence here. * * *[4]

Exceptions overruled.

PRIESTLEY v. FOWLER.

(Court of Exchequer, 1837. 3 Mees. & W. 1, 49 R. R. 495.)

Case. The declaration stated that the plaintiff was a servant of the defendant in his trade of a butcher; that the defendant had desired and directed the plaintiff, so being his servant, to go with and take certain goods of the defendant's, in a certain van of the defendant then used by him, and conducted by another of his servants, in carrying goods for hire upon a certain journey; that the plaintiff, in pursuance of such desire and direction, accordingly commenced and was proceeding and being carried and conveyed by the said van, with the said goods; and it became the duty of the defendant, on that occasion, to use due and proper care that the said van should be in a proper state of repair, that it should not be overloaded, and that the plaintiff should be safely and securely carried thereby; nevertheless, the defendant did not use proper care that the van should be in a sufficient state of repair, or that it should not be overloaded, or that the plaintiff should be safely and securely carried thereby, in consequence of the neglect of all and each of which duties the van gave way and broke down, and the plaintiff was thrown with violence to the ground, and his thigh was thereby fractured, &c. Plea, Not guilty.

[4] The evidence of negligence was here considered by the Court. It appeared that in legal effect Coombs and the plaintiff were invitees in the defendant's freight yard.

Only so much of the case is given as relates to the first count.

At the trial before Park, J., at the Lincolnshire Summer Assizes, 1836, the plaintiff, having given evidence to show that the injury arose from the overloading of the van, and that it was so loaded with the defendant's knowledge, had a verdict for £100. In the following Michaelmas Term, Adams, Serjt, obtained a rule to show cause why the judgment should not be arrested, on the ground that the defendant was not liable in law, under the circumstances stated in the declaration.

Lord Abinger, C. B. This was a motion in arrest of judgment, after verdict for the plaintiff, upon the insufficiency of the declaration. (His Lordship stated the declaration.) It has been objected to this declaration, that it contains no premises from which the duty of the defendant, as therein alleged, can be inferred in law; or, in other words, that from the mere relation of master and servant no contract, and therefore no duty, can be implied on the part of the master to cause the servant to be safely and securely carried, or to make the master liable for damage to the servant, arising from any vice or imperfection, unknown to the master, in the carriage, or in the mode of loading and conducting it. For, as the declaration contains no charge that the defendant knew any of the defects mentioned, the Court is not called upon to decide how far such knowledge on his part of a defect unknown to the servant, would make him liable.

It is admitted that there is no precedent for the present action by a servant against a master. We are therefore to decide the question upon general principles, and in doing so we are at liberty to look at the consequences of a decision the one way or the other.

If the master be liable to the servant in this action, the principle of that liability will be found to carry us to an alarming extent. He who is responsible by his general duty, or by the terms of his contract, for all the consequences of negligence in a matter in which he is the principal, is responsible for the negligence of all his inferior agents. If the owner of the carriage is therefore responsible for the sufficiency of his carriage to his servant, he is responsible for the negligence of his coach-maker, or his harness-maker, or his coachman. The footman, therefore, who rides behind the carriage, may have an action against his master for a defect in the carriage owing to the negligence of the coach-maker, or for a defect in the harness arising from the negligence of the harness-maker, or for drunkenness, neglect, or want of skill in the coachman; nor is there any reason why the principle should not, if applicable in this class of cases, extend to many others. The master, for example, would be liable to the servant for the negligence of the chambermaid, for putting him into a damp bed; for that of the upholsterer, for sending in a crazy bedstead, whereby he was made to fall down while asleep and injure himself; for the negligence of the cook, in not properly cleaning the copper vessels used in the kitchen; of the butcher, in supplying the family with meat of a quality injurious to the health; of the builder, for a defect in the foundation of the house, whereby it fell, and injured both the master and the servant by the ruins.

The inconvenience, not to say the absurdity of these consequences, afford a sufficient argument against the application of this principle to the present case. But, in truth, the mere relation of the master and the servant never can imply an obligation on the part of the master to take more care of the servant than he may reasonably be expected to do of himself. He is, no doubt, bound to provide for the safety of his servant in the course of his employment, to the best of his judgment, information and belief. The servant is not bound to risk his safety in the service of his master, and may, if he thinks fit, decline any service in which he reasonably apprehends injury to himself; and in most of the cases in which danger may be incurred, if not in all, he is just as likely to be acquainted with the probability and extent of it as the master. In that sort of employment, especially, which is described in the declaration in this case, the plaintiff must have known as well as his master, and probably better, whether the van was sufficient, whether it was overloaded, and whether it was likely to carry him safely. In fact, to allow this sort of action to prevail would be an encouragement to the servant to omit that diligence and caution which he is in duty bound to exercise on the behalf of his master, to protect him against the misconduct or negligence of others who serve him, and which diligence and caution, while they protect the master, are a much better security against any injury the servant may sustain by the negligence of others engaged under the same master, than any recourse against his master for damages could possibly afford.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment ought to be arrested.

Rule absolute.[5]

[5] Accord: Murray v. South Carolina R. Co. (1841) 1 McMul. (S. C.) 385, 36 Am. Dec. 268: (P., a fireman on the defendant's railway, was injured, while engaged in the discharge of his duties, by the derailment of his engine through the carelessness of the engineer. The form of the action was trespass on the case.)

Farwell v. Boston, etc., R. Corp. (1842) 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339: (P., an engineer on the defendant's railway, was injured, while engaged in the discharge of his duties, by the negligence of the defendant's switchman in "leaving a switch in wrong condition." The form of action was trespass on the case.)

The opinion in Farwell v. Boston, etc., R. Corp. was by Chief Justice Shaw. He said, in part:

"This is an action of new impression in our courts, and involves a principle of great importance. It presents a case, where two persons are in the service and employment of one company, whose business it is to construct and maintain a railroad, and to employ their trains of cars to carry persons and merchandize for hire. They are appointed and employed by the same company to perform separate duties and services, all tending to the accomplishment of one and the same purpose—that of the safe and rapid transmission of the trains; and they are paid for their respective services according to the nature of their respective duties, and the labor and skill required for their proper performance. The question is, whether, for damages sustained by one of the persons so employed, by means of the carelessness and negligence of another, the party injured has a remedy against the common employer. It is an argument against such an action, though certainly not a decisive one, that no such action has before been maintained. * * *

"The general rule, resulting from considerations as well of justice as of policy, is, that he who engages in the employment of another for the performance of specified duties and services, for compensation, takes upon himself the natural and ordinary risks and perils incident to the performance of such services, and in legal presumption, the compensation is adjusted accordingly. And we are not aware of any principle which should except the perils arising from the carelessness and negligence of those who are in the same employment. These are perils which the servant is as likely to know, and against which he can as effectually guard, as the master. They are perils incident to the service, and which can be as distinctly foreseen and provided for in the rate of compensation as any others. * * *

"If we look from considerations of justice to those of policy, they will strongly lead to the same conclusion. In considering the rights and obligations arising out of particular relations, it is competent for courts of justice to regard considerations of policy and general convenience, and to draw from them such rules as will, in their practical application, best promote the safety and security of all parties concerned. This is, in truth, the basis on which implied promises are raised, being duties legally inferred from a consideration of what is best adapted to promote the benefit of all persons concerned, under given circumstances. To take the well known and familiar cases already cited; a common carrier, without regard to actual fault or neglect in himself or his servants, is made liable for all losses of goods confided to him for carriage, except those caused by the act of God or of a public enemy, because he can best guard them against all minor dangers, and because, in case of actual loss, it would be extremely difficult for the owner to adduce proof of embezzlement, or other actual fault or neglect on the part of the carrier, although it may have been the real cause of the loss. The risk is therefore thrown upon the carrier, and he receives, in the form of payment for the carriage, a premium for the risk which he thus assumes. So of an innkeeper: he can best secure the attendance of honest and faithful servants, and guard his house against thieves. Whereas, if he were responsible only upon proof of actual negligence, he might connive at the presence of dishonest inmates and retainers, and even participate in the embezzlement of the property of the guests, during the hours of their necessary sleep, and yet it would be difficult, and often impossible, to prove these facts.

"The liability of passenger carriers is founded on similar considerations. They are held to the strictest responsibility for care, vigilance and skill, on the part of themselves and all persons employed by them, and they are paid accordingly. The rule is founded on the expediency of throwing the risk upon those who can best guard against it. Story on Bailments, 590 et seq.

"We are of opinion that these considerations apply strongly to the case in question. Where several persons are employed in the conduct of one common enterprise or undertaking, and the safety of each depends much on the care and skill with which each other shall perform his appropriate duty, each is an observer of the conduct of the others, can give notice of any misconduct, incapacity or neglect of duty, and leave the service, if the common employer will not take such precautions, and employ such agents as the safety of the whole party may require. By these means, the safety of each will be much more effectually secured, than could be done by a resort to the common employer for indemnity in case of loss by the negligence of each other. Regarding it in this light, it is the ordinary case of one sustaining an injury in the course of his own employment, in which he must bear the loss himself, or seek his remedy, if he have any, against the actual wrong-doer. * * *

"It was strongly pressed in the argument, that although this might be so, where two or more servants are employed in the same department of duty, where each can exert some influence over the conduct of the other, and thus to some extent provide for his own security; yet that it could not apply where two or more are employed in different departments of duty, at a distance from each other, and where one can in no degree control or influence the conduct of another. But we think this is founded upon a supposed distinction, on which it would be extremely difficult to establish a practical rule. When the object to be accomplished is one and the same, when the employers are the same, and the several persons employed derive their authority and their compensation from the same source, it would be extremely difficult to distinguish, what constitutes one department and what a distinct department of duty. It would vary with the circumstances of every case. If it were made to depend upon the nearness or distance of the persons from each other, the question would immediately arise, how near or how distant must they be, to be in the same or different departments. In a blacksmith's shop, persons working in the same building, at different fires, may be quite independent of each other, though only a few feet distant. In a ropewalk, several may be at work on the same piece of cordage, at the same time, at many hundred feet distant from each other, and beyond the reach of sight and voice, and yet acting together.

"Besides, it appears to us, that the argument rests upon an assumed principle of responsibility which does not exist. The master, in the case supposed, is not exempt from liability, because the servant has better means of providing for his safety, when he is employed in immediate connection with those from whose negligence he might suffer; but because the implied contract of the master does not extend to indemnify the servant against the negligence of any one but himself; and he is not liable in tort, as for the negligence of his servant, because the person suffering does not stand towards him in the relation of a stranger, but is one whose rights are regulated by contract express or implied. The exemption of the master, therefore, from liability for the negligence of a fellow servant, does not depend exclusively upon the consideration, that the servant has better means to provide for his own safety, but upon other grounds. Hence the separation of the employment into different departments cannot create that liability, when it does not arise from express or implied contract, or from a responsibility created by law to third persons, and strangers, for the negligence of a servant."

It was held, therefore, that the action could not be maintained.

See, also, Pollock on Torts (8th Ed.) 98: "The old rule as it stood before the Act of 1880, is that a master is not liable to his servant for injury received from any ordinary risk of or incident to the service, including acts or defaults of any other person employed in the same service. Our law can show no more curious instance of a rapid modern development. The first evidence of any such rule is in Priestly v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1, 49 R. R. 495, decided in 1837, which proceeds on the theory (if on any definite theory) that the master 'cannot be bound to take more care of the servant than he may reasonably be expected to do of himself'; that a servant has better opportunities than his master of watching and controlling the conduct of his fellow-servants; and that a contrary doctrine would lead to intolerable inconvenience, and encourage servants to be negligent. According to this there would be a sort of presumption that the servant suffered to some extent by want of diligence on his own part. But it is needless to pursue this reasoning: for the like result was a few years afterwards arrived at by Chief Justice Shaw of Massachusetts by another way, and in a judgment which is the fountain-head of all the latter decisions, Farwell v. Boston & Worcester R. R. Corp. (1842) 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339, and has now been judicially recognized in England as 'the most complete exposition of what constitutes common employment.' Sir Francis Jeune in The Petrel, [1893] p. 320, 323. The accepted doctrine is to this effect. Strangers can hold the master liable for the negligence of a servant about his business. But in the case where the person injured is himself a servant in the same business he is not in the same position as a stranger. He has of his free will entered into the business and made it his own. He cannot say to the master, You shall so conduct your business as not to injure me by want of due care and caution therein. For he has agreed with the master to serve in that business, and his claims on the master depend on the contract of service. Why should it be an implied term of that contract, not being an express one, that the master shall indemnify him against the negligence of a fellow-servant, or any other current risk. It is rather to be implied that he contracted with the risk before his eyes, and that the dangers of the service, taken all around, were considered in fixing the rate of payment. This is, I believe, a fair summary of the reasoning

THRUSSELL v. HANDYSIDE & CO.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1888. 20 Q. B. Div. 359.)

HAWKINS, J. (after stating the case, and holding that the facts established negligence in the defendant). But this does not determine the case, for the plaintiff may fail on one of two grounds, either that he contributed to the accident by his own negligence, or that the case comes within the maxim "Volenti non fit injuria."

As to the first of these grounds I cannot find any evidence which proves negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

The only remaining question is whether the plaintiff took the risk upon himself, so that the maxim "Volenti non fit injuria" applies. That question, as is shewn by the judgments in Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q. B. D. 647, was for the jury. The plaintiff was altogether unconnected with the defendants or their workmen, but was an independent workman employed by Messrs. Lucas, and it is difficult to say, where a man is lawfully working, subject to the orders of his employers, and to the risk of dismissal if he disobeys, that if after asking for and failing to obtain protection from the danger caused by other people's work, he suffers injury, the maxim "Volenti non fit injuria" applies. It is true that he knows of the danger, but he does not wilfully incur it. "Scienti," as was pointed out in Thomas v. Quatermaine, 18 Q. B. D. at p. 692, and in Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q. B. D. at p. 659, is not equivalent to "volenti." It cannot be said, where a man is lawfully engaged in work, and is in danger of dismissal if he leaves his work, that he wilfully incurs any risk which he may encounter in the course of such work, and here the plaintiff had asked the defendants' men to take care. It is different where there is no duty to be performed, and a man takes his chance of the danger, for there he voluntarily encounters the risk. If the plaintiff could have gone away from the dangerous place without incurring the risk of losing his means of livelihood, the case might have been different; but he was obliged to be there; his poverty, not his will, consented to incur the danger. * * *

The case of Woodley v. Metropolitan District Ry. Co., 2 Ex. D. 384, was relied on by Mr. Lush as an authority in favour of the defendants, and at first sight it looks somewhat like the present case, but which has prevailed in the authorities. With its soundness we are not here concerned. It was not only adopted by the House of Lords for England, but forced by them upon the reluctant Courts of Scotland to make the jurisprudence of the two countries uniform. No such doctrine appears to exist in the law of any other country in Europe. The following is a clear judicial statement of it in its settled form: 'A servant, when he engages to serve a master, undertakes, as between himself and his master, to run all the ordinary risks of the service, including the risk of negligence upon the part of a fellow servant when he is acting in the discharge of his duty as servant of him who is the common master of both.' Erle, C. J., in Tunney v. Midland R. Co. (1866) L. R. 1 C. P. 296."

when the facts of the two cases are compared there is a clear distinction. The plaintiff in that case was in the employment of a contractor and was injured by a passing train while he was working in a tunnel on the Metropolitan District Railway, and he brought an action against the railway company. It was proved that there was a very small space between the wall of the tunnel and the passing train, but still the space was enough, if a workman was careful, to enable him to stand in safety while a train passed. It is true that the jury found that there was negligence on the part of the company in not having taken precautions for the protection of the workman, but the plaintiff having it in his power to protect himself, and knowing that the danger existed, the majority of the Court of Appeal held that he was not entitled to recover. He was injured not owing to an inevitable cause, but owing to a danger which by the use of proper care he might have avoided. In the present case the plaintiff could not have avoided the danger, unless he had disobeyed the orders of his employers, and incurred the risk of dismissal. * * *

Appeal dismissed.[6]

DOWD v. NEW YORK, O. & W. RY. CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1902. 170 N. Y. 459, 63 N. E. 541.)

The action was against the railway company for alleged negligence in causing the death of plaintiff's intestate, a car repairer in the defendant's employ. The answer denied all the allegations of negligence on the part of the defendant, and alleged that the death of the decedent was caused by his own negligence.

It appeared that on the 31st of August, 1892, the plaintiff's intestate had been in the employ of the defendant as a car repairer for about six weeks, but not continuously. On that day, shortly after noon, he was at work under a car situated near the middle of a train consisting of twenty-five empty coal cars standing without an engine on siding No. 3. A blue as well as a red flag (signifying danger and the presence of a car repairer) was flying at the rear or southerly end of the train. A milk train consisting of an engine, express car, passenger car and three or four milk cars came in at this time and stopped at the station to transact its usual business. It was a little late and after discharging the passengers and freight, the engineer ran south past the switch and then, as was his custom, backed rapidly, severed his engine and kicked the train upon siding No. 3. Of the three trainmen belonging to this train but one remained thereon to manage the brakes and he was unable to control its movement. After some delay, he succeeded in setting the hand brake and then struggled with an air brake, but without success. The result was that the milk train ran down the grade without control, until, colliding with the empty cars, it shoved them forward about two car lengths and caused one of them to run over the plaintiff's intestate as he was working under it, and injured him so severely that he died within a few days.

The jury found for the plaintiff, and after affirmance by the Appellate Division, one of the justices dissenting, the defendant came to this court.[7]

VANN, J. * * * The defendant, by an appropriate exception, raised the question of law that the evidence did not authorize the jury to find that the decedent was not chargeable with knowledge of the practice that caused his death. If he knew of the practice and continued to work without any promise by the defendant to correct its methods, he assumed the danger and waived any claim for damages on account thereof. Crown v. Orr, 140 N. Y. 450, 35 N. E. 648.

The decedent was chargeable not only with what he actually knew, but also with what he ought to have known by the exercise of ordinary diligence. He had worked for the defendant about six weeks, in all, at different times, between the first of April and the last of August when he was hurt. "He was repairing cars all the time he was there," which kept him in a position where he could not well see the ordinary movement of trains in the yard. A witness who worked "in the same gang with him the most of the time," testified that he had never seen cars kicked "on the sidings where cars were being repaired" while he was working with him. It appeared that cars were kicked upon sidings every day and sometimes, but not so often when the signals were up. There was little other evidence upon the subject and none showing that the decedent was ever in such a position as necessarily to have seen cars kicked on a track where repairers were at work. If the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show affirmatively the absence of knowledge on the part of her intestate, it may be that the evidence was insufficient for the purpose. If, however, the burden of proof in this regard was upon the defendant, the finding of the jury should be sustained because the evidence did not conclusively establish the fact in accordance with its theory.

When the plaintiff's intestate entered the service of the defendant he impliedly assumed the obvious risks of the business and waived any right of action on account thereof. The common law makes this a part of the contract of employment, the same as if an express stipulation to that effect, committed to writing, had been signed by both parties. Furthermore, by continuing at work, with no prospect of a change of method, he waived such dangers as he subsequently discovered. The doctrine of assumed risks rests upon the implication of a promise by the employé to waive the consequences of dangers of which he is fully aware. It is distinct in principle from the doctrine of contributory negligence although they have frequently been confounded by the courts. In many cases this was owing to the fact that it appeared from the plaintiff's own showing that he knew of the dangers in advance and hence his complaint was properly dismissed. Whether the fact of a known or obvious risk is proved by the one party or the other is immaterial, provided it is proved at all, but the question now before us is upon whom rests the burden of proof in this respect. If the plaintiff knows the danger, under ordinary circumstances he waives it, but is the waiver a defense to be alleged and proved by the defendant, or only a form of contributory negligence, the absence of which is a part of the plaintiff's case?

Contributory negligence prevents a recovery because the plaintiff, of his own volition, intervenes between the negligence of the defendant and the injury received, so that the former is not the sole cause of the latter. * * * One who is injured by his own negligence is regarded by the law as not having been injured at all, so far as other parties are concerned. By assuming the risk, the plaintiff does not intervene but waives. Intervention in order to break the causal connection between the negligent act and the injury must come in between them. The assumption of the risk does not come in between, but is in advance of both. The independent will of the plaintiff is not exercised by intervening, but by voluntarily waiving and releasing, when he enters the service, any right of action which might accrue to him from the cause stated. * * *

We think that the burden of showing that the servant assumed the risk of obvious dangers rests upon the master and hence we cannot say, as matter of law, that the jury, in the case before us, was compelled to find that the plaintiff's intestate knew or should have known of the practice of kicking cars on a track where car repairers were at work. If he did not know of the practice, he did not waive the danger.

Judgment affirmed.

ENGLISH v. AMIDON et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1902. 72 N. H. 301, 56 Atl. 548.)

Action on the case against Amidon and others for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in falling down a dangerous stairway in the defendants' mill. A motion for a non-suit was granted, and the plaintiff excepted.

BINGHAM, J. It was the duty of the defendants, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, to provide and maintain a safe and suitable stairway by which the plaintiff, as their servant, could go to and from his place of work in the mill. Fifield v. Railroad, 42 N. H. 225; Jaques v. Company, 66 N. H. 482, 22 Atl. 552, 13 L. R. A. 824; Fitzgerald v. Company, 155 Mass. 155, 29 N. E. 464, 31 Am. St. Rep.

537; Mahoney v. Dore, 155 Mass. 513, 30 N. E. 366. Inasmuch as the defendants operated their mill at night, it is claimed that the stairway should then have been lighted to render it reasonably safe. If the stairway was unsuitable for the use of the defendants' servants at night, because the plan of construction, taken in conjunction with the darkness, made it dangerous, it might be found to have been the defendants' duty, in the exercise of ordinary care, to make it reasonably safe, either by suitably lighting it or by remedying the construction; and this was a personal duty, from which they could not relieve themselves by delegating its performance to another.

The evidence was that the plaintiff and seven other spinners, after finishing their work at 9 o'clock in the evening, regularly came down the stairway from the third floor of the mill; that no other way was provided for them; that the stairway was winding, steep, narrow, and worn; that the treads of the stairs varied in width, being narrowest on the inside of the curve; and that the defendants had placed lamps, which were usually lighted at night, over the stairs. On the night in question, when the plaintiff and the other workmen had finished their labors, they put out the lights over their machines, as was their custom, and started to go out of the mill. On reaching the stairway they found it was dark, but proceeded to go down and out, the plaintiff going on the outside of the curve, where the treads of the stairs were widest, steadying himself with his hand against the wall, there being no railing on that side of the stairway. When part way down he slipped, fell, and was injured. Reasonable men could conclude from this evidence that the defendants required their servants to use this stairway at night; that its construction, in conjunction with the darkness, rendered its use dangerous; that the defendants themselves so regarded it; that their neglect to make the stairway safe for such use was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury; and that under the circumstances he was exercising due care in undertaking to use the stairway (the only means provided for leaving the mill) and in his conduct while using it.

Did the plaintiff voluntarily assume the risk of the defendants' negligence? "One does not voluntarily assume a risk, within the meaning of the rule that debars a recovery, when he merely knows there is some danger, without appreciating the danger." Mundle v. Company, 86 Me. 400, 405, 30 Atl. 16; Demars v. Company, 67 N. H. 404, 40 Atl. 902. One cannot be said, as a matter of law, to assume a risk voluntarily, though he knows the danger and appreciates the risk, if at the time he was acting "under such an exigency, or such an urgent call of duty, or such constraint of any kind as in reference to the danger deprives his act of its voluntary character" (Mahoney v. Dore, supra); or if, after discovering the master's neglect, he "has no opportunity to leave the service before the injury is received" (Olney v. Railroad, 71 N. H. 427, 431, 52 Atl. 1097).

When the plaintiff went into the mill it was daylight. He knew that his work would not be finished before 9 o'clock that night, and that it was the custom of the defendants to then have the stairway lighted. He had the right to believe they would perform their duty on the night in question, and to rely thereon. He entered the mill, worked until 9 o'clock, and then went to the stairway to go out. On reaching it he found himself surrounded in darkness. Although he then knew the defendants had failed to perform their duty, yet in view of the fact that he then had no choice open to him, the only exit provided being over the dark stairway, and no opportunity to leave the defendants' service before his injury was received, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that he voluntarily assumed the risk. It was for the jury to say whether the plaintiff, knowing the defendant's neglect of duty, fully appreciated the danger therefrom and voluntarily encountered it. Demars v. Company, supra; Whitcher v. Railroad, 70 N. H. 242, 46 Atl. 740; Dempsey v. Sawyer, 95 Me. 295, 49 Atl. 1035; Mahoney v. Dore, supra; Fitzgerald v. Company, supra; 47 L. R. A. 161, 201, note.

SCHLEMMER v. BUFFALO, R. & P. RY. CO.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania.

MR. JUSTICE DAY. This action was brought in a Pennsylvania court to recover for wrongfully causing the death of Adam M. Schlemmer, plaintiff's intestate, as a result of injuries received while in the employ of the railroad company. The case has been once before in [8] On motion for a rehearing, Walker, J., said: "* * * The case is clearly distinguishable from McLaine v. Company [1902] 71 N. H. 294, 52 Atl. 545, 58 L. R. A. 462 [93 Am. St. Rep. 522], for in that case the danger arose from the act of a fellow servant in the performance of the work, for which it was held to be unreasonable to hold the master responsible, and not from any defects in the instrumentalities provided by the master, for which he is liable if he does not exercise ordinary care in the premises. Manning v. Manchester Mills [1900] 70 N. H. 582, 49 Atl. 91, is distinguishable for a similar reason. In other cases cited by the defendants (Mellen v. Wilson [1893] 159 Mass. 88, 34 N. E. 96; Dene v. Print Works [1902] 181 Mass. 560, 64 N. E. 203; Kaare v. Company [1893] 139 N. Y. 369, 34 N. E. 901; New York, etc., R. R. v. Perriguey [1893] 138 Ind. 414, 34 N. E. 233, 37 N. E. 976; Collins v. Railroad [1882] 30 Minn. 31, 40 N. W. 60), the sole ground upon which negligence was claimed was the absence of light caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The existence of light in those cases was not required to remedy or to obviate the danger arising from structural defects. Lamps for the production of light were regarded as a part of the properly constructed appliances or machines which it was the duty of the servant to operate. The question of their necessity and use to guard against the consequences of the master's negligence in unreasonably maintaining dangerously defective appliances was not considered. Motion denied." Id. (1902) 72 N. H. 301, 303, 56 Atl. 548, 550.

this court, and is reported in 205 U. S. 1, 51 L. Ed. 681, 27 Sup. Ct. 407. The injury was received while Schlemmer, an employee of the defendant railroad company was endeavoring to couple a shovel car to the caboose of one of the railroad trains of the defendant company.

Before the case first came here, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania had held that the plaintiff could not recover damages because of the contributory negligence of the deceased. 207 Pa. 198, 56 Atl. 417. This court reversed the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and remanded the case for further proceedings in conformity with the opinion of this court.

For a proper understanding of the case a brief statement of the facts will be necessary. The shovel car was not equipped with an automatic coupler, as required by the act of March 2, 1893, chap. 196, § 2, 27 Stat. at L. 531, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3174, and that fact was the basis of the action for damages. The shovel car had an iron drawbar, weighing somewhere about 80 pounds, protruding beyond the end of the shovel car. The end of this drawbar had a small opening, or eye, into which an iron pin was to be fitted when the coupling was made; this was to be effected by placing the end of the drawbar into the slot of the automatic coupler with which the caboose was equipped. Owing to the difference in the height, the end of the shovel car would pass over the automatic coupler on the caboose in case of an unsuccessful attempt to make the coupling, and the end of the shovel car would come in contact with the end of the caboose.

Plaintiff's intestate was an experienced brakeman, having been in the service fifteen or sixteen years. At the time when he undertook to couple the train with the shovel car to the end of the caboose, he went under the end of the shovel car, and attempted to raise the iron drawbar so as to cause it to fit into the slot of the automatic coupler on the caboose. While so doing, his head was caught between the ends of the shovel car and the caboose, and he was almost instantly killed. This happened between 8 and 9 o'clock on an evening in the month of August, and while dusk had gathered, it was not very dark, and the testimony tends to show that the situation was plainly observable. * * *

The trial court submitted the case to the jury upon the issues joined under the Federal statute, including the question whether the plaintiff's intestate, at the time of the injury, had been guilty of contributory negligence. Under these instructions the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

The court then granted a rule to show cause why judgment should not be rendered non obstante veredicto, which motion was granted, and an opinion delivered, in which the judge held that the testimony did not warrant the conclusion that, in making the coupling, the risk was so obvious that an ordinarily careful and prudent brakeman would not have undertaken it; and therefore, under the statute, assumption of risk was no defense, but reached the conclusion that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to exercise care according to the circumstances in making the coupling in the way he attempted to make it, and in not adopting a safer way, which was pointed out to him at the time.

Upon the second appeal, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania affirmed the judgment of the trial court, saying:

"Per Curiam: It is the settled law of Pennsylvania that any negligence of a party injured, which contributed to his injury, bars his recovery of damages without regard to the negligence, either greater or less than his own, of the other party. The present is a clear case of contributory negligence within this rule. The evidence is indisputable that the unfortunate decedent not only attempted to make the coupling in a dangerous way when his attention was directly called to a safer way, but also did it with reckless disregard of his personal safety by raising his head, though twice expressly cautioned at the time as to the danger of so doing." 222 Pa. 470, 71 Atl. 1053.

The case is now here upon a petition in error to reverse this judgment of affirmance. The statute at the time of the injury complained of took away assumption of risk on the part of the employee as a defense to an action for injuries received in the course of the employment. The defense of contributory negligence was not dealt with by the statute.

When the case was here before, we did not find it necessary to pass upon the question whether contributory negligence on the part of an injured employee would be a defense to an action under the law as it then stood, for, upon the record as then presented, the court was of opinion that to sustain the defense of contributory negligence would amount to a denial to the plaintiff of all benefit of the statute which made the assumption of risk no longer a defense.

While, as was said in the case when here before, assumption of risk sometimes shades into negligence as commonly understood, there is, nevertheless, a practical and clear distinction between the two. In the absence of statute taking away the defense, or such obvious dangers that no ordinarily prudent person would incur them, an employee is held to assume the risk of the ordinary dangers of the occupation into which he is about to enter, and also those risks and dangers which are known, or are so plainly observable that the employee may be presumed to know of them, and if he continues in the master's employ without objection, he takes upon himself the risk of injury from such defects. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. McDade, 191 U. S. 64, 67, 68, 48 L. Ed. 96, 100, 101, 24 Sup. Ct. 24, and former cases in this court therein cited.

Contributory negligence, on the other hand, is the omission of the employee to use those precautions for his own safety which ordinary prudence requires. See, in this connection, Narramore v. Cleveland C., C. & St. L. R. Co., 48 L. R. A. 68, 37 C. C. A. 499, 509, 96 Fed. 298.

In the present case, the statute of Congress expressly provides that the employee shall not be deemed to have assumed the risk of injury if such is occasioned by his continuing in the employ of the carrier after the unlawful use of the car or train in the failure to provide automatic couplers has been brought to his knowledge. Therefore, when Schlemmer saw that the shovel car was not equipped with an automatic coupler, he would not, from that knowledge alone, take upon himself the risk of injury without liability from his employer.

But there is nothing in the statute absolving the employee from the duty of using ordinary care to protect himself from injury in the use of the car with the appliances actually furnished. In other words, notwithstanding the company failed to comply with the statute, the employee was not, for that reason, absolved from the duty of using ordinary care for his own protection under the circumstances as they existed. This has been the holding of the courts in construing statutes enacted to promote the safety of employees. Krause v. Morgan, 53 Ohio St. 26, 40 N. E. 886; Holum v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 80 Wis. 299, 50 N. W. 99; Grand v. Michigan C. R. Co., 83 Mich. 564, 11 L. R. A. 402, 47 N. W. 837; Taylor v. Carew Mfg. Co., 143 Mass. 470, 10 N. E. 308. And such was the holding of the court of appeals of the eighth circuit, where the statute now under consideration was before the court. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Arrighi, 63 C. C. A. 649, 129 Fed. 347.

In the absence of legislation at the time of the injury complained of, taking away the defense of contributory negligence, it continued to exist, and the Federal question presented upon this record is: Was the ruling of the state court in denying the right of recovery upon the ground of contributory negligence, in view of the circumstances shown, such as to deprive the plaintiff in error of the benefit of the statute which made assumption of risk a defense no longer available to the employer? To answer this question we shall have to look to the testimony adduced at the trial, all of which is contained in the record before us. As we have already said, the testimony shows that the plaintiff's intestate was an experienced brakeman. A witness, who is uncontradicted in the record, testified that just before Schlemmer got out of the caboose, when he saw the train backing up, he was told: "We had better shove that up by hand, the same as we did in Bradford. That is a dangerous coupling to make." (At Bradford the method of making the coupling was by means of pushing the caboose up against the train, instead of backing the train against the caboose.) To this Schlemmer replied, with emphasis, "Back up." He then proceeded to make the coupling, with the result stated.

Another witness, the yard conductor, testified without contradiction, that just before the cars got together he walked up to Schlemmer, and told him they had better shove the caboose on by hand, to which he answered: "Never mind, I will make this coupling." To which the witness answered: "Well, you will have to get down."

Witness testified that he called to him twice to get down, the last time not more than a second, possibly a couple of seconds, before he was injured. This witness furthermore testified that he had a sufficient crew to push the caboose up by hand, that there was plenty of force to shove the caboose up in that way; that that was a great deal safer way to make the coupling than backing onto the caboose. The testimony further shows that there was plenty of room under the projection of the shovel car to operate the drawbar and raise it up. In fact, in this manner, the coupling was made a few minutes after the unfortunate occurrence which resulted in the death of the deceased.

As the record is now presented, there is no proof in the case that the deceased was ordered to make the coupling in the manner he did, and there is testimony to the effect that, just before the injury, the conductor in charge of the train said to the deceased: "Mr. Schlemmer, you be very careful now, and keep your head down low, so as not to get mashed in between those cars." He said he would.

In view of this record we cannot say that the court, in denying a recovery to the plaintiff, upon the ground of contributory negligence of the deceased, denied to her any rights secured by the Federal statute. Entirely apart from the question of assumption of risk, which, under the law, could not be a defense to the plaintiff's action, as the law then stood, there remained the defense of contributory negligence.

After an examination of the record as now presented, containing testimony not adduced at the former trial, we are constrained to the conclusion that there was ample ground for saying, as both the trial court and the Supreme Court of the state of Pennsylvania did, that the decedent met his death because of his unfortunate attempt to make the coupling in a dangerous way, when a safer way was at the time called to his attention. Furthermore, he was injured in spite of repeated cautions, made at the time, as to the great danger of being injured if he raised his head in attempting to make the coupling in the manner which he did.

As we have said, the Federal question in the record, and the only one which gives us jurisdiction, is: Did the trial and judgment deprive the plaintiff in error of rights secured by the Federal statute? The views which we have expressed require that the question be answered in the negative.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is affirmed.[9]

IV. IMPUTED NEGLIGENCE AS AN EXCUSE[10]

THE BERNINA.

(Court of Appeal, 1887. L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 58.)

Appeal from a judgment by Butt, J., on a special case stated for the opinion of the court in three actions in personam against the owners of the steamship "Bernina." Butt, J., held, on the authority of Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, that the plaintiffs were unable to recover. The plaintiffs appealed.[11]

LINDLEY, L. J. This was a special case. Three actions are brought in the Admiralty Division of the High Court by the respective legal personal representatives of three persons on board the Bushire against the owners of the Bernina. Those persons were killed by a collision between the two vessels, both of which were negligently navigated. One of the three persons (Toeg) was a passenger on the Bushire; one (Armstrong) was an engineer of the ship, though not to blame for the collision. The third (Owen) was her second officer, and was in charge of her, and was himself to blame for the collision. The questions for decision are, whether any, and if any, which of these actions can be maintained? and if any of them can, then whether the claims recoverable are to be awarded according to the principles which prevail at common law, or according to those which are adopted in the Court of Admiralty in cases of collision.[12] * * *

The first matter to be considered is whether there has been any such wrongful act, neglect, or default of the defendants as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the three deceased persons respectively to have sued the defendants. Now, as regards one of them, namely, Owen, the second officer, who was himself to blame for the collision, it is clear that, if death had not ensued, he could not have maintained an action against the defendants. There was negligence on his part contributing to the collision, and no evidence to show that, notwithstanding his negligence, the defendants could, by taking reasonable care, have avoided the collision. There was what is called such contributory negligence on his part as to render an action by him unsustainable. It follows, therefore, that his representatives can recover nothing under Lord Campbell's Act for his widow and children, and their action cannot be maintained. The other two actions are not so easily disposed of. They raise two questions: (1) Whether the passenger Toeg, if alive, could have successfully sued the defendants;

[10] On the general bearing of the doctrine, see 29 Cyc. 542, notes 99, 1–6.

[11] The statement of the case is abridged.

[12] Only so much of the opinion is given as relates to this first question. As to the second question, it was held that actions under Lord Campbell's Act are not admiralty actions and, although brought in the Admiralty Division of the High Court, are not subject to the admiralty rule as to half damages.

and if he could, then (2) whether there is any difference between the case of the passenger and that of the engineer Armstrong. The learned judge whose decision is under review felt himself bound by authority to decide both actions against the plaintiffs. The authorities which the learned judge followed are Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, and Armstrong v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Ry. Co., Law Rep. 10 Ex. 47; and the real question to be determined is whether they can be properly overruled or not. Thorogood v. Bryan, supra, was decided in 1849, and has been generally followed at Nisi Prius ever since when cases like it have arisen. But it is curious to see how reluctant the Courts have been to affirm its principle after argument, and how they have avoided doing so, preferring, where possible, to decide cases before them on other grounds. See, for example, Rigby v. Hewitt, 5 Ex. 240; Greenland v. Chaplin, 5 Ex. 243; Waite v. North Eastern Ry. Co., E. B. & E. 719. I am not aware that the principle on which Thorogood v. Bryan was decided has ever been approved by any Court which has had to consider it. On the other hand, that case has been criticised and said to be contrary to principle by persons of the highest eminence, not only in this country, but also in Scotland and in America. And while it is true that Thorogood v. Bryan has never been overruled, it is also true that it has never been affirmed by any Court which could properly overrule it, and it cannot be yet said to have become indisputably settled law. I do not think, therefore, that it is too late for a Court of Appeal to reconsider it, or to overrule it if clearly contrary to well settled legal principles.

Thorogood v. Bryan was an action founded on Lord Campbell's Act. The facts were shortly as follows. The deceased was a passenger in an omnibus, and he had just got off out of it. He was knocked down and killed by another omnibus belonging to the defendants. There was negligence on the part of the drivers of both omnibuses, and it appears that there was also negligence on the part of the deceased himself. The jury found a verdict for the defendants, and there does not seem to have been any reason why the Court should have disallowed the verdict if not driven to do so on technical grounds. In those days, however, a misdirection by the judge to the jury compelled the Court to grant a new trial, whether any injustice had been done or not; and accordingly the plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and it is with reference to this point that the decision of the Court is of importance. The learned judge who tried the case told the jury in effect to find for the defendant if they thought that the deceased was killed either by reason of his own want of care or by reason of want of care on the part of the driver of the omnibus out of which he was getting. The last direction was complained of, but was upheld by the Court. The ratio decidendi was that if the death of the deceased was not occasioned by his own negligence it was occasioned by the joint negligence of both drivers, and that, if so, the negligence of the driver of the omnibus off which the deceased was getting was the negligence of the deceased; and the reason for so holding was that the deceased had voluntarily placed himself under the care of the driver. Maule, J., puts it thus: "The deceased must be considered as identified with the driver of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased." This theory of identification was quite new. No trace of it is to be found in any earlier decision, nor in any legal treatise, English or foreign, so far as I have been able to ascertain, nor has it ever been satisfactorily explained. It must be assumed, for the purpose of considering the grounds of the decision in question, that the passenger was not himself in fault. Assuming this to be so, then, if both drivers were negligent, and both caused the injury to the passenger, it is difficult to understand why both drivers or their masters should not be liable to him. The doctrine of identification laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan is, to me, quite unintelligible. It is, in truth, a fictitious extension of the principles of agency, but to say that the driver of a public conveyance is the agent of the passengers is to say that which is not true in fact. Such a doctrine, if made the basis of further reasoning, leads to results which are wholly untenable, e. g., to the result that the passengers would be liable for the negligence of the person driving them, which is obviously absurd, but which, of course, the Court never meant. All the Court meant to say was that for purposes of suing for negligence the passenger was in no better position than the man driving him. But why not? The driver of a public vehicle is not selected by the passenger otherwise than by being hailed by him as one of the public to take him up; and such selection, if selection it can be called, does not create the relation of principal and agent or master and servant between the passenger and the driver; the passenger knows nothing of the driver and has no control over him; nor is the driver in any proper sense employed by the passenger. The driver, if not his own master, is hired, paid, or employed by the owner of the vehicle he drives or by some other person who lets the vehicle to him. The orders he obeys are his employer's orders. These orders, in the case of an omnibus, are to drive from such a place to such a place and take up and put down passengers; and in the case of a cab the orders are to drive where the passenger for the time being may desire to go, within the limits expressly or impliedly set by the employer. If the passenger actively interferes with the driver by giving him orders as to what he is to do, I can understand the meaning of the expression that the passenger identifies himself with the driver, but no such interference was suggested in Thorogood v. Bryan. The principles of the law of negligence, and in particular of what is called contributory negligence, have been discussed on many occasions since that case was decided, and are much better understood now than they were thirty years ago. Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 573, in the Exchequer Chamber, and Radley v. London & North Western Ry. Co., 1 App. Cas. 754, in the House of Lords, show the true grounds on which a person himself guilty of negligence is unable to maintain an action against another for an injury occasioned by the combined negligence of both. If the proximate cause of the injury is the negligence of the plaintiff as well as that of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover anything. The reason for this is not easily discoverable. But I take it to be settled that an action at common law by A. against B. for injury directly caused to A. by the want of care of A. and B. will not lie. As Pollock, C. B., pointed out in Greenland v. Chaplin, supra, the jury cannot take the consequences and divide them in proportion according to the negligence of the one or the other party. But if the plaintiff can show that although he has himself been negligent, the real and proximate cause of the injury sustained by him was the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff can maintain an action, as is shown not only by Tuff v. Warman, supra, and Radley v. London & North Western Ry. Co., supra, but also by the well-known case of Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546, and other cases of that class. The cases which give rise to actions for negligence are primarily reducible to three classes, as follows:

1. A. without fault of his own is injured by the negligence of B., then B. is liable to A. 2. A. by his own fault is injured by B. without fault on his part, then B. is not liable to A. 3. A. is injured by B. by the fault more or less of both combined; then the following further distinctions have to be made: (a) if, notwithstanding B.'s negligence, A. with reasonable care could have avoided the injury, he cannot sue B.: Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60; Bridge v. Grand Junction Ry. Co., 3 M. & W. 244; Dowell v. General Steam Navigation Co., 5 E. & B. 195; (b) if, notwithstanding A.'s negligence, B. with reasonable care could have avoided injuring A., A. can sue B.: Tuff v. Warman, supra; Radley v. London & North Western Ry. Co., supra; Davies v. Mann, supra; (c) if there has been as much want of reasonable care on A.'s part as on B.'s or, in other words, if the proximate cause of the injury is the want of reasonable care on both sides, A. cannot sue B. In such a case A. cannot with truth say that he has been injured by B.'s negligence, he can only with truth say that he has been injured by his own carelessness and B.'s negligence, and the two combined give no cause of action at common law. This follows from the two sets of decisions already referred to. But why in such a case the damages should not be apportioned, I do not profess to understand. However, as already stated, the law on this point is settled, and not open to judicial discussion. If now another person is introduced the same principles will be found applicable. Substitute in the foregoing cases B. and C. for B., and unless C. is A.'s agent or servant there will be no difference in the result, except that A. will have two persons instead of one liable to him. A. may sue B. and C. in one action, and recover damages against them both; or he may sue them separately and recover the whole damage sustained against the one he sues: Clark v. Chambers, 3 Q. B. D. 327, where all the previous authorities were carefully examined by the late L. C. J. Cockburn. This is no doubt hard on the defendant, who is alone sued, and this hardship seems to have influenced the Court in deciding Thorogood v. Bryan, supra. In that case the Court appears to have thought it hard on the defendant to make him pay all the damages due to the plaintiff, and that it was no hardship to the plaintiff to exonerate the defendant from liability, as the plaintiff had a clear remedy against the master of the omnibus in which he was a passenger. But it is difficult to see the justice of exonerating the defendant from all liability in respect of his own wrong and of throwing the whole liability on some one who was no more to blame than he. The injustice to the defendant, which the Court sought to avoid, is common to all cases in which a wrong is done by two people and one of them alone is made to pay for it. The rule which does not allow of contribution among wrong-doers is what produces hardship in these cases, but the hardship produced by that rule (if really applicable to such cases as these under discussion) does not justify the Court in exonerating one of the wrong-doers from all responsibility for his own misconduct or the misconduct of his servants. I can hardly believe that if the plaintiff in Thorogood v. Bryan, had sued the proprietors of both omnibuses it would have been held that he had no right of action against one of them. Having given my reasons for my inability to concur in the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan, supra, I proceed to consider how far that doctrine is supported by other authorities. * * * Thorogood v. Bryan and Armstrong v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Ry. Co. affirm that, although if A. is injured by the combined negligence of B. and C., A. can sue B. and C., or either of them, he cannot sue C. if he, A., is under the care of B. or in his employ. From this general doctrine I am compelled most respectfully to dissent, but if B. is A.'s agent or servant the doctrine is good. In Scotland the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan was discussed and held to be unsatisfactory in the case of Adams v. Glasgow & South Western Ry. Co., 3 Court Sess. Cas. 215. In America the subject was recently examined with great care by the Supreme Court of the United States in Little v. Hackett [116 U. S. 366] 14 Am. Law Record, 577, 54 Am. Rep. 15, in which the English and American cases were reviewed, and the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan, supra, was distinctly repudiated as contrary to sound principles. In this case the plaintiff was driving in a hackney carriage and was injured by a collision between it and a railway train on a level crossing. There was negligence on the part of the driver of the carriage and on the part of the railway company's servants, but it was held that the plaintiff was not precluded from maintaining an action against the railway company. In this country Thorogood v. Bryan was distinctly disapproved by Dr. Lushington in The Milan, Lush. 388; and even Lord Bramwell, who has gone further than any other judge in upholding the decision, has expressed disapproval of the grounds on which it was based. No text-writer has approved of it, and the comments in Smith's Leading Cases are adverse to it (volume 1, p. 266, 6th Ed.). For the reasons above stated, I am of opinion that the doctrines laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan and Armstrong v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Ry. Co. are contrary to sound legal principles, and ought not to be regarded as law. Consequently, I am of opinion that the decision in Toeg's and Armstrong's case ought to be reversed.[13]

Appeal allowed.[14]

[13] The concurring opinions of Lord Esher, M. R., and Lopes, L. J., are omitted. Lord Esher's opinion (12 P. D. pages 60–84) contains an elaborate review of the authorities, English and American.

[14] From this decision an appeal was taken to the House of Lords, where, under the name, Mills v. Armstrong, L. R. 13, App. Cases (1888), the judgment of the Court of Appeal was affirmed.

Commenting on the doctrine of identification in Thorogood v. Bryan, Lord Herschell, in Mills v. Armstrong remarks as follows: "With the utmost respect for these eminent judges, I must say that I am unable to comprehend this doctrine of identification upon which they lay so much stress. In what sense is the passenger by a public stage-coach, because he avails himself of the accommodation afforded by it, identified with the driver? The learned judges manifestly do not mean to suggest (though some of the language used would seem to bear that construction) that the passenger is so far identified with the driver that the negligence of the latter would render the former liable to third persons injured by it. I presume that they did not even mean that the identification is so complete as to prevent the passenger from recovering against the driver's master; though if 'negligence of the owner's servants is to be considered negligence of the passenger,' or if he 'must be considered a party' to their negligence, it is not easy to see why it should not be a bar to such an action. In short, as far as I can see, the identification appears to be effective only to the extent of enabling another person whose servants have been guilty of negligence to defend himself by the allegation of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured. But the very question that had to be determined was, whether the contributory negligence of the driver of the vehicle was a defence as against the passenger when suing another wrongdoer. To say that it is a defence because the passenger is identified with the driver, appears to me to beg the question, when it is not suggested that this identification results from any recognized principles of law, or has any other effect than to furnish that defence the validity of which was the very point in issue. Two persons may no doubt be so bound together by the legal relation in which they stand to each other that the acts of one may be regarded by the law as the acts of the other. But the relation between the passenger in a public vehicle and the driver of it certainly is not such as to fall within any of the recognized categories in which the act of one man is treated in law as the act of another."

WAITE v. NORTHEASTERN RY. CO.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1858. Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1859. El. Bl. & El. 719, 728, 113 R. R. 855.)

Action by Alexander Waite, an infant, to recover for the alleged negligence of the defendant railway company. The defendant filed a plea of not guilty and two special pleas. Issues on all the pleas.

LORD CAMPBELL, C. J. In this case we think that the rule ought to be made absolute for entering a verdict for the defendants, or for a nonsuit. The jury must be taken to have found that Mrs. Park, the grandmother of the infant plaintiff, in whose care he was when the accident happened, was guilty of negligence without which the accident would not have happened; and that, notwithstanding the negligence of the defendants, if she had acted upon this occasion with ordinary caution and prudence, neither she herself nor the infant would have suffered. Under such circumstances, had she survived she could not have maintained any action against the Company; and we think that the infant is so identified with her that the action in his name cannot be maintained. The relation of master and servant certainly did not subsist between the grandchild and the grandmother; and she cannot in any sense be considered his agent: but we think that the defendants, in furnishing the ticket to one and the half-ticket for the other, did not incur a greater liability towards the grandchild than towards the grandmother, and that she, the contracting party, must be implied to have promised that ordinary care should be taken of the grandchild.

We do not consider it necessary to offer any opinion as to the recent cases in which passengers by coaches or by ships have brought actions for damage suffered from the negligent management of other coaches and ships, there having been negligence in the management of the coaches and ships by which they were travelling, as, at all events, a complete identification seems to us to be constituted between the plaintiff and the party whose negligence contributed to the damage which is the alleged cause of action, in the same manner as if the plaintiff had been a baby only a few days old, to be carried in a nurse's arms.

Rule absolute.

The plaintiff having appealed against the above decision, the case was argued in the Exchequer Chamber.

COCKBURN, C. J. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench ought to be affirmed. I put the case on this ground: that, when a child of such tender and imbecile age is brought to a railway station or to any conveyance, for the purpose of being conveyed, and is wholly unable to take care of itself, the contract of conveyance is on the implied condition that the child is to be conveyed subject to due and proper care on the part of the person having it in charge. Such care not being used, where the child has no natural capacity to judge of the surrounding circumstances, a child might get into serious danger from a state of things which would produce no disastrous consequences to an adult capable of taking care of himself. Here the child was under the charge of his grandmother; and the company must be taken to have received the child as under her control and subject to her management. The plea and finding show that the negligence of the defendants contributed partially to the damage; but that the negligence of the person in whose charge the child was, and with reference to whom the contract of conveyance was made, also contributed partially. There is not therefore that negligence on the part of the defendants which is necessary to support the action.

POLLOCK, C. B. I entirely agree. The shortest way of putting Mr. Mellish's argument is that this is not a mere case of simple wrong, but one arising from the contract of the grandmother on the part of the plaintiff, who must avail himself of that contract, without which he cannot recover. There really is no difference between the case of a person of tender years under the care of another and a valuable chattel committed to the care of an individual, or even not committed to such care. The action cannot be maintained unless it can be maintained by the person having the apparent possession, even though the child or the chattel was not regularly put into the possession of the person, as, for instance, though the party taking charge of the child had done so without the father's consent; that circumstance would make no difference as to the question of the child's right. That is my reason for pressing this argument of Mr. Mellish, as it meets every possible view of the case.[15]

SECTION 5.—THE LAST CLEAR CHANCE

CLAY v. WOOD.

(At Nisi Prius, in the King's Bench, 1803. 5 Esp. 44.)

This was an action on the case, for negligently driving a chaise against a certain horse of the defendant's on which the plaintiff's servant then rode, by which he had his thigh broke; in consequence of which he died.

[15] The concurring opinions of Williams and Crowder, JJ., and of Bramwell, B., are omitted.

In the argument Pollock, C. B., put this question to counsel: "Suppose a man to drive his own gig, in which his child is, and to come into collision with another carriage through the negligence of both drivers. Can the child recover against the owners of the other carriage? That would be manifestly absurd. * * *"

The facts were, that the plaintiff's servant was riding on the wrong side of the road; but near the middle of it. The defendant was the owner of a chaise, then driven by his servant, coming out of another road, and crossing the road over to that side of the road on which the servant was riding, which was the proper side of the road for the defendant. In so crossing over, the shaft of the chaise struck the horse in the thigh, and broke it. The defendant's counsel replied, That it was the duty of the servant to have kept on his proper side; and that the accident being occasioned by his being so out of place, the defendant was not liable.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, That the circumstance of the person being on the wrong side of the road was not sufficient to discharge the defendant; for though a person might be on his wrong side of the road, if the road was of sufficient breadth, so that there was full and ample room for the party to pass, he was of opinion he was bound to take that course which should carry him clear of the person who was on his wrong side; and that if an injury happened, by running against such person, he would be answerable. A person being on his wrong side of the road could not justify another in wantonly doing an injury, which might be avoided. The question therefore to be left to the jury was, Whether there was such room, that though the plaintiff's servant was on his wrong side of the road, there was sufficient room for the defendant's carriage to pass between the plaintiff's horse and the other side of the road? If they were of opinion that there was, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

DAVIES v. MANN.

(Court of Exchequer, 1842. 10 Mees. & W. 546, 62 R. R. 698.)

Case for negligence. The declaration stated, that the plaintiff theretofore, and at the time of the committing of the grievance thereinafter mentioned, to wit, on, &c., was lawfully possessed of a certain donkey, which said donkey of the plaintiff was then lawfully in a certain highway, and the defendant was then possessed of a certain waggon and certain horses drawing the same, which said waggon and horses of the defendant were then under the care, government, and direction of a certain then servant of the defendant, in and along the said highway; nevertheless the defendant, by his said servant, so carelessly, negligently, unskillfully, and improperly governed and directed his said waggon and horses, that by and through the carelessness, negligence, unskillfulness, and improper conduct of the defendant, by his said servant, the said waggon and horses of the defendant then ran and struck with great violence against the said donkey of the plaintiff, and thereby then wounded, crushed and killed the same, &c. The defendant pleaded not guilty.

At the trial before Erskine, J., at the last Summer Assizes for the county of Worcester, it appeared that the plaintiff, having fettered the forefeet of an ass belonging to him, turned it into the public highway, and at the time in question the ass was grazing on the off side of a road about eight yards wide, when the defendant's waggon, with a team of three horses, coming down a slight descent, at what the witness termed a smartish pace, ran into the ass, knocked it down, and the wheels passing over it, it died soon after. The ass was fettered at the time and it was proved that the driver of the waggon was some little distance behind the horses. The learned Judge told the jury that though the act of the plaintiff, in leaving the donkey on the highway, so fettered as to prevent his getting out of the way of carriages travelling along it, might be illegal, still, if the proximate cause of the injury was attributable to the want of proper conduct on the part of the driver of the waggon, the action was maintainable against the defendant; and his Lordship directed them, if they thought that the accident might have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the driver, to find for the plaintiff. The jury found their verdict for the plaintiff, damages 40s.

Godson now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection. The act of the plaintiff in turning the donkey into the public highway was an illegal one, and, as the injury arose principally from that act, the plaintiff was not entitled to compensation for that injury which, but for his own unlawful act, would never have occurred. [Parke, B. The declaration states that the ass was lawfully on the highway, and the defendant has not traversed that allegation; therefore it must be taken to be admitted.] The principle of law, as deducible from the cases is, that where an accident is the result of faults on both sides, neither party can maintain an action. Thus, in Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60, it was held that one who is injured by an obstruction on a highway, against which he fell, cannot maintain an action, if it appear that he was riding with great violence and want of ordinary care, without which he might have seen and avoided the obstruction. So, in Vennall v. Garner, 1 C. & M. 21, in case for running down a ship, it was held, that neither party can recover when both are in the wrong; and Bayley, B., there says, "I quite agree that if the mischief be the result of the combined negligence of the two, they must both remain in statu quo, and neither party can recover against the other." Here the plaintiff, by fettering the donkey, had prevented him from removing himself out of the way of accident; had his forefeet been free no accident would probably have happened. Pluckwell v. Wilson, 5 Car. & P. 375; Luxford v. Large, Ibid. 421, and Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Ad. & E. (N. S.) 29; 4 P. & D. 672, are to the same effect.

LORD ABINGER, C. B. I am of opinion that there ought to be no rule in this case. The defendant has not denied that the ass was lawfully in the highway, and therefore we must assume it to have been lawfully there; but even were it otherwise, it would have made no difference, for as the defendant might, by proper care, have avoided injuring the animal, and did not, he is liable for the consequences of his negligence, though the animal may have been improperly there.

PARKE, B. This subject was fully considered by this Court in the case of Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company, 3 M. & W. 246, where, as appears to me, the correct rule is laid down concerning negligence, namely, that the negligence which is to preclude a plaintiff from recovering in an action of this nature, must be such as that he could, by ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. I am reported to have said in that case, and I believe quite correctly, that "the rule of law is laid down with perfect correctness in the case of Butterfield v. Forrester, that, although there may have been negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet unless he might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, he is entitled to recover; if by ordinary care he might have avoided them, he is the author of his own wrong." In that case of Bridge v. Grand Junction Railway Company, there was a plea imputing negligence on both sides; here it is otherwise; and the judge simply told the jury, that the mere fact of negligence on the part of the plaintiff in leaving his donkey on the public highway, was no answer to the action, unless the donkey's being there was the immediate cause of the injury; and that, if they were of opinion that it was caused by the fault of the defendant's servant in driving too fast or, which is the same thing, at a smartish pace, the mere fact of putting the ass upon the road would not bar the plaintiff of his action. All that is perfectly correct; for, although the ass may have been wrongfully there, still the defendant was bound to go along the road at such a pace as would be likely to prevent mischief. Were this not so, a man might justify the driving over goods left on a public highway, or even over a man lying asleep there, or the purposely running against a carriage going on the wrong side of the road.

GURNEY, B., and ROLFE, B., concurred.

Rule refused.[16]

[16] Compare the earlier case of Payne v. Smith (1836) 4 Dana (Ky.) 497: Whilst driving his horse in a gig, in a brisk trot, in one of the streets of Lexington, the defendant, in passing through a narrow space of about ten feet in width, between a wagon and one of the side pavements, came in contact with the plaintiff's horse, which was walking alone across the street, rather obliquely towards the gig." A recovery for the plaintiff, suing in trespass, was permitted. "The testimony," said Robertson, C. J., "will not allow the inference that the violent collision was the consequence, altogether or chiefly, of the heedlessness, or voluntary perverseness of the plaintiff's horse; or that the injurious contact was unavoidable by the defendant; or that it would have occurred had he been reasonably vigilant and careful, or had he been driving with prudent speed."

TUFF v. WARMAN.

(In the Exchequer Chamber, 1858. 5 C. B. [N. S.] 573, 141 Reprint, 231, 116 R. R. 774.)

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Common Pleas discharging a rule for a new trial (moved on the ground of misdirection and that the verdict was against evidence) in an action against the defendant, a Trinity House pilot, for negligently navigating a steam vessel called the "Celt" in the river Thames, and running against and damaging the plaintiff's barge, the "Nancy."

The cause was tried before Willes, J., at the sittings in London after Hilary Term, 1857, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff.[17] The facts brought out in the evidence were substantially as follows:

At the time the collision took place, the "Nancy" was sailing down the river with a fair wind: and the "Celt" was steaming up the river. There were only two persons on board the "Nancy." One was occupied in washing the deck; the other was steering. The latter was in such a position that he could not see ahead (the sail being in the way) without stooping. He stated that he had seen the "Celt" when more than half a mile off, on the south side of the river, and when he so saw her there was no likelihood of her coming into collision with the barge; that he had not seen her again until just before the collision, when, he said, he ported his helm, but that it was then too late to alter the course of the barge; that, if he had seen the steamer a few minutes before, he should have ported his helm, but he should not have avoided the collision by porting his helm five minutes before; and that there was plenty of room on each side for the steamer to pass.

Two seamen who were in another vessel were called by the plaintiff, and stated that the "Celt" was about the middle of the river, but nearer to the north than to the south shore; that the "Celt" and the "Nancy" were for a quarter of a mile or more before the collision in a direct line; that the "Celt" did not port her helm; and that there was no difficulty in the steamer passing the "Nancy" on either side.

On the part of the defendant, witnesses were called to prove that the defendant was only one-fourth of the width of the river from the north bank of the river; that he was keeping a lookout and that he could not see whether any one was looking out on the barge; that, several minutes before the collision he directed the helm of the "Celt" to be ported, and that this direction was obeyed; that this was done in time to void the collision, had the "Nancy" at the same time ported her helm also, or if she had even kept on her course; but that her steersman had starboarded his helm instead of porting it.

In his summing up the learned Judge told the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover if it was an accident, or if the plaintiff by his negligence had directly contributed to the accident; and that, if the injury was occasioned by the negligence of both parties, the plaintiff had no remedy: and he asked the jury whether they thought the absence of look-out was an act of negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and, if so, they would have to take it into consideration in deciding whether, notwithstanding that, the defendant was liable: and he further told them, that, if the parties on one vessel had a look-out and still persisted in a course which would inflict an injury, then they were liable, though there was no look-out on the other vessel, for that would not be the direct cause of the injury: and he referred to the case of Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546, by way of illustration. The learned Judge further told the jury, that, if they thought the accident had been partly caused by the plaintiff's own negligence, they should find for the defendant; but that, if they thought the barge was injured by the negligence of the defendant, and that the negligence of the plaintiff did not directly contribute thereto, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

In the following Easter Term, a rule was obtained on the part of the defendant calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground that the learned Judge had misdirected the jury, in this, that he ought to have told them, that, if the plaintiff by his negligence contributed to the occasioning of the accident, he could not recover, whether he contributed directly or indirectly; and that, even assuming negligence on the defendant's part, the plaintiff could not recover, if he might by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence; and that he should further have told the jury, that, if the plaintiff failed to comply with the statutory rule relative to porting his helm, whether his failure to do so arose from his not looking out or from other causes, and such failure either directly or indirectly contributed to the collision, he could not recover.

Cause was shown against this rule in Trinity Term, 1857, and the rule was discharged; but leave was given to the defendant to appeal, pursuant to the 35th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. (Vide 2 C. B. N. S. 740.)

If the Court should be of opinion that the objections made to the ruling of the learned Judge are unsustainable, the judgment below is to stand: if not, the judgment below is to be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The case was argued on the 10th of May, 1858, before WIGHTMAN, J., ERLE, J., CROMPTON, J., WATSON, B., BRAMWELL, B., and CHANNELL, B.[18]

Cur. adv. vult.

WIGHTMAN, J., now delivered the judgment of the Court: It appears to us that the proper question for the jury in this case, and indeed in all others of the like kind, is, whether the damage was occasioned entirely by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant, or whether the plaintiff himself so far contributed to the misfortune by his own negligence or want of ordinary and common care and caution, that, but for such negligence or want of ordinary care and caution on his part, the misfortune would not have happened. In the first case, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, in the latter not; as, but for his own fault, the misfortune would not have happened. Mere negligence or want of ordinary care or caution would not however, disentitle him to recover unless it were such, that, but for that negligence or want of ordinary care and caution, the misfortune could not have happened; nor, if the defendant might by the exercise of care on his part have avoided the consequences of the neglect or carelessness of the plaintiff.

This appears to be the result deducible from the opinion of the Judges in Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60, Bridge v. Grand Junction Railway Company, 3 M. & W. 246, Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 548, and Dowell v. General Steam Navigation Company, 5 El. & Bl. 206.

In the present case the main objection taken to the summing-up was, that the judge left to the jury whether the plaintiff by his negligence "directly" contributed to the misfortune; and it was contended, for the defendant, that, whether he directly or indirectly contributed, was immaterial, if he contributed to it by his negligence at all. But the direction to the jury must have reference to the evidence in the case; and, taking the whole summing-up together, in connection with the evidence, we do not think that the jury could have been misled by the use of the word "directly." The learned Judge told the jury, that, if the absence of a look-out was negligence on the part of the plaintiff, still, if the defendant also had a look-out, and nevertheless persisted in a course that would inflict an injury, he would be liable, though the plaintiff had no look-out; for that neglect of the plaintiff would not be the direct cause of the injury, that is to say, would not be a cause without which the injury would not have happened.

In this, which seems to be the obvious sense in which the word "direct" was used, we do not think there was any misdirection; and, in other respects, the summing-up does not appear to be objectionable, according to the rules to be adduced from the authorities referred to.

Upon the whole, then, we are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.[19]

Judgment affirmed.[20]

[19] "The judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Tuff v. Warman has been accepted, now for half a century, in England and I think we may say in most Common Law jurisdictions, as the leading authority in actions for negligence where there is evidence that both parties have contributed to the result by successive or alternate failures to act with due care and caution. In such a case the question is which of them might last have avoided the harmful result by the exercise of reasonable care. It has been justly said that the rule in Tuff v. Warman is not in terms applicable to cases where the negligence of the plaintiff and the defendant is not successive but simultaneous. There

[20] Compare the distinction taken in Ketch Frances v. Steamship Highland Loch, [1912] A. C. 312, where the defendants "were placed in a position in which they had to take one of two risks."

RADLEY et al. v. LONDON & N. W. RY. CO.

(House of Lords, 1876. 1 App. Cas. 754.)

This was an appeal against a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber.[21] The appellants were the plaintiffs in an action brought in the Court of Exchequer, in which they claimed damages for the destruction of a bridge occasioned, as they alleged, by the negligence of the defendants' servants. The cause was tried at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1873, before Brett, J., when the following facts were proved:

The plaintiffs were colliery proprietors owning and working a colliery close to a branch of the defendant's railway called the Parr Branch. In connection with the Parr Branch there were certain sidings on the land of the plaintiffs, and belonging to them, made by them for convenience of transferring and carrying coal raised from their colliery to and by the defendant's line of railway. Upon these sidings of the plaintiffs no engine of the defendants was accustomed to run throughout, and they were used solely, as far as the defendants were concerned, for placing therein returned empty waggons by the defendants and removing waggons therefrom when filled with coal. Waggons once left on these sidings by the defendants were entirely within the control of the plaintiffs. The defendants were accustomed to bring empty returned waggons along the Parr Branch at any hour by day or night, and without notice to the plaintiffs to shunt such waggons onto the plaintiffs sidings, where they were left under the plaintiffs' control. Part of the sidings was crossed by a bridge used as a tramway, about eight feet in height from the level of the rails, on which rested part of the head gearing and supports necessary for the working of the plaintiffs' colliery. An empty waggon, or one loaded in an ordinary way with coal, could pass safely and clearly under this bridge, and waggons were occasionally shunted under it by the defendants, but when they did so it was complained of by the plaintiffs, on the ground that waggons so left blocked up a public highway called Fleet Lane which crossed the siding between the railway and the bridge.

At the plaintiffs' colliery it was the ordinary custom to leave off work at 12:30 p. m. on Saturdays and to resume at 6 a. m. on Mondays. About 2:30 p. m. on Saturday, the 25th of January, 1873, the defendants brought three or four empty waggons of the plaintiffs', together with a disabled waggon of the plaintiffs' loaded upon another waggon, and marked "home for repairs," along the Parr Branch, and shunted them onto plaintiffs' siding, and left them there. The height of the waggon, with the disabled waggon loaded on it, was about eleven feet in all, too high to pass under the bridge before mena simpler rule will suffice, namely, that if the plaintiff could have avoided the accident by the use of ordinary care he cannot recover. See the learned and judicious remarks of an anonymous reviewer in the Law Quarterly Review, v. 87. This distinction was taken as long ago as 1869. Murphy v. Deane (1869) 101 Mass. 455, 3 Am. Rep. 390. That judgment is not wholly satisfying to English readers, for it insists on the doctrine (not accepted by the majority of American jurisdictions) that the plaintiff has to prove, as part of his own case, that he was in the exercise of due care. But on the facts it would seem that the plaintiff recklessly exposed herself to an obvious risk, that the instruction given to the jury was substantially right, and that an instruction in the terms of Tuff v. Warman, as asked for on the plaintiff's behalf, would probably have made no difference." Sir Frederick Pollock, 116 R. R. iv, v.

[21] For the report of the case in the Exchequer Chamber, see Radley v. London & North Western Ry. Co. (1875) L. R. 10 Ex. 100. The report of the case in the Exchequer will be found in Radley v. London & North Western Ry. Co. (1874) L. R. 9 Ex. 71.

tioned. The disabled waggon loaded upon the other, and the two or three others, were known to a person left in charge of the plaintiffs' works during the absence of the workmen at 2:30 on Saturday, the 25th of January, to be on the siding, and were left standing there during Saturday afternoon and up till and during Sunday night, the 26th, and it was known to him that a number of waggons would arrive during that night.

On the night of Sunday, about 12:30, the defendants brought up on their line a train of forty-eight empty waggons of the plaintiffs', and proceeded to shunt them onto plaintiffs' siding: but the night being very dark, the defendants' servants engaged in shunting did not notice that the loaded-up waggon was different from any other waggon in height. The train of waggons was slowly backed along the siding, and coming against the waggons which had been left by the defendants on the previous Saturday, pushed them over Fleet Lane towards the bridge, so as to cause the loaded-up waggon to strike against the bridge, which checked the further progress of the train. On touching the bridge the engine-driver felt an obstruction, and not having got all the waggons off the main line, which it was his duty to do, and believing the obstruction to be caused by a break, he, to use his own words, drew back the engine and gave another jam-up; by this he gave such a momentum to the engine that the loaded-up waggon knocked down and carried away the bridge and head gearing, which was the accident complained of by plaintiffs.

A guard in charge of the empty waggons was, whilst they were being shunted as above described, seated on one of the waggons about the middle of the train. The plaintiffs had also a siding on the east side of the defendants' line, on which empty waggons were from time to time shunted by the defendants, and on which the waggons brought on the Sunday night might have been put.

At the trial, the defendants contended that there was no negligence on their part, and even if there was, that there was contributory negligence on the plaintiffs' part, inasmuch as, knowing that waggons might arrive at any hour of the day or night, and that in fact they were expected to arrive on the night of the 26th, it was their duty to have removed the loaded-up waggon and to have the sidings clear; the plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that there was no such duty on their part, and that there was no evidence of contributory negligence.[22]

At the trial, Mr. Justice Brett told the jurors that:

"You must be satisfied that the plaintiffs' servants did not do anything which persons of ordinary care, under the circumstances, would not do, or that they omitted to do something which persons of ordinary care would do. * * * It is for you to say entirely as to both points, but the law is this, the plaintiffs must have satisfied you that this happened by the negligence of the defendants' servants, and without any contributory negligence of their own; in other words, that it was solely by the negligence of the defendants' servants. If you think it was, then your verdict will be for the plaintiffs. If you think it was not solely by the negligence of the defendants' servants your verdict must be for the defendants."

The jurors having, on this direction, stated that they thought there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs, the learned [22] The statement of the case to this point is from the report in the Exchequer Chamber, L. R. 10 Ex. 100–102. The facts are stated also, but less explicitly, in L. R. 9 Ex. 71, and in 1 App. Cas. 754 (1876).

Judge directed that the verdict should be entered for the defendants, but reserved leave for the plaintiffs to move. A rule having been obtained for a new trial, it was, after argument made absolute. On appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, the decision of the Exchequer was reversed. This appeal to the House of Lords was then brought.[23]

LORD PENZANCE. The remaining question is whether the learned Judge properly directed the jury in point of law. The law in these cases of negligence is, as was said in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, perfectly well settled and beyond dispute.

The first proposition is a general one, to this effect, that the plaintiff in an action for negligence cannot succeed if it is found by the jury that he has himself been guilty of any negligence or want of ordinary care which contributed to cause the accident.

But there is another proposition equally well established, and it is a qualification upon the first, namely, that though the plaintiff may have been guilty of negligence, and although that negligence may, in fact, have contributed to the accident, yet if the defendant could in the result, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened, the plaintiff's negligence will not excuse him. This proposition, as one of law, cannot be questioned. It was decided in the case of Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546, supported in that of Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 573, 27 L. J. C. P. 322, and other cases, and has been universally applied in cases of this character without question.

The only point for consideration, therefore, is whether the learned Judge properly presented it to the mind of the jury.

It seems impossible to say that he did so. At the beginning of his summing-up he laid down the following as the propositions of law which governed the case: It is for the plaintiffs to satisfy you that this accident happened through the negligence of the defendants' servants, and as between them and the defendants, that it was solely through the negligence of the defendants' servants. They must satisfy you that it was solely by the negligence of the defendants' servants, or, in other words, that there was no negligence on the part of their servants contributing to the accident; so that, if you think that both sides were negligent, so as to contribute to the accident, then the plaintiffs cannot recover.

This language is perfectly plain and perfectly unqualified, and in case the jurors thought there was any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs' servant, they could not, without disregarding the direction of the learned Judge, have found in the plaintiffs' favor, however negligent the defendants had been or however easily they might with ordinary care have avoided any accident at all.

The learned Judge then went on to describe to the jury what it was that might properly be considered to constitute negligence, first in the conduct of the defendants, and then in the conduct of the plaintiffs; and having done this, he again reverted to the governing propositions of law, as follows: "There seem to be two views. It is for you to say entirely as to both points. But the law is this, the plaintiffs must have satisfied you that this happened by the negligence of the defendants' servants, and without any contributory negligence of their own; in other words, that it was solely by the negligence of the defendants' servants. If you think it was, then your verdict will be for the plaintiffs. If you think it was not solely by the negligence of the defendants' servants, your verdict must be for the defendants."

This, again, is entirely without qualification, and the undoubted meaning of it is, that if there was any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs, they could in no case recover. Such a statement of the law is contrary to the doctrine established in the case of Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546, and the other cases above alluded to, and in no part of the summing-up is that doctrine anywhere to be found. The learned counsel were unable to point out any passage addressed to it.

It is true that in part of his summing-up the learned Judge pointed attention to the conduct of the engine driver, in determining to force his way by violence through the obstruction, as fit to be considered by the jury on the question of negligence; but he failed to add that if they thought the engine driver might at this stage of the matter by ordinary care have avoided all accident, any previous negligence of the plaintiffs would not preclude them from recovering.

In point of fact the evidence was strong to shew that this was the immediate cause of the accident, and the jury might well think that ordinary care and diligence on the part of the engine driver would, notwithstanding any previous negligence of the plaintiffs in leaving the loaded-up truck on the line, have made the accident impossible. This substantial defect of the learned Judge's charge is that that question was never put to the jury.

On this point, therefore, I propose to move that your Lordships should reverse the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, and direct a new trial.[24]

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer restored, and a new trial ordered, with costs.

[24] The Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns), "concurring with every word" of the opinion expressed by Lord Penzance, did not think it necessary that he should do more than say that he hoped their Lordships would agree to the motion which Lord Penzance had proposed. Lord Gordon concurred in the motion. Lord Blackburn agreed in the result.

BENNICHSEN v. MARKET ST. RY. CO.

Ruberta Bennichsen, by her guardian ad litem, sued to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by being struck by a street car of the defendant. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. Defendant appeals from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

McFARLAND, J. The important features of the case are these: At the time of the alleged injuries defendant was operating a double track electric street railroad on Sansome street in San Francisco, the street running north and south. Defendant also was operating a similar street railroad on Broadway street, which runs east and west, crossing Sansome street. Plaintiff lived with her parents in a house on the southeast corner of Sansome and Broadway, where the two railroads cross each other. She had been going to school for about four years before the accident by which she was injured, and in going to and from school, doing errands, etc., she had been in the habit almost daily of crossing said railroads. She was at the time of the accident almost nine years old—eight years eight months and some days. Her mother had frequently cautioned her to be careful in crossing the railroads. The plaintiff herself testified that before the accident when crossing the railroad she would look to see if there was any car coming so that she would not get hurt, and that if she saw a car coming she would wait on the sidewalk until it had passed. On the day of the accident she undertook to cross Sansome street between Broadway and Pacific street, which is the next street south of and parallel with Broadway, when the car was close at hand going north toward Broadway, and was struck by it, and injured. She did not look to see if the car was coming. The evidence of defendant was to the point that she ran against the side of the car, and was thrown under it, although the jury may have been justified in finding that she was struck by the front end of the car. Witnesses for plaintiff testified that when they saw her just before the accident she was from 8 to 10 feet from the car. But under any view of the evidence on this point it is clear beyond doubt that if she had been a person of mature age she would have been guilty of contributory negligence, negligence which contributed proximately and directly to her injuries. And we need not inquire whether the jury would have been justified, under all the evidence on the point, in finding that on account of her age, no negligence could be attributed to her, because the case was tried on the theory, and the jury were instructed, that even though she, or her parents, were guilty of contributory negligence, still she was entitled to recover if "by reason of negligence on his part the motorman failed to avoid the accident," and "if the defendant's employés could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care."

The case, therefore, was tried upon the theory that there was evidence to bring it within the cases which hold that although the person injured put himself by his own negligence in a place of danger, if the employés in charge of the train discovered his danger in time to prevent injury by the exercise of ordinary care and did not do so, then, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the injured person, he may recover. But there was no such evidence in the case at bar. There is no pretense that the motorman saw the plaintiff at all at the time of the accident until after it had occurred; on the other hand, it is shown clearly that he did not. The motorman testified that he did not see her, and his testimony is not only uncontradicted, but is confirmed by testimony of the plaintiff. He said that he was looking ahead on Sansome street, although somewhat to the left or west in order to watch for a car that might be coming down Broadway, but that he had Sansome street in full view, and did not see plaintiff until she had run into the side of the car. And to confirm the fact that he did not see her one of plaintiff's main witnesses testified that at the time of the accident the motorman "was looking behind" and that "his face was back, he was looking back, he was not looking ahead." And, indeed, plaintiff's whole case is argued upon the theory that the negligence of the motorman consisted in his not looking ahead, and that this is the negligence which entitles plaintiff to recover, even though she was guilty of contributory negligence. But no case has gone that far; and to go that far would be practically to destroy the whole doctrine of contributory negligence. There was in this case, therefore, no evidence to justify the jury in finding that there was such negligence on the part of defendant's employés as entitled plaintiff to recover notwithstanding her contributory negligence. Of course, contributory negligence implies some negligence on the part of the defendant; and the general rule is that a plaintiff complaining of personal injuries caused by a train or car, who was himself guilty of negligence, which contributed proximately and directly to the injuries, cannot recover, although the defendant was also guilty of negligence. There are exceptions to the rule, however, but they embrace only those cases where a person is by his own negligence in a dangerous situation and is discovered in that position by those in the management of the approaching train in time to prevent injury by the exercise of ordinary care. In the earlier cases the conduct of those in charge of a train who, seeing one in a dangerous position, made no effort to avoid injuring him when it could have been easily avoided, is characterized as "willful and wanton." The cases, however, all hold that the discovery of such a person in a dangerous position in time to prevent injury by the exercise of ordinary care is necessary to constitute an exception to the rule that one guilty of contributory negligence cannot recover. It is not necessary to review the authorities cited by respondent other than the case of Lee v. Market Street Railway Co., 135 Cal. 293, 67 Pac. 765, for that is the case most favorable to respondent's contention. But in the Lee Case this court, after referring to certain evidence, said (italics ours): "Here, then, was enough to warrant the submission to the jury of the question whether or not the defendant exercised ordinary care after the discovery of plaintiff's situation of peril. If it did not, then notwithstanding the negligence of plaintiff, it was liable. The verdict of the jury is a finding to the effect that they did not believe that defendant's employés exercised proper care after discovery of plaintiff's situation." And so that case was decided upon the theory that defendant failed to exercise ordinary care to prevent the accident after discovery of plaintiff's perilous situation. It has been expressly held that a case like the one at bar can be taken out of the doctrine of contributory negligence only where the defendant had actual knowledge of plaintiff's perilous situation. In Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, this court, speaking through Angellotti, J., after quoting from Beach on Contributory Negligence, said "It is, of course, true, as urged by defendant, that it is essential to such liability that the defendant did actually know of the danger, and that there is no such liability where he does not know of the peril of the injured party, but would have discovered the same but for remissness on his part." In Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 232, 53 Pac. 652, Temple, J., speaking for the court, said: "The case is not within the rule laid down in Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., 103 Cal. 541, 37 Pac. 500. Doubtless, notwithstanding the negligence of a plaintiff has put him in peril, yet if his danger is perceived by the defendant in time, so that by the exercise of ordinary diligence on his part injury can be avoided, the defendant will be held for the injury. But that is based upon the fact that a defendant did actually know of the danger—not upon the proposition that he would have discovered the peril of the plaintiff but for remissness on his part. Under this rule, a defendant is not liable because he ought to have known." * * *

NICOL v. OREGON–WASHINGTON R. & NAVIGATION CO.

Action by Nicol against the Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Company. There was a judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

GOSE, J. This is an action for damages against the defendant, a common carrier, for an alleged negligent destruction of plaintiff's automobile at a country crossing. The case was tried to the court. Findings were made in favor of plaintiff, and a judgment was entered thereon, from which the defendant has appealed.

The negligence charged is that, while the respondent was in the act of driving his automobile over the railroad crossing in a public highway, the machine became stalled crosswise of the track, the engine of the machine stopped running, the respondent was unable to start it or to move the machine off the track, and "the engineer and fireman in charge of defendant's said train saw the plaintiff before the train got to him, and saw his automobile standing upon the crossing in sufficient time to have stopped said train and to have avoided colliding with and destroying plaintiff's automobile." The appellant joined issue on the charge of negligence, and pleaded that the collision resulted from the negligence of the respondent. The collision occurred about 1 o'clock in the morning.

The court did not find, and the evidence does not show, that the engineer actually saw the machine. The court's findings in this respect are: That, when the respondent found that he could not extricate his machine, he ran north along the track and right of way toward the approaching train, a distance of 650 or 700 feet, lighting matches, waving his arms, and shouting to signal the engineer in charge of the train, and that, had the engineer been keeping a proper lookout ahead, he would have seen the respondent, who while running down the straight track was in plain view of the engineer in the rays of the headlight of the engine for at least 1,000 feet before the engine passed him, and would have seen his signals in time to have stopped the train before striking the machine.

The first point urged is that there is a variance between the pleadings and the evidence, and that the findings are not within the issues. The variance is immaterial. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1752; Irby v. Phillips, 40 Wash. 618, 82 Pac. 931; Richardson v. Moore, 30 Wash. 406, 71 Pac. 18.

The further consideration of the case necessitates a statement of the essential facts. The train which struck the automobile was a passenger train composed of nine cars, and was traveling from Tacoma in a southerly direction at a speed of 35 to 38 miles an hour. The engine was equipped with a standard electric headlight, burning brightly and lighting the track so that an object thereon could be seen on a bright night a distance varyingly estimated by the locomotive engineers at from 1,000 to 1,800 feet. The track has a one-degree curve for a distance of 200 feet immediately north of the crossing where the accident happened. From there northward it runs straight for a distance of 4,800 feet. The respondent says that he ran north towards the approaching train, following the center of the track, for about 500 or 600 feet, striking matches and waving his arms, and that he then stepped to the outside of the track and continued running along it a distance of 100 to 200 feet, giving the same signals, at which point he was passed by the train. The engineer says that he passed him about 500 feet north of the crossing; that he did not see him until the headlight was opposite him; that he then applied his air, but did not apply the emergency brakes; and that he stopped the train in 1,000 feet. The engineer admitted that he knew that the track was crossed at grade by a public highway, at the point where the collision happened. The respondent was returning to Tacoma from the country club, at American Lake, in his machine, the morning of the accident. He was traveling north on the west side of the railroad track. He got on the wrong road, crossed the railroad track and, discovering his mistake, turned and started to recross the track, got off the planking, which was 16 feet wide over the track, and got his machine stalled crosswise of the track near the cattle guards, as before stated. He says that the night was bright, and that the stars were shining, and that all the lights upon his machine were lighted and in good condition. These facts clearly establish his negligence. Moore v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 58 Wash. 1, 107 Pac. 852, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 410. The principal fact in dispute was as to whether the night was clear or foggy. The respondent's witnesses asserted the former to be the fact, whilst the appellant's witnesses insisted that the latter was the fact. The court found that "the night was clear, there being no fog to any extent or other atmospheric difficulty to interfere with the engineer's view." We accept the fact as found by the court.

The respondent contends that, concerning his negligence, the negligence had ceased; that appellant owed the duty of keeping a lookout; that, had the engineer exercised reasonable care, he would have seen the respondent and his signals in time to have avoided the collision; and that the appellant is liable under the doctrine of "last clear chance." On the other hand, the appellant earnestly insists that it owed no duty to the respondent, except to not willfully injure him or his property after actually discovering his peril. We think the respondent has the correct view. His machine was within the public highway; he was in no sense a trespasser, although without the traveled portion of the road. The appellant knew of the presence of the highway, knew that it crossed the track at grade, and knew that it was traveled by the public. Moreover, it was the duty of the engineer to exercise reasonable care, and had he done so under his own testimony, assuming that the night was clear, he would have seen the respondent and his signals a distance of 1,000 feet or more. This would have given him at least 1,500 feet in which to stop the train, according to his own statement. He testified that he was keeping a lookout ahead, but that the presence of the fog obscured his vision. One of the appellant's witnesses, a locomotive engineer, testified that the engineer could see a man ahead a distance of 1,200 feet on a clear night. In failing to see the respondent and heed his signals, the engineer was clearly guilty of negligence. The act of a man running along a right of way at 1 o'clock in the morning, striking matches and waving his arms, is a circumstance that ought to attract the attention of a prudent engineer, and it was notice that there was danger ahead.

The doctrine of last clear chance is applied perhaps most frequently to cases where the plaintiff's negligence has terminated, and where the defendant thereafter, in the exercise of reasonable care and owing a duty to exercise it, should have discovered the peril in time to have prevented an injury. It has also often been applied where it would be apparent to one in control of a dangerous agency, if exercising reasonable vigilance, that a traveler is unconscious of his danger or so situated as to be incapable of self-protection, and in such cases, if the one controlling the agency could have averted the danger by exercising reasonable care and failed to do so, liability follows. It is based upon the principle that the negligence of the one is remote, and that the negligence of the other is the proximate and efficient cause of the catastrophe; he having the last clear opportunity of preventing it. * * *[26]

The engineer testified that he stopped the train, after seeing the respondent, in a distance of 1,000 feet, and that he could have made an emergency stop in 700 or 900 feet. The locomotive engineers who testified for the respondent said that the particular train could have been stopped in an emergency in a distance of 600 feet. The engineer had a right to exercise his best judgment as to whether the conditions which confronted him demanded an emergency stop (his first and highest duty being owed to the passengers), and the appellant could not be held liable for an error of judgment made under such circumstances. We place the liability upon the ground that (as the court found) the respondent while running down the "straight track" was in plain view of the engineer, in the rays of the headlight, for at least 1,000 feet before the engine passed him. This being true, if the engineer had been keeping a proper lookout—and all the appellant's expert witnesses testified that all prudent engineers keep a constant lookout ahead—he would have seen the respondent and would have seen his signals, and in view of the lateness of the hour and the proximity of the highway crossing, it was his duty to heed the signals. We have found no case involving facts similar to these present in this case, but we think the case readily accommodates it-

MOUNT, C. J., and CROW, PARKER, and CHADWICK, JJ., concur.

BLODGETT v. CENTRAL VERMONT RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1909. 82 Vt. 269, 73 Atl. 590.)

Action by Blodgett, as administrator, to recover for the death of his intestate through the alleged negligence of the defendant. Judgment for the plaintiff and the defendant excepts.

WATSON, J. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant moved for a verdict on the grounds (1) that there was no evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant; and (2) that the undisputed and unconflicting evidence showed contributory negligence on the part of the intestate. The case is here on exception to the overruling of this motion. The facts herein stated appear from or are supported by the evidence.

The intestate, a man about 72 years of age, while driving across defendant's railroad track at a highway crossing at West Berlin in the afternoon of May 18, 1905, was struck by defendant's engine drawing the mail train, so called, north-bound, and instantly killed. The train was running at about schedule rate of speed, 45 miles an hour. The depot at that place is a building about 25 feet in length and a little less than that in width. It stands 62 feet south of the crossing where the intestate was killed, wholly on the east side of the main track and about 9 feet from the east rail. There is a platform toward the track extending north and south beyond the building, the whole length of which is 134 feet. The northerly end of this platform comes to the highway. West Berlin is not a regular stopping place for any passenger trains. It is a flag station for some trains, but the one in question never stops there except to leave passengers coming from beyond Springfield, which happens only two or three times a year. * * *

The intestate was a peddler driving a single horse hitched to an open wagon with a small box containing his goods fitted into the rear end of the wagon body. East of the crossing in question the highway over which he was traveling is a gradual ascent to the railroad. At a distance of 328 feet east of the east rail a person traveling over the highway toward the crossing has a plain view of the railroad track from the depot southerly some 1500 or 1600 feet. The track there is elevated considerably above the level of the land, and is in plain view for the whole distance to the crossing, except as the vision is obstructed by the depot. Going westerly from a point in the middle of the road 41 feet east of the east rail to the crossing, the view of the track southerly is thus obstructed until within 24 feet of the east rail. There the track can be seen past the westerly end of the building for a distance of 115 feet. At 20 feet from the east rail the track is visible for a distance of 160½ feet; and, when within 16 feet, the track is in full view practically as far southerly as it is from any place hereinbefore named. It was conceded by the plaintiff in argument that all signals required by law and more were given on the train. When the engine was about half way between the whistling post for the crossing and the station, the engineer, looking beyond the depot on its easterly side, saw the intestate on the highway driving toward the railroad. Thereupon he sounded a second whistle for the crossing. The team about the same time went behind the depot, and was seen no more by the engineer until it was on the crossing in front of the engine. It was argued that the engineer should have seen the team after it came in view on the westerly side of the depot before it went on the crossing and in season to have prevented the accident, and that a failure so to do is a circumstance from which a jury may infer negligence. We will assume without deciding this to be so, and pass to the question of contributory negligence.

The undisputed evidence shows that the intestate's senses of sight and hearing were good; that he was in good health and very active; that the day of the accident was warm and pleasant, and there was nothing over his ears to prevent him from hearing; that the horse he was driving was 12 or 13 years old, very quiet, easy to manage, and not easily frightened by a train of cars or anything; and that during the last six or seven years of his life he averaged to drive over the crossing in question once in four or five weeks, by reason of which he was acquainted with the railroad in that vicinity, also with the crossing and its surroundings. The horse was walking at a fair gait in the middle of the road as it went past the depot and approached the crossing. The intestate was looking at the horse, and did not look up the track southerly until the horse was partly on the crossing. When the horse was some five or ten feet from the track, two witnesses who were on the opposite side of the track and a short distance away saw the intestate driving toward the crossing, and hallooed to him, saying, "The cars are coming," at the same time throwing up their hands to attract his attention, but the noise from the train was such that the witnesses were not sure that he heard their voices, nor did they know that he saw their demonstrations. The point where the intestate's view was first obstructed by the depot is about 41 feet east of the east rail, and from there in the middle of the traveled road the track is visible 600 feet southerly, and a moving train of cars can be seen 1,000 feet further. When the intestate was 16 feet from the east rail, the approaching train must have been plainly in view, and the horse yet a distance of 4 feet from the nearest rail. A stop might have been made at this place of safety until the train had passed. But, instead of thus avoiding the danger, the intestate without making vigilant use of his senses of sight and hearing recklessly drove on the crossing in front of the train. The rule making it the duty of a traveler nearing a railroad crossing to look and listen for approaching trains, and to make such vigilant use of his sight and hearing in so doing as a careful and prudent man would make in the same circumstances, was fully laid down in Manley v. Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., 69 Vt. 101, 37 Atl. 279, also in Carter v. Central Vermont R. R. Co., 72 Vt. 190, 47 Atl. 797, and need not be here repeated. In the latter case it is said that if by the vigilant use of his eyes and ears the plaintiff might have discovered and avoided the danger and omitted such vigilance, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and that he was chargeable with such knowledge of the approach of the train as he might have obtained by the exercise of that degree of care, which in the circumstances of danger he was bound to use. There seems to be no escape from the conclusion that the intestate was guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident and precludes a recovery by the plaintiff, unless the evidence tends to show the defendant guilty of such subsequent negligence as in the circumstances renders it liable.

It is urged by the plaintiff that, when the intestate's horse first came in view on the westerly side of the depot, it was visible to the engineer, and would have been seen by him had he been in the exercise of requisite care, before the intestate, sitting 12 feet back from the horse's head, could look past the depot and see the approaching train; that consequently the defendant had the last clear chance to avoid the collision; and that, since the engineer was negligent in failing thus to see the team, this negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, and the negligence on the part of the intestate in driving on the crossing was remote, and will not defeat a recovery. Again assuming that the defendant was negligent in not thus seeing the intestate before he drove on the crossing, yet it does not follow that the last clear chance was with the defendant. On the contrary, the undisputed testimony of the witnesses who saw the accident shows that the intestate had an equal opportunity to avoid a collision. We have already noted the intestate's negligence in driving on the track without first making proper use of his senses to ascertain whether there was approaching danger. So far as the evidence shows, he did not look to see whether a train was coming or not until his horse was just stepping on the crossing, or its forward feet were on the plank of the crossing. The horse was still walking, was undisturbed by the noise of the train, and was under the complete control of the intestate. On seeing the train, the intestate at first partly stopped the horse, or pulled it back, as though to back up, and then urged it forward. At that time the accident could have been prevented by backing the horse three or four feet off the crossing to a place of safety. This the intestate had time to do, for, in fact, the team subsequently moved forward at a walk far enough to place the horse entirely over the crossing before the collision, by reason whereof it escaped injury. Thus it clearly appears that the intestate's negligence was continuous to the time when the engineer discovered the team on the track, after which everything possible was done by the defendant's servants in the management of the train to prevent a collision. So, even though as assumed the engineer was negligent in not seeing the team after it was visible on the westerly side of the depot before the time when it was no longer possible for him to avoid the accident, the intestate's negligence was of the same degree and concurrent during all of the same time, to say nothing of his negligence later, and no recovery can be had. In Trow v. Vt. Central R. Co., 24 Vt. 487, 58 Am. Dec. 191, upon examination of authorities, it was held that when there has been mutual negligence, and the negligence of each party was the proximate cause of the injury, no action can be sustained, and this is the established doctrine.

It follows that the motion for a verdict should have been granted. Judgment reversed, and judgment for the defendant to recover its costs.[27]

[27] Part of the opinion is omitted.

Compare: Quinn v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (1903) 162 Ind. 442, 70 N. E. 526: (Action to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate through the alleged negligence of the defendant railway company. About 10 o'clock in the forenoon of a clear day the plaintiff's intestate, walking north on Third street, approached the public grade crossing of the defendant's tracks. He was acquainted with this crossing. He possessed ordinary intelligence. His eyesight and hearing were good. When he reached the crossing, a through freight train on the main track was moving toward Third street. When he was from sixty to eighty feet south of the side track, defendant's freight engine, with two loaded cars, went east on the side track, and when he reached the crossing of Third street, this engine and these cars were standing still about 260 feet east of Third street. The east end of that portion of the train on the side track which had been cut off from the two cars was about 600 feet westward from the crossing. The decedent stopped near the south rail of the side track, and remained on or near the track about two minutes, watching the through freight train on the main track, which passed in front of him, and only a few feet away, at a speed of from eight to ten miles per hour. No obstruction prevented him from seeing the engine and two cars on the side track, and if he had looked eastward he could have seen them when they were standing still, or after they started westward, when they were approaching him. While decedent's attention was directed to the train on the main track, the local freight engine and two cars were run back, westward, at a speed of about four miles per hour, and struck the decedent while he was standing on or very near the side track. No signal of the starting or approach of the engine and cars on the side track was given and no watch was kept by the train men as they approached the crossing of Third street. The question as framed for the court was this: "Whether there can be a recovery when a foot traveler on a public street, approaching a railroad crossing where there are two tracks, sees a train standing motionless on the track nearest him, and goes upon or near that track, and stands there, awaiting the passing of a train upon the further track, to which his attention is directed, and while so standing, with his attention directed to the passing train, is struck by the train upon the first track backing noiselessly down upon him, without signal or warning of any kind being given him of its approach." This court's answer was as follows: "In the present

EVANSVILLE & S. I. TRACTION CO. v. SPIEGEL.

This is an action brought against the Traction Company to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's minor son, Carl Spiegel. His death is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in operating a car on Main street, in Evansville. There was a general denial, with a verdict for the plaintiff. From a judgment on this verdict for $1,363 the defendant appeals.

LAIRY, J. * * * Under the issues formed by the pleadings in this case, evidence might have been introduced that would bring the case within the operation of the doctrine known as the "last clear chance." This doctrine is clearly stated by a writer in 2 Law Quarterly Review, p. 507, as follows: "The party who last has a clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, notwithstanding the negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible for it." This doctrine has been frequently recognized and applied by our courts. Grass v. Fort Wayne, etc., Traction Co. (1908) 42 Ind. App. 395, 81 N. E. 514; Indianapolis St. R. Co. v. Schmidt (1905) 35 Ind. App. 202, 71 N. E. 663, 72 N. E. 478; Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Hamer (1902) 29 Ind. App. 426, 62 N. E. 658, 63 N. E. 778; Krenzer v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. (1898) 151 Ind. 587, 43 N. E. 649, 52 N. E. 220, 68 Am. St. Rep. 252; Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Pitzer (1887) 109 Ind. 179, 6 N. E. 310, 10 N. E. 70, 58 Am. St. Rep. 387; Indianapolis St. R. Co. v. Bolin (1906) 39 Ind. App. 169, 78 N. E. 210.

case the tracks of the appellee were straight, and the view from the point where the decedent stood was unobstructed for more than three hundred feet eastward. While standing still, the western end of the train which afterwards struck the decedent was about two hundred fifty feet eastward from him, and in plain view all the time. When it started toward him, at a speed of four or five miles per hour, if the decedent had looked in its direction, he must have seen it before it reached Third street, and ample time would have been afforded him to get off the track. The circumstance that his attention was directed to a train passing on the north track constituted no excuse for his failure to observe the train approaching him on the south track, nor for his negligence in standing upon the south track or very near to it. If the movement of the train on the north track filled the air with dust thereby obscuring the view up and down the south track, this was but an additional reason for the exercise of greater vigilance on the part of the decedent. Oleson v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. (1896) 143 Ind. 405, 42 N. E. 736, 32 L. R. A. 149; Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Duncan (1895) 143 Ind. 524, 42 N. E. 37. If this condition existed, common prudence required that the decedent should get off and away from the track. The decedent had a basket of clothing on his right shoulder, and this probably prevented him from seeing the train as it came toward him. Had he turned his face eastward, or if he had put the basket down when he went upon the track, he must have discovered the coming train, and could instantly have stepped aside into a place of safety. He failed to take this natural and reasonable precaution, and his want of care for his own safety certainly contributed in some degree, and, as we think, in a very considerable degree, to occasion the accident and injury. The answers of the jury established the fact of contributory negligence on the part of the decedent. This being so, there could be no recovery by the plaintiff." Per Dowling, J.)

Even though it be conceded that the answers to the interrogatories show that the plaintiff's decedent negligently approached and entered upon appellant's track in front of an approaching car, and thus negligently exposed himself to the danger of a collision, this would not necessarily preclude a recovery for injury resulting from appellant's negligence. Answers to interrogatories showing such facts would not overthrow a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for the reason that evidence may have been introduced proving, or tending to prove, that after said decedent was in the position of danger in which he had so negligently placed himself, the defendant knew of his perilous position, or might have known it by the exercise of ordinary care, in time to prevent the injury, and that it negligently failed to take adavntage of the last clear chance to prevent the injury. It is the duty of this court to reconcile the interrogatories with the general verdict, if they can be so reconciled by any evidence which might have been introduced within the issues; and, to this end, the court, in ruling upon this motion, will treat the case as though this evidence had been introduced and acted upon by the jury. In view of what we have said, we are of opinion that the answers to the interrogatories are not in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict and the motion of appellant for judgment in its favor on such interrogatories, notwithstanding the general verdict, was properly overruled.

Several reasons were assigned by appellant in its motion for a new trial. The first one presented and relied on by appellant is that the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence. In passing on this motion, it is the duty of the court to consider the answers to the interrogatories in connection with the evidence for the purpose of deciding whether the verdict is sustained by the evidence. Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Clark (1880) 73 Ind. 168.

The jury found both by its general verdict and by the answers to interrogatories that defendant was negligent. The answers to the interrogatories show that its car was being run at the rate of fifteen miles an hour at the time of the accident, a rate which was three miles in excess of the rate permitted by the ordinance. There is much conflict in the evidence as to the speed of the car, some of the witnesses stating that it was running at a much greater speed and some that it was running much slower. Where the evidence is conflicting, the verdict of the jury is conclusive on this court.

We will next consider whether the undisputed evidence in the case, considered in connection with the interrogatories, shows that decedent was negligent in going upon appellant's track, where he was killed.

The evidence in reference to the conduct of decedent from the time he came out of Williams street until he was struck by the car is not in serious conflict. The jury have found the facts showing this conduct in answers to certain interrogatories, and the facts so found are fully sustained by the evidence. The jury find upon this question that decedent came out of Williams street, riding a bicycle, and started diagonally across Main street toward Sycamore street; that he was carrying a basket in his left hand, had his right hand on the handle-bar of the bicycle, and was traveling at a moderate rate of speed; that he had frequently crossed Main street at and near that place, and was familiar with the location and surroundings, and knew that cars frequently passed on Main street; that there was nothing to obstruct his view of the approaching car at any time after he rode out of Williams street into Main street, and no other car was passing at the time; that if he had looked north on Main street at any time after he came out of Williams street he could have seen a car for two blocks, and that he could have heard the car for half a block if he had listened, but that there were noises of pedestrians and vehicles in the vicinity which would have prevented him from hearing the car; that when he reached the space between the two tracks, he was met by another bicycle rider coming from the opposite direction in the space between the tracks, and that he was attempting to pass this bicycle rider when he went upon the west track; and that he went upon the west track at a point in a straight line between the middle of Williams street and the middle of Sycamore street and about three feet in front of the car. These facts having been found by the jury will be taken as true, so far as there is evidence to sustain them, and the fact that there may have been conflicting evidence as to some or all of such facts will not affect their verity. In deciding whether the general verdict is sustained by the evidence, the facts found by way of answers to interrogatories will be treated the same as though they were established by the undisputed evidence, unless some of the facts so found are unsupported by any evidence.

There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether decedent rode his bicycle in a straight line from the point where he entered upon Main street toward the middle of Sycamore street until he went upon the track, or whether he rode south in the space between the two tracks for a short distance before he went upon the west track, but this is not material. In either view of the case, it appears from the evidence, when considered in connection with the answers to the interrogatories, that he rode half way across Main street in plain view of the approaching car, and went upon the street-car track within three feet of the front end of such car, while it was moving at the rate of twelve or fifteen miles an hour. At that point Main street is shown by the map introduced in evidence to be about sixty feet in width, and the answers to interrogatories show that it was practically level, and that there was nothing to obstruct decedent's view of the approaching car. The evidence shows no conditions or circumstances surrounding the decedent just before the accident which could properly be considered by the jury as an excuse for decedent's apparent failure to observe or heed the approach of the car. Nothing is shown that could have obstructed his view or distracted his attention. While some of the witnesses testified that this was a busy street about the noon hour, and that many people, on foot and in wagons and other vehicles, passed the point where the accident happened, about that hour, nothing is shown as to conditions and surroundings at the time the accident occurred. In the light of these facts we cannot think that the conduct of the decedent in approaching and entering upon the street-car track in the manner shown was consistent with due care on his part. We recognize that the rule of law which requires a person about to cross the track of a steam railroad to look and listen for approaching trains in order to absolve himself from the charge of contributory negligence does not apply in all its strictness to persons traveling along, or crossing street railways. Street railways are constructed along and operated in streets, and must be so operated with due regard to the rights of others using said streets for other modes of travel, and for just reasons the same degree of care is not required of one in crossing a street-car track as is required of one in crossing the track of a steam railroad. Indianapolis St. R. Co. v. Marschke (1906) 166 Ind. 490, 77 N. E. 945; White v. Worcester, etc., St. R. Co. (1896) 167 Mass. 43, 44 N. E. 1052.

This rule does not, however, absolve persons going upon or across the tracks of street railways from all care. A person about to cross a street-car track must use ordinary care in view of all the circumstances and surroundings. He must make reasonable use of his eyes to observe the approach of cars, and where there is nothing to obstruct his view, or to distract his attention, and he goes upon the track immediately in front of a moving car, he is guilty of negligence. Indianapolis St. R. Co. v. Zaring (1904) 33 Ind. App. 297, 71 N. E. 270, 501; Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Helvie (1899) 22 Ind. App. 515, 53 N. E. 191.

In this case we cannot escape the conclusion that appellee's decedent was negligent in approaching and entering upon appellant's street-car track, where he received the injury that caused his death.

The question of last clear chance yet remains to be considered. This doctrine finds its most frequent application in cases where the negligence of the defendant is shown, and where it also appears that the plaintiff, or decedent, by a want of due care on his part placed himself in a position of imminent peril exposing him to danger as a result of the negligence of the defendant. In such a case it may be shown that after the plaintiff, or decedent, had thus negligently exposed himself to the danger, circumstances or conditions existed, or then arose, which imposed upon the defendant or its agents a special duty to protect him from injury and afforded an opportunity to do so, and that such duty was not observed and the opportunity neglected. When this is shown, the negligent conduct of the plaintiff is held to be, not the cause, but a condition of the situation with reference to which the defendant must act. In the case of Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. East Tenn., etc., R. Co. (1894) 60 Fed. 993, 9 C. C. A. 314, the doctrine is thus stated: "If, with a knowledge of what plaintiff has done, or is about to do, the defendant can by ordinary care, avoid the injury likely to result therefrom, and does not, defendant's failure to avoid the injury is the last link in the chain of causes, and is, in law, the sole proximate cause. The conduct of the plaintiff is not, then, a cause, but a condition of the situation with respect to which the defendant has to act."

Contributory negligence, when shown, is a complete defense to a case founded upon negligence of the defendant. To make out a case of contributory negligence, two elements must be established by the evidence: (1) That the plaintiff was negligent, and (2) that this negligence proximately and directly contributed to the injury. If the jury found from the evidence in this case that after the motorman discovered the peril of the plaintiff's decedent to which his negligence had exposed him, or was about to expose him, such motorman had time and opportunity to prevent the injury by the exercise of precautions to that end, and he failed to do so, then contributory negligence on the part of the decedent is not established. In such a case the negligence of decedent is established, but it is not shown to have directly and proximately contributed to his injury, and therefore the second element is wanting.

The doctrine of last clear chance is not an exception to the rule relating to contributory negligence. Facts which render the doctrine of last clear chance applicable in any case, do not tend to prove that the plaintiff was not negligent, but do tend to prove that the negligence of the plaintiff, which placed him in a situation of danger, was not the proximate cause of his injury, but was only the remote cause. Grass v. Fort Wayne, etc., Traction Co., supra.

In the case of Indianapolis St. R. Co. v. Schmidt, supra, it is said "that the negligence of the plaintiff ceases to be the proximate cause of the injury when the defendant has opportunity to prevent it, and, with knowledge of the exposed condition of the plaintiff, negligently refuses to do so, is well settled in this state."

In considering contributory negligence with reference to the doctrine of last clear chance, it is important to distinguish the facts tending to show want of due care on the part of plaintiff from those tending to show that such want of care on his part directly and proximately contributed to the injury. In a case like this, proof of facts tending to show that decedent approached and entered upon defendant's street-car track without taking any precaution for his own safety, makes out a prima facie showing upon the question of his negligence; and proof of facts tending to show that by reason of such negligence he was placed in a position where he was exposed to the danger of being injured, and where he was actually injured by reason of defendant's negligence, would make out a prima facie showing that the negligence of decedent directly and proximately contributed to his injury. Such a showing upon both of these questions would constitute a prima facie case of contributory negligence. This case may be met by evidence tending to rebut the showing made upon either or both of the constituent elements of contributory negligence. The showing upon the first element, before referred to, may be rebutted by evidence tending to show that decedent used due care, and the showing upon the second element may be rebutted by evidence tending to prove that after decedent had by his own negligence become exposed to imminent and impending danger, defendant had it within its power to prevent the injury by the exercise of some precaution on its part which it failed to exercise. Evidence tending to establish "last clear chance," does not have the effect of confessing and avoiding contributory negligence, but its purpose and effect is to show that plaintiff's negligence was not the proximate cause of his injury, and thus to rebut the evidence tending to establish that fact.

The defendant in this case, as shown by the interrogatories considered in connection with the undisputed evidence, made out a prima facie case of contributory negligence upon both its essential elements. It was incumbent upon plaintiff to introduce the evidence, if such had not already been introduced, tending to prove, either that his decedent used due care, or that under the circumstances, facts existed which called for the application of the doctrine of "last clear chance." See Ency. Ev. 854: Gibson v. Harrison (1901) 69 Ark. 385, 63 S. W. 999, 54 L. R. A. 268; Koegel v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. (1904) 181 Mo. 379, 80 S. W. 905; Luna v. Missouri, etc., R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 73 S. W. 1061. If there is a total failure of evidence upon both of these propositions, the prima facie case of contributory negligence made by appellant must prevail; but if there is evidence tending to show, either that plaintiff used due care, or if he was negligent that such negligence was not the direct and proximate cause of his injury, but only the remote cause, then the question of contributory negligence was for the jury, and the burden of this issue remained with the defendant as to both of the constituent elements of contributory negligence. Grass v. Fort Wayne, etc., Traction Co., supra; 1 Elliott, Evidence, 139.

We have already stated that there is no evidence tending to show due care on the part of decedent, and we will now consider the evidence bearing upon the other questions. In order to make such a showing as calls for the application of the doctrine of last clear chance, the evidence must show, or tend to show (1) that, at some appreciable time before the accident happened, decedent was in a place of imminent and apparent danger, or that his appearance and conduct was such as to indicate to a man of ordinary prudence occupying the position of the motorman that he was about to place himself in such a position; and (2) that during the time which intervened after this situation arose and before the injury the motorman could have prevented or mitigated such injury by the exercise of due care, and decedent could not.

The only evidence bearing upon this question that we have been able to find is the evidence of the motorman. He said: "I saw him come out of Williams street, right onto Main. I was right down here pretty close to him. He had a basket in his left hand, and had his right hand on the handle-bar of the bicycle. He was headed in the direction of Sycamore street. I saw another boy on a bicycle coming up Main street. When he got up right close to the boy, it seemed like he was going to run into that boy, and they were going to have a collision, and he whipped his wheel right square around on my track. I don't think I was more than three feet away, might say right against him when he got on my track. I did not reverse the power 'til he got on the track. I did not use the brake at all before the accident happened." The jury in the answers to interrogatories found that decedent was going diagonally across Main street toward Sycamore street at a moderate rate of speed, as described by the motorman, that he met another bicycle rider in the space between the two tracks, and that he turned onto the west track at a point only three feet in front of the car. The map introduced in evidence shows that it is about thirty or thirty-five feet from the south line of Main street to the place where the accident happened, although the jury found that there was no evidence as to the exact distance. The jury found that there was no evidence showing how far the car was from the place of collision when decedent entered Main street, and we have been unable to find any evidence on this question. The jury found that there was no more effective means of stopping the car than by reversing the power. There is no evidence tending to show how far the car was from the decedent at the time the motorman saw that the bicycles were likely to collide. There is no evidence showing that decedent, as he approached the track, was looking in the opposite direction from the car, or that he seemed to be abstracted or oblivious to his surroundings. There is nothing in the evidence showing that there was anything to indicate that decedent was likely to go upon the track in front of the car, except the general direction in which he was traveling.

This evidence does not prove, or tend to prove, a state of facts to which the doctrine of last clear chance is applicable. The first essential thing that the evidence must prove or tend to prove is that the decedent was in a situation of apparent and imminent danger at some appreciable time before the injury. If this evidence tends to show that Carl Spiegel was in such a place of apparent danger, when was it in reference to the time of the injury? Was it when he rode his bicycle upon the track within three feet of the front end of the moving car? If so, there was clearly no time within which the motorman could have prevented the injury. Was it when the motorman saw that there was a bicycle approaching from the south, and that there was likely to be a collision between the two bicycles? If so, there is no evidence tending to prove how far the car was from the decedent at that time, or that the motorman by any means could have prevented the injury. Was it when decedent was approaching the street-car track from Williams street? There is nothing in evidence tending to show that at that time there was any apparent danger that decedent would go upon the track in front of the car; neither is there any evidence to show how far the car was from the place of accident at the time decedent entered upon Main street. If there had been evidence tending to show that Carl Spiegel, as he approached the track was apparently abstracted and oblivious of his surroundings, and that he was moving in the direction of the track at such a speed as would likely carry him in front of the car and into dangerous proximity to it, and that the motorman, regardless of this apparent danger, took no steps to stop the car or slacken its speed, then we would have a different case presented. In such a case, it would be for the jury to say whether the negligence of the defendant directly and proximately contributed to decedent's injury, or whether it was only the remote cause; but, in this case, there is no evidence upon which the application of this doctrine can be predicated. We therefore conclude that appellant's motion for a new trial should have been sustained.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed with directions to grant a new trial.[28]

[28] The statement of facts is abridged. A portion of the opinion, and the dissenting opinion by Hottel, J., on the effect of the general verdict, are omitted.

Compare: Labelle v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1913) 87 Vt. 87, 88 Atl. 517: (P., driving a dump cart, was walking beside the tongue between the front wheels and the body of the cart, when he approached a public grade crossing of a railway. As he was just getting on the track he saw a train coming. He attempted to get across, but the train struck the cart and the cart struck him. P. claimed the right to go to the jury on the last clear chance. Said Watson, J.: "Should the case have been submitted to the jury upon the doctrine of the 'last clear chance'? The negligence of the plaintiff proximately contributing to the accident continued as long as it was possible for him to avoid personal injury. He was walking between the front wheels and the body of the dump cart, his horses perfectly manageable. The space between the forward wheels and the body was sufficient for cramping purposes, and there was no evidence tending to show that it was not large enough for the plaintiff to go through and outside the wheels, thereby to leave the team at any time before he went upon the track, if need be, for his safety. He could have done this until the train was so near, according to the undisputed evidence, that it was no longer possible for those in charge to prevent a collision. Thus it appears that the plaintiff's negligence, proximate in character, was concurrent with that of the defendant [assuming that the defendant was negligent] as long as it was possible for the latter to avoid the accident. In this respect the case is not distinguishable from that of Flint's Adm'r v. Central Vermont Ry. Co. [1909] 82 Vt. 269, 73 Atl. 590, cited above, and the doctrine of the 'last clear chance' does not apply." French v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. [1882] 76 Vt. 441, 58 Atl. 722; Butler v. Rockland, etc., St. R. Co. [1904] 99 Me. 149, 58 Atl. 775, 105 Am. St. Rep. 267; Green v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co. [1904] 143 Cal. 41, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68. A judgment for the defendant upon a directed verdict was therefore affirmed.)

TAYLOR v. METROPOLITAN ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, 1914. 256 Mo. 191, 165 S. W. 327.)

Action to recover damages for personal injuries received by one Albert P. Taylor in a collision with one of defendant's cars while Taylor was crossing Nineteenth street on Cherry street in Kansas City, Mo., about 8 p. m., September 20, 1907. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the trial court in the sum of $6,250, and the defendant perfected an appeal to the Kansas City Court of Appeals. After the appeal was taken, plaintiff died. The case was revived in the name of Jennie Taylor, as administratrix of his estate. In an opinion written by the Kansas City Court of Appeals, the judgment was affirmed; but, one of the judges of said Court of Appeals deeming its decision contrary to previous decisions of the Supreme Court, the cause was duly certified and transferred here. That portion of the plaintiff's petition charging negligence is as follows:

"Defendant, through the negligence and unskillfulness of its officers, agents, servants, and employés in running, conducting, and managing a car of the defendant, which was being moved by the defendant at an unusual and rapid rate of speed along said track, while in charge of its said officers, agents, servants, and employés, negligently and carelessly ran the said car into, upon, and against the wagon in which plaintiff was riding, as aforesaid, with great force and violence. That the officers, agents, servants, and employés of the defendant in charge of said car, and who were then engaged in running, conducting, and managing said car saw, or, by the exercise of ordinary care on their part, might have seen, said plaintiff, and become aware of the danger to which he was exposed while crossing said Nineteenth street, and while said wagon was on said track, crossing the same, in ample time to have stopped said car before it struck said wagon, as aforesaid, and thus have avoided injuring plaintiff, but that said officers, agents, servants, and employés of said defendant so in charge of said car negligently failed to stop said car, and negligently caused and permitted the same to strike said wagon as aforesaid, whereby plaintiff was violently knocked down and against said wagon and gig and out of said wagon to the street," etc.

The answer was a general denial.

WILLIAMS, C. * * * IV. A further contention is made that the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained, on the ground that "it appears from plaintiff's own testimony that his own negligence was the proximate cause of the accident."

Plaintiff testified that, when the wagon started north across Nineteenth street, he did not know which way the cars ran on that street, and first looked toward the east, and then turned and looked to the west, and saw the car coming 60 or 70 yards distant. At this time the horses' front feet were between the rails, and he thought there was plenty of time for the wagon to cross ahead of the car, and did not therefore think it necessary for him to jump from the wagon. He is corroborated in this by both the driver of the wagon, and also by Jaggard, who was near him in the back portion of the wagon. At this time he thought the wagon was traveling about 6 miles an hour and had about 17 feet to go in order to clear the track. He thought the car was running at a speed of from 25 to 30 miles an hour, and that it had 180 to 210 feet to go. He then turned and was engaged in conversation with Jaggard, and a little later, his attention being aroused by what was said by Jaggard directing the driver to "look out," he looked up and saw the car almost upon them and before he had time to change his position the collision occurred.

In the discussion in the preceding paragraph, it was found that there was evidence tending to show that the motorman, by the exercise of the proper degree of care, under the circumstances, could have seen plaintiff in a position of peril in time to have saved him by the exercise of proper care. Under such conditions, it could not be said that his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, so as to defeat a recovery under the humanity rule. White v. Railroad, supra, 202 Mo. loc. cit. 564, 101 S. W. 14.

In order to justify the designation of plaintiff's negligence as the proximate cause of the injury, and therefore prevent the operation of the humanity rule, the situation must be such that plaintiff's negligence caused him to enter the danger zone too late for defendant to save him by the exercise of the care required under the situation.

The correct rule, applicable here, was announced by Lamm, J., in the case of Ellis v. Metropolitan Street Railway Co., 234 Mo. 657, 138 S. W. 23, as follows: "When a person, out of danger, negligently moves from his place of safety to one of danger from an on-coming street car, so close to it and under such circumstances that his danger could not be reasonably apprehended by those in charge of the car (who see or might see his peril) in time to have saved him by the exercise of ordinary care, then the negligence of the traveler is either the proximate cause of his own injury, or, in case the element of defendant's negligence be also present, then the negligence of the street traveler and the negligence of the carrier are coincident and concurrent; they (excluding the idea of comparative negligence) may be said to balance or offset each other. In either of which hypotheses there is no room at all for the application of the humanity rule. If a given case in that regard is so plain that average fair-minded men cannot reasonably differ about it, a recovery may be denied as a matter of law. That result has been reached in many cases cited. But, if there is a ground for fair difference of opinion about it, then the question is for the jury." * * *

The judgment is affirmed. Roy, C., concurs.

Per Curiam. The foregoing opinion of Williams, C., is adopted as the opinion of the Court.[29]

CHAPTER II

TORTS THROUGH MALICE

SECTION 1.—NATURE OF "MALICE"

Closely connected with the law and theory of intentional wrongdoing is the legal use of the word "malice." In a narrow and popular sense this term means ill-will, spite, or malevolence; but its legal signification is much wider. Malice means in law wrongful intention. It includes any intent which the law deems wrongful, and which therefore serves as a ground of liability. Any act done with such an intent is, in the language of the law, malicious, and this legal usage has etymology in its favour. The Latin "malitia" means badness, physical or moral—wickedness in disposition and in conduct—not specifically or exclusively ill-will or malevolence; hence the malice of English law, including all forms of evil purpose, design, intent, or motive.

We have seen, however, that intent is of two kinds, being either immediate or ulterior, the ulterior intent being commonly distinguished as the motive. The term "malice" is applied in law to both these forms of intent, and the result is a somewhat puzzling ambiguity which requires careful notice. When we say that an act is done maliciously we mean one of two distinct things. We mean either that it is done intentionally, or that it is done with some wrongful motive. In the phrases "malicious homicide" and "malicious injury to property," malicious is merely equivalent to wilful or intentional. I burn down a house maliciously if I burn it on purpose, but not if I burn it negligently. There is here no reference to any ulterior purpose or motive. But on the other hand malicious prosecution does not mean intentional prosecution; it means a prosecution inspired by some motive of which the law disapproves. A prosecution is malicious, for example, if its ulterior intent is the extortion of money from the accused. So also with the malice which is needed to make a man liable for defamation on a privileged occasion; I do not utter defamatory statements maliciously, simply because I utter them intentionally.

John W. Salmond, Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) 346.

Malice in common acceptation means ill will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act, done intentionally without just cause or excuse. If I give a perfect stranger a blow likely to produce death, I do it of malice, because I do it intentionally, and without just cause or excuse. If I maim cattle, without knowing whose they are, if I poison a fishery, without knowing the owner, I do it of malice, because it is a wrongful act and done intentionally. If I am arraigned of felony, and wilfully stand mute, I am said to do it of malice, because it is intentional, and without just cause or excuse.

BAYLEY, J., in Bromage v. Prosser (1825) 4 B. & C. 247, 255.

SECTION 2.—INDIVIDUAL TORTS TURNING ON MALICE.

I. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION

STATUTE OF MALICIOUS APPEALS.

(13 Edw. I, c. 12, 1285. 1 Pickering's Stats. at Large, 190.)

Forasmuch as many, through Malice intending to grieve other, do procure false Appeals to be made of Homicides and other Felonies by Appellors, having nothing to satisfy the King for their false Appeal, nor to the Parties appealed for their Damages; it is ordained, That when any, being appealed of Felony surmised upon him, doth acquit himself in the King's Court in due Manner, either at the Suit of the Appellor, or of our Lord the King, the Justices, before whom the Appeal shall be heard and determined, shall punish the Appellor by a Year's Imprisonment, and the Appellors shall nevertheless restore to the Parties appealed their Damages, according to the Discretion of the Justices, having Respect to the Imprisonment or Arrestment that the Party appealed hath sustained by reason of such Appeals, and to the Infamy that they have incurred by the Imprisonment or otherwise, and shall nevertheless make a grevious Fine unto the King. And if peradventure such Appellor be not able to recompense the Damages, it shall be inquired by whose Abetment or Malice the Appeal was commenced if the Party appealed desire it; and if it be found by the same Inquest, that any Man is Abettor through Malice at the Suit of the Party appealed he shall be distrained by a judicial Writ to come before the Justices; and if he be lawfully convict of such malicious Abetment, he shall be punished by Imprisonment and Restitution of Damages, as before is said of the Appellor.

The new forms of Tort which came into existence as varieties of the action of Case, because the older writs dealing with similar offences were unavailable, were notably, Malicious Prosecution and Nuisance. Malicious Prosecution was an adaptation of the old Writ of Conspiracy, which was itself based on a statute and ordinance of the years 1300 and 1305, respectively. These enactments, however, only applied to cases where, "two, three, or more persons of malice and covin do conspire and devise to indict any person falsely, and afterwards he who is so indicted is acquitted." The old writ was, consequently, confined to such cases; and subsequent judicial rulings seem to have restricted it still further, to cases of false indictments for treason or felony, whereby the accused's life was endangered. Obviously, there were many other cases in which oppression could be used, not merely by a group of persons acting together, but even by a single unscrupulous person, through the medium of baseless prosecutions. And so, after the Church Courts had tried to acquire jurisdiction in such cases through proceedings for defamation, we find in the King's Courts, by the end of the fifteenth century, an action of Case in the Nature of Conspiracy, which applied against single individuals and on false indictments for mere misdemeanors. This new form of action gradually acquired the name of Malicious Prosecution, and was further extended to cover the malicious procuring of search warrants against the plaintiff. It should be observed, however, that, unlike strict Conspiracy, the gist of the action of Malicious Prosecution is damage to the plaintiff, not the mere conspiring of the defendants; though, if a false and malicious prosecution is brought, damage to the party prosecuted will be presumed. Apparently, though the closely related Writ of Champerty (against person buying shares in lawsuits with a view of aiding in carrying them on) retained the form given to it by statute, the Action of Maintenance (against persons taking part in lawsuits in which they had no interest) was also a typical example of Case; being an enlargement of the narrower statutory remedy against royal officials.

(A) Elements of the Prima Facie Case in Malicious Prosecution

(Court of King's Bench, 1779. 1 Doug. 215, 99 Reprint, 140.)

Action for a malicious presentment, (for incest,) in the Ecclesiastical Court of the Archdeaconry of Huntingdon. Demurrer to the declaration, and cause assigned, that it was not stated, how the prosecution was disposed of, or that it was not still depending. The Court was clearly of opinion, that the objection was fatal, and said it was settled that the plaintiff in such an action, must shew the original suit, wherever instituted, to be at an end; otherwise he might recover in the action, and yet be afterwards convicted on the original prosecution.

Judgment for the defendant.

BYNE v. MOORE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1813. 5 Taunt. 187, 128 Reprint, 658.)

This was an action for a malicious prosecution. The declaration alleged that the defendant, maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff, had falsely and maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, charged the plaintiff with violently assaulting him, and had thereby procured a warrant for apprehending the plaintiff. The plaintiff gave no other evidence than that the indictment was returned "not found." On the trial, MacDonald, C. J., nonsuited the plaintiff.

Best, Serjt., obtained a rule nisi to set aside this non suit, and have a new trial.[1]

MANSFIELD, C. J. I feel a difficulty to understand how the plaintiff could recover in the present action, wherein he could recover no damages, because he clearly has not proved that he has sustained any: I can understand the ground upon which an action shall be maintained for an indictment which contains scandal, but this contains none, nor does any danger of imprisonment result from it: this bill was a piece of mere waste paper. All the cases in Buller's Nisi Prius, 13, are directly against this action, for the author speaks of putting the plaintiff to expense, and affecting his good fame, neither of which could be done here. If this action could be maintained, every bill which the grand jury threw out would be the ground of an action. The judge too might certify in this cause against the costs, if the damages had been under 40s.

HEATH, J., concurred.

CHAMBRE, J. It would be a very mischievous precedent if the action could be supported on this evidence.

Rule discharged.

FARMER v. SIR ROBERT DARLING.

(Court of King's Bench, 1766. 4 Burr. 1971, 98 Reprint, 27.)

On Thursday last, Sir Fletcher Norton, on behalf of the defendant, moved for a new trial, and to set aside the verdict, which had been given for the plaintiff in an action for a malicious prosecution, with £250 damages, at the Middlesex sittings at Nisi Prius before Lord

[1] The statement of the case is abridged.

Mansfield, on the 15th instant. His objections were—1st. That the damages were excessive; 2dly. That the verdict was against evidence. He had a rule to shew cause.

Lord Mansfield now reported the evidence.

It was an action for a malicious prosecution of the plaintiff, by two indictments for nuisances; one, by a drain; the other, by his poulterer's yard; both of them near the prosecutor's house; upon which indictments the then defendant and now plaintiff had been acquitted.

It appeared, upon the report "that there was malice implied;" and it appeared, that the plaintiff had actually and bona fide paid £140 in defending himself against the two indictments.

His Lordship said, he told the jury, that the foundation of this action was malice; which must be either express, or implied; and he acquainted them, that they were not obliged to give all the £140 expended; or, they might (on the other hand) give more, if they should see it proper to do so. He said, he left it to the jury, to consider of the implied malice, from the groundlessness of the prosecution.

Sir Fletcher Norton, Mr. Morton and Mr. Recorder Eyre now argued on behalf of the defendant, for a new trial. They said, there was another requisite to the maintenance of this sort of action, besides malice; it was also necessary to prove, "that the indictment was causeless and without any foundation." Both these are essential, and necessary to be proved.

As in a writ of conspiracy, falsity is necessary to be charged; so, in this case, malice alone is not sufficient: it must also be a prosecution without any foundation. These are two independent essentials to the maintenance of this action; there must be both malice and falsity. We admit there was some evidence of malice; but it was proved, by sufficient evidence, to be a nuisance. Therefore there was a probable cause for the indictments; and if there was, then the prosecutor is not liable to this action for a malicious prosecution; whatever motive might induce the prosecutor to indict the person guilty of the offence. It would be of dangerous consequence, to make a prosecutor liable to this action, where there is a probable cause for indicting an offender.

Secondly.—The damages are excessive.

Lord Mansfield. This action is for a malicious prosecution, without a probable cause.

I can not say that the jury have done wrong here, in finding that the indictments were preferred without probable cause.

This drain was an ancient drain. The fault arose above and below Farmer's part of it. His brick-drain was cleaned, and clear. The gist of the indictment was "that he did not lower his drain." He had no need to do it. The verdict was not, in my opinion, against evidence.

The next prosecution was for the feeding the fowls. And I can not say that the jury had no reason to find this likewise to be an indictment without probable cause. Every stench is not a nuisance: nor is every noisome trade a nuisance in every place; though many of them are nuisances by reason of their locality. This was an ancient trade, long carried on in this place; long before Sir Robert Darling came there. He comes and builds a house near it, in a place that was formerly a poultry-yard. Nobody before complained of it, or presented it. So that the conclusion does not follow, "that it was a nuisance." And the jury had a view. Therefore I can not say, that the jury had no reason to take the prosecution to be groundless.

As to the excessiveness of the damages—it does not appear by the verdict, how far the jury gave it upon the bill; and how far, upon the whole circumstances of the case taken together. The end and tendency of these two indictments was to drive this plaintiff from his business of a poulterer, after having long carried it on. This was sworn to have been the prosecutor's view in preferring them. And they might affect the man's credit. There are many circumstances which make it reasonable, not to indulge the present defendant in sending it to a new litigation, only to abate the quantum of the damages, when he has been so much in the wrong.

Therefore he was against granting a new trial.

The other three Judges entirely agreed with his Lordship in both points; and expressed their sentiments at large to the same effect. They likewise agreed with Sir Fletcher Norton, as to the grounds of this sort of action; viz. "That malice, (either express or implied,) and the want of probable cause must both concur." But they were clearly of opinion, that it appeared upon the whole state of the evidence, that in this case they did both concur. Therefore they thought the rule ought to be discharged; both objections being sufficiently answered.

PER CUR. unanimously. Rule discharged.

CHAPMAN et al. v. NASH.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1913. 121 Md. 608, 89 Atl. 117.)

Action by Charles Carrol Nash, an infant, by his father and next friend, for malicious prosecution. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. The facts developed in the evidence were as follows:

The plaintiff was the son of Charles M. Nash, who lived in Baltimore county, about 25 miles from the city, and who was engaged in the business of buying hay in the county and hauling it to Baltimore city and selling it to various purchasers. Among his purchasers was the Chapman Coal Company, to which he had sold hay for about two years prior to August 10, 1911, on which date the occurrences took place which led to the prosecution of the plaintiff and his father upon the criminal charge hereinafter mentioned. The plaintiff was then about nineteen years old and had been driving the hay wagon for about two years, and during those years no one else, to his knowledge, had hauled hay to the coal company for his father. The father owned two wagons which he used in hauling hay to the city. One of these wagons was heavier than the other. The hay carriages of the two wagons were different in color—that of the heavy wagon was blue and that of the lighter one was red. Both wagons had been weighed at the Fremont Street hay scales, and their weight had been registered there. When the plaintiff brought in a load of hay to be delivered to the defendants, the method of ascertaining the amount of hay to be paid for and the manner of collecting was this: The wagon and hay were weighed together, and the plaintiff would tell the weighmaster which wagon he was using. He would say the lighter or the heavier one as the case might be. The weighmaster would accept his statement and deduct the registered weight of the wagon which the plaintiff informed him he was using from the gross weight, and the difference would be the net weight to be paid for by the purchaser. The weighmaster would give the plaintiff a ticket which showed the net weight made up in this way. The ticket and hay were then taken to the South Baltimore yard of the coal company, where the hay was unloaded and the ticket O. K.'d by the superintendent of the coal company, and taken by the plaintiff for payment to the office of the company at Sharp and Lombard streets. The money was collected, not by the plaintiff, but by Charles M. Nash, his father, whose custom was to go to the office after the ticket had been left there and collect the money. The lighter wagon, as shown by the weight at the hay scales, weighed 3,000 pounds, and the heavy one 3,800 pounds. Within one year prior to August 10, 1911, the plaintiff had delivered 13 loads of hay to the coal company, and had presented tickets therefor which showed the wagon to weigh 3,000 pounds. These tickets were accepted as correct by the coal company, and the amounts shown to be due were paid without question to Charles M. Nash.

On August 5, 1911, the coal company wrote to Charles M. Nash, saying that he might send in a load of prime timothy hay the following week, and advised him that the hay must be weighed and the certificate presented from the state scales in the city. The prior 13 deliveries had been certified to by others than the state inspectors. The plaintiff left home with a load of hay on the 9th of August, and drove as far as Pikesville, where he spent the night, and on the morning of the 10th he proceeded to the Northwestern hay scales where the hay was weighed. He told the weighmaster that he was driving the lighter wagon, and was given a ticket which showed that 3,000 pounds were deducted from the gross weight. He then took the hay to the yard of the coal company, delivered the ticket, and unloaded the wagon. Mr. J. W. Chapman, one of the defendants, was present while the plaintiff was in the act of unloading. After Mr. Chapman had observed the wagon, he concluded that its weight was in excess of that stated in the certificate, and he asked the plaintiff to reweigh the wagon, which the plaintiff promised to do. The plaintiff at that time knew that he had made a misstatement to the weighmaster as to the wagon, and that the weight shown upon the ticket was not correct, and that there was a shortage of 950 pounds. He testified as follows as to his conversation with Mr. Chapman had at that time: "Q. You knew right then and there that it was the wrong weights, didn't you? A. Yes. Q. Did you tell him so? A. No, sir. Q. Then you knew when you left him that you had the wagon with the wrong weight? A. Yes. Q. And you never told him? A. No, sir. Q. Although he asked you what weight it was? A. The ticket showed that. Q. The ticket showed that, and he had brought it to your particular notice by asking you to go to the scales and have the wagon weighed? A. Yes. Q. You went right on up home? A. Yes; to tell my father and let him come down and attend to it." William J. Chapman testified that he asked the plaintiff if the weight shown on the ticket was correct, and that he said it was, and this testimony is not denied. Charles M. Nash testified that he knew the wagon used to haul this particular hay weighed 3,950 pounds, and that he told his son on August 9th to use the heavy wagon. Mr. Isaac, one of the members of coal company, went to the Northwestern hay scales to see the wagon weighed, but the plaintiff did not go to the scales, but continued on his way home without reweighing the wagon. He was overtaken near Arlington by two members of the coal company, and the wagon was weighed at that place, and it was found to weigh 3,800 pounds. It was then taken to the Northwestern hay scales, where it was found to weigh 3,950 pounds, and where the ticket was corrected by the state inspector.

Although the plaintiff, according to his own testimony, well knew at the time he delivered the hay that the weight of the wagon had been misstated, he made no mention of that fact then or when he was overtaken on the road. On the morning of August 11th Charles M. Nash called at the office of the coal company and inquired what the trouble about the load of hay was, although it must be inferred that he well knew and was informed that it was short in weight, and asked for settlement on the corrected bill. William J. Chapman declined to settle, but told him to call in a few days, which he did. He testified that Mr. Chapman told him at that interview that he would not settle, but said, "If you will drop this load of hay, we will drop our side." He asked Mr. Isaac, the treasurer of the coal company, to pay for the amount of hay shown by the corrected bill, and said his son did not know the weight of the wagon, and that he should have told him. Charles M. Nash placed his account in the hands of an attorney for collection, and after some communication with William J. Chapman a suit was brought before a justice of the peace. Prior to the institution of the suit the coal company made a demand upon Charles M. Nash for alleged shortages amounting to $239.16 in hay delivered from August, 1909, to August 10, 1911, inclusive. On the day of the trial before the justice, December 13, 1911, G. Walter Chapman appeared before James W. Lewis, a police justice of Baltimore city, and swore out a warrant against the plaintiff and his father, charging them with a conspiracy to defraud the Chapman Coal Company of Baltimore a corporation, for $11.87, current money, by means of false certificate of weight of the load of hay delivered to it on August 10, 1911. They were arrested and indicted by the grand jury in the criminal court of Baltimore upon this charge, and after a trial in that court were acquitted. The explanation offered by the plaintiff at the trial of his statement to the weighmaster that he was using the lighter wagon was that he made a mistake.

BURKE, J. (after stating the facts and disposing of certain preliminary questions). There was testimony offered tending to show that the defendants were actuated by malice in the institution of the prosecution, but such evidence cannot be considered in determining the question of probable cause. While malice may be inferred from the want of probable cause, a want of probable cause cannot be adduced from the most express malice. "In the trial of actions of this nature," said Judge Washington, in Munns v. Dupont (3 Wash. c. c. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 9,926), supra, "it is of infinite consequence to mark with precision the line to which the law will justify the defendant in going and will punish him if he goes beyond it. On the one hand, public justice and public security require that offenders against the law should be brought to trial and to punishment if their guilt be established. Courts and juries, and the law officers whose duty it is to conduct the prosecution of public offenders, must, in most instances, if not in all, proceed upon the information of individuals, and if these actions are too much encouraged, if the informer acts upon his own responsibility and is bound to make good his charge at all events, under the penalty of responding in damages to the accused, few will be found able and willing at so great a risk to endeavor to promote the public good. The informer can seldom have a full view of the whole ground, and must expect to be frequently disappointed by evidence which the accused only can furnish. Even if he be possessed of the whole evidence, he may err in judgment, and in many instances the jury may acquit where to his mind the proofs of guilt were complete."

The question we are to determine is this: Were the facts we have stated such as justified the defendants, as reasonable, cautious men, in believing the plaintiff and his father had entered into a conspiracy to defraud them? That such a fraud by the methods adopted in weighing the wagon might have been perpetrated with the greatest facility is evident. The wagon which weighed 3,950 pounds was represented as weighing 3,000 pounds, the tickets for the 13 prior loads delivered gave the weight of the wagon as 3,000 pounds. The son delivered the tickets and the father collected the money. The plaintiff testified that he gave the weight as 3,000 pounds by mistake. It is possible that this statement is true, but it is almost inconceivable that he did not know it was the heavier wagon, and his misstatements to Mr. Chapman, and his suppression of the truth at the time when it was his duty to have spoken truthfully, were most unfortunate for him. The facts and circumstances which are undisputed, and which were within the knowledge of the defendants at the time the warrant was sworn out, were well calculated to create in their minds the strongest suspicion, and in our opinion would have warranted a prudent and cautious man in believing that a skillfully devised plan had been adopted by the defendants to defraud and cheat. We do not mean to say that any such plan or scheme did in fact exist. The plaintiff has been acquitted of the charge preferred against him. It is to be hoped that he was entirely free from any intent to do wrong, but the uncontradicted facts and circumstances which we have carefully weighed and considered have led us to the conclusion that under the legal principles governing this class of actions the plaintiff failed to show, by any evidence legally sufficient for that purpose that the prosecution was instituted without probable cause. It follows that the defendants' prayer which asked for the withdrawal of the case from the jury should have been granted.

This conclusion dispenses with the consideration of the other questions raised by the record. Judgment reversed, without a new trial, with costs to the appellants.

GIBSON v. CHATERS.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1800. 2 Bos. & P. 129, 126 Reprint, 1196.)

This was an action on the case for maliciously arresting the plaintiff and holding him to bail.

At the trial before Lord Eldon, C. J., it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant were both resident at North Shields in Northumberland, the former being the master, and the latter the owner of a ship; that some matters in difference between them having been submitted to arbitration, the plaintiff was awarded to pay the sum of £19. 14s. on the 31st of November, 1797, but in consequence of his being absent from home at that time, and not returning till March, 1799, did not pay the sum awarded; that in December, 1798, the defendant being in London made an affidavit of debt to hold the plaintiff to bail, and that a writ issued thereupon; that on the plaintiff's returning to North Shields in March, 1799, he hearing of the defendant's intention to arrest him, paid the debt to the defendant's agent at North Shields, and took a receipt for the amount; that on the 4th of May following, the plaintiff having arrived in the river Thames from North Shields, was arrested and holden to bail by the defendant's attorney, on an alias writ taken out at that time, but grounded on the affidavit made by the defendant in December, 1798. His Lordship being of opinion that it was necessary to prove express malice, and that no evidence of malice had been given, nonsuited the plaintiff.

Best, Serjt., now moved for a rule nisi to set aside this nonsuit, and have a new trial; contending that the case was distinguishable from that of Scheibel v. Fairbain [1799] 1 Bos. & P. 388, the writ on which the plaintiff in that case was arrested having been sued out previous to the time when the debt was paid, whereas the writ in the present instance was actually taken out after the debt had been discharged and the receipt given; that the ground of complaint in Scheibel v. Fairbain was a mere nonfeasance in the defendant who had omitted to countermand a writ previously sued out, and was so treated by the Court, but that this was a malfeasance and came expressly within the rule laid down in Waterer v. Freeman, Hob. 267, that a man is liable to an action if he sue against his release, or after the debt duly paid. He observed, that the rule with respect to proving malice in actions for malicious prosecutions, did not hold in the case of actions for holding to bail in a mere civil suit, since the rule in the former instance proceeded on the danger of discouraging prosecutions for public offences.

But the Court were of opinion that the facts of this case precluded any inference of malice, and that the plaintiff therefore to entitle himself to recover, ought to have given evidence of actual malice

Best took nothing by his motion.

VANDERBILT v. MATHIS.

(Superior Court of City of New York, 1856. 5 Duer, 304.)

BOSWORTH, J. To maintain an action for malicious prosecution, three facts, if controverted, must be established: (1) That the prosecution is at an end, and was determined in favor of the plaintiff. (2) The want of probable cause. (3) Malice.

In such an action, it is necessary to give some evidence of the want of probable cause. It is insufficient to prove a mere acquittal; that, alone, is not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. Gorton v. De Angelis, 6 Wend. 418.

It is equally essential, that the former prosecution should appear to have been maliciously instituted. Malice may be inferred from the want of probable cause, but such an inference is one which a jury is not required to make, at all events, merely because they may find the absence of probable cause.

Unless the evidence, in relation to the circumstances under which the prosecution was ended, and that given to establish the want of probable cause, justify the inference of malice, other evidence, in support of it, must be given.

Evidence as to the conduct of the defendant, in the course of the transaction, his declarations on the subject, and any forwardness and activity in exposing the plaintiff by a publication, are properly admitted to prove malice. Such evidence must be given as will justify a jury in finding the existence of malice.

The rule is uniformly stated, that, to maintain an action, for a former prosecution, it must be shown to have been without probable cause, and malicious. Vanduzor v. Linderman, 10 Johns. 106; Murray v. Long, 1 Wend. 140; Willans v. Taylor, 6 Bing. 183.

The judge, at the trial, charged, that the fact, that the plaintiff was discharged before the magistrate showed, prima facie, that there was no probable cause for the arrest, and shifted the burden of proof from the plaintiff to the defendant, who was bound to show, affirmatively, that there was probable cause.

He was requested to charge, "that the discharge of Vanderbilt was not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause." This he refused to do. To this refusal to charge, and to the charge as made, the defendant excepted.

He also charged, "that, if probable cause is made out, the question of malice becomes immaterial, except as bearing on the question of damages."

"This question of malice, in fact, supposing that probable cause did not exist, is material only as affecting the question of damages."

He was requested to charge, "that the jury could not find a verdict for the plaintiff, unless he has proved that there was no probable cause for the complaint, and not even then, unless they believe, from the evidence, that, in making the complaint, the defendant acted from malicious motives." This the judge declined to do, and to his refusal to so charge the defendant excepted.

Although the evidence which establishes the want of probable cause may be, and generally is, such as to justify the inference of malice, yet we understand the rule to be, that when it is a just and proper inference from all the facts and circumstances of the case, upon all the evidence given in the cause, "that the defendant was not actuated by any improper motives, but only from an honest desire to bring a supposed offender to justice, the action will not lie, because such facts and circumstances disprove that which is of the essence of the action, viz., the malice of the defendant in pressing the charge."

In Bulkley v. Smith, 2 Duer, 271, the court stated the rule to be, "that, in order to maintain a suit for a malicious prosecution, the plaintiff is bound to prove the entire want of a probable cause for the accusation, and the actual malice of the defendant in making it. Malice is a question of fact, which, when the case turns upon it, must be decided by the jury."

Story, J., in Wiggin v. Coffin, Fed. Cas. No. 17,624, instructed the jury that two things must concur, to entitle a plaintiff to recover in such an action: "The first is, the want of probable cause for the prosecution; the second is, malice in the defendant in carrying on the prosecution. If either ground fail, there is an end of the suit."

In Vanduzor v. Linderman, 10 Johns. 106, the court said: "No action lies merely for bringing a suit against a person without sufficient ground. Savil v. Roberts, 1 Salk. 13; Purton v. Honnor, 1 Bos. & Pul. 205. To sustain a suit for a former prosecution, it must appear to have been without cause, and malicious."

If the charge must be understood to mean, that if the want of probable cause was established, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, although the jury should believe, from the whole evidence, that, in making the complaint, the defendant did not act from malicious motives, then we deem it to be erroneous. This construction is the only one, of which the language of the instruction appears to be susceptible; for the judge, in charging the jury, stated that the "question of malice in fact, supposing that probable cause did not exist, is material only as affecting the question of damages."

Malice in fact, is that kind of malice which is to be proved. When malice may be, and is inferred, from the want of probable cause, it is actual malice which is thus proved.

There is no theoretical malice which can satisfy this rule, and which can coexist with the established fact, that the prosecution was instituted in an honest belief of the plaintiff's guilt, and with no other motives than to bring a supposed offender to justice.

The question of malice may be a turning-point of the controversy, in an action of this nature.

The want of probable cause may be shown, and yet, upon the whole evidence, in any given case, it may be a fair question for the determination of a jury, whether the defendant was actuated by malice. If the whole evidence is such, that a jury cannot properly doubt the honesty and purity of the motive which induced the former prosecution, and if they fully believe that it was instituted from good motives, and in the sincere conviction that the plaintiff was guilty of the offence charged, and without malice, the defendant would be entitled to a verdict.

The charge made, and which was excepted to, must be deemed to have been made, to give the jury a rule of action, in disposing of the case upon the whole evidence. We think it was not only calculated to mislead, but was erroneous.

A new trial must be granted, with costs to abide the event.[2]

CINCINNATI DAILY TRIBUNE CO. v. BRUCK.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1900. 61 Ohio St. 489, 56 N. E. 198, 76 Am. St. Rep. 433.)

In an action against the Cincinnati Daily Tribune for the publication of a libel on the plaintiff, the defendant answered, by way of counterclaim, that just before the libel the plaintiff, a stockholder of the company, maliciously, and without probable cause, commenced a suit against it for dissolution and the appointment of a receiver, on the false averment that it was insolvent. The application was at once heard, denied, and the suit dismissed. It is then averred that the suit worked great injury to the credit of the company, prevented a sale of the property then being negotiated, and otherwise greatly embarrassed it in business. Issue having been made up, the case was tried to a jury, and at the close of the defendant's evidence the court, on motion of the plaintiff, withdrew from the consideration of the jury all the evidence offered by the defendant on its counterclaim, but in its charge left it to be considered in mitigation of damages. There was a judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant brings error.

PER CURIAM. The ruling of the court presents the question whether the facts pleaded in the answer constitute a counterclaim to that of the plaintiff. If, however, the facts stated constitute a cause of action in favor of the defendant for the recovery of damages against the plaintiff for the malicious prosecution of the suit for the appointment of a receiver, it is very clear that they would constitute a counterclaim in this action. They are connected with the subject of the action, and this is sufficient to warrant their being pleaded as a counterclaim. Section 5072, Rev. St.; Swan, Pl. & Pr. 259, note.

[2] "I have always understood, since the case of Johnstone v. Sutton (1786) 1 T. R. 510, which was decided long before I was in the profession, that no point of law was more clearly settled than that in every action for a malicious prosecution or arrest, the plaintiff must prove what is averred in the declaration, viz., that the prosecution or arrest was malicious and without reasonable or probable cause: If there be reasonable or probable cause, no malice, however distinctly proved, will make the defendant liable; but when there is no reasonable or probable cause, it is for the jury to infer malice from the facts proved. That is a question in all cases for their consideration, and it having in this instance been withdrawn from them, it is impossible to say whether they might or might not have come to the conclusion that the arrest was malicious. It was for them to decide it, and not for the judge. I can conceive a case, where there are mutual accounts between parties, and where an arrest for the whole sum claimed by the plaintiff would not be malicious; for example, the plaintiff might know that the set-off was open to dispute, and that there was reasonable ground for disputing it. In that case, though it might afterwards appear that the set-off did exist, the arrest would not be malicious. The term 'malice' in this form of action is not to be considered in the sense of spite or hatred against an individual, but of malus animus, and as denoting that the party is actuated by improper and indirect motives." Per Parke, J., in Mitchell v. Jenkins (1833) 5 B. & Ad. 588, 594.

The real question is, do they constitute a cause of action in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff? We think not. It is a well-settled general rule, that no recovery can be had by a defendant against a plaintiff for the malicious prosecution of a civil action, where there has been no arrest of the person or seizure of property. The cases relied on by the plaintiff in error do not support its claim. That of Coal Co. v. Upson, 40 Ohio St. 17, arose from a suit where a temporary injunction had been obtained on false and malicious averments. A temporary injunction imposes a restraint upon the owner over his property as hurtful to him as if it were in fact seized, and it was held that for the malicious prosecution of such suit an action would lie. The case of Pope v. Pollock, 46 Ohio St. 367, 21 N. E. 356, 4 L. R. A. 255, 15 Am. St. Rep. 608, arose from the malicious prosecution of suits in forcible entry and detainer.

Judgments in such suits are not conclusive. The proceeding may be commenced and recommenced without limit, unless enjoined, and hence affords an opportunity for the gratification of malice and oppression, and when this is the case an action may be maintained by the injured party for the recovery of damages. In the above case a suit had been brought, and a verdict of not guilty rendered. Another was brought with the same result. A suit for malicious prosecution was then brought and sustained. The case stands upon a clear exception to the general rule. No ground for an exception appears in this case. Had a receiver been appointed and possession taken of the defendant's property, a different case would have been presented. Affirmed.*

*"The broad canon is true that in the present day and according to our present law the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause, will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution. * * * The counsel for the plaintiff have argued this case with great ability, but they cannot point to a single instance since Westminster Hall began to be the seat of justice in which an ordinary action similar to the actions of the present day has been concluded to justify a subsequent action on the ground that it was brought maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause." Bowen, L. J., in Quartz Hill Mining Co. v. Eyre (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 674, 690.

In most American states, however, the trend of authority is now the other way. In 1882, Prof. Lawson, reviewing all the American cases upon the point, reached the conclusion that the weight of authority appears to be against the right of action for an unfounded malicious prosecution of an ordinary civil suit. 21 American Law Reg. 368. In 1906 Mr. Lewis, editing Cooley on Torts, found that the preponderance of authority had shifted since the previous edition of this work and was now in favor of permitting the action. In 1907 Judge Jaggard was able to state without question "that the prevailing rule in America is that the action may lie, although the original proceeding was begun by a civil summons only and the party seeking the recovery was not arrested and his property was not seized, and he suffered no peculiar injury, but only when the want of probable cause is very palpable." See 26 Cyc. 16, and cases there cited in notes 91–93.

(B) Excusable Prosecution

WALTER v. SAMPLE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1855. 25 Pa. 275.)

Error to the District Court of Allegheny county.

This was an action on the case for malicious prosecution. Upon the trial of the cause, defendant's counsel, called Jacob Whitesell, Esq., a member of the bar, who testified as follows:

"Mr. Sample stated to me the facts of the case, and I advised him to go before the Mayor and make information, and have the parties arrested and examined. He acted under my advice, so far as arresting the boys, and having an investigation of the matter, and the trial in Court."

The Court instructed the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"The opinion of private counsel cannot amount to proof of probable cause, unless the facts clearly warrant it, and were correctly stated."

Assignment of error: The Court erred in instructing the jury that "the opinion of private counsel cannot amount to proof of probable cause, unless the facts clearly warrant it, and were correctly stated."

WOODWARD, J. This was an action on the case for malicious prosecution, and the only question presented by the record is, whether the Court were right in instructing the jury that "the opinion of private counsel cannot amount to proof of probable cause, unless the facts clearly warrant it, and were correctly stated." Ever since the case of Farmer v. Darling, 4 Burr. 1971, it has been held that malice, either express or implied, and the want of probable cause, must both concur to support actions of this nature. The presumption of law is that every public prosecution is founded in probable cause, and the burden is, therefore, in the first instance, on the plaintiff; but when he has submitted evidence of want of probable cause, or of circumstances from which a violent presumption would arise that it was wanting, the burden of proof is shifted on to the defendant, and then it is competent for him to show that he acted under professional advice. To make this defence available, he must show that he submitted all the facts which he knew were capable of proof fairly to his counsel, and that he acted bona fide on the advice given. This proved, he negatives, if not the malice, the want of probable cause. * * *

The opinion of Judge Rogers, at Nisi Prius, in the case of Le Maistre v. Hunter, Brightly, N. P. 498, which seems to have been the authority followed by the Court below, is not, when taken altogether, in conflict with the current of authorities. The facts are not given in reference to which he charged the jury in this language: "In conformity to a point put by counsel for the plaintiff, I instruct you that the opinion of private counsel of a prosecution cannot amount to proof of probable cause, nor prevent a recovery, unless the facts clearly warrant it, and are correctly stated. Even the application to counsel, and their opinion, in order to be available in the establishment of probable cause, must not be resorted to as a mere cover for the prosecution, but must be the result of an honest and fair purpose; and the statement made at the time, must be fair and full and consistent with that purpose."

This is no more than a statement of the general rule with its necessary qualifications. Nevertheless, the words, "unless the facts clearly warrant it," found both in Judge Rogers' opinion, and that under review, are ill chosen, because liable to misapplication. "Unless the facts clearly warrant" what? The opinion of counsel, or the prosecution? Whichever be the antecedent intended, it is apparent that these words would make the defence depend for its value wholly on the soundness of the legal opinion. If the facts must clearly warrant the legal opinion, that, to be a defence, must be the very judgment of the law on the facts; if they must clearly warrant the prosecution then the defence is complete without the professional opinion; and thus, either way, it goes for nothing. No matter how candidly and faithfully a prosecutor has submitted the facts to his legal adviser and followed his advice, if they turn out insufficient for the support of the prosecution, he is liable in an action for malicious prosecution. On this principle every acquittal of a defendant would be followed by such an action. A qualification of the rule in terms like these, destroys the rule itself.

The law is not so. Professors of the law are the proper advisers of men in doubtful circumstances, and their advice, when fairly obtained, exempts the party who acts upon it from the imputation of proceeding maliciously and without probable cause. It may be erroneous, but the client is not responsible for the error. He is not the insurer of his lawyer. Whether the facts amount to probable cause, is the very question submitted to counsel in such cases; and when the client is instructed that they do, he has taken all the precaution demanded of a good citizen.

To manifest the good faith of the party, it is important that he should resort to a professional adviser of competency and integrity. He is not, in the language of Judge Rogers, to make such a resort "a mere cover for the prosecution"; but when he has done his whole duty in the premises, he is not to be made liable, because the facts did not clearly warrant the advice and prosecution. The testimony here was, that Sample stated the facts of the case, and there is no suggestion on the record that they were not fairly stated. Suppression, evasion, or falsehood, would make him liable; but if fairly submitted, and if the advice obtained was followed in good faith, he had a defence to the action, and the Court should have given him the benefit of it.

The judgment is reversed and a venire de novo awarded.[3]

RAVENGA v. MACKINTOSH.

(Court of King's Bench, 1824. 2 Barn. & C. 693, 107 Reprint, 541, 26 R. R. 521.)

This was an action for malicious arrest. Plea, not guilty. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with £250 damages. The Attorney-General moved for a new trial.[4]

BAYLEY, J. I have no doubt that in this case there was a want of probable cause. I accede to the proposition, that if a party lays all the facts of his case fairly before counsel, and acts bona fide upon the opinion given by that counsel (however erroneous that opinion may be), he is not liable to an action of this description. A party, however, may take the opinions of six different persons, of which three are one way and three another. It is therefore a question for the jury, whether he acted bona fide on the opinion, believing that he had a cause of action. The jury in this case have found, and there was abundant evidence to justify them in drawing the conclusion, that the defendant did not act bona fide, and that he did not believe that he had any cause of action whatever. Assuming that the defendant's belief that he had a cause of action would amount to a probable cause, still, after the jury have found that he did not believe that he had any cause of action whatever, the judge would have been bound to say, that he had not reasonable or probable cause of action.

Rule refused.

MACK v. SHARP.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1904. 138 Mich. 448, 101 N. W. 631, 5 Ann. Cas. 109.)

This is an action for malicious prosecution. The plaintiff, at the instance of the defendant, was arrested upon a charge of criminal libel. He was acquitted, brought this action, and recovered judgment for substantial damages. The defendant brings error.

MONTGOMERY, J. * * * The court also ruled throughout the case that in this action the defendant was not at liberty to prove that the plaintiff was in fact guilty of the criminal offense imputed to him in the prosecution instituted by the defendant. It is well established by authority that in an action for malicious prosecution it is complete defense to show that the plaintiff was in fact guilty of the offense charged against him by defendant, and this though the proof of guilt is furnished by evidence not known to defendant when the prosecution against the plaintiff was instituted. This testimony is not in such case offered in support of probable cause, but to show that the plaintiff has suffered no wrong by his arrest. The law considers that if a criminal is fortunate enough to escape conviction, he should rest content with his good luck, and not belabor one who suspected his guilt and acted accordingly. As it was said in Newton v. Weaver, 13 R. I. 617: "The action for malicious prosecution was designed for the benefit of the innocent, and not of the guilty. It matters not whether there was proper cause for the prosecution, or how malicious may have been the motives of the prosecutor, if the accused is guilty he has no legal cause of complaint." See, also, Threefoot v. Nuckols, 68 Miss. 123, 8 South. 335; Whitehurst v. Ward, 12 Ala. 264; Parkhurst v. Mastellar, 57 Iowa, 478, 10 N. W. 864; Turner v. Dinnegar, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 467; Lancaster v. McKay, 103 Ky. 616, 45 S. W. 887.

[3] Part of the opinion is omitted.

[4] The statement of facts is abridged, and the opinion of Holroyd, J., is omitted.

Inasmuch as it is essential to the plaintiff's action to show a termination of the criminal action as a basis for his suit for malicious prosecution, it is competent to establish this fact by the verdict of acquittal. Black on Judgments, § 529. But it is not conclusive evidence of the plaintiff's innocence. Id.

Plaintiff's counsel cite the case of Josselyn v. McAllister, 25 Mich. 45, as sustaining the ruling of the circuit judge. It does not appear that the precise question of whether the actual guilt of the plaintiff could be given in evidence as a defense was discussed in that case. It is true that testimony which might have amounted to an admission of one element of the offense was held properly excluded on the ground that defendant was not shown to have knowledge of the fact when the prosecution was instituted by him. It was said that, "if Josselyn acted without any knowledge or suspicion of the supposed fact, it could in no way affect his motives"—a proposition obvious enough in itself, and quite conclusive as to the admissibility of the proposed testimony in that case, for the opinion shows there were joined in that action counts for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, and by reference to the report of the case at a former hearing (22 Mich. 304) it will be seen that the counts for malicious prosecution were disposed of on the first trial at the circuit, so that in the first opinion it was very pertinently said, "As no state of facts relied upon would have made the arrests lawful, the defense depends, so far as this class of testimony is concerned, purely on the consideration of malice." The case of Patterson v. Garlock, 39 Mich. 447, also cited, does not sustain the ruling below. Indeed, some of the language employed by Mr. Justice Graves makes strongly for what we hold to be the correct rule. In that case testimony offered by the plaintiff to establish his innocence was received. The court held that, while it was not bound to make affirmative proof of his actual innocence, yet such testimony was admissible. Mr. Justice Graves said: "It requires no reasoning to show that, where the question is whether one man has fair ground to charge another with a crime, it cannot be laid down that the abstract fact of his guilt or innocence must be necessarily impertinent and immaterial."

There was error in the court's ruling. * * * The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.[5]

II. Malicious Abuse of Process

WATERER v. FREEMAN.

(Court of King's Bench, 1617–1619. Hobart, 266a, 80 Reprint, 412.)

The case of Waterer v. Freeman, supra, was this term judged for the plaintiff, and the rest of the judges desired me to deliver the judgment and reason. * * *

But now to the main point, we hold, that if a man bring an action upon a false surmise in a proper Court, he cannot bring an action against him and charge him with it as a fault directly, and ex diametro, as if the suit itself were a wrongful act, for executio juris non habet injuriam. And as all by nature is good, so Saint Paul saith, the law is good if a man use it lawfully; so the abuse of law is the fault. * * *

Now to the principal case, if a man sue me in a proper Court, yet if his suit be utterly without ground of truth, and that certainly known to himself, I may have an action of the case against him for the undue vexation and damage that he putteth me unto by his ill practice, though the suit itself be legal, and I cannot complain of it, as it is a suit, as in the case before; and therefore the 16 of E. 3, Fitz. Deceipt, 35, a conusee of a statute sued execution against his deed of defeasance, whereupon the conusor had an action of deceit against him and his assign, in the nature of an audita querela. So note the distinction upon this case, and 43 E. 3, before. If a man sue me, and hanging that suit commence another against me, to this I have a plea in abatement, which proves this latter suit unjust and vexatious: but if he discontinue the former he may bring a new action. Likewise I hold, that I may have an action upon the case against him that sues me against his release, or after the money duly paid; yea, though it be upon a single obligation. So where one doth bargain and sell his land at the common law, and refuse to make assurance accordingly, and after conveyeth the land to another, who hath knowledge of the first bargain, the first bargainee may have an action upon the case, or deceit as well as subpœna, whereupon Fairfax, 21 E. 4, 23, saith well, that if men will be good pleaders, there should not be cause of so many suits in Chancery. * * * [6]

GRAINGER v. HILL et al.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1838. 4 Bing. N. C. 212, 132 Reprint, 769.)

In September, 1836, the plaintiff, by deed, mortgaged to the defendants for £80 a vessel of which he was owner as well as captain: the money was to be repaid in September, 1837; and the plaintiff was to retain the register of the vessel in order to pursue his voyages.

In November, 1836, the defendants, under some apprehension as to the sufficiency of their security, resolved to possess themselves of the ship's register, and for this purpose, after threatening to arrest the plaintiff unless he repaid the money lent, they made an affidavit of debt, sued out a capias endorsed for bail in the sum of £95. 17s. 6d. in an action of assumpsit, and sent two sheriff's officers with the writ to the plaintiff, who was lying ill in bed from the effects of a wound. A surgeon present, perceiving he could not be removed, one of the defendants said to the sheriff's officers, "Don't take him away; leave the young man with him." The officers then told the plaintiff that they had not come to take him, but to get the ship's register; but that if he failed to deliver the register, or to find bail, they must either take him or leave one of the officers with him.

The plaintiff being unable to procure bail, and being much alarmed, gave up the register.

The plaintiff could not go to sea without the register, and because of its unlawful detention by the defendant lost four voyages from London to Caen. The plaintiff afterwards came to an arrangement with the defendants; was discharged from the arrest; paid the costs: repaid the money borrowed on mortgage; and received from the defendants a release of the mortgage deed. No further steps were taken in the action of assumpsit.

On these facts, a special action on the case was brought to recover the damage which the plaintiff had sustained from the defendants' wrongful acts. On the general issue there was a verdict for the plaintiff.

Taddy, Serjt., pursuant to leave, moved to enter a non suit on the ground, inter alia, that there was no proof of the defendants' action in assumpsit having been determined previously to the commencement of the present action, and without such proof the action will not lie.

PARK, J. * * * The argument as to the omission to prove the termination of the defendant's suit, and to allege want of reasonable and probable cause for it, has proceeded on a supposed analogy between the present case and an action for a malicious arrest. But this is a case primæ impressionis, in which the defendants are charged with having abused the process of the law, in order to obtain property to which they had no colour of title; and, if an action on the case be the remedy applicable to a new species of injury, the declaration and proof must be according to the particular circumstances. I admit the authority of the cases which have been cited, but they do not apply to the present. * * *[7]

MALONE v. BELCHER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1913. 216 Mass. 209, 103 N. E. 637, 49 L. R. A. [N. S.] 753, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 830.)

Action for malicious prosecution. Verdict for plaintiff. Both parties bring exceptions.

MORTON, J. This is an action of tort to recover of the defendant damages for a malicious abuse of process in causing property which the plaintiff had bargained to sell to one Petersen to be maliciously attached for the purpose of preventing said sale and compelling the plaintiff to convey the same to the defendant or to such person or persons as he might designate. There was a verdict for the plaintiff with the amount of which he is dissatisfied. The case is here on exceptions by both parties to the refusal of the presiding judge to give certain rulings asked for—those requested by the plaintiff going to the measure of damages, and those requested by the defendant to the maintenance of the action. There is also an exception by the defendant to the charge.

There was evidence tending to show that while the suit was brought by the defendant and the attachment made for the ostensible purpose of collecting a commission which he claimed to be due him from the plaintiff, the real object was by means of the suit and attachment to prevent the conveyance of the property to Petersen and to secure it for himself. The plaintiff testified amongst other things that the defendant said: "'I am going to attach it' [meaning the property which the plaintiff had agreed to sell to Petersen]. I said, 'What right do you claim, Mr. Belcher, to attach it?' He said, 'I want to hold up the sale; that is the only way I can hold it up.'" The plaintiff also testified that in answer to his question, "Who is your customer," the defendant replied, "It was myself, Mr. Malone." This and other evidence introduced by the plaintiff warranted, if believed, a finding that the real object of the suit and attachment was not that for which the suit purported to have been brought and the attachment made, but was for the purpose of preventing the transfer of the property to Petersen and getting it, if the defendant could, for himself. This would constitute a malicious abuse of process for which the defendant would be liable. The gravamen of the cause of action was the malicious attachment by means of the suit for the purpose of preventing the transfer to Petersen. It was not necessary in order to maintain the action to show a termination of the suit in which the attachment was made, as it would have been in case of malicious prosecution. The attachment for the purpose of preventing the sale to Petersen was a perversion of the object which the writ was intended by law to effect, and it was therefore immaterial whether the suit in which the attachment was made had been terminated or not. But as to malice and want of probable cause the case stood differently. The defendant had the right, even though actuated by malicious motives, to attach the property to secure a claim which he had probable cause for believing was due to him from the defendant. In these respects the case was analogous to a case for malicious prosecution, and it was necessary, as the court instructed the jury, for the plaintiff to show malice and want of probable cause. * * * [8]

III. Malicious Falsehood

SHEPPARD v. WAKEMAN.

(Court of King's Bench, 1661. 1 Lev. 53, 83 Reprint, 293.)

Case, where the Plaintiff was to be married to such a one who intended to take her to his Wife; the Defendant falsely and maliciously to hinder the Marriage, writ a letter to the said Person, That the Plaintiff was contracted to him, whereby she lost her Marriage. After Verdict for the Plaintiff, 'twas moved, That the Action did not lie, the Defendant claiming Title to her himself, like as Gerrard's Case, 4 Co. for Slander of Title. But after divers Motions, the Plaintiff had Judgment, for it is found to be malicious and false; and if such an Action should not lie, a mean and base Person might injure any Person of Honour and Fortune by such a Pretence.

SIR G. GERARD v. DICKENSON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1590. 4 Co. Rep. 18a, 76 Reprint, 903.)

The plaintiff declared that he was seised of the manor and castle of H. in the county of Stafford in fee by purchase from George Lord Audley; and that he was in communication to demise the said castle and manor to Ralph Egerton for twenty-two years for two hundred pounds fine, and one hundred pounds rent per annum, and that the defendant (præmissorum non ignara) said, "I have a lease of the manor and castle of H. for ninety years;" and then and there shewed and published a demise supposed to be made by George Audley, grandfather to the said George Lord Audley, for ninety years, to Edward Dickenson, her husband, and published the said demise as a true and good lease; and so affirmed it, and offered to sell it; ubi revera the said lease was counterfeited by her husband, and that the defendant knew it to be counterfeited; by reason of which words and publication the said Ralph Egerton did not proceed to accept the said lease, to damage, &c. The defendant pleaded in bar, quod talis indentura (qualis in the declaration is alleged) came to the defendant's hands by trover, and traversed that she knew of the forgery, upon which the plaintiff demurred in law. And in this case three points were resolved: 1st. If the defendant had affirmed and published, that the plaintiff had no right to the castle and manor of H., but that she herself had right to them, in that case, because the defendant herself pretends right to them, although in truth she had none, yet no action lies. For if an action should lie when the defendant herself claims an interest, how can any make claim or title to any land, or begin any suit, or seek advice and counsel, but he should be subject to an action? which would be inconvenient. Which resolution agrees with the opinion in Banister's case before, no action upon the case lies against one who publishes another to be his villein without saying that he lies in wait to imprison him, et tales et tantas minas in ipsum fecit, quod circa negotia sua palam intendere non audebat. And therefore it was resolved, that for the said words, "I have a lease of the manor of H. for ninety years," although it is false, yet no action lies for slandering of his title or interest in the said castle and manor. And although it appears by the defendant's bar, that she has no title or interest in the said lease, but is a stranger to it; yet forasmuch as the matter alleged in the declaration doth not maintain the action, the bar will not make it good. 2. It was resolved that there was other matter in the declaration sufficient to maintain the action, and that was because it was alleged in the declaration that the defendant knew of the communication of the making of the said lease to Ralph Egerton, and also that she knew that the lease was forged and counterfeited, and yet (against her own knowledge) she has affirmed and published, that it was a good and true lease, by which the plaintiff was defeated of his bargain. If a man forges a bond in my name, and puts it in suit against me, by which I am vexed and damnified, I shall have an action on the case. B. offered eight oxen to sell to A. as his proper goods, knowing them to be the proper goods of P. A. trusting in the fidelity of B. bought them for eight pounds, and afterwards P. retook the oxen; in that case A. shall have an action upon the case against B. * * *[9]

HATCHARD v. MEGE et al.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1887. 18 Q. B. Div. 771.)

The statement of claim, so far as material to the point decided, was as follows:

Paragraph 1 alleged that the plaintiff was a wine merchant and importer, and the registered proprietor of a trade-mark thereinafter described, and a dealer in a brand of champagne introduced by him and known as "the Delmonico" champagne.

Paragraph 4 alleged that the defendants wrote and published "of and concerning the plaintiff and his said trade as a wine merchant and importer the following false and malicious libel that is to say: 'Caution: Delmonico Champagne. Messrs. Delbeck & Co., finding that wine stated to be Delmonico Champagne is being advertised for sale in Great Britain, hereby give notice that such wine cannot be the wine it is represented to be, as no champagne shipped under that name can be genuine unless it has their names on their labels. Messrs. Delbeck & Co. further give notice that if such wine be shipped from France they will take proceedings to stop such shipments, and such other proceedings in England as they may be advised'—thereby meaning that the plaintiff had no right to use his said registered trade-mark or brand for champagne imported or sold by him, and that in using such trade-mark or brand he was acting fraudulently, and endeavoring to pass off inferior champagne as being of the manufacture of Messrs. Delbeck & Co., and that the champagne imported and sold by the plaintiff was not genuine wine, and that no person other than the defendants had the right to use the word 'Delmonico' as a trade-mark or brand, or part of a trade-mark or brand, of champagne in the United Kingdom.

"5. In consequence of the publication of the libel aforesaid, the plaintiff has been greatly injured in his credit and reputation, and in his said trade and business of a wine merchant and importer and dealer in champagne.

"The plaintiff claims:

"(3) £1000 damages in respect of the publication of the said libel.

"(4) An injunction restraining the defendants, their servants or agents, from continuing the publication of the said libel or any other advertisement or notice to a similar effect."

At the trial Lord Coleridge, C. J., after hearing the opening statement of counsel for the plaintiff, directed a nonsuit to be entered, on the ground that the action came to an end on the death of the original plaintiff.

[9] The third point is omitted.

Accord: Smith v. Spooner (1810) 3 Taunt. 246: D. had leased certain premises for 31 years. The tenant, P., was about to sell at auction a 24 year remainder of the time. D., thinking that he had a right to recover possession of the term for some misconduct of the tenant, went to the auction and told the auctioneer that he, D., was the owner and that P. could not make title to the time. And see the remark of Lawrence, J. (Id. 255): "An action (upon the case for slander of title) can only be maintained when the words are spoken maliciously. It is not necessary to plead specially; it is for the plaintiff to prove malice, which is the gist of the action and is a part of the declaration important to be proved by the plaintiff."

DAY, J. This is an application to set aside a nonsuit, which was directed by the Lord Chief Justice on the opening statement of counsel, and the question is whether the nonsuit was properly entered.

The statement of claim alleges two distinct grievances. The first claim was for infringement of the plaintiff's trade-mark, but that was abandoned at the trial. The second claim is contained in paragraph 4, which sets out a distinct cause of action. The publication there set out is complained of as a libel on the plaintiff in relation to his trade. It is substantially a warning not to buy Delmonico champagne because it is not genuine. The statement of claim alleges that the publication is false and malicious; that would be a question for the jury; it is not for us to consider the facts of the case; we can only look at what was opened by the plaintiff's counsel and what appears on the pleadings. The innuendo charges that the defendants intended to convey the meaning that the plaintiff had no right to use his trade-mark or brand, and that the wine he sold was not genuine. It may be that the publication bears that meaning, and that the words used import dishonesty. The plaintiff has died, and the question to be decided is how much, if any part, of the cause of action survives. The statute 4 Edw. 3, c. 7, and the course of the practice, make it clear that a civil action for libel dies with the death of the person libelled. It does not come within the spirit, and certainly not within the letter of the statute. There is, however, a further question whether a right of action can survive because injury to the plaintiff's trade-mark is alleged. Injury to trade is constantly alleged in actions for libel, and therefore that does not affect the question of survivorship. In the present case the second part of the statement of claim may be subdivided into two separate and distinct claims. The first is for ordinary defamation, either independently of the plaintiff's trade, affecting his character by charging him with being a dishonest man, or defamation of him in his trade by charging him with being a dishonest wine-merchant. That claim would not survive, for it is nothing more than a claim in respect of a libel on an individual. But this publication may be construed to mean that the plaintiff had no right to use his trade-mark. This is not properly a libel, but is rather in the nature of slander of title, which is well defined in Odgers on Libel and Slander, c. V, p. 137, in the following passage: "But wholly apart from these cases there is a branch of the law (generally known by the inappropriate but convenient name—slander of title) which permits an action to be brought against any one who maliciously decries the plaintiff's goods or some other thing belonging to him, and thereby produces special damage to the plaintiff. This is obviously no part of the law of defamation, for the plaintiff's reputation remains uninjured; it is really an action on the case for maliciously acting in such a way as to inflict loss upon the plaintiff. All the preceding rules dispensing with proof of malice and special damage are therefore wholly inapplicable to cases of this kind. Here, as in all other actions on the case, there must be et damnum et injuria. The injuria consists in the unlawful words maliciously spoken, and the damnum is the consequent money loss to the plaintiff."

It appears, therefore, that the first and last parts of the innuendo in the present case suggests slander of title. As appears from the passage I have read, an action for slander of title is not an action for libel, but is rather in the nature of an action on the case for maliciously injuring a person in respect of his estate by asserting that he has no title to it. The action differs from an action for libel in this, that malice is not implied from the fact of publication, but must be proved, and that the falsehood of the statement complained of, and the existence of special damage, must also be proved in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover. The question whether the publication is false and malicious is for the jury. Here, I think, special damage is alleged by the statement of claim, and if the plaintiff could have shewn injury to the sale of the wine which he sold under his trade-mark, he would have been entitled to recover, and that is a cause of action which survives.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the nonsuit was right so far as it related to the claim in respect of a personal libel, but was wrong as to the claim in respect of so much of the publication as impugned the plaintiff's right to sell under his trade-mark or brand.

There will, therefore, be an order for a new trial, but it will be limited to this latter part of the claim.[10]

MELLIN v. WHITE.

(Court of Appeal. [1894] 3 Ch. 276.)

The plaintiff was the manufacturer and proprietor of the food for infants known as "Mellin's Infants' Food." This food was sold wholesale by the plaintiff in bottles, which were inclosed in paper wrappers, bearing thereon the words "Mellin's Infants' Food" and the plaintiff's trade-mark.

The defendant was a chemist at Portsmouth, and the plaintiff had for some years been in the habit of supplying him with Mellin's Food. In 1893 the plaintiff discovered that the defendant had adopted the practice of affixing to the wrappers of the bottles of the plaintiff's food which he sold, a label in the following terms:

"Notice.

"The public are recommended to try Dr. Vance's Prepared Food for Infants and Invalids, it being far more nutritious and healthful than any other preparation yet offered, sold in barrels, containing 1 lb. net weight, at 7½ d. each; or in 7 lb. packets, 3s. 9d. each. Local agent, Timothy White, chemist, Portsmouth."

[10] The statement of facts is abridged and opinion of Wills, J., is omitted.

The defendant was, in fact, the proprietor of Dr. Vance's Prepared Food.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that Dr. Vance's food was far inferior to the plaintiff's in nutritiveness and healthfulness for infants and invalids, and that the statement on the label to the contrary was untrue, and was made for the purpose and with the object of depreciating the plaintiff's food, and of inducing persons in the habit of purchasing and using it to believe that it was an inferior article, and to purchase Dr. Vance's food instead. The plaintiff further alleged that the statement on the label that the defendant was "an agent" was untrue; and the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from offering the plaintiff's food for sale otherwise than under the original labels and wrappers, or offering it for sale, under the plaintiff's labels and wrappers, with any unauthorized variations, and from untruly stating or representing to persons purchasing, or about to purchase, the plaintiff's food, or to the public generally, that the plaintiff's food was not nutritious or healthful, or that the plaintiff's food was less nutritious or healthful than Dr. Vance's.

Moulton, Q. C., and A. B. Terrell, for the appeal: The putting this label on Mellin's bottles is a step calculated to injure the sale of Mellin's Food. It is a trade libel, being an untrue statement made to purchasers of Mellin's Food that it is inferior to Dr. Vance's.

Neville, Q. C., and Macnaghten, for the defendant: There is no difference of substance between this case and the ordinary case of a tradesman publishing a puff saying that his goods are the best of their kind in the market. Suppose a bootmaker were to advertise that his were the best boots in the market, could a bootmaker next door bring an action, on the ground that the advertiser was stigmatizing the neighbour's goods as inferior to his? This is that case.

LINDLEY, L. J. I think in this case the learned judge has gone too far in giving judgment for the defendant upon the materials which were laid before him. He appears to have proceeded on the ground that, even if the plaintiff's evidence stood uncontradicted, this action could not in point of law be sustained. I think that is going too far. The defendant has brought upon himself a new form of attack by adopting a new mode of carrying on business. Nobody in this court, at all events, has ever seen or heard of a tradesman selling goods in the bottles and with the labels used by the manufacturer, and putting on them labels which disparage the article contained in the bottles. It is quite a new idea. I do not say it is illegal. I do not say it is overstepping the mark. But if, upon hearing the whole of the evidence to be adduced, the result should be that the statement contained in the label complained of is a false statement about the plaintiff's goods to the disparagement of them, and if that statement has caused injury to, or is calculated to injure the plaintiff, this action will lie. * * *

LOPES, L. J. All I desire to say is, that in my opinion it is actionable to publish maliciously, without lawful occasion, a false statement disparaging the goods of another person, and causing such other person damage, or likely to cause such other person damage. I think, provided that can be made out, an action for an injunction will lie. All these matters as far as we know at the present moment are undecided, they have not been proved, the evidence has only been heard upon one side, and whether or not the statement in the defendant's notice is false we are not in a position to say. Evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff, but no evidence was given on the part of the defendant. For anything I know, the defendant may be able to shew that the evidence which was given for the plaintiff was incorrect, and that no false statement has been made at all. * * *

The Court of Appeal, therefore, discharged the judgment of Romer, J., and ordered a new trial. The defendant appealed to the House of Lords.[11]

WHITE v. MELLIN.

(House of Lords. [1895] A. C. 154.)

LORD HERSCHELL, L. C. (after stating the facts and quoting from the opinions of Lindley and Lopes, L. JJ., in the Court of Appeal). None of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal dealt with the evidence which had been adduced on behalf of the plaintiff; but I think it must be taken that they had arrived at the conclusion that that evidence did bring the case within those statements of the law. Of course, if the plaintiff, on his evidence, had made out no case, he could not complain that the learned judge decided against him and did not hear the witnesses for the defendant; the action was in that case properly dismissed. I take it, therefore, that although the learned judges did not analyse the evidence or make any reference to it, they must have concluded that it established a case coming within the law as they laid it down. My Lords, as I understand, in the view of these learned judges, or in the view of Lindley, L. J., to take his statement of the law in the first place, it was necessary in order to the maintenance of the action that three things should be proved: That the defendant had disparaged the plaintiff's goods, that such disparagement was false, and that damage had resulted or was likely to result. Now, my Lords, the only statement made by the defendant by means of the advertisement is this: that Vance's food was the most healthful and nutritious for infants and invalids that had been offered to the public. The statement was perfectly general, and would apply in its terms not only to the respondent's infants' food but to all others that were offered to the public. I will take it as sufficiently pointed at the plaintiff's food by reason of its being affixed to a bottle of the plaintiff's food when sold, and that it does disparage the plaintiff's goods by asserting that they are not as healthful and as nutritious as those recommended by the defendant. The question then arises, Has it been proved on the plaintiff's own evidence that that was a false disparagement of the plaintiff's goods? * * *

[11] The statement of facts is abridged, and part of the opinions of Lindley, L. J., and Lopes, L. J., and the concurring opinion of Kay, L. J., are omitted.

I am not satisfied that it has been shewn that by means of this advertisement the defendant falsely disparaged the plaintiff's goods. But, my Lords, assuming that he did so, the Court of Appeal regarded it as requisite for the maintenance of the action that something further should be proved, and that is that the disparaging statement has caused injury to or is calculated to injure the plaintiff. Upon that there is a complete absence of evidence. The plaintiff was called, but he did not state that he had sustained any injury, nor did he even say that it was calculated to injure him, and I own it seems to me impossible, in the absence of any such statement or evidence, to say that it is a case in which such must be the necessary consequence; on the contrary, speaking for myself, I should doubt very much whether it was likely to be the consequence. After all, the advertisement is of a very common description, puffing, it may be, extremely and in an exaggerated fashion, these particular goods, Vance's food. That advertisement was outside the wrapper; inside was found an advertisement of Mellin's food, in which Mellin's food was stated to be recommended by the faculty as best for infants and invalids. Why is it to be supposed that any one buying this bottle at the chemist's would be led to believe that Mellin's food which he had bought was not a good article or not as good an article as another, merely because a person who obviously was seeking to push a rival article said that his article was better? My Lords, why should people give such a special weight to this anonymous puff of Vance's food, obviously the work of some one who wanted to sell it, as that it should lead him to determine to buy it instead of Mellin's food, which was said to be recommended by the faculty as the best for infants and invalids? I confess I do not wonder that the plaintiff did not insist that he had sustained injury by what the defendant had done. There is an entire absence of any evidence that the statement complained of either had injured or was calculated to injure the plaintiff. If so, then the case is not brought even within the definition of the law which Lindley, L. J., gives.

My Lords, the learned counsel relied upon recent cases in which an injunction has been granted to restrain the publication of a libel, and he suggested that there had been a growth of equity jurisprudence which had brought within its ambit a class of cases which were previously not regarded as within it. But when the case in which the Court of Appeal laid down that an injunction might be granted to restrain the publication of a libel is looked at, it will be seen that the decision was not founded upon any principle or rule of equity jurisprudence, but upon the fact that a Court of Common Law could have granted such an injunction in an action of libel, and that since the Judicature Act the power which a Court of Common Law possessed in that respect is now possessed also by the Court of Chancery. That was distinctly the ground upon which the judgment was founded, that "the 79th and 82d sections of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 undoubtedly conferred on the Courts of Common Law the power, if a fit case should arise, to grant injunctions at any stage of a cause in all personal actions of contract or tort, with no limitation as to defamation"; and then, inasmuch as those powers are now possessed by the Chancery Division, it was held that they likewise could in such cases grant an injunction. That was the decision in Bonnard v. Perryman, [1891] 2 Ch. 269.

My Lords, obviously to call for the exercise of that power it would be necessary to shew that there was an actionable wrong well laid, and if the statement only shewed a part of that which was necessary to make up a cause of action—that is to say, if special damage was necessary to the maintenance of the action, and that special damage was not shewn,—a tort in the eye of the law would not be disclosed, the case would not be within those provisions, and no injunction would be granted. I think, therefore, for these reasons, that the plaintiff would not be entitled to an injunction, any more than he would be entitled to maintain an action unless he established all that was necessary to make out that a tort had been committed; and for the reasons which I have given, taking the Western Counties Manure Company v. Lawes Chemical Manure Company, L. R. 9 Ex. 218, to be good law, he has not brought himself within it.

But, my Lords, I cannot help saying that I entertain very grave doubts whether any action could be maintained for an alleged disparagement of another's goods, merely on the allegation that the goods sold by the party who is alleged to have disparaged his competitor's goods are better either generally or in this or that particular respect than his competitors' are. Of course, I put aside the question (it is not necessary to consider it) whether where a person intending to injure another, and not in the exercise of his own trade and vaunting his own goods, has maliciously and falsely disparaged the goods of another, an action will lie; I am dealing with the class of cases which is now before us, where the only disparagement consists in vaunting the superiority of the defendant's own goods. In Evans v. Harlow, 5 Q. B. 624, Lord Denman expressed himself thus: "The gist of the complaint is the defendant's telling the world that the lubricators sold by the plaintiff were not good for their purpose, but wasted the tallow. A tradesman offering goods for sale exposes himself to observations of this kind, and it is not by averring them to be 'false, scandalous, malicious and defamatory' that the plaintiff can found a charge of libel upon them. To decide so would open a very wide door to litigation, and might expose every man who said his goods were better than another's to the risk of an action." My Lords, those observations seem to me to be replete with good sense. It is to be observed that Evans v. Harlow, 5 Q. B. 624, does not appear to have been decided on the ground merely that there was no allegation of special damage. The only judge who alludes to the absence of such an allegation is Patteson, J. No reference to it is to be found either in the judgment of Lord Denman or in the judgment of Wightman, J., the other two judges who took part in that decision; and I think it is impossible not to see that, as Lord Denman says, a very wide door indeed would be opened to litigation, and that the courts might be constantly employed in trying the relative merits of rival productions, if an action of this kind were allowed.

Mr. Moulton sought to distinguish the present case by saying that all that Lord Denman referred to was one tradesman saying that his goods were better than his rival's. That, he said, is a matter of opinion, but whether they are more healthful and more nutritious is a question of fact. My Lords, I do not think it is possible to draw such a distinction. The allegation of a tradesman that his goods are better than his neighbour's very often involves only the consideration whether they possess one or two qualities superior to the other. Of course "better" means better as regards the purpose for which they are intended, and the question of better or worse in many cases depends simply upon one or two or three issues of fact. If an action will not lie because a man says that his goods are better than his neighbour's, it seems to me impossible to say that it will lie because he says that they are better in this or that or the other respect. Just consider what a door would be opened if this were permitted. That this sort of puffing advertisement is in use is notorious; and we see rival cures advertised for particular ailments. The Court would then be bound to inquire, in an action brought, whether this ointment or this pill better cured the disease which it was alleged to cure—whether a particular article of food was in this respect or that better than another. Indeed, the Courts of law would be turned into a machinery for advertising rival productions by obtaining a judicial determination which of the two was the better. As I said, advertisements and announcements of that description have been common enough; but the case of Evans v. Harlow, 5 Q. B. 624, was decided in the year 1844, somewhat over half a century ago, and the fact that no such action—unless it be Western Counties Manure Co. v. Lawes Chemical Manure Co., L. R. 9 Ex. 218, has ever been maintained in the Courts of Justice is very strong indeed to shew that it is not maintainable. It is, indeed, unnecessary to decide the point in order to dispose of the present appeal.

For the reasons which I have given I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court below cannot be sustained, even assuming the law to be as stated by the learned judges; but inasmuch as the case is one of great importance and some additional colour would be lent to the idea that an action of this description was maintainable by the observations in the Court below, I have thought it only right to express my grave doubts whether any such action could be maintained even if the facts brought the case within the law there laid down.

Upon the whole, therefore, I think that the judgment of Romer, J., was right and ought to be restored and that this appeal should be allowed, with the usual result as to costs; and I so move your Lordships.[12]

IV. Deceit

CHANDELOR v. LOPUS.

(In the Exchequer Chamber, 1603. Cro. Jac. 4, 79 Reprint, 3.)

Action upon the case. Whereas the defendant being a goldsmith, and having skill in jewels and precious stones, had a stone which he affirmed to Lopus to be a bezar-stone, and sold it to him for one hundred pounds; ubi revera it was not a bezar-stone: the defendant pleaded not guilty, and verdict was given and judgment entered for the plaintiff in the King's Bench.

But error was thereof brought in the Exchequer Chamber; because the declaration contains not matter sufficient to charge the defendant, viz. that he warranted it to be a bezar-stone, or that he knew that it was not a bezar-stone; for it may be, he himself was ignorant whether it were a bezar-stone or not.

And all the Justices and Barons (except Anderson) held, that for this cause it was error: for the bare affirmation that it was a bezar-stone, without warranting it to be so, is no cause of action: and although he knew it to be no bezar-stone it is not material; for every one in selling his wares will affirm that his wares are good, or the horse which he sells is sound; yet if he does not warrant them to be so, it is no cause of action, and the warranty ought to be made at the same time of the sale; as F. N. B. 94, c, and 98, b; 5 Hen. 7, pl. 41; 9 Hen. 6, pl. 53; 12 Hen. 4, pl. 1, 42 Ass. 8; 7 Hen. 4, pl. 15. Wherefore, forasmuch as no warrant is alleged, they held the declaration to be ill.

Anderson to the contrary; for the deceit in selling it for a bezar, whereas it was not so, is cause of action.

But, notwithstanding, it was adjudged to be no cause, and the judgment reversed.[13]

BAILY v. MERRELL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1615. 3 Buist. 94, 81 Reprint, 81.)

In a special action upon the case for a deceit, the case appears to be this: The plaintiff being a common carrier, using to carry wares out of Essex into Northamptonshire; the defendant having a cade of woad to be carried, came unto the plaintiff, and bargained with him for the carriage of this, and by agreement, he was to give him 2s. for every hundred weight of this, and being demanded by the plaintiff, how many hundred weight this did contain, he said it was about 800 weight; upon this, he giving credit unto him, did cause this to be put into his cart, and he afterwards perceiving by the hardness of the draught, that his horses did overdraw themselves, and by reason of this carriage he did kill two of his horses, and then he did presently weigh the same, and found the same to be 2,000 pound weight, and so for this his deceit used, by reason of which he was so much damnified; for his remedy herein, he brought this action, to which the defendant pleaded non culp. All this matter appearing so to the jury upon the trial, and the loss of his horses, they gave a verdict for the plaintiff, and 20 marks damages.

DODDERIDGE, J. Here is a plain default in the carrier, that he did not weigh this; if he had carried this home for him, he would then have had for it according to the weight of it, after the rate of 2s. a hundred weight, as they agreed for, and that there it ought to be weighed; he himself at his peril ought to have looked unto this before.

TOTA CURIA (absent Coke, Chief Justice) that the action by the plaintiff lieth not, because the default was in himself, that he had not weighed this.

By the rule of the Court, this matter to stay till the plaintiff move the same again, and no judgment pronounced one way or other; but the plaintiff perceiving the opinion of the Court to be against him, never moved the Court again herein.*

fendant was a goldsmith, and skilled in the nature of precious stones, and being possessed of a stone which the defendant asserted and assured the said plaintiff to be a true and perfect stone called a bezoar stone, &c. upon which the plaintiff bought it, &c. There the opinion of Popham was, that if I have any commodities which are damaged (whether victuals or otherwise), and I, knowing them to be so, sell them for good, and affirm them to be so, an action upon the case lies for the deceit; but although they be damaged, if I, knowing not that, affirm them to be good, still no action lies, without I warrant them to be good." And see Lord Fitzgerald's comment upon this in Derry v. Peek (1889) 14 A. C. 337, 357: "The action seems originally to have been on a warranty which failed in fact, as there had been no warranty, and it was then sought to support it as an action for deceit; but it was not alleged in the count that the defendant knew the representation to be untrue. It was in reference to that that the observation of Popham, C. J., was made. He had the reputation of being a consummate lawyer."

MORGAN v. BLISS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1806. 2 Mass. 111.)

In an action of the case for deceit, the plaintiffs declare that Pliny Bliss and Charles Wiley, contriving and intending to cheat and defraud the plaintiffs, in pursuance of such intention made a pretended promissory note subscribed by said Pliny for the sum of twenty-three dollars, payable to the said Charles, which note the said Charles transferred and assigned to the plaintiffs. And afterwards the said Charles fraudulently gave to the said Pliny, and the said Pliny fraudulently received, a discharge of said note.

The writ having been served upon Pliny Bliss alone, he appeared and defended, and at the adjourned session in December last, upon the general issue of not guilty, joined between these parties, viz., the plaintiffs and Pliny Bliss, the plaintiffs gave in evidence a note, dated August 22, 1803, by which P. Bliss, for value received, promised C. Wiley to pay him 23 dollars on demand. Amos Daniels, a subscribing witness to the note, testified that P. Bliss said, at the time the note was given, it was to answer a debt of one J. Bliss to the plaintiffs, C. Wiley being indebted to the said J. Bliss.

THE COURT. This was an action for fraud, and the evidence was clearly insufficient to support the charge. Here was no evidence of any conspiracy between Bliss and Wiley; nor any proof of the plaintiffs' ever having released their demand on J. Bliss, (and no reason shown for not producing such proof,) or of their having in any other way given a valuable consideration for the note; and without such evidence, what damage do they show themselves to have sustained? There is nothing left in the case for the jury to deliberate upon.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE suggested that there might perhaps be a foundation for a criminal prosecution for conspiracy; but an act done in pursuance of an unlawful intent, and without occasioning actual damage, is no ground for a civil action.

Nonsuit not set aside.

PASLEY et al. v. FREEMAN.

(Court of King's Bench, 1789. 3 Term R. 51, 1 R. R. 634, 100 Reprint, 450.)

This was an action in the nature of a writ of deceit; to which the defendant pleaded the general issue. And after a verdict for the plaintiffs on the third count, a motion was made in arrest of judgment.

The third count was as follows:

"And whereas also the said Joseph Freeman, afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of February in the year of our Lord 1787, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, further intending to deceive and defraud the said John Pasley and Edward, did wrongfully and deceitfully encourage and persuade the said John Pasley and Edward, to sell and deliver to the said John Christopher Falch divers other goods, wares, and merchandises, to wit, 16 other bags of cochineal of great value to wit, of the value of £2634. 16s. 1d. upon trust and credit: and did for that purpose then and there falsely, deceitfully, and fraudulently assert and affirm to the said John Pasley and Edward, that the said John Christopher then and there was a person safely to be trusted and given credit to in that respect; and did thereby falsely, fraudulently, and deceitfully, cause and procure the said John Pasley and Edward to sell and deliver the said last-mentioned goods, wares, and merchandizes, upon trust and credit, to the said John Christopher; and in fact they the said John Pasley and Edward, confiding in and giving credit to the said last-mentioned assertion and affirmation of the said Joseph, and believing the same to be true, and not knowing the contrary thereof, did afterwards, to wit, on the 28th day of February in the year of our Lord 1787 at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, sell and deliver the said last-mentioned goods, wares, and merchandizes, upon trust and credit, to the said John Christopher; whereas in truth and in fact, at the time of the said Joseph's making his said last-mentioned assertion and affirmation, the said John Christopher was not then and there a person safely to be trusted and given credit to in that respect, and the said Joseph well knew the same, to wit, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid. And the said John Pasley and Edward further say, that the said John Christopher hath not, nor hath any other person on his behalf, paid to the said John Pasley and Edward, or either of them, the said sum of £2634. 16s. 1d. last-mentioned, or any part thereof, for the said last-mentioned goods, wares, and merchandizes; but on the contrary the said John Christopher then was, and still is, wholly unable to pay the said sum of money last mentioned, or any part thereof, to the said John Pasley and Edward, to wit, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid; and the said John Pasley and Edward aver that the said Joseph falsely and fraudulently deceived them in this, that at the time of his making his said last-mentioned assertion and affirmation, the said John Christopher was not a person safely to be trusted or given credit to in that respect as aforesaid, and the said Joseph then well knew the same, to wit, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid: by reason of which said last-mentioned false, fraudulent, and deceitful assertion and affirmation of the said Joseph the said John Pasley and Edward have been deceived and imposed upon, and have wholly lost the said last-mentioned goods, wares, and merchandizes, and the value thereof, to wit, at London aforesaid in the parish and ward aforesaid; to the damage," &c.

Application was first made for a new trial, which, after argument, was refused: and then this motion in arrest of judgment. Wood argued for the plaintiffs, and Russell for the defendant, in the last term: but as the Court went so fully into this subject in giving their opinions, it is unnecessary to give the arguments at the Bar.

The Court took time to consider of this matter and now delivered their opinions seriatim.

BULLER, J. The foundation of this action is fraud and deceit in the defendant, and damage to the plaintiffs. And the question is, whether an action thus founded can be sustained in a Court of Law? Fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action; but where these two concur, an action lies. Per Croke, J., 3 Bulst. 95. But it is contended, that this was a bare naked lie; that, as no collusion with Falch is charged, it does not amount to a fraud: and, if there were any fraud, the nature of it is not stated. And it was supposed by the counsel who originally made the motion, that no action could be maintained, unless the defendant, who made this false assertion, had an interest in so doing. I agree that an action cannot be supported for telling a bare naked lie; but that I define to be, saying a thing which is false, knowing or not knowing it to be so, and without any design to injure, cheat, or deceive, another person. Every deceit comprehends a lie; but a deceit is more than a lie on account of the view with which it is practised, its being coupled with some dealing, and the injury which it is calculated to occasion, and does occasion, to another person. Deceit is a very extensive head in the law; and it will be proper to take a short view of some of the cases which have existed on the subject, to see how far the Courts have gone, and what are the principles upon which they have decided. * * *

These cases then are so far from being authorities against the present action, that they shew that, if there be fraud or deceit, the action will lie; and that knowledge of the falsehood of thing asserted is fraud and deceit. Collusion then is not necessary to constitute fraud. In the case of a conspiracy, there must be a collusion between two or more to support an indictment: but if one man alone be guilty of an offence, which, if practised by two, would be the subject of an indictment for a conspiracy, he is civilly liable in an action for reparation of damages at the suit of the person injured. That knowledge of the falsehood of the thing asserted constitutes fraud, though there be no collusion, is further proved by the case of Risney v. Selby, Salk. 211, where, upon a treaty for the purchase of a house, the defendant fraudulently affirmed that the rent was £30 per annum, when it was only £20 per annum, and the plaintiff had his judgment; for the value of the rent is a matter which lies in the private knowledge of the landlord and tenant, and if they affirm the rent to be more than it is, the purchaser is cheated, and ought to have a remedy for it. No collusion was there stated, nor does it appear that the tenant was ever asked a question about the rent, and yet the purchaser might have applied to him for information; but the judgment proceeded wholly upon the ground that the defendant knew that what he asserted was false. And by the words of the book it seems that, if the tenant had said the same thing, he also would have been liable to an action. If so, that would be an answer to the objection, that the defendant in this case had no interest in the assertion which he made. But I shall not leave this point on the dictum or inference which may be collected from that case. If A. by fraud and deceit cheat B. out of £1000, it makes no difference to B. whether A., or any other person, pockets that £1000. He has lost his money and if he can fix fraud upon A., reason seems to say that he has a right to seek satisfaction against him. * * *

The gist of the action is fraud and deceit, and if that fraud and deceit can be fixed by evidence on one who had no interest in his iniquity, it proves his malice to be the greater. But it was objected to this declaration, that if there were any fraud, the nature of it is not stated: to this the declaration itself is so direct an answer, that the case admits of no other. The fraud is, that the defendant procured the plaintiffs to sell goods on credit to one whom they would not otherwise have trusted, by asserting that which he knew to be false. Here then is the fraud, and the means by which it was committed; and it was done with a view to enrich Falch by empoverishing the plaintiffs, or, in other words, by cheating the plaintiffs out of their goods. The cases which I have stated, and Sid. 146, and 1 Keb. 522, prove that the declaration states more than is necessary; for fraudulenter without sciens, or sciens without fraudulenter, would be sufficient to support the action. But as Mr. J. Twisden said in that case, the fraud must be proved. The assertion alone will not maintain the action; but the plaintiff must go on to prove that it was false, and that the defendant knew it to be so: by what means that proof is to be made out in evidence need not be stated in the declaration. Some general arguments were urged at the Bar, to shew that mischiefs and inconveniences would arise if this action were sustained; for if a man, who is asked a question respecting another's responsibility, hesitate, or is silent, he blasts the character of the tradesman: and if he say that he is insolvent, he may not be able to prove it. But let us see what is contended for: it is nothing less than that a man may assert that which he knows to be false, and thereby do an everlasting injury to his neighbour, and yet not be answerable for it. This is as repugnant to law as it is to morality. Then it is said that the plaintiffs had no right to ask the question of the defendant. But I do not agree in that; for the plaintiffs had an interest in knowing what the credit of Falch was. It was not the inquiry of idle curiosity, but it was to govern a very extensive concern. The defendant undoubtedly had his option to give an answer to the question, or not: but if he gave none, or said he did not know, it is impossible for any Court of Justice to adopt the possible inferences of a suspicious mind as a ground for grave judgment. All that is required of a person in the defendant's situation is, that he shall give no answer, or that if he do, he shall answer according to the truth as far as he knows. The reasoning in the case of Coggs v. Bernard [2 Ld. Raymond, 909] which was cited by the plaintiff's counsel, is I think very applicable to this part of the case. If the answer import insolvency, it is not necessary that the defendant should be able to prove that insolvency to a jury; for the law protects a man in giving that answer, if he does it in confidence and without malice. No action can be maintained against him for giving such an answer unless express malice can be proved. From the circumstance of the law giving that protection, it seems to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the law not only gives sanction to the question, but requires that, if it be answered at all, it shall be answered honestly. There is a case in the books, which, though not much to be relied on, yet serves to shew that this kind of conduct has never been thought innocent in Westminster Hall. In R. v. Gunston, 1 Str. 583, the defendant was indicted for pretending that a person of no reputation was Sir J. Thornycraft, whereby the prosecutor was induced to trust him; and the Court refused to grant a certiorari, unless a special ground were laid for it. If the assertion in that case had been wholly innocent, the Court would not have hesitated a moment. How indeed an indictment could be maintained for that, I do not well understand; nor have I learnt what became of it. The objection to the indictment is, that it was merely a private injury: but that is no answer to an action. And if a man will wickedly assert that which he knows to be false, and thereby draws his neighbour into a heavy loss, even though it be under the specious pretence of serving his friend, I say ausis talibus istis non jura subserviunt.[14]

DERRY et al. v. SIR HENRY WILLIAM PEEK.

(House of Lords, 1889. 14 App. Cas. 337.)

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal. The facts are set out at length in the report of the decisions below, 37 Ch. D. 541. For the present report the following summary will suffice:

By a special Act (45 & 46 Vict. c. 159) the Plymouth, Devonport and District Tramways Company was authorized to make certain tramways.

By section 35 the carriages used on the tramways might be moved by animal power and, with the consent of the Board of Trade, by steam or any mechanical power for fixed periods and subject to the regulations of the Board.

By section 34 of the Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), which section was incorporated in the said special Act, "all carriages used on any tramway shall be moved by the power prescribed by the special Act, and where no such power is prescribed, by animal power only."

In February, 1883, the appellants as directors of the company issued a prospectus containing the following paragraph:

"One great feature of this undertaking, to which considerable importance should be attached, is, that by the special Act of Parliament obtained, the company has the right to use steam or mechanical motive power, instead of horses, and it is fully expected that by means of this a considerable saving will result in the working expenses of the line as compared with other tramways worked by horses."

Soon after the issue of the prospectus the respondent, relying, as he alleged, upon the representations in this paragraph and believing that the company had an absolute right to use steam and other mechanical power, applied for and obtained shares in the company.

The company proceeded to make tramways, but the Board of Trade refused to consent to the use of steam or mechanical power except on certain portions of the tramways.

In the result the company was wound up, and the respondent in 1885 brought an action of deceit against the appellants claiming damages for the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendants whereby the plaintiff was induced to take shares in the company.

At the trial before Stirling, J., the plaintiff and defendants were called as witnesses. The effect given to their evidence in this House will appear from the judgments of noble and learned Lords.

Stirling, J., dismissed the action; but that decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (Cotton, L. J., Sir J. Hannen, and Lopes, L. J.) who held that the defendants were liable to make good to the plaintiff the loss sustained by his taking the shares, and ordered an inquiry, 37 Ch. D. 541, 591. Against this decision the defendants appealed.

Lord Bramwell. My Lords, I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. I am glad to come to this conclusion; for, as far as my judgment goes, it exonerates five men of good character and conduct from a charge of fraud, which, with all submission, I think wholly unfounded, a charge supported on such materials as to make all character precarious. I hope this will not be misunderstood; that promoters of companies will not suppose that they can safely make inaccurate statements with no responsibility. I should much regret any such notion; for the general public is so at the mercy of company promoters, sometimes dishonest, sometimes over sanguine, that it requires all the protection that the law can give it. Particularly should I regret if it was supposed that I did not entirely disapprove of the conduct of those directors who accepted their qualification from the contractor or intended contractor. It is wonderful to me that honest men of ordinary intelligence cannot see the impropriety of this. It is obvious that the contractor can only give this qualification because he means to get it back in the price given for the work he is to do. That price is to be fixed by the directors who have taken his money. They are paid by him to give him a good price, as high a price as they can, while their duty to their shareholders is to give him one as low as they can.

But there is another thing. The public, seeing these names, may well say, "These are respectable and intelligent men who think well enough of this scheme to adventure their money in it; we will do the same," little knowing that those thus trusted had made themselves safe against loss if the thing turned out ill, while they might gain if it was successful. I am glad to think that Mr. Wilde, a member of my old profession, was not one of those so bribed. The only shade of doubt I have in the case is, that this safety from loss in the directors may have made them less careful in judging of the truth of any statements they have made.

There is another matter I wish to dispose of before going into the particular facts of the case. I think we need not trouble ourselves about "legal fraud," nor whether it is a good or bad expression; because I hold that actual fraud must be proved in this case to make the defendants liable, and, as I understand, there is never any occasion to use the phrase "legal fraud" except when actual fraud cannot be established. "Legal fraud" is only used when some vague ground of action is to be resorted to, or, generally speaking, when the person using it will not take the trouble to find, or cannot find, what duty has been violated or right infringed, but thinks a claim is somehow made out. With the most sincere respect for Sir J. Hannen I cannot think the expression "convenient." I do not think it is "an explanation which very clearly conveys an idea"; at least, I am certain it does not to my mind. I think it a mischievous phrase, and one which has contributed to what I must consider the erroneous decision in this case. But, with these remarks, I have done with it, and will proceed to consider whether the law is not that actual fraud must be proved, and whether that has been done.

Now, I really am reluctant to cite authorities to shew that actual fraud must be established in such a case as this. It is one of the first things one learned, and one has never heard it doubted until recently. I am very glad to think that my noble and learned friend (Lord Herschell) has taken the trouble to go into the authorities fully; but to some extent I deprecate it, because it seems to me somewhat to come within the principle Qui s'excuse s'accuse. When a man makes a contract with another he is bound by it; and, in making it, he is bound not to bring it about by fraud. Warrantizando vendidit gives a cause of action if the warranty is broken. Knowingly and fraudulently stating a material untruth which brings about, wholly or partly, the contract, also gives a cause of action. To this may now be added the equitable rule (which is not in question here), that a material misrepresentation, though not fraudulent, may give a right to avoid or rescind a contract where capable of such rescission. To found an action for damages there must be a contract and breach, or fraud. The statement of claim in this case states fraud. Of course that need not be proved merely because it is stated. But no one ever heard of or saw a statement of claim or declaration for deceit without it. There is not an authority at common law, or by a common law lawyer, to the contrary; none has been cited, though there may be some incautious, hesitating expressions which point that way. Every case from the earliest in Comyns' Digest to the present day alleges it. Further, the learned judges of the Court of Appeal hardly deny it. There is indeed an opinion to the contrary of the late Master of the Rolls, but it must be remembered that his knowledge of actions of deceit was small, if any. * * *

Lord Herschell. My Lords, in the statement of claim, in this action the respondent, who is the plaintiff, alleges that the appellants made in a prospectus issued by them certain statements which were untrue, that they well knew that the facts were not as stated in the prospectus, and made the representations fraudulently, and with the view to induce the plaintiff to take shares in the company.

"This action is one which is commonly called an action of deceit, a mere common law action." This is the description of it given by Cotton, L. J., in delivering judgment. I think it important that it should be borne in mind that such an action differs essentially from one brought to obtain rescission of a contract on the ground of misrepresentation of a material fact. The principles which govern the two actions differ widely. Where rescission is claimed it is only necessary to prove that there was misrepresentation; then, however honestly it may have been made, however free from blame the person who made it, the contract, having been obtained by misrepresentation, cannot stand. In an action of deceit, on the contrary, it is not enough to establish misrepresentation alone; it is conceded on all hands that something more must be proved to cast liability upon the defendant, though it has been a matter of controversy what additional elements are requisite. I lay stress upon this because observations made by learned judges in actions for rescission have been cited and much relied upon at the bar by counsel for the respondent. Care must obviously be observed in applying the language used in relation to such actions to an action of deceit. Even if the scope of the language used extend beyond the particular action which was being dealt with it must be remembered that the learned judges were not engaged in determining what is necessary to support an action of deceit, or in discriminating with nicety the elements which enter into it.

There is another class of actions which I must refer to also for the purpose of putting it aside. I mean those cases where a person within whose special province it lay to know a particular fact, has given an erroneous answer to an inquiry made with regard to it by a person desirous of ascertaining the fact for the purpose of determining his course accordingly, and has been held bound to make good the assurance he has given. Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470, may be cited as an example, where a trustee had been asked by an intended lender, upon the security of a trust fund, whether notice of any prior incumbrance upon the fund had been given to him. In cases like this it has been said that the circumstance that the answer was honestly made in the belief that it was true affords no defence to the action. Lord Selborne pointed out in Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. at p. 935, that these cases were in an altogether different category from actions to recover damages for false representation, such as we are now dealing with.

One other observation I have to make before proceeding to consider the law which has been laid down by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal in the case before your Lordships. "An action of deceit is a common law action, and must be decided on the same principles, whether it be brought in the Chancery Division or any of the Common Law Divisions, there being, in my opinion, no such thing as an equitable action for deceit." This was the language of Cotton, L. J., in Arkwright v. Newbould, 17 Ch. D. 320. It was adopted by Lord Blackburn in Smith v. Chadwick, 9 App. Cas. 193, and is not, I think, open to dispute.

In the Court below Cotton, L. J., said: "What in my opinion is a correct statement of the law is this, that where a man makes a statement to be acted upon by others which is false, and which is known by him to be false, or is made by him recklessly, or without care whether it is true or false, that is, without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true, he is liable in an action of deceit at the suit of anyone to whom it was addressed or anyone of the class to whom it was addressed and who was materially induced by the misstatement to do an act to his prejudice." About much that is here stated there cannot, I think, be two opinions. But when the learned Lord Justice speaks of a statement made recklessly or without care whether it is true or false, that is without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true, I find myself, with all respect, unable to agree that these are convertible expressions. To make a statement careless whether it be true or false, and therefore without any real belief in its truth, appears to me to be an essentially different thing from making, through want of care, a false statement, which is nevertheless honestly believed to be true. And it is surely conceivable that a man may believe that what he states is the fact, though he has been so wanting in care that the Court may think that there were no sufficient grounds to warrant his belief. I shall have to consider hereafter whether the want of reasonable ground for believing the statement made is sufficient to support an action of deceit. I am only concerned for the moment to point out that it does not follow that it is so, because there is authority for saying that a statement made recklessly, without caring whether it be true or false, affords sufficient foundation for such an action. * * *

It will thus be seen that all the learned judges concurred in thinking that it was sufficient to prove that the representations made were not in accordance with fact, and that the person making them had no reasonable ground for believing them. They did not treat the absence of such reasonable ground as evidence merely that the statements were made recklessly, careless whether they were true or false, and without belief that they were true, but they adopted as the test of liability, not the existence of belief in the truth of the assertions made, but whether the belief in them was founded upon any reasonable grounds. It will be seen, further, that the Court did not purport to be establishing any new doctrine. They deemed that they were only following the cases already decided, and that the proposition which they concurred in laying down was established by prior authorities. Indeed, Lopes, L. J., expressly states the law in this respect to be well settled. This renders a close and critical examination of the earlier authorities necessary.

I need go no further back than the leading case of Pasley v. Freeman, 2 Smith's L. C. 74. If it was not there for the first time held that action of deceit would lie in respect of fraudulent representations against a person not a party to a contract induced by them, the law was at all events not so well settled but that a distinguished Judge, Grose, J., differing from his Brethren on the Bench, held that such an action was not maintainable. Buller, J., who held that the action lay, adopted in relation to it the language of Croke, J., in 3 Bulstrode, 95, who said: "Fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action, but where these two concur an action lies." * * *

Having now drawn attention, I believe, to all the cases having a material bearing upon the question under consideration, I proceed to state briefly the conclusions to which I have been led. I think the authorities establish the following propositions: First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shewn that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second, for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent, there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth. And this probably covers the whole ground, for one who knowingly alleges that which is false, has obviously no such honest belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made.

I think these propositions embrace all that can be supported by decided cases from the time of Pasley v. Freeman down to Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie in 1867, Law Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 145, when the first suggestion is to be found that belief in the truth of what he has stated will not suffice to absolve the defendant if his belief be based on no reasonable grounds. I have shewn that this view was at once dissented from by Lord Cranworth, so that there was at the outset as much authority against it as for it. And I have met with no further assertion of Lord Chelmsford's view until the case of Weir v. Bell, 3 Ex. D. 238, where it seems to be involved in Lord Justice Cotton's enunciation of the law of deceit. But no reason is there given in support of the view, it is treated as established law. The dictum of the late Master of the Rolls, that a false statement made through carelessness, which the person making it ought to have known to be untrue, would sustain an action of deceit, carried the matter still further. But that such an action could be maintained notwithstanding an honest belief that the statement made was true, if there were no reasonable grounds for the belief, was, I think, for the first time decided in the case now under appeal.

In my opinion making a false statement through want of care falls far short of, and is a very different thing from, fraud, and the same may be said of a false representation honestly believed though on insufficient grounds. Indeed Cotton, L. J., himself indicated, in the words I have already quoted, that he should not call it fraud. But the whole current of authorities, with which I have so long detained your Lordships, shews to my mind conclusively that fraud is essential to found an action of deceit, and that it cannot be maintained where the acts proved cannot properly be so termed. And the case of Taylor v. Ashton, 11 M. & W. 401, appears to me to be in direct conflict with the dictum of Sir George Jessel, and inconsistent with the view taken by the learned judges in the Court below. I observe that Sir Frederick Pollock, in his able work on Torts (p. 243, note), referring, I presume, to the dicta of Cotton, L. J., and Sir George Jessel, M. R., says that the actual decision in Taylor v. Ashton, 11 M. & W. 401, is not consistent with the modern cases on the duty of directors of companies. I think he is right. But for the reasons I have given I am unable to hold that anything less than fraud will render directors or any other persons liable to an action of deceit.

At the same time I desire to say distinctly that when a false statement has been made the questions whether there were reasonable grounds for believing it, and what were the means of knowledge in the possession of the person making it, are most weighty matters for consideration. The ground upon which an alleged belief was founded is a most important test of its reality. I can conceive many cases where the fact that an alleged belief was destitute of all reasonable foundation would suffice of itself to convince the Court that it was not really entertained, and that the representation was a fraudulent one. So, too, although means of knowledge are, as was pointed out by Lord Blackburn in Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. at p. 952, a very different thing from knowledge, if I thought that a person making a false statement had shut his eyes to the facts, or purposely abstained from inquiring into them, I should hold that honest belief was absent, and that he was just as fraudulent as if he had knowingly stated that which was false.

I have arrived with some reluctance at the conclusion to which I have felt myself compelled, for I think those who put before the public a prospectus to induce them to embark their money in a commercial enterprise ought to be vigilant to see that it contain such representations only as are in strict accordance with fact, and I should be very unwilling to give any countenance to the contrary idea. I think there is much to be said for the view that this moral duty ought to some extent to be converted into a legal obligation, and that the want of reasonable care to see that statements, made under such circumstances, are true, should be made an actionable wrong. But this is not a matter fit for discussion on the present occasion. If it is to be done the legislature must intervene and expressly give a right of action in respect of such a departure from duty. It ought not, I think, to be done by straining the law, and holding that to be fraudulent which the tribunal feels cannot properly be so described. I think mischief is likely to result from blurring the distinction between carelessness and fraud, and equally holding a man fraudulent whether his acts can or cannot be justly so designated.

It now remains for me to apply what I believe to be the law to the facts of the present case. * * *

I agree with the Court below that the statement made did not accurately convey to the mind of a person reading it what the rights of the company were, but to judge whether it may nevertheless have been put forward without subjecting the defendants to the imputation of fraud, your Lordships must consider what were the circumstances. By the General Tramways Act of 1870 it is provided that all carriages used on any tramway shall be moved by the power prescribed by the special Act, and where no such power is prescribed, by animal power only, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 78, § 34. In order, therefore, to enable the company to use steampower, an Act of Parliament had to be obtained empowering its use. This had been done, but the power was clogged with the condition that it was only to be used with the consent of the Board of Trade. It was therefore incorrect to say that the company had the right to use steam; they would only have that right if they obtained the consent of the Board of Trade. But it is impossible not to see that the fact which would impress itself upon the minds of those connected with the company was that they had, after submitting the plans to the Board of Trade, obtained a special Act empowering the use of steam. It might well be that the fact that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary would not dwell in the same way upon their minds, if they thought that the consent of the Board would be obtained as a matter of course if its requirements were complied with, and that it was therefore a mere question of expenditure and care. The provision might seem to them analogous to that contained in the General Tramways Act, and I believe in the Railways Act also, prohibiting the line being opened until it had been inspected by the Board of Trade and certified fit for traffic, which no one would regard as a condition practically limiting the right to use the line for the purpose of a tramway or railway. I do not say that the two cases are strictly analogous in point of law, but they may well have been thought so by business men.

I turn now to the evidence of the defendants. [LORD HERSCHELL here reviewed the evidence of each of the five defendants.]

As I have said, Stirling, J., gave credit to these witnesses, and I see no reason to differ from him. What conclusion ought to be drawn from their evidence? I think they were mistaken in supposing that the consent of the Board of Trade would follow as a matter of course because they had obtained their Act. It was absolutely in the discretion of the Board whether such consent should be given. The prospectus was therefore inaccurate. But that is not the question. If they believed that the consent of the Board of Trade was practically concluded by the passing of the Act, has the plaintiff made out, which it was for him to do, that they have been guilty of a fraudulent misrepresentation? I think not. I cannot hold it proved as to any one of them that he knowingly made a false statement, or one which he did not believe to be true, or was careless whether what he stated was true or false. In short, I think they honestly believed that what they asserted was true, and I am of opinion that the charge of fraud made against them has not been established. * * *

Adopting the language of Jessel, M. R., in Smith v. Chadwick, 20 Ch. D. at p. 67, I conclude by saying that on the whole I have come to the conclusion that the statement, "though in some respects inaccurate and not altogether free from imputation of carelessness, was a fair, honest and bona fide statement on the part of the defendants, and by no means exposes them to an action for deceit."

I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.[15]

V. Malicious Use of Property or Influence for the Harm of Another

KEEBLE v. HICKERINGILL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1809. 11 East, 574, note, 11 R. R. 273, 103 Reprint, 1127.)

Action upon the case. Plaintiff declares that he was, 8th November in the second year of the Queen, lawfully possessed of a close of land called Minott's Meadow, et de quodam vivario, vocato, a "decoy pond," to which divers wildfowl used to resort and come: and the plaintiff had at his own cost and charges prepared and procured divers decoy ducks, nets, machines, and other engines for the decoying and taking of the wildfowl, and enjoyed the benefit in taking them: the defendant knowing which, and intending to damnify the plaintiff in his vivary, and to fright and drive away the wildfowl used to resort thither, and deprive him of his profit, did, on the 8th of November, resort to the head of the said pond and vivary and did discharge six guns laden with gunpowder, and with the noise and stink of the gunpowder did drive away the wildfowl then being in the pond: and on the 11th and 12th days of November the defendant, with the design to damnify the plaintiff, and fright away the wildfowl, did place himself with a gun near the vivary, and there did discharge the said gun several times that was then charged with the gunpowder against the said decoy pond, whereby the wildfowl were frightened away, and did forsake the said pond.

[15] The House of Lords were unanimous in reversing the order of the Court of Appeal and restoring the order of Stirling, J. Parts of the opinions of Lord Bramwell and Lord Herschell and all of the concurring opinions of Lord Chancellor Halsbury and of Lords Watson and Fitzgerald are omitted.

Upon not guilty pleaded, a verdict was found for the plaintiff and £20 damages.

HOLT, C. J. I am of opinion that this action doth lie. It seems to be new in instance, but it is not new in the reason or the principle of it. For, 1st, this using or making a decoy is lawful. 2dly. This employment of his ground to that use is profitable to the plaintiff, as is the skill and management of that employment. As to the first, Every man that hath a property may employ it for his pleasure and profit, as for alluring and procuring decoy ducks to come to his pond. To learn the trade of seducing other ducks to come there in order to be taken is not prohibited by either the law of the land or the moral law; but it is as lawful to use art to seduce them, to catch them, and destroy them for the use of mankind, as to kill or destroy wildfowl or tame cattle. Then when a man uses his art or his skill to take them, to sell and dispose of for his profit; this is his trade; and he that hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action for so hindering him. Why otherwise are scandalous words spoken of a man in his profession actionable, when without his profession they are not so? Though they do not affect any damage, yet are they mischievous in themselves; and therefore in their own nature productive of damage; and therefore an action lies against him. Such are all words that are spoken of a man to disparage him in his trade, that may bring damage to him; though they do not charge him with any crime that may make him obnoxious to punishment; as to say a merchant is broken, or that he is failing, or is not able to pay his debts, 1 Roll. 60, I; all the cases there put. How much more when the defendant does an actual and real damage to another when he is in the very act of receiving profit by his employment. Now there are two sorts of acts for doing damage to a man's employment, for which an action lies; the one is in respect of a man's privilege; the other is in respect of his property. In that a man's franchise or property whereby he hath a fair, market, or ferry, if another shall use the like liberty, though out of his limits, he shall be liable to an action; though by grant from the king. But therein is the difference to be taken between a liberty in which the public hath a benefit, and that wherein the public is not concerned. 22 H. 6. 14, 15.

The other is where a violent and malicious act is done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood; there an action lies in all cases. But if a man doth him damage by using the same employment; as if Mr. Hickeringill had set up another decoy on the same ground near the plaintiff's, and that had spoiled the custom of the plaintiff, no action would lie, because he had as much liberty to make and use a decoy as the plaintiff. This is like the case of 11 H. 4. 47. One schoolmaster sets up a new school to the damage of an antient school, and thereby the scholars are allured from the old school to come to his new. (The action there was held not to lie.) But suppose Mr. Hickeringill should lie in the way with his guns, and fright the boys from going to the school, and their parents would not let them go thither; sure that schoolmaster might have an action for the loss of his scholars. 29 E. 3. 18. A man hath a market, to which he hath toll for horses sold: a man is bringing his horse to market to sell: a stranger hinders and obstructs him from going thither to the market: an action lies, because it imports damage. Action upon the case lies against one that shall by threat fright away his tenants at will. 9 H. 7. 8; 21 H. 6. 31; 9 H. 7. 7; 14 Ed. 4. 7. Vide Rastal. 662; 2 Cro. 423. Trespass was brought for beating his servant whereby he was hindered from taking his toll; the obstruction is a damage, though not the loss of his service.[16]

LETTS v. KESSLER.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1896. 54 Ohio St. 73, 42 N. E. 765, 40 L. R. A. 177.)

The plaintiff below (defendant in error here) filed her petition in the court of common pleas against defendant below (plaintiff in error here), averring that she was the owner by purchase under a land contract of certain permises in the city of Cleveland; that defendant owned and occupied the lot on the east side thereof; that she used her premises as an hotel and boarding house; that he was erecting a high board fence on his ground, which would obstruct her windows, and deprive her of light and air; that said fence was not being erected for any useful or ornamental purpose, but from motives of pure malice alone, and for the express malicious purpose of annoying plaintiff, and excluding light and air from her house, so as to render her house uninhabitable, to injure the value thereof; and that said fence would exclude the light and air, and thereby greatly injure the value of her house. She prayed that he might be restrained from completing said fence, and that, upon the final hearing, a mandatory injunction might compel its removal. Defendant below demurred to this petition, and the demurrer was overruled, and exceptions taken. The ruling upon this demurrer is reported in 7 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 108. He then filed an answer, in substance a general denial, with an averment that the fence was erected to prevent the rush of water and eave drip from her premises onto his. This she denied in her reply. The case went to the circuit court on appeal, and that court overruled the demurrer, and on the trial made a finding of facts containing in substance the allegations of the petition. The following is the finding of facts and the judgment:

[16] Compare: Tarleton v. McGawley (1793) 1 Peake, 270, 3 R. R. 689: (D., the master of a vessel trading on the coast of Africa, purposely fired a cannon from his vessel at a canoe in which natives were going to a rival ship, the "Tarleton," and killed one of them, "whereby the natives of the said coast were deterred and hindered from trading with" the "Tarleton.")

"This cause came on to be heard upon the petition of the plaintiff, the answer of defendant, the reply of the plaintiff thereto, and the testimony, and the court being requested by the defendant to make a finding of facts in the case, and to state conclusions of the facts, as follows: That the plaintiff owns and occupies premises situated on Lake street, in the city of Cleveland, known as 'The Osborn,' and said plaintiff owned and occupied said premises at the time of the erection of the structure hereinafter described. Said premises were used by plaintiff as a boarding house. Defendant owns and occupies premises adjoining plaintiff in the east. Between the two houses is a driveway and open space about 20 feet wide. Plaintiff and defendant had litigation in May, 1891, on account of defendant having attached a shed roof to her building without consent of said plaintiff. About two weeks after the trial of said lawsuit, the defendant took down said shed or roof, and built up against the house of said plaintiff a tight-board fence. The said fence was 86 feet long. The scantlings were placed against the wall of said plaintiff's house, and reached up under the eaves of the same. Boards were nailed on to said scantlings, beginning about two feet from the ground, and extending to the sills of the second-story windows. Defendant nailed onto the rear portion of said fence, and extending about 40 feet towards the front, a shed or roof. Under this shed or roof defendant had lumber piled. Said board fence completely covered up the bathroom, kitchen, bedroom, and library windows, rendering said portion of house dark, damp, and uninhabitable, and causing a substantial damage to the same. Said structure was erected upon the land of the defendant, and belonged to him. The structure was erected by said defendant from motives of unmixed malice towards said plaintiff, and for no useful or ornamental purposes of the property of said defendant, except said shed or roof, and its back wall below the shed roof, which may subserve some useful purpose of defendant in the use of his property by protecting his lumber piled thereunder. The court, upon the foregoing facts, finds and decrees that said defendant be, and is hereby, enjoined from proceeding further with the erection of said fence. Adjudged and decreed that said defendant, within 20 days from the entering of this decree, take down all of said fence and scantling projecting above the roof of said shed, and all the remainder of said fence outside of and beyond said shed; and it is considered that the plaintiff recover his costs expended in the case, taxed at $———, and that the defendant pay his own costs, for which it is ordered that execution issue,—to all of which the defendant excepts."

A motion for a new trial was overruled, with exceptions taken. Thereupon a petition in error was filed to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

BURKET, J. (after stating the facts). The only question in this case arises upon the following findings of fact by the circuit court: "Said structure was erected upon the land of the defendant, and belonged to him. The structure was erected by said defendant from motives of unmixed malice towards said plaintiff, and for no useful or ornamental purposes of the property of said defendant." It is not claimed that the person of the plaintiff was interfered with in this case, so that we have for consideration only the rights of property. The fence complained of is upon the land of the defendant, and belongs to him. Plaintiff fails to aver, and the court fails to find, that she has any right to or upon the lot of defendant below by contract, statute, or any other way known to the law for acquiring a right to, in, or upon lands, unless such right may be acquired by, and transferred to her, by means of the aforesaid, "motives of unmixed malice." This is a manner of acquiring, on the one hand, and of transferring, on the other, a right to property unknown to the law.

But it is urged in her behalf that even if she had no right of property, and even if he was the owner of the lot, he could not use his own land for the purpose of erecting structures thereon which subserve no useful or ornamental purpose, and are erected through motives of unmixed malice towards his adjoining neighbor. It is and must be conceded that he might, by erecting a building on his lot, shut off her light and air to exactly the same extent as is done by this fence, and that in such case she would be without right and without remedy, even though done with the same feelings of malice as induced him to erect the fence; thus making his acts lawful when the malice is seasoned with profit, or some show of profit, to himself, and unlawful when his malice is unmixed with profit, the injury or inconvenience to her meanwhile remaining the same in both cases. If, through feelings of malice, he desires to shut the light and air from her windows, it is nothing to her whether he makes a profit or loss thereby. Her injury is no greater and no less in the one case than in the other. As to her it is the effect of the act, and not the motive. In effect, he has the right to shut off the light and air from her windows by a building on his own premises; and she is not, in effect, concerned in the means by which such effect is produced, whether by a building or other structure; nor is she concerned as to the motive, nor as to whether he makes or loses by the operation. In the one case she might have a strong suspicion of his malice, while in the other such suspicion would be reduced to a certainty. But this is nothing to her as affecting a property right. As long as he keeps on his own property, and causes an effect on her property which he has a right to cause, she has no legal right to complain as to the manner in which the effect is produced; and to permit her to do so would not be enforcing a right of property, but a rule of morals. It would be controlling and directing his moral conduct by a suit in equity,—by an injunction.

To permit a man to cause a certain injurious effect upon the premises of his neighbor by the erection of a structure on his own premises if such structure is beneficial or ornamental, and to prohibit him from causing the same effect in case the structure is neither beneficial nor ornamental, but erected from motives of pure malice, is not protecting a legal right, but is controlling his moral conduct. In this state a man is free to direct his moral conduct as he pleases, in so far as he is not restrained by statute.

But it is said that such acts are offensive to the principles of equity. Not so. There is no conflict between law and equity in our practice, and what a man may lawfully do cannot be prohibited as inequitable. It may be immoral, and shock our notions of fairness, but what the law permits equity tolerates. It would be much more inequitable and intolerable to allow a man's neighbors to question his motives every time that he should undertake to erect a structure upon his own premises, and drag him before a court of equity to ascertain whether he is about to erect the structure for ornament or profit, or through motives of unmixed malice.

The case is not like annoying a neighbor by means of causing smoke, gas, noisome smells, or noises to enter his premises, thereby causing injury. In such cases something is produced on one's own premises, and conveyed to the premises of another; but in this case nothing is sent, but the air and light are withheld. A man may be compelled to keep his gas, smoke, odors, and noise at home, but he cannot be compelled to send his light and air abroad. Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 135, 2 Am. Rep. 379. If smoke, gas, offensive odors, or noise pass from one's own premises to or upon the premises of another, to his injury, an action will lie therefor, even though the smoke, gas, odor, or noise should be caused by the lawful business operations of defendant, and with the best of motives. Broom, Leg. Max. 372. In such cases it is the effect or injury, and not the motive, that is regarded. The true test is whether anything recognized by law as injurious passes from the premises of one neighbor to that of another. Anything so passing invades the legal rights of him whose premises it reaches, and such rights will be protected. But courts cannot regulate or control the moral conduct of a man, unless authorized so to do by statute.[17]

[17] Judge Burket here referred to a number of cases, with comments, as follows: The following cases, cited by plaintiff in error, bear more or less upon the question involved in this case, and seem to produce a decided weight of authority in his favor: Frazier v. Brown (1861) 12 Ohio St. 294; Falloon v. Schilling (1883) 29 Kan. 292, 44 Am. Rep. 642; Mahan v. Brown (1835) 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 261, 28 Am. Dec. 461; Greenleaf v. Francis (1836) 18 Pick. The defendant in error cites the cases reviewed in Frazier v. Brown

But it is strongly urged by counsel for defendant in error that the maxim, "Enjoy your own property in such a manner as not to injure that of another person," applies in such cases as this, and that, as it must be conceded that the fence in question is an injury to the property of defendant in error, his acts are in conflict with the above maxim. At first blush, this would seem to be so, but a careful consideration shows the contrary. The maxim is a very old one, and states the law too broadly. In this case, for instance, it is conceded that the plaintiff in error had the right to enjoy his property by erecting a house so as to do the same injury which was done by the fence, and that, while that would be an injury to the property of defendant in error, she would be without remedy, and his act in erecting such house would not be regarded as violating the maxim.

In Jeffries v. Williams, 5 Exch. 797, it was claimed, and in Railroad Co. v Bingham, 29 Ohio St. 369, it was held, that the true and legal meaning of the maxim is: "So use your own property as not to injure the rights of another." Boynton, J., in that case says: "Where no right has been invaded, although one may have injured another, no liability has been incurred. Any other rule would be manifestly wrong." The maxim should be limited to causing injury to the rights of another, rather than to the property of another, because for an injury to the rights of another there is always a remedy; but there may be injuries to the property of another for which there is no remedy, as in draining a spring or well, or cutting off light and air or a pleasant view by the erection of buildings, and many other cases which might be cited.

Thus limiting the maxim to the rights of the defendant in error, it is plain that the acts of plaintiff in error in the use which he made of his property did not injure any legal right of hers, and that, therefore, what he did was not in violation of such maxim.*

(1861) 12 Ohio St. 294, and also the case of Burke v. Smith (1888) 69 Mich. 395, 37 N. W. 838. Most of the cases cited are cases arising out of interference with wells, springs, and percolating waters. Such cases bear but slightly upon the question. The Michigan case is substantially like the case under consideration. In that case the lower court enjoined the defendant, and that judgment was affirmed by an equally divided court. The syllabus says that, the court being equally divided, nothing is decided. As nothing was decided, the case is not an authority on either side of the question.

*Compare the remark of Professor Ames, Law & Morals (1908) 22 Harv. Law Review, 111: "Suppose, again, that the owner of land sinks a well, not in order to get water for himself, but solely for the purpose of draining his neighbor's spring, or that he erects an abnormally high fence on his own land, but near the boundary, not for any advantage of his own, but merely to darken his neighbor's windows or to obstruct his view. Is the landowner responsible to his neighbor for the damage arising from such malevolent conduct? In thirteen of our states he must make compensation for malevolently draining the neighbor's spring. In two other states the opposite has been decided. In four states one who erects a spite fence must pay for the damage to the neighbor. In six others he incurs no liability. Six states have passed special statutes giving an action for building such a fence."

For statutes changing the rule followed in the principal case, see the Massa-

The circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition, and in rendering judgment in favor of defendant in error upon the facts as found by the court. The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, and, proceeding to render such judgment as the circuit court should have rendered upon the facts found, the petition of plaintiff below is dismissed, at her cost. Judgment reversed.

HUGHES v. McDONOUGH.

(Supreme Court of Judicature of New Jersey, 1881. 43 N. J. Law, 459, 39 Am. Rep. 603.)

The substance of the declaration was, that the plaintiff was a blacksmith and horseshoer by trade, of good character, &c.; that he had obtained the patronage of one Peter Van Riper, and that on a certain occasion he shod a certain mare of the said Van Riper in a good and workmanlike manner; that the defendant, maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in his said trade, &c., "did willfully and maliciously mutilate, impair and destroy the work done and performed by the said plaintiff upon the mare of the said Van Riper, without the knowledge of the said Van Riper, by loosing a shoe which was recently put on by the said plaintiff, so that if the mare was driven, the shoe would come off easily, and thus make it appear that the said plaintiff was a careless and unskillful horseshoer and blacksmith, and that the said mare was not shod in a good and workmanlike manner, and thus deprive the plaintiff of the patronage and custom of the said Van Riper."

The second count charges the defendant with driving a nail in the foot of the horse of Van Riper, after it had been shod by the plaintiff, with the same design as specified in the first count.

The special damage was the loss of Van Riper as a customer.

BEASLEY, C. J. The single exception taken to this record is, that the wrongful act alleged to have been done by the defendant does not appear to have been so closely connected with the damages resulting to the plaintiff as to constitute an actionable tort. The contention was that the wrong was done to Van Riper; that it was his horse whose shoe was loosened, and whose foot was pricked, and that the immediate injury and damage were to him, and that, consequently, the damages to the plaintiff were too remote to be made the basis of a legal claim.

But this contention involves a misapplication of the legal principle, and cannot be sustained. The illegal act of the defendant had a close chusetts act of June 2, 1887 (St. 1887, c. 348) discussed in Rideout v. Knox (1889) 148 Mass. 368, 19 N. E. 390, 2 L. R. A. 81, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560, and the Indiana statute of February 27, 1909 (Laws 1909, p. 70, c. 26).

Compare, also, The German Civil Code (1896) § 826 (Wang's trans.): "A person who willfully causes damage to another in a manner contra bonos mores is bound to compensate the other for the damage."

causal connection with the hurt done to the plaintiff, and such hurt was the natural, and almost the direct product of such cause. Such harmful result was sure to follow, in the usual course of things, from the specified malfeasance. The defendant is conclusively chargeable with the knowledge of this injurious effect of his conduct, for such effect was almost certain to follow from such conduct, without the occurrence of any extraordinary event, or the help of any extraneous cause. The act had a twofold injurious aspect; it was calculated to injure both Van Riper and the plaintiff; and as each was directly damnified, I can perceive no reason why each cannot repair his loses by an action.

The facts here involved do not, with respect to their legal significance, resemble the juncture that gave rise to the doctrine established in the case of Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East, 1. In that instance the action was for a slander that required the existence of special damage as one of its necessary constituents, and it was decided that such constituent was not shown by proof of the fact that as a result of the defamation the plaintiff had been discharged from his service by his employer before the end of the term for which he had contracted. The ground of this decision was that this discharge of the plaintiff from his employment was illegal, and was the act of a third party, for which the defendant was not responsible, and that, as the wrong of the slander had been detrimental only by reason of an independent wrongful act of another, the injury was to be imputed to the last wrong, and not to that which was farther distant one remove. In his elucidation of the law in this case, Lord Ellenborough says, alluding to the discharge of the plaintiff from his employment, that it "was a mere wrongful act of the master, for which the defendant was no more answerable, than if, in consequence of the words, other persons had afterwards assembled and seized the plaintiff and thrown him into a horse-pond by way of punishment for his supposed transgression." The class of cases to which this authority belongs, rests upon the principle that a man is responsible only for the natural consequences of his own misdeeds, and that he is not answerable for detriments that ensue from the misdeeds of others. But this doctrine, it is to be remembered, does not exclude responsibility when the damage results to the party injured through the intervention of the legal and innocent acts of third parties, for, in such instances, damage is regarded as occasioned by the wrongful cause, and not at all by those which are not wrongful. Where the effect was reasonably to have been foreseen, and where, in the usual course of events, it was likely to follow from the cause, the person putting such cause in motion will be responsible, even though there may have been many concurring events or agencies between such cause and its consequences. * * *

The principles thus propounded must have a controlling effect in the decision of the question now before this court, as they decisively show that the damage of which the plaintiff complained was not, in a legal sense, remote from the wrongful act. What, in point of substance, was done by the defendant, was this: he defamed, by the medium of a fraudulent device, the plaintiff in his trade, and by means of which defamation, the latter sustained special detriment. If this defamation had been accomplished by words spoken or written, or by signs or pictures, it is plain the wrong could have been remedied, in the usual form, by an action on the case for slander; and, plainly, no reason exists why the law should not afford a similar redress when the same injury has been inflicted by disreputable craft. It is admitted upon the record that the plaintiff has sustained a loss by the fraudulent misconduct of the defendant; that such loss was not only likely in the natural order of events, to proceed from such misconduct, but that it was the design of the defendant to produce such result by his act. Under such circumstances it would be strange indeed if the party thus wronged could not obtain indemnification by appeal to the judicial tribunals.

ASHLEY v. HARRISON.

(At Nisi Prius, Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1793. 1 Peake, 256, 3 R. R. 686.)

This declaration stated that the plaintiff during the time of Lent, 1793, caused to be performed every Wednesday and Friday night, by divers singers and musicians at a certain place of public amusement called the Covent Garden Theatre, certain musical performances for the entertainment of the public for certain rewards paid to him for admission into the said place of public amusement by those persons who were desirous of hearing the said musical performances; by means whereof he derived great gains, &c., yet the defendant knowing the premises, but contriving to lessen the profits, &c. and to terrify, deter, &c. a certain public singer called Gertrude Elizabeth Mara; who had been before that time retained by the plaintiff to sing publicly for him at the said place, &c. from singing; wrote and published a certain false and malicious paper writing of and concerning the said G. E. Mara, and of and concerning her conduct, as such public singer as aforesaid, containing therein, &c. The libel was then set out, and the declaration concluded that by reason thereof the said G. E. M. could not sing without great danger of being assaulted, ill-treated, and abused, and was terrified, deterred, prevented, and hindered from so singing; and that the profits of the amusement were thereby rendered much less than they otherwise would have been.

On the opening of the cause, Lord Kenyon expressed his disapprobation of the action, but on Erskine, for the plaintiff, suggesting that the objection was on the record, his Lordship permitted the case to proceed.

The declaration was proved, and Madame Mara said, that "she did not choose to expose herself to contempt again, and therefore refused to sing."

When the defendant's counsel were proceeding to their defence, they were stopped by LORD KENYON, who said: This action is unprecedented, and I think cannot be supported on principle. The injury is much too remote to be the foundation of an action. If this action is to be maintained, I know not to what extent the rule may be carried. For aught I can see to the contrary, it might equally be supported against every man who circulates the glass too freely, and intoxicates an actor, by which he is rendered incapable of performing his part on the stage. If any injury has happened, it was occasioned entirely by the vain fears or caprice of the actress. Madame Mara says, she did not choose to expose herself to contempt again. The action then is to depend entirely upon the nerves of the actress; if she chooses to appear on the stage again, no action can be maintained, if she does not, her refusal is to be followed with an action. In actions for defamations whereby a woman loses her marriage, it is not sufficient to prove that she was a virtuous woman, and one who might reasonably hope to have settled well in life; but a marriage already agreed upon must be shown to have been lost.

The plaintiff was nonsuited.

LUMLEY v. GYE.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1853. 2 El. & Bl. 216, 95 R. R. 501.)

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff was lessee and manager of the Queen's Theatre, for performing operas for gain to him; and that he had contracted and agreed with Johanna Wagner to perform in the theatre for a certain time, with a condition, amongst others, that she should not sing or use her talents elsewhere during the term without the plaintiff's consent in writing: yet defendant, knowing the premises, and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff as lessee and manager of the theatre, whilst the agreement with Wagner was in force, and before the expiration of the term, enticed and procured Wagner to refuse to perform: by means of which enticement and procurement of defendant, Wagner wrongfully refused to perform, and did not perform during the term.

Count 2, for enticing and procuring Johanna Wagner to continue to refuse to perform during the term, after the order of Vice-Chancellor Parker—affirmed by Lord St. Leonards (see Lumley and Wagner, 1 D., M. & G. 604, 91 R. R. 193)—restraining her from performing at a theatre of the defendants.

Count 3, that Johanna Wagner had been and was hired by the plaintiff to sing and perform at his theatre for a certain time, as the dramatic artiste of plaintiff, for reward to her, and had become and was such dramatic artiste of plaintiff at his theatre: yet defendant, well knowing &c., maliciously enticed and procured her, then being such dramatic artiste, to depart from the said employment.

In each count special damage was alleged.

Demurrer. Joinder.

The demurrer was argued in the sittings after Hilary Term last before COLERIDGE, WIGHTMAN, ERLE and CROMPTON, JJ.

Willes, for the defendant:

The counts disclose a breach of contract on the part of Wagner, for which the plaintiff's remedy is by an action on the contract against her. The relation of master and servant is peculiar; and, though it originates in a contract between the employer and the employed, it gives rise to rights and liabilities, on the part of the master, different from those which would result from any other contract. Thus the master is liable for the negligence of his servant, whilst an ordinary contractor is not liable for that of the person with whom he contracts. And a master may lawfully defend his servant when a contractor may not defend his contractee. And so a master may bring an action for enticing away his servant. But these are anomalies, having their origin in times when slavery existed: they are intelligible on the supposition that the servant is the property of his master: and, though they have continued long after all but free service has ceased, they are still confined to cases where the relation of master and servant, in the strict sense, exists. In the present case Wagner is a dramatic artiste, not a servant in any sense.

Cowling, contra:

The general principle is laid down in Comyns's Digest, Action upon the Case (A). "In all cases, where a man has a temporal loss, or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action upon the case, to be repaired in damages." In Comyns's Digest, Action upon the Case for Misfeasance (A, 6), an instance is given: "If he threatens the tenants of another, whereby they depart from their tenures," citing 1 Rol. Abr. 108, Action sur Case (N) pl. 21. An action lies for procuring plaintiff's wife to remain absent: Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes, 577. An action for ravishment of ward: and, if "a man procureth a ward to go from his guardian, this is a ravishment in law:" 2 Inst. 440. Now, as neither the tenants, the wife nor the ward are servants, it cannot be said that the action for procurement is an anomaly confined to the case of master and servant. * * *

CROMPTON, J. The declaration in this case consists of three counts. * * * To this declaration the defendant demurred: and the question for our decision is, whether all or any of the counts are good in substance?

The effect of the first two counts is, that a person, under a binding contract to perform at a theatre, is induced by the malicious act of the defendant to refuse to perform and entirely to abandon her contract; whereby damage arises to the plaintiff, the proprietor of the theatre. The third count differs, in stating expressly that the performer had agreed to perform as the dramatic artiste of the plaintiff, and had become and was the dramatic artiste of the plaintiff for reward to her; and that the defendant maliciously procured her to depart out of the employment of the plaintiff as such dramatic artiste; whereby she did depart out of the employment and service of the plaintiff; whereby damage was suffered by the plaintiff. It was said, in support of the demurrer, that it did not appear in the declaration that the relation of master and servant ever subsisted between the plaintiff and Miss Wagner; that Miss Wagner was not averred, especially in the first two counts, to have entered upon the service of the plaintiff; and that the engagement of a theatrical performer, even if the performer has entered upon the duties, is not of such a nature as to make the performer a servant, within the rule of law which gives an action to the master for the wrongful enticing away of his servant. And it was laid down broadly, as a general proposition of law, that no action will lie for procuring a person to break a contract, although such procuring is with a malicious intention and causes great and immediate injury. And the law as to enticing servants was said to be contrary to the general rule and principle of law, and to be anomalous, and probably to have had its origin from the state of society when serfdom existed, and to be founded upon, or upon the equity of, the Statute of Labourers. * * *

The proposition of the defendant, that there must be a service actually subsisting, seems to be inconsistent with the authorities that show these actions to be maintainable for receiving or harbouring servants after they have left the actual service of the master. * * *

In Blake v. Lanyon, 6 T. R. 221, 3 R. R. 162, a journeyman who was to work by the piece, and who had left his work unfinished, was held to be a servant for the purposes of such an action; and I think that it was most properly laid down by the court in that case, that a person who contracts to do certain work for another is the servant of that other (of course with reference to such an action) until the work is finished. It appears to me that Miss Wagner had contracted to do work for the plaintiff within the meaning of this rule; and I think that, where a party has contracted to give his personal services for a certain time to another, the parties are in the relation of employer and employed, or master and servant, within the meaning of this rule. And I see no reason for narrowing such a rule; but I should rather, if necessary, apply such a remedy to a case "new in its instance," but "not new in the reason and principle of it" (11 East, 573), that is, to a case where the wrong and damage are strictly analogous to the wrong and damage in a well recognised class of cases. In deciding this case on the narrower ground, I wish by no means to be considered as deciding that the larger ground taken by Mr. Cowling is not tenable, or of saying that in no case except that of master and servant is an action maintainable for maliciously inducing another to break a contract to the injury of the person with whom such contract has been made. It does not appear to me to be a sound answer, to say that the act in such cases is the act of the party who breaks the contract; for that reason would apply in the acknowledged case of master and servant. Nor is it an answer, to say that there is a remedy against the contractor, and the party relies on the contract; for, besides that reason also applying to the case of master and servant, the action on the contract and the action against the malicious wrong-doer may be for a different matter; and the damages occasioned by such malicious injury might be calculated on a very different principle from the amount of the debt which might be the only sum recoverable on the contract. Suppose a trader, with a malicious intent to ruin a rival trader, goes to a banker or other party who owes money to his rival, and begs him not to pay the money which he owes him, and by that means ruins or greatly prejudices the party: I am by no means prepared to say that an action could not be maintained, and that damages beyond the amount of the debt, if the injury were great, or much less than such amount if the injury were less serious, might not be recovered. Where two or more parties were concerned in inflicting such injury, an indictment or a writ of conspiracy at common law, might perhaps have been maintainable; and, where a writ of conspiracy would lie for an injury inflicted by two, an action on the case in the nature of conspiracy will generally lie; and in such action on the case the plaintiff is entitled to recover against one defendant without proof of any conspiracy, the malicious injury and not the conspiracy being the gist of the action. 1 Wms. Saund. 230. In this class of cases it must be assumed that it is the malicious act of the defendant, and that malicious act only, which causes the servant or contractor not to perform the work or contract which he would otherwise have done. The servant or contractor may be utterly unable to pay anything like the amount of the damage sustained entirely from the wrongful act of the defendant: and it would seem unjust, and contrary to the general principles of law, if such wrong-doer were not responsible for the damage caused by his wrongful and malicious act. Several of the cases cited by Mr. Cowling on this part of the case seem worthy of attention.

Without however deciding any such more general question, I think that we are justified in applying the principle of the action for enticing away servants to a case where the defendant maliciously procures a party, who is under a valid contract to give her exclusive personal services to the plaintiff for a specified period, to refuse to give such services during the period for which she had so contracted, whereby the plaintiff was injured.

I think, therefore, that our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

COLERIDGE, J. * * * In order to maintain this action, one of two propositions must be maintained; either that an action will lie against anyone by whose persuasions one party to a contract is induced to break it to the damage of the other party, or that the action, for seducing a servant from the master or persuading one who has contracted for service from entering into the employ, is of so wide an application as to embrace the case of one in the position and profession of Johanna Wagner. After much consideration and enquiry I am of opinion that neither of these propositions is true; and they are both of them so important, and, if established by judicial decision, will lead to consequences so general, that, though I regret the necessity, I must not abstain from entering into remarks of some length in support of my view of the law. * * *

Persuading with effect, or effectually or successfully persuading, may no doubt sometimes be actionable—as in trespass—even where it is used towards a free agent: the maxims qui facit per alium facit per se, and respondeat superior, are questionable; but, where they apply, the wrongful act done is properly charged to be the act of him who has procured it to be done. He is sued as a principal trespasser, and the damage, if proved, flows directly and immediately from his act, though it was the hand of another, and he a free agent, that was employed. But when you apply the term of effectual persuasion to the breach of a contract it has obviously a different meaning; the persuader has not broken and could not break the contract, for he had never entered into any; he cannot be sued upon the contract; and yet it is the breach of the contract only that is the cause of the damage. Neither can it be said that in breaking the contract the contractor is the agent of him who procures him to do so; it is still his own act; he is principal in so doing, and is the only principal. This answer may seem technical: but it really goes to the root of the matter. It shows that the procurer has not done the hurtful act; what he has done is too remote for the damage to make him answerable for it. The case itself of Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes, 577, seems to me to have little or no bearing on the present: a wife is not, as regards her husband, a free agent or separate person; if to be considered so for the present purpose, she is rather in the character of a servant, with this important peculiarity, that, if she be induced to withdraw from his society and cohabit with another or do him any wrong, no action is maintainable by him against her. In the case of criminal conversation, trespass lies against the adulterer as for an assault on her, however she may in fact have been a willing party to all that the defendant had done. No doubt, therefore, effectual persuasion to the wife to withdraw and conceal herself from her husband is in the eye of the law an actual withdrawing and concealing her; and so, in other counts of the declaration, was it charged in this very case of Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes, 577. A case explainable and explained on the same principle is that of ravishment of ward. The writ of this lay against one who procured a man's ward to depart from him; and, where this was urged in a case hereafter to be cited, Mich. 11 Hen. IV, fol. 23 A, pl. 46, post, p. 527 seq., Judge Hankford gives the answer: the reason is, he says, because the ward is a chattel, and vests in him who has the right. None of this reasoning applies to the case of a breach of contract: if it does, I should be glad to known how any treatise on the law of contract could be complete without a chapter on this head, or how it happens that we have no decisions upon it. Certainly no subject could be more fruitful or important; important contracts are more commonly broken with than without persuaders or procurers, and these often responsible persons when the principals may not be so. I am aware that with respect to an action on the case the argument primæ impressionis is sometimes of no weight. If the circumstances under which the action would be brought have not arisen, or are of rare occurrence, it will be of none or only of inconsiderable weight; but, if the circumstances have been common, if there has been frequent occasion for the action, I apprehend that it is important to find that the action has yet never been tried. * * *

Again, where several persons happen to persuade to the same effect, and in the result the party persuaded acts upon the advice, how is it to be determined against whom the action may be brought, whether they are to be sued jointly or severally, in what proportions damages are to be recovered? Again, if, instead of limiting our recourse to the agent, actual or constructive, we will go back to the person who immediately persuades or procures him one step, why are we [to] stop there? The first mover, and the malicious mover too, may be removed several steps backward from the party actually induced to break the contract: why are we not to trace him out? Morally he may be the most guilty. I adopt the arguments of Lord Abinger and my Brother Alderson in the case of Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109, 62 R. R. 534; if we go the first step, we can show no good reason for not going fifty. And, again, I ask how is it that, if the law really be as the plaintiff contends, we have no discussions upon such questions as these in our books, no decisions in our reports? Surely such cases would not have been of rare occurrence: they are not of slight importance, and could hardly have been decided without reference to the Courts in Banc. Not one was cited in the argument bearing closely enough upon this point to warrant me in any further detailed examination of them. I conclude therefore what occurs to me on the first proposition on which the plaintiff's case rests.

I come now to the second proposition, that the decisions in respect of master and servant, and the seducing of the latter from the employ of the former, are exceptions grafted on the general law traceable up to the Statute of Labourers. This is of course distinct from the question of the extent of the exception, that is, to what classes of servants it applies: but the enquiries are so connected together in fact, and the latter has so obvious a bearing in support of the former, that it will be better to take them both together.

Now, in the first place, I cannot find any instance of this action having been brought before the statute passed; the weight of which fact is much increased by finding that it was of common occurrence very soon after. The evidence for it is not merely negative, for the mischief and the cause of action appear to have been well known before, and the want of the remedy felt. The common law did give a remedy in certain cases; and Judges are found pointing out what that remedy was, and to what cases it applied. From the cases collected in Fitzherbert's Abridgment, tit. Laborers, it appears that the distinction between the action at common law and the action upon the statute was well known: wherever the former action lay it was in trespass, and not on the case: in saying which I do not rely merely on the words,—writ of trespass,—which might be applicable to trespass on the case; but I rely on the operative words of the writ, which stated a taking vi et armis: it might be joined with trespass quare clausum fregit or trespass for the asportation of chattels or false imprisonment. The count necessarily charged the taking of the servant out of the service of the plaintiff; whereas the writ upon the statute, as appears from Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, 167 B, charges the retainer and admission of the servant into the defendant's service after he has been induced to withdraw, or has withdrawn without reasonable cause, from that of the plaintiff. I do not wish unnecessarily to multiply citations from the Year Books; but it will be necessary to refer to some, and at a greater length than they are found in the abridgments. * * *

Any one, I am certain, who will go through the cases abstracted by Fitzherbert under the title Laborers, will be satisfied that at common law, before the statute, such an action as the present could not be maintained. Under that title 61 cases are abridged: many of them are for the seduction of servants; but there is no instance of any one in which the action at common law was sustained, unless an actual trespass was charged: and it is clear from the case which I have cited at so much length, that the distinction between taking and procuring to go was familiar to the lawyers of that day. I can hardly imagine that this could have been said, if the common law would have given relief in such a case: and, if it could, the rapid growth of the action after the Statute of Labourers had passed would be difficult to account for.

I come then to the Statute of Labourers (23 Edw. III); and my object now is to show that nothing in the provisions or policy of that statute will warrant the action under the circumstances of this case; and that the older authorities are decidedly against it. * * *

I conclude then that this action cannot be maintained, because: 1st. Merely to induce or procure a free contracting party to break his covenant, whether done maliciously or not, to the damage of another, for the reasons I have stated, is not actionable. 2nd. That the law with regard to the seduction of servants from their master's employ, in breach of their contract, is an exception, the origin of which is known, and that that exception does not reach the case of a theatrical performer.

I know not whether it may be objected that this judgment is conceived in a narrow spirit, and tends unnecessarily to restrain the remedial powers of the law. In my opinion it is not open to this objection. It seems to me wiser to ascertain the powers of the instrument with which you work, and employ it only on subjects to which they are equal and suited; and that, if you go beyond this, you strain and weaken it, and attain but imperfect and unsatisfactory and often unjust, results. But, whether this be so or not, we are limited by only the principles and analogies which we find laid down for us, and are to declare, not to make, the rule of law.

I think, therefore, with the greatest and most real deference for the opinions of my Brethren, and with all the doubt as to the correctness of my own which these opinions, added to the novelty and difficulty of the case itself, cannot but occasion, that our judgment ought to be for the defendant: though it must be pronounced for the plaintiff.

LA SOCIÉTÉ ANONYME DE REMORQUAGE À HELICE v. BENNETTS.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division, 1910. [1911] 1 K. B. 243.)

Action tried in the Commercial Court before Hamilton, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover damages suffered by them by reason of the negligence of the defendant's servants. The facts, so far as material, were as follows.

On April 4, 1910, the steam tug John Bull, belonging to the plaintiffs, was engaged in towing the ship Kate Thomas from Antwerp to Port Talbot, South Wales, when the steamship India, belonging to the defendant, by the negligence of defendant's servants, came into collision with and sank the Kate Thomas. The tug received no damage either to herself or to her equipment. The plaintiffs alleged that by reason of the negligence of the defendant's servants they were deprived of their tow and lost the towage remuneration they would otherwise have received, and claimed £80, as the amount of the towage remuneration so lost, that being the remuneration fixed by the contract for the towage of the Kate Thomas from Antwerp to Port Talbot. At the time of the accident about four-fifths of the voyage from Antwerp to Port Talbot had been completed. The defendant contended that the plaintiff had no cause of action in respect of the loss of the towage remuneration upon the ground that, although there was negligence on the part of the defendant's servants, the loss of towage remuneration was not damage to the plaintiffs which was the direct consequence of the negligence so as to be recoverable in law.

It appeared from the report of the master of the John Bull that, seeing that the Kate Thomas was in the most alarming sinking condition after the collision, he immediately cast off the hawser in order to be able to render assistance to the ship, but that before reaching the place of the disaster she had sunk. The defendant paid the plaintiffs for the loss of the hawser. Clause 9 of the towage contract provided as follows: "Sea towage interrupted by accident to be paid pro ratio of distance towed."

HAMILTON, J. * * * In my opinon the plaintiffs have no cause of action. The obligation upon the defendant which was broken by his servants was the general one of navigating the seas with reasonable care. In order to give the plaintiffs a cause of action arising out of that breach, they must show not only injuria, namely, the breach of the defendant's obligation, but also damnum to themselves in the sense of damage recognized by law. This they have failed to do. No doubt, as a direct consequence of the collision, in one sense, the plaintiffs lost the chance of completing their towage contract, because the Kate Thomas went to the bottom. If the plaintiffs' cause of action had been completed by damage to the tow inflicted by the defendant's servants whereby the tug was no longer able to tow, then the case would come within Lord Stowell's decision in The Betsey Caines, 2 Hagg. Adm. 28, and the decision of the House of Lords in The Argentino, 14 App. Cas. 519, would apply. But all that has occurred is that in the course of performing a profitable contract an event happened which rendered the contract no further performable and therefore less profitable to the plaintiffs. That appears to me to bring the case within the authority of Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Co., L. R. 10 Q. B. 453, and within the general statement of the law by Lord Penzance in his judgment in Simpson v. Thomson, 3 App. Cas. 279. It has been suggested that a distinction can be drawn between a case where the contract has been entered into but performance of it has not been entered upon, in which case it is admitted on the plaintiffs' behalf that the loss does not give a cause of action, and a case where the contract has not only been entered into, but performance of it has commenced. No authority has been cited for making such a distinction and I can see none in principle. I think this case involves the very point anticipated by Blackburn, J., in Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Co., L. R. 10 Q. B. 453, where in giving judgment he said: "In the present case the objection is technical and against the merits, and we should be glad to avoid giving it effect. But if we did so we should establish an authority for saying that in such a case as that of Rylands v. Fletcher (1868) L. R. 3 H. L. 330, the defendant would be liable, not only to an action by the owner of the drowned mine, and by such of his workmen as had their tools or clothes destroyed, but also to an action by every workman and person employed in the mine, who in consequence of its stoppage made less wages than he otherwise would have done." It can make no substantial difference whether a contract which has been entered into is already in the course of performance or is only about to be performed. In either case all that has happened is that the conditions under which the contract was performable have been altered by the act of the defendant so as to make them less favorable to one of the contracting parties, namely, to the plaintiffs. I can understand that the law might regard any interference by the defendant with the plaintiffs' contractual chances with a third party as a ground of action in their favor, but I cannot understand why, as the policy of the law excludes a right of action in the one case, where the contract has been made but not performed, it should give a cause of action in the other case, where part performance has taken place. There must therefore, be judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.[19]

TUTTLE v. BUCK.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1909. 107 Minn. 145, 119 N. W. 946, 22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 599, 131 Am. St. Rep. 446, 16 Ann. Cas. 807.)

ELLIOTT, J. This appeal was from an order overruling a general demurrer to a complaint in which the plaintiff alleged: That for more than 10 years last past he has been and still is a barber by trade, and engaged in business as such in the village of Howard Lake, Minn., in said county, where he resides, owning and operating a shop for the purpose of his said trade. That until the injury hereinafter complained of his said business was prosperous, and plaintiff was enabled thereby to comfortably maintain himself and family out of the income and profits thereof, and also to save a considerable sum per annum, to wit, about $800. That the defendant, during the period of about 12 months last past, has wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously endeavored to destroy plaintiff's said business and compel plaintiff to abandon the same. That to that end he has persistently and systematically sought, by false and malicious reports and accusations of and concerning the plaintiff, by personally soliciting and urging plaintiff's patrons no longer to employ plaintiff, by threats of his personal displeasure, and by various other unlawful means and devices, to induce, and has thereby induced, many of said patrons to withhold from plaintiff the employment by them formerly given. That defendant is possessed of large means, and is engaged in the business of a banker in said village of Howard Lake, at Dassel, Minn., and at divers other places, and is nowise interested in the occupation of a barber; yet in the pursuance of the wicked, malicious, and unlawful purpose aforesaid, and for the sole and only purpose of injuring the trade of the plaintiff, and of accomplishing his purpose and threats of ruining the plaintiff's said business and driving him out of said village, the defendant fitted up and furnished a barber shop in said village for conducting the trade of barbering. That failing to induce any barber to occupy said shop on his own account, though offered at nominal rental, said defendant, with the wrongful and malicious purpose aforesaid, and not otherwise, has during the time herein stated hired two barbers in succession for a stated salary, paid by him, to occupy said shop, and to serve so many of plaintiff's patrons as said defendant has been or may be able by the means aforesaid to direct from plaintiff's shop. That at the present time a barber so employed and paid by the defendant is occupying and nominally conducting the shop thus fitted and furnished by the defendant, without paying any rent therefor, and under an agreement with defendant whereby the income of said shop is required to be paid to defendant, and is so paid in partial return for his wages. That all of said things were and are done by defendant with the sole design of injuring the plaintiff, and of destroying his said business, and not for the purpose of serving any legitimate interest of his own. That by reason of the great wealth and prominence of the defendant, and the personal and financial influence consequent thereon, he has by the means aforesaid, and through other unlawful means and devices by him employed, materially injured the business of the plaintiff, has largely reduced the income and profits thereof, and intends and threatens to destroy the same altogether, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $10,000.

It has been said that the law deals only with externals, and that a lawful act cannot be made the foundation of an action because it was done with an evil motive. In Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 151, Lord Watson said that, except with regard to crimes, the law does not take into account motives as constituting an element of civil wrong. In Mayor v. Pickles, [1895] A. C. 587, Lord Halsbury stated that if the act was lawful, "however ill the motive might be, he had a right to do it." In Raycroft v. Tayntor, 68 Vt. 219, 35 Atl. 53, 33 L. R. A. 225, 54 Am. St. Rep. 882, the court said that, "where one exercises a legal right only, the motive which actuates him is immaterial." In Jenkens v. Fowler, 24 Pa. 318, Mr. Justice Black said that "mischievous motives make a bad case worse, but they cannot make that wrong which in its own essence is lawful." This language was quoted in Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 233, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, and in substance in Ertz v. Produce Exchange, 79 Minn. 143, 81 N. W. 737, 48 L. R. A. 90, 79 Am. St. Rep. 433. See, also, Cooley, Torts (3d Ed.) p. 1505; Auburn & Co. v. Douglass, 9 N. Y. 444. Such generalizations are of little value in determining concrete cases. They may state the truth, but not the whole truth. Each word and phrase used therein may require definition and limitation. Thus, before we can apply Judge Black's language to a particular case, we must determine what act is "in its own essence lawful." What did Lord Halsbury mean by the words "lawful act"? What is meant by "exercising a legal right"? It is not at all correct to say that the motive with which an act is done is always immaterial, providing the act itself is not unlawful. Numerous illustrations of the contrary will be found in the civil as well as the criminal law.

We do not intend to enter upon an elaborate discussion of the subject, or become entangled in the subtleties connected with the words "malice" and "malicious." We are not able to accept without limitations the doctrine above referred to, but at this time content ourselves with a brief reference to some general principles. It must be remembered that the common law is the result of growth, and that its development has been determined by the social needs of the community which it governs. It is the resultant of conflicting social forces, and those forces which are for the time dominant leave their impress upon the law. It is of judicial origin, and seeks to establish doctrines and rules for the determination, protection, and enforcement of legal rights. Manifestly it must change as society changes and new rights are recognized. To be an efficient instrument, and not a mere abstraction, it must gradually adapt itself to changed conditions. Necessarily its form and substance has been greatly affected by prevalent economic theories. For generations there has been a practical agreement upon the proposition that competition in trade and business is desirable, and this idea has found expression in the decisions of the courts as well as in statutes. But it has led to grievous and manifold wrongs to individuals, and many courts have manifested an earnest desire to protect the individuals from the evils which result from unrestrained business competition. The problem has been to so adjust matters as to preserve the principle of competition and yet guard against its abuse to the unnecessary injury to the individual. So the principle that a man may use his own property according to his own needs and desires, while true in the abstract, is subject to many limitations in the concrete. Men cannot always in civilized society, be allowed to use their own property as their interests or desires may dictate without reference to the fact that they have neighbors whose rights are as sacred as their own. The existence and well-being of society requires that each and every person shall conduct himself consistently with the fact that he is a social and reasonable person. The purpose for which a man is using his own property may thus sometimes determine his rights, and applications of this idea are found in Stillwater Water Co. v. Farmer, 89 Minn. 58, 93 N. W. 907, 60 L. R. A. 875, 99 Am. St. Rep. 541, Id., 92 Minn. 230, 99 N. W. 882, and Barclay v. Abraham, 121 Iowa, 619, 96 N. W. 1080, 64 L. R. A. 255, 100 Am. St. Rep. 365.

Many of the restrictions which should be recognized and enforced result from a tacit recognition of principles which are not often stated in the decisions in express terms. Sir Frederick Pollock notes that not many years ago it was difficult to find any definite authority for stating as a general proposition of English law that it is wrong to do a willful wrong to one's neighbor without lawful justification or excuse. But neither is there any express authority for the general proposition that men must perform their contracts. Both principles, in this generality of form and conception, are modern and there was a time when neither was true. After developing the idea that law begins, not with authentic general principles, but with the enumeration of particular remedies, the learned writer continues: "If there exists, then, a positive duty to avoid harm, much more, then, exists the negative duty of not doing willful harm, subject, as all general duties must be subject, to the necessary exceptions. The three main heads of duty with which the law of torts is concerned, namely, to abstain from willful injury, to respect the property of others, and to use due diligence to avoid causing harm to others, are all alike of a comprehensive nature." Pollock, Torts (8th Ed.) p. 21. He then quotes with approval the statement of Lord Bowen that "at common law there was a cause of action whenever one person did damage to another, willfully and intentionally, without just cause and excuse." In Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330, Mr. Justice Hammond said: "It is said, also, that, where one has the lawful right to do a thing, the motive by which he is actuated is immaterial. One form of this statement appears in the first headnote in Allen v. Flood, as reported in [1898] A. C. 1, as follows: 'An act lawful in itself is not converted by a malicious or bad motive into an unlawful act, so as to make the doer of the act liable to a civil action.' If the meaning of this and similar expressions is that, where a person has the lawful right to do a thing irrespective of his motive, his motive is immaterial, the proposition is a mere truism. If, however, the meaning is that where a person, if actuated by one kind of a motive, has a lawful right to do a thing, the act is lawful when done under any conceivable motive, or that an act lawful under one set of circumstances is therefore lawful under every conceivable set of circumstances, the proposition does not commend itself to us as either logically or legally accurate." Similar language was used by Mr. Justice Wells in Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; by Lord Coleridge in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 21 Q. B. D. 544–553; by Lord Justice Bowen in the same case, 23 Q. B. D. 593; by Mr. Justice Holmes in Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 204, 25 Sup. Ct. 3, 49 L. Ed. 154; by Chief Justice McSherry in Klingel's Pharmacy v. Sharp, 104 Md. 233, 64 Atl. 1029, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 976, 118 Am. St. Rep. 399, 9 Ann. Cas. 1184; and by Judge Sanborn in his dissenting opinion in Passaic Print Works v. Ely & Walker Dry Goods Co., 105 Fed. 163, 44 C. C. A. 426, 62 L. R. A. 673. Numerous cases will be found referred to in the note to this case in 62 L. R. A. 673, and in an article in 18 Harvard Law Review, 411.

It is freely conceded that there are many decisions contrary to this view; but, when carried to the extent contended for by the appellant, we think they are unsafe, unsound, and illy adapted to modern conditions. To divert to one's self the customers of a business rival by the offer of goods at lower prices is in general a legitimate mode of serving one's own interest, and justifiable as fair competition. But when a man starts an opposition place of business, not for the sake of profit to himself, but regardless of loss to himself, and for the sole purpose of driving his competitor out of business, and with the intention of himself retiring upon the accomplishment of his malevolent purpose, he is guilty of a wanton wrong and an actionable tort. In such a case he would not be exercising his legal right, or doing an act which can be judged separately from the motive which actuated him. To call such conduct competition is a perversion of terms. It is simply the application of force without legal justification, which in its moral quality may be no better than highway robbery.

Nevertheless, in the opinion of the writer this complaint is insufficient. It is not claimed that it states a cause of action for slander. No question of conspiracy or combination is involved. Stripped of the adjectives and the statement that what was done was for the sole purpose of injuring the plaintiff, and not for the purpose of serving a legitimate purpose of the defendant, the complaint states facts which in themselves amount only to an ordinary everyday business transaction. There is no allegation that the defendant was intentionally running the business at a financial loss to himself, or that after driving the plaintiff out of business the defendant closed up or intended to close up his shop. From all that appears from the complaint he may have opened the barber shop, energetically sought business from his acquaintances and the customers of the plaintiff, and as a result of his enterprise and command of capital obtained it, with the result that the plaintiff, from want of capital, acquaintance, or enterprise, was unable to stand the competition and was thus driven out of business. The facts thus alleged do not, in my opinion, in themselves, without reference to the way in which they are characterized by the pleader, tend to show a malicious and wanton wrong to the plaintiff.

A majority of the Justices, however, are of the opinion that, on the principle declared in the foregoing opinion, the complaint states a cause of action, and the order is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

JAGGARD, J., dissents.

HUSKIE v. GRIFFIN.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1909. 75 N. H. 345, 74 Atl. 595, 27 L. R. A. [N. S.] 966, 139 Am. St. Rep. 718.)

In this action, by Huskie against Griffin, there was a judgment of nonsuit in the superior court, and the case was transferred on the plaintiff's exception.

The plaintiff's evidence tended to prove that, while he was employed by the defendant, he applied for an increase of wages, and was told by the defendant's superintendent that he was at liberty to leave at any time if he could better himself. He sought employment elsewhere, and one day received a note stating that he could have work at the McElwain factory. He showed the note to Griffin's superintendent, who made no objection to the proposed action, but at once went to the office and drew the plaintiff's wages for him. As soon as the plaintiff had left, Griffin telephoned to Trull, superintendent of the McElwain shop. Trull's testimony as to the conversation was in part as follows: "He telephoned and said there was a man from my factory came up to his factory with a note and hired, or was about to hire, one of his men, right in the middle of the day, and wanted to know if I thought that was a nice thing to do. I said it was not, and that I would not hire the man; and when I found out about it I told our man not to hire him. Q. That is, you instructed your agent not to hire him? A. Yes, sir; but after that Griffin told me I could hire him, but I told him I didn't want him. Q. That was a little ironical, wasn't it, Mr. Trull? A. Well, during the same conversation, right afterward, he said, 'You can have him if you want him, you can hire him.' Q. And you understood that to be a little bit ironical, didn't you. A. I didn't understand anything about it. Q. Well, you didn't hire him, anyhow? A. No, sir; I didn't hire him." On cross-examination, the witness stated the conversation more favorable to the defendant. When the plaintiff reached the McElwain factory he was refused employment. He then returned to the defendant, who complained because the plaintiff received a note in the shop. The conversation became heated, and the defendant refused to comply with the plaintiff's request to telephone to Trull and adjust the matter.

PEASLEE, J. The parties to this action do not agree as to what facts the evidence tended to prove. The defendant argues that because he asked Trull to retain the plaintiff as an employé therefore it cannot be found that the defendant sought to cause the plaintiff's discharge by Trull. The plaintiff's claim is that the request to retain him might be found to be a mere cover, well understood by both parties to the conversation. His claim is well founded. A jury might believe that the complaint made by the defendant to Trull was false, and that the defendant, after he had encouraged the plaintiff to seek employment elsewhere, maliciously caused the plaintiff's discharge from such new employment. The plaintiff's engagement was not for any certain period. Trull might lawfully discharge him at any time. It therefore follows that cases involving recovery for procuring the breach of a binding executory contract (Bixby v. Dunlap, 56 N. H. 456, 22 Am. Rep. 475; South Wales Miners' Fed. v. Glamorgan Coal Co., [1905] A. C. 239) are not in point here. The issue presented is that of the existence and extent of what has come to be known as the right to an "open market." How far one may lawfully interfere to prevent the making of contracts between third parties is a problem which has been much discussed in other jurisdictions. It is new in this state. Three phases of it are presented by the case at bar: (1) When the interference is by fraud; (2) when it is without fraud or force (actually applied or reasonably apprehended), but prompted by a motive to injure the aggrieved party; (3) when it is unaccompanied by what are ordinarily considered illegal acts or motives, and is induced solely by a desire of the defendant to promote his own welfare.

1. It is well established that the inherent right of every man to freely deal, or refuse to deal, with his fellowmen is not to be destroyed or abridged by acts involving the elements of the common-law action for deceit. This is not denied. On this branch of the case the defendant relies upon the proposition that the facts are not made out. He concedes, as he plainly must concede, that the law is in favor of the plaintiff's position, provided only that there is evidence to support the several necessary findings. As before stated, there was evidence in this case which, if believed by the jury, would lead to the conclusion that the defendant was guilty of fraud. It could be found that the plaintiff quit the defendant's employ in an honorable manner; that the defendant, with knowledge of the facts, represented that the plaintiff's departure was dishonorable; that this was done with the intent to cause the new employer to act to the plaintiff's damage, and that such damaging action resulted from this cause. The plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury upon the issue of fraud.

2. Whether motive (when falsehood is absent) is a material element in these cases is a question upon which the authorities are not so fully agreed. That it is material, and that where malice, or a purpose to do the plaintiff injury, is the moving force to the commission of the act, a recovery may be had is the rule in many jurisdictions. Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330; Van Horn v. Van Horn, 56 N. J. Law, 318, 28 Atl. 669; Doremus v. Hennessy, 176 Ill. 608, 52 N. E. 924, 54 N. E. 524, 43 L. R. A. 797, 802, 68 Am. St. Rep. 203; Ertz v. Produce Exchange, 79 Minn. 140, 81 N. W. 737, 48 L. R. A. 90, 79 Am. St. Rep. 433; Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div. 333. The rule is well stated in a recent case in California: "Any injury to a lawful business, whether the result of a conspiracy or not, is prima facie actionable, but may be defended upon the ground that it was merely the result of a lawful effort of the defendants to promote their own welfare. To defeat this plea of justification, the plaintiff may offer evidence that the acts of the defendants were inspired by express malice, and were done for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff, and not to benefit themselves. The principle is the same which permits proof of express malice to defeat the plea of privilege in libel, or the defense of probable cause in actions for malicious prosecution or false imprisonment." J. F. Parkinson Co. v. Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. The opposite view is taken by high authority. Macauley v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 33 Atl. 1, 37 L. R. A. 455, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319; Judge Jeremiah Smith in 20 Harv. Law Rev. 451, et seq.

For the reason above indicated, and others which will be given in the discussion of the next issue in this case, it is held that a statement of the truth, made for the sole purpose of damaging the plaintiff by causing a third party to refuse to further deal with the plaintiff, is actionable if damage ensues. The state of mind of an offending person may be proved in various ways. It may appear that there was no good reason for doing the act. In that case, malice may be inferred from the proved absence of other motive for the act done. In case there be a sufficient justifiable motive, it may still be proved that in fact malice was the moving force. In either case the question is one of fact. There was in the case at bar sufficient evidence to support a finding that the defendant did what he did for the sole purpose of depriving the plaintiff of the benefit of a contract for employment. The question is not what the defendant now says his purpose was. It is not even what he said his purpose was at the time he made the complaint to Trull. Nor is his motive necessary to be found in a literal application of the words he used. The conversation as testified to was susceptible of more than one interpretation. It may have meant that the defendant intended to cause the plaintiff to be discharged as a matter of small revenge, and while the defendant was formally protesting against the act he had intentionally and maliciously caused. It is not, as the defendant claims, a case of guessing. It is one of interpreting the acts and words disclosed by the evidence in the case. Upon this issue the case should have been submitted to the jury, under instructions that if they found the act was done solely for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff he was entitled to recover. If the damage was done "for its own sake," liability would be made out. Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443, dissenting opinion of Holmes, J.

3. Beyond the issues of fraud and malicious injury lies one which has caused much of perplexity and conflicting adjudication. How far advantage may or may not lawfully be gained by appeal, persuasion, or threat of loss of future favor—whether those not involved in the initial contest may be dragged into it by these and kindred means—are questions which courts, jurists, and publicists have not found it easy to answer. Between the early view that a peaceful strike for higher wages was inherently wicked (King v. Journeymen Tailors of Cambridge, 8 Mod. 11; In re Journeymen Cordwainers, Yates, Sel. Cas. 111, 277) and the theory that all honest and peaceful means are permissible (dis. op. Vegelahn v. Guntner, supra), there is room for every shade of opinion. "It will be seen that in the different courts there is considerable variety and some conflict of opinion." Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 74 N. E. 603, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 3 Ann. Cas. 738. Cases where the act complained of was committed by one person alone are comparatively rare, the plain reason being that peaceful and truthful persuasion, or promise of future favor, by a single individual is not likely to produce results of a character so grave as to induce the injured party to seek redress through the courts. But when the act is that of many persons, the result has not infrequently been to drive the injured party out of business or deprive him of an opportunity to labor at his chosen calling. In many cases it has been decided that the common law governing criminal conspiracies offered a sufficient ground for holding the offenders liable civilly. Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuelle, 215 Mo. 421, 114 S. W. 997, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 607, 128 Am. St. Rep. 492, and authorities there reviewed. It was soon perceived, however, that the argument was unsound; and the theory that acts which might lawfully be done by one or any number of persons, acting singly, were unlawful when done by several acting by a concerted plan was abandoned in most jurisdictions. Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 42 Atl. 607, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746; Toledo, etc., Ry. v. Company (C. C.) 54 Fed. 730, 19 L. R. A. 387.

Another ground taken was that there is in the concerted action of the many a coercive element which should be placed on a par with the use of force, or with the undue influence sometimes exercised over persons not fully capable of protecting themselves. Boutwell v. Marr, supra; Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330; Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, 46 N. E. 297, 37 L. R. A. 802, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319; Casey v. Union (C. C.) 45 Fed. 135, 12 L. R. A. 193. The reasoning by which this view has been supported not infrequently suggests the true solution of the difficulty. The conclusion has been reached by deciding what was or was not reasonable conduct under the circumstances of the case. The more recent authorities reason that, as the right to deal or not to deal with others is inherent in the idea of Anglo-Saxon liberty, prima facie a man can demand an open market; and, since this is so, one who interferes with this free market must justify his acts or respond in damages. Thus far these authorities are uniform; but when they proceed to the determination of what amounts to a justification, they differ widely. The cause is not far to seek. The rule which they apply is that of reasonable conduct, yet they discuss and decide each case as though it involved only a question of law. In reality, the issue is largely one of fact, and the result is what would be expected. Judges are men, and their decisions upon complex facts must vary as those of juries might on the same facts. Calling one determination an opinion and the other a verdict does not alter human nature, nor make that uniform and certain which from its nature must remain variable and uncertain. While these cases go too far in what they decide as questions of law, yet the test they constantly declare they are applying is the true one. The standard is reasonable conduct under all the circumstances of the case. Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 74 N. E. 603, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 3 Ann. Cas. 738; Macauley v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 33 Atl. 1, 37 L. R. A. 455, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770; Doremus v. Hennessy, 176 Ill. 608, 52 N. E. 924, 54 N. E. 524, 43 L. R. A. 797, 802, 68 Am. St. Rep. 203. "What is the measure or test by which the conduct of a combination of persons must be judged in order to determine whether or not it is an unlawful interference with freedom of employment in the labor market, and as such injurious to an employer of labor in respect of his 'probable expectancies,' has not as yet been clearly defined. Perhaps no better definition could be suggested than that which may be framed by conveniently using that important legal fictitious person who has taken such a large part in the development of our law during the last fifty years—the reasonably prudent, reasonably courageous, and not unreasonably sensitive man. Precisely this same standard is employed throughout the law of nuisance in determining what degree of annoyance * * * one must submit to." Jersey City Printing Co. v. Cassidy, 63 N. J. Eq. 759, 766, 53 Atl. 230, 233. Occasionally courts have recognized in a degree the principle that the question should be treated as one of fact. "The judge rightly left to the jury the question whether, in view of all the circumstances, the interference was or was not for a justifiable cause. If the plaintiff's habits, or conduct, or character had been such as to render him an unfit associate in the shop for ordinary workmen of good character, that would have been a sufficient reason for interference in behalf of his shopmates. We can conceive of other good reasons. But the evidence tended to show that the only reason for procuring his discharge was his refusal to join the union. The question, therefore, is whether the jury might find that such an interference was unlawful." Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 357, 74 N. E. 603, 605, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 3 Ann. Cas. 738.

There is no such difficulty in dealing with the question here as has been met with elsewhere, and it is not necessary to attempt to reconcile the conflict which has resulted from the application of a view which does not obtain in this jurisdiction. In this state the question of reasonable conduct, whether in relation to tangible property or to intangible rights, is one of fact. Ladd v. Brick Co., 68 N. H. 185, 37 Atl. 1041, and cases cited. But while the question to be settled is within the province of the jury, there are still legal propositions involved in the case. It must be determined whether there is anything for the jury to weigh—whether the evidence is not conclusive one way or the other upon the issue of reasonable conduct.

At the present time no one would think of submitting to a jury the question whether a peaceful strike for higher wages was reasonable. They would be told, as matter of law, that such action was within the laborers' rights. So there may be conduct which is clearly unreasonable, or not justifiable. An illustration of such conduct is presented by the second ground for recovery in this case. One may not interfere with his neighbor's open market or "reasonable expectancies" solely for the purpose of doing harm. It has been said, however, in several cases that a wrongful motive cannot convert a legal act into an illegal one, and many judges have thought this was the end of the law upon the question. They seem to proceed upon a theory of absolute right in the defendant, which is at variance with the holding in many of the same cases, that the defendant may be called upon to justify his conduct. Indeed, the authorities are practically unanimous to the effect that the defendant is liable unless he shows a justification. If this is true, it follows as matter of course that his right is not absolute. It is a qualified one, and the rightfulness of its exercise depends upon all those elements which go to make up a cause for human action. The reasonableness of the act cannot always be satisfactorily determined until something is known of the state of the actor's mind. The "justification may be found sometimes in the circumstances under which it is done, irrespective of motive, sometimes in the motive alone, and sometimes in the circumstances and motive combined." Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330.

Since the defendant is called upon to justify—to show reasonable cause for the interference with his neighbor's right—it seems to clearly follow that, where his only reason is his malicious wish to injure the plaintiff, he has no justification. It is a contradiction in terms to say that a desire to do harm for the harm's sake can be called a just motive. In a late case in this state it is said of the use of property that "it cannot be justly contended that a purely malicious use is a reasonable use. The question of reasonableness depends upon all the circumstances—the advantage and profit to one of the uses attacked, and the unavoidable injury to the other. Where the only advantage to one is the pleasure of injuring another, there remains no foundation upon which it can be determined that the disturbance of the other in the lawful enjoyment of his estate is reasonable or necessary." Horan v. Byrnes, 72 N. H. 93, 100, 54 Atl. 945, 948, 62 L. R. A. 602, 101 Am. St. Rep. 670. The same reason applies here. If the evidence had been conclusive that the act was done solely from a malicious motive a verdict would have been directed for the plaintiff. It is not improbable that there are other plain cases—cases where there is nothing for the jury to pass upon. The third issue in this case does not come within that class. It cannot be said that all reasonable men would conclude that every reasonable man would or would not do what the defendant did, even though he acted honestly and from a proper motive. If any one doubts this assertion, he has but to read the cases where this and kindred questions have been discussed and decided as those of law. Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 74 N. E. 603, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 3 Ann. Cas. 738, and cases there cited; L. D. Willcutt & Sons Co. v. Driscoll, 200 Mass. 110, 85 N. E. 897, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1236; National Protective Ass'n v. Cumming, 170 N. Y. 315, 68 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648; Jacobs v. Cohen, 183 N. Y. 207, 76 N. E. 5, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292, 111 Am. St. Rep. 730, 5 Ann. Cas. 280; Wilson v. Hey, 232 Ill. 389, 83 N. E. 928, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 85, 122 Am. St. Rep. 119, 13 Ann. Cas. 82; Barnes v. Union, 232 Ill. 424, 83 N. E. 940, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018, 13 Ann. Cas. 54. When eminent judges come to opposite conclusions upon a question, it can hardly be said that jurors might not reasonably do the same.

The plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury upon all three grounds which have been considered: (1) Fraud, (2) malicious injury, and (3) unreasonable interference with the open market. Whether section 12, c. 266, Pub. St., affords a basis for a claim of greater right in the plaintiff is a question which has not been argued and is not considered.

Exception sustained. All concurred.

SECTION 3.—AS TO JUSTIFYING OR EXCUSING THE USE OF PROPERTY OR INFLUENCE FOR THE INTENTIONAL HARM OF ANOTHER

I. The Principle in General

There are indeed many authorities which appear to hold that to constitute an actionable wrong there must be a violation of some definite legal right of the plaintiff. But those are cases, for the most part at least, where the defendants were themselves acting in the lawful exercise of some distinct right, which furnished the defence of a justifiable cause for their acts, except so far as they were in violation of a superior right in another.

Thus every one has an equal right to employ workmen in his business or service; and if, by the exercise of this right in such manner as he may see fit, persons are induced to leave their employment elsewhere, no wrong is done to him whose employment they leave, unless a contract exists by which such other person has a legal right to the further continuance of their services. If such a contract exists, one who knowingly and intentionally procures it to be violated may be held liable for the wrong, although he did it for the purpose of promoting his own business.

One may dig upon his own land for water, or any other purpose, although he thereby cuts off the supply of water from his neighbor's well. Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 117. It is intimated, in this case, that such acts might be actionable if done maliciously. But the rights of the owner of land being absolute therein, and the adjoining proprietor having no legal right to such a supply of water from lands of another, the superior right must prevail. Accordingly it is generally held that no action will lie against one for acts done upon his own land in the exercise of his rights of ownership, whatever the motive, if they merely deprive another of advantages, or cause a loss to him, without violating any legal right; that is, the motive in such cases is immaterial. Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49; Mahan v. Brown, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 261, 28 Am. Dec. 461; Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. (N. Y.) 316. A similar decision was made in Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528, 64 Am. Dec. 721, but the suggestion in Greenleaf v. Francis was approved so far as this, namely, that malicious acts without the justification of any right, that is, acts of a stranger, resulting in like loss or damage, might be actionable; and the case of Parker v. Boston & Maine Railroad, 3 Cush. 107, 50 Am. Dec. 709, was referred to as showing that such loss of advantages previously enjoyed, although not of vested legal right, might be a ground of damages recoverable against one who caused the loss without superior right or justifiable cause.

Every one has a right to enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition; but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance or annoyance. If disturbance or loss come as a result of competition, or the exercise of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria, unless some superior right by contract or otherwise is interfered with. But if it come from the merely wanton or malicious acts of others, without the justification of competition or the service of any interest or lawful purpose, it then stands upon a different footing, and falls within the principle of the authorities first referred to.

Wells, J., in Walker v. Cronin (1871) 107 Mass. 555, 563.

At Common Law there was a cause of action whenever one person did damage to another wilfully and intentionally, and without just cause or excuse. Under the head of that class of action came the action of slander of title, whether the subject of the slander was real or personal property. If a man falsely and maliciously—because the malice would shew there was no just cause—made a statement about the property of another which was calculated to do, and which did do, damage to the other in the management of that property, an action would lie at Common Law, and damages would be recoverable and in Chancery, I suppose that even if you could not prove that actual damage had occurred, the Court might, if actual damage was likely to occur, prevent the wrongful act by injunction.

Bowen, L. J., in Skinner & Co. v. Shew & Co., [1893] 1 Ch. 413, 422.

It has been considered that, prima facie, the intentional infliction of temporal damage is a cause of action, which, as a matter of substantive law, whatever may be the form of pleading, requires a justification if the defendant is to escape. Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. D. 598, 613; S. C., [1892] A. C. 25. If this is the correct mode of approach it is obvious that justifications may vary in extent according to the principle of policy upon which they are founded, and that while some, for instance, at common law, those affecting the use of land, are absolute, Bradford v. Pickles, [1895] A. C. 587, others may depend upon the end for which the act is done. Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Mass. 485, 487, 50 N. E. 125, 52 L. R. A. 115, 83 Am. St. Rep. 289; Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330; Squires v. Wason Manuf. Co., 182 Mass. 137, 140, 141, 65 N. E. 32. See cases cited in Passaic Print Works v. Ely & Walker Dry-Goods Co., 105 Fed. 163, 44 C. C. A. 426, 62 L. R. A. 673. It is no sufficient answer to this line of thought that motives are not actionable and that the standards of the law are external. That is true in determining what a man is bound to foresee, but not necessarily in determining the extent to which he can justify harm which he has foreseen.

Holmes, J., in Aikens v. Wisconsin (1904) 195 U. S. 194, 204, 25 Sup. Ct. 3, 49 L. Ed. 154.[20]

At Common Law every member of the community is entitled to carry on any trade or business he chooses and in such manner as he thinks most desirable in his own interests, and inasmuch as every right connotes an obligation no one can lawfully interfere with another in the free exercise of his trade or business unless there exists some just cause or excuse for such interference. Just cause or excuse for interference with another's trade or business may sometimes be found in the fact that the acts complained of as an interference have all been done in the bona fide exercise of the doer's own trade or business and with a single view to his own interests (the Mogul Steamship Case, 23 Q. B. D. 598; [1892] A. C. 25). But it may also be found in the existence of some additional or substantive right conferred by letters patent from the Crown or by contract between individuals. In the case of letters patent from the Crown this additional or substantive right is generally described as a monopoly. In the lat-

[20] "X., who intentionally causes damage to A., has prima facie done an injury or wrong to A., and if X. can show no legal justification for the damage he has thus intentionally done to A., he is liable to an action by A." Professor A. V. Dicey, 18 Law Quar. Rev. 4.

"It is submitted that the discussion would be materially simplified if it were understood that all damage wilfully done to one's neighbor is actionable unless it can be justified or excused." Sir Frederick Pollock, Torts (7th Ed.) 319.

"The wilful causing of damage to another by a positive act, whether by one man alone, or by several acting in concert, and whether by direct action against him or indirectly by inducing a third person to exercise a lawful right, is a tort unless there was just cause for inflicting the damage. * * *" Professor James Barr Ames, 18 Harv. Law Rev. 412.

Quoting these three passages and the opening sentences from the opinions of Bowen, L. J., and Holmes, J., in the text, Professor Jeremiah Smith has remarked: "The above statements of Bowen, Dicey, Holmes, Pollock and Ames all seem to imply that the causing of the damage in question was the object immediately aimed at by the defendant. But they do not necessarily import the doing of damage 'for the sake of the harm as an evil in itself, and not merely as a means to some further end legitimately desired.' On the contrary, the desire to cause the harm is entirely consistent with the absence of personal ill will towards the plaintiff, and also with the existence of an ultimate good motive on the part of the defendant. Conceding that damage as such, i. e., because it is harmful or damaging to the plaintiff, is the very object immediately desired, yet it may not be the ultimate end which is sought to be attained. We think that the law should be held to go as far as the above general statements of Bowen, Dicey, Holmes and Pollock, and the more specific statement of Professor Ames." 20 Harv. Law Rev. 263 (1907).

ter case the contract on which the additional or substantive right is founded is generally described as a contract in restraint of trade. Monopolies and contracts in restraint of trade have this in common, that they both, if enforced, involve a derogation from the common law right in virtue of which any member of the community may exercise any trade or business he pleases and in such manner as he thinks best in his own interests.

Lord Parker of Waddington, in Attorney General of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co., [1913] A. C. 781, 793

MOGUL STEAMSHIP CO., Limited, v. McGREGOR, GOW & CO. et al.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1888. 21 Q. B. Div. 544. Court of Appeal, 1889. 23 Q. B. Div. 598. House of Lords. [1892] A. C. 25.)

In this action, the plaintiffs claimed damages for a conspiracy to prevent them from carrying on their trade between London and China, and an injunction against the continuance of the alleged wrongful acts. The facts were shortly as follows: [21]

[21] The statement here given is from the reports of the case in the Queen's Bench Division, 21 Q. B. D. 544, and in the Court of Appeal, 23 Q. B. D. 598. The facts are fully set forth also in The Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (1885) 15 Q. B. D. 476, when the plaintiffs were seeking an interim injunction. In this earlier consideration of the case Lord Coleridge, C. J., remarked: "This is an application for an interlocutory or interim injunction before the trial of the action. It is certainly conceivable that such a conspiracy,—because conspiracy undoubtedly it is,—as this might be proved in point of fact: and I do not entertain any doubt, nor does my learned Brother, that, if such a conspiracy were proved in point of fact, and the intuitus of the conspirators were made out to be, not the mere honest support and maintenance of the defendants' trade, but the destruction of the plaintiffs' trade, and their consequent ruin as merchants, it would be an offence for which an indictment for conspiracy, and, if an indictment, then an action for conspiracy, would lie. * * * [But] even assuming that the plaintiffs are right in their contention it will be competent to the jury at the trial to award, and I have no doubt they will award, the plaintiffs abundant damages to compensate them for the injury that they may have sustained at the hands of the defendants. I have always understood, and I am confirmed in that understanding by the larger experience of Lord Justice Fry, that that is almost of itself a reason for not issuing an injunction prior to the trial of the action. If the plaintiffs establish their case by the verdict of the jury or the decision of the judge, they will get all they are entitled to. Next, this does not appear to me to be a case in which, as I was at one time inclined to think, the plaintiffs can sustain irreparable injury by our declining to grant the relief prayed. It may be that they will suffer some damage; it may be that they will for a time have a difficulty in carrying on their China trade or may have to carry it on at a loss. But injury of that sort differs altogether from the injury which is called 'irreparable,' to prevent which injunctions have heretofore been granted in the Court of Chancery, and are now allowed to issue from this Court. For instance, if a fine old ornamental tree in a nobleman's park be cut down, the injury is practically irreparable, and cannot be compensated in damages. It is in cases of that nature that an interim injunction issues. The injury here, if it be made out, obviously is not one of that character." The motion for the interim injunction was therefore refused.

The plaintiffs were a shipping company incorporated for the purpose of acquiring shares in certain steamships—the Sikh, Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee—and became the owners of a large number of shares in these ships, which were built for and employed in the China and Australian trades. The defendants were an associated body of shipowners trading (among other places) between China and London, who formed themselves into a conference or association for the purpose of keeping up the rate of freights in the tea trade between China and Europe, and securing that trade to themselves by allowing a rebate of 5 per cent. on all freights paid by shippers who shipped tea for Europe in conference vessels only. The defendants alleged (and, as is found in the judgment, truly alleged) that the large profits derived from the tea freights alone enabled them to keep up a regular line of communication all the year round between England and China, and that without a practical monopoly of the tea trade they must cease to do so. The plaintiffs were admitted to the benefits of this conference for the season of 1884, when the following circular was widely distributed by the defendants among the merchants engaged in the China trade:

"Shanghai, 10th May, 1884.

"To those exporters who confine their shipments of tea and general cargo from China to Europe (not including the Mediterranean and Black Sea ports) to the P. & O. Steam Navigation Co.'s, Messagerie Maritime Co.'s, Ocean Steamship Co.'s, Glen, Castle, Shire, and Ben Lines, and to the steamships Oopack and Ningchow, we shall be happy to allow a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freight charged.

"Exporters claiming the returns will be required to sign a declaration that they have not made nor been interested in any shipments of tea or general cargo to Europe (excepting the ports above named) by any other than the said lines.

"Shipments by the steamships Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee on their present voyages from Hankow will not prejudice claims for returns.

"Each line to be responsible for its own returns only, which will be payable half-yearly, commencing 30th October next.

"Shipments by an outside steamer at any of the ports in China or at Hong Kong will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period within which they have been made, even although its other branches may have given entire support to the above lines.

"The foregoing agreement on our part to be in force from present date till the 30th April, 1886."

In May, 1885, the defendants issued and widely distributed among the merchants in the China trade the following circular, which had the effect of excluding the plaintiffs from the benefits of the conference:

"Shanghai, 11 May, 1885.

"Referring to our circular dated 10th May, 1884, we beg to remind you that shipments for London by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other non-conference steamers at any of the ports in China or at Hong Kong, will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period in which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support to the conference lines."

The plaintiffs by their statement of claim alleged a conspiracy on the part of the defendants to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining cargoes for their steamers, such conspiracy consisting in a combination and agreement amongst the defendants, having by reason of such combination and agreement control of the homeward shipping trade, pursuant to which combination and agreement shippers were bribed, coerced, and induced to agree to forbear, and to forbear, from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers. In the alternative, the conspiracy was alleged to consist of a combination and agreement amongst the defendants pursuant to which the defendants, with intent to injure the plaintiffs and prevent them obtaining cargoes for their steamers, agreed to refuse, and refused, to accept cargoes from shippers except upon the terms that the shippers should not ship any cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers, and by threats of stopping the shipment of homeward cargoes altogether, which they had the power and intended to carry into effect, prevented shippers from shipping cargoes by plaintiffs' steamers. * * *

The defence included a denial of the alleged conspiracy, and an objection that the plaintiffs' statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

The action was tried without a jury, before Lord Coleridge, C. J., who delivered a written judgment for the defendants.[22] The plaintiffs appealed.

[22] In this judgment, 21 Q. B. D. 544, 547, which is omitted here, Lord Coleridge, C. J., remarks: "But it is said that the motive of these acts was to ruin the plaintiffs, and that such a motive, it has been held, will render the combination itself wrongful and malicious, and that if damage has resulted to the plaintiffs an action will lie. I concede that if the premises are established the conclusion follows. It is too late to dispute, if I desired it, as I do not, that a wrongful and malicious combination to ruin a man in his trade may be ground for such an action as this. Was then this combination such? The answer to this question has given me much trouble, and I confess to the weakness of having long doubted and hesitated before I could make up my mind. There can be no doubt that the defendants were determined, if they could, to exclude the plaintiffs from this trade. Strong expressions were drawn from some of them in cross-examination, and the telegrams and letters shewed the importance they attached to the matter, their resolute purpose to exclude the plaintiffs if they could, and to do so without any consideration for the results to the plaintiffs, if they were successfully excluded. This, I think, is made out, and I think no more is made out than this. Is this enough? It must be remembered that all trade is and must be in a sense selfish; trade not being infinite, nay, the trade of a particular place or district being possibly very limited, what one man gains another loses. In the hand to hand war of commerce, as in the conflicts of public life, whether at the bar, in Parliament, in medicine, in engineering, (I give examples only,) men fight on without much thought of others, except a desire to excel or to defeat them. Very lofty minds, like Sir Philip Sidney with his cup of water, will not stoop to take an advantage, if they think another wants it more. Our age, in spite of high authority to the contrary, is not without its Sir Philip Sidneys; but these are counsels of perfection which it would be silly indeed to make the measure of the rough business of the world as pursued by ordinary men of business. The line is in words difficult to draw, but I cannot see that these defendants have in fact passed the line which separates the reasonable and legitimate selfishness of traders from wrong and malice. In 1884 they admitted the plaintiffs to their conference; in 1885 they excluded them, and they were determined no doubt, if they could, to make the exclusion complete and effective, not from any personal malice or ill will to the

[In the Court of Appeal]

BOWEN, L. J. We are presented in this case with an apparent conflict or antinomy between two rights that are equally regarded by the law—the right of the plaintiffs to be protected in the legitimate exercise of their trade, and the right of the defendants to carry on their business as seems best to them, provided they commit no wrong to others. The plaintiffs complain that the defendants have crossed the line which the common law permits; and inasmuch as, for the purposes of the present case, we are to assume some possible damage to the plaintiffs, the real question to be decided is whether, on such an assumption, the defendants in the conduct of their commercial affairs have done anything that is unjustifiable in law. The defendants are a number of ship-owners who formed themselves into a league or conference for the purpose of ultimately keeping in their own hands the control of the tea carriage from certain Chinese ports, and for the purpose of driving the plaintiffs and other competitors from the field. In order to succeed in this object, and to discourage the plaintiffs' vessels from resorting to those ports, the defendants during the "tea harvest" of 1885 combined to offer to the local shippers very low freights, with a view of generally reducing or "smashing" rates, and thus rendering it unprofitable for the plaintiffs to send their ships thither. They offered, moreover, a rebate of five per cent. to all local shippers and agents who would deal exclusively with vessels belonging to the Conference, and any agent who broke the condition was to forfeit the entire rebate on all shipments made on behalf of any and every one of his principals during the whole year—a forfeiture of rebate or allowance which was denominated as "penal" by the plaintiffs' counsel. It must, however, be taken as established that the rebate was one which the defendants need never have allowed at all to their customers. It must also be taken that the defendants had no personal ill-will to the plaintiffs, nor any desire to harm them except such as is involved in the wish and intention to discourage by such measures the plaintiffs from sending rival vessels to such ports. The acts of which the plaintiffs particularly complained were as follows: First, a circular of May 10, 1885, by which the defendants offered to the local shippers and their agents a benefit by way of rebate if they would not deal with the plaintiffs, which was to be lost if this condition was not fulfilled. Secondly, the sending of special ships to Hankow in order by competition to deprive the plaintiffs' vessels of profitable freight. Thirdly, the offer at Hankow of freights at a level which would not repay a shipowner for his adventure, in order to "smash" freights and frighten plaintiffs as individuals, but because they were determined, if they could, to keep the trade to themselves; and if they permitted persons in the position of the plaintiffs to come in and share it they thought, and honestly and, as it turns out, correctly thought, that for a time at least there would be an end of their gains."

the plaintiffs from the field. Fourthly, pressure put on the defendants' own agents to induce them to ship only by the defendants' vessels, and not by those of the plaintiffs. It is to be observed with regard to all these acts of which complaint is made that they were acts that in themselves could not be said to be illegal unless made so by the object with which, or the combination in the course of which, they were done; and that in reality what is complained of is the pursuing of trade competition to a length which the plaintiffs consider oppressive and prejudicial to themselves. We were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel to accept the position from which their argument started—that an action will lie if a man maliciously and wrongfully conducts himself so as to injure another in that other's trade. Obscurity resides in the language used to state this proposition. The terms "maliciously," "wrongfully," and "injure" are words all of which have accurate meanings, well known to the law, but which also have a popular and less precise signification, into which it is necessary to see that the argument does not imperceptibly slide. An intent to "injure" in strictness means more than an intent to harm. It connotes an intent to do wrongful harm. "Maliciously," in like manner, means and implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful, to the detriment of another. The term "wrongful" imports in its turn the infringement of some right. The ambiguous proposition to which we were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel still, therefore, leaves unsolved the question of what, as between the plaintiffs and defendants, are the rights of trade. For the purpose of clearness, I desire, as far as possible, to avoid terms in their popular use so slippery, and to translate them into less fallacious language wherever possible.

The English law, which in its earlier stages began with but an imperfect line of demarcation between torts and breaches of contract, presents us with no scientific analysis of the degree to which the intent to harm, or, in the language of the civil law, the animus vicino nocendi, may enter into or affect the conception of a personal wrong; see Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. C. 349, at p. 388. All personal wrong means the infringement of some personal right. "It is essential to an action in tort," say the Privy Council in Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt, 13 Moore, P. C. 209, "that the act complained of should under the circumstances be legally wrongful as regards the party complaining; that is, it must prejudicially affect him in some legal right; merely that it will, however directly, do a man harm in his interests, is not enough." What, then, were the rights of the plaintiffs as traders as against the defendants? The plaintiffs had a right to be protected against certain kind of conduct; and we have to consider what conduct would pass this legal line or boundary. Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action when done without just cause or excuse is what the law calls a malicious wrong (see Bromage v. Prosser, 4 B. & C. 247; Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty, 7 App. Cas. 741, at p. 772, per Lord Blackburn). The acts of the defendants which are complained of here were intentional, and were also calculated, no doubt, to do the plaintiffs damage in their trade. But in order to see whether they were wrongful we have still to discuss the question whether they were done without any just cause or excuse. Such just cause or excuse the defendants on their side assert to be found in their own positive right (subject to certain limitations) to carry on their own trade freely in the mode and manner that best suits them, and which they think best calculated to secure their own advantage.

What, then, are the limitations which the law imposes on a trader in the conduct of his business as between himself and other traders? There seem to be no burdens or restrictions in law upon a trader which arise merely from the fact that he is a trader, and which are not equally laid on all other subjects of the Crown. His right to trade freely is a right which the law recognizes and encourages, but it is one which places him at no special disadvantage as compared with others. No man, whether trader or not, can, however, justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by shew of violence, Tarleton v. McGawley, Peak, N. P. C. 270; the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing, Clifford v. Brandon, 2 Camp. 358, Gregory v. Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 205; the disturbance of wild fowl in decoys by the firing of guns, Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East, 571, and Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East, 574, n.; the impeding or threatening servants or workmen, Garret v. Taylor, Cro. Jac. 567; the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts, Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333; Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216: all are instances of such forbidden acts. But the defendants have been guilty of none of these acts. They have done nothing more against the plaintiffs than pursue to the bitter end a war of competition waged in the interest of their own trade. To the argument that a competition so pursued ceases to have a just cause or excuse when there is ill-will or a personal intention to harm, it is sufficient to reply (as I have already pointed out) that there was here no personal intention to do any other or greater harm to the plaintiffs than such as was necessarily involved in the desire to attract to the defendants' ships the entire tea freights of the ports, a portion of which would otherwise have fallen to the plaintiffs' share. I can find no authority for the doctrine that such a commercial motive deprives of "just cause or excuse" acts done in the course of trade which would but for such a motive be justifiable. So to hold would be to convert into an illegal motive the instinct of self-advancement and self-protection, which is the very incentive to all trade. To say that a man is to trade freely, but that he is to stop short at any act which is calculated to harm other tradesmen, and which is designed to attract business to his own shop, would be a strange and impossible counsel of perfection. But we were told that competition ceases to be the lawful exercise of trade, and so to be a lawful excuse for what will harm another, if carried to a length which is not fair or reasonable. The offering of reduced rates by the defendants in the present case is said to have been "unfair." This seems to assume that, apart from fraud, intimidation, molestation, or obstruction, of some other personal right in rem or in personam, there is some natural standard of "fairness" or "reasonableness" (to be determined by the internal consciousness of judges and juries) beyond which competition ought not in law to go. There seems to be no authority, and I think with submission, that there is no sufficient reason, for such a proposition. It would impose a novel fetter upon trade. The defendants, we are told by the plaintiffs' counsel, might lawfully lower rates provided they did not lower them beyond a "fair freight," whatever that may mean. But where is it established that there is any such restriction upon commerce? And what is to be the definition of a "fair freight?" It is said that it ought to be a normal rate of freight, such as is reasonably remunerative to the ship-owner. But over what period of time is the average of this reasonable remunerativeness to be calculated? All commercial men with capital are acquainted with the ordinary expedient of sowing one year a crop of apparently unfruitful prices, in order by driving competition away to reap a fuller harvest of profit in the future; and until the present argument at the bar it may be doubted whether ship-owners or merchants were ever deemed to be bound by law to conform to some imaginary "normal" standard of freights or prices, or that law courts had a right to say to them in respect of their competitive tariffs, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further." To attempt to limit English competition in this way would probably be as hopeless an endeavor as the experiment of King Canute. But on ordinary principles of law no such fetter on freedom of trade can in my opinion be warranted. A man is bound not to use his property so as to infringe upon another's right. "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas." If engaged in actions which may involve danger to others, he ought, speaking generally, to take reasonable care to avoid endangering them. But there is surely no doctrine of law which compels him to use his property in a way that judges and juries may consider reasonable: see Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. C. 349. If there is no such fetter upon the use of property known to the English law, why should there be any such a fetter upon trade?

It is urged, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that even if the acts complained of would not be wrongful had they been committed by a single individual, they become actionable when they are the result of concerted action among several. In other words, the plaintiffs, it is contended, have been injured by an illegal conspiracy. Of the general proposition, that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several, there can be no doubt. The distinction is based on sound reason, for a combination may make oppressive or dangerous that which if it proceeded only from a single person would be otherwise, and the very fact of the combination may show that the object is simply to do harm, and not to exercise one's own just rights. In the application of this undoubted principle it is necessary to be very careful not to press the doctrine of illegal conspiracy beyond that which is necessary for the protection of individuals or of the public; and it may be observed in passing that as a rule it is the damage wrongfully done, and not the conspiracy, that is the gist of actions on the case for conspiracy: see Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Wms. Saund. 229; Hutchins v. Hutchins, 7 Hill's New York Cases, 104, Bigelow's Leading Cases on Torts, 207. But what is the definition of an illegal combination? It is an agreement by one or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means: O'Connell v. The Queen, 11 Cl. & F. 155; Reg. v. Parnell, 14 Cox, Crim. Cas. 508; and the question to be solved is whether there has been any such agreement here. Have the defendants combined to do an unlawful act? Have they combined to do a lawful act by unlawful means? A moment's consideration will be sufficient to shew that this new inquiry only drives us back to the circle of definitions and legal propositions which I have already traversed in the previous part of this judgment. The unlawful act agreed to, if any, between the defendants must have been the intentional doing of some act to the detriment of the plaintiffs' business without just cause or excuse. Whether there was any such justification or excuse for the defendants is the old question over again, which, so far as regards an individual trader, has been already solved. The only differentia that can exist must arise, if at all, out of the fact that the acts done are the joint acts of several capitalists, and not of one capitalist only. The next point is whether the means adopted were unlawful. The means adopted were competition carried to a bitter end. Whether such means were unlawful is in like manner nothing but the old discussion which I have gone through, and which is now revived under a second head of inquiry, except so far as a combination of capitalists differentiates the case of acts jointly done by them from similar acts done by a single man of capital. But I find it impossible myself to acquiesce in the view that the English law places any such restriction on the combination of capital as would be involved in the recognition of such a distinction. If so, one rich capitalist may innocently carry competition to a length which would become unlawful in the case of a syndicate with a joint capital no larger than his own, and one individual merchant may lawfully do that which a firm or a partnership may not. What limits, on such a theory, would be imposed by law on the competitive action of a joint-stock company limited, is a problem which might well puzzle a casuist. The truth is, that the combination of capital for purposes of trade and competition is a very different thing from such a combination of several persons against one, with a view to harm him, as falls under the head of an indictable conspiracy. There is no just cause or excuse in the latter class of cases. There is such a just cause or excuse in the former. There are cases in which the very fact of a combination is evidence of a design to do that which is hurtful without just cause —is evidence—to use a technical expression—of malice. But it is perfectly legitimate, as it seems to me, to combine capital for all the mere purposes of trade for which capital may, apart from combination, be legitimately used in trade. To limit combinations of capital, when used for purposes of competition, in the manner proposed by the argument of the plaintiffs, would, in the present day, be impossible—would be only another method of attempting to set boundaries to the tides. Legal puzzles which might well distract a theorist may easily be conceived of imaginary conflicts between the selfishness of a group of individuals and the obvious well-being of other members of the community. Would it be an indictable conspiracy to agree to drink up all the water from a common spring in a time of drought; to buy up by preconcerted action all the provisions in a market or district in times of scarcity: see Rex v. Waddington, 1 East, 143; to combine to purchase all the shares of a company against a coming settling-day; or to agree to give away articles of trade gratis in order to withdraw custom from a trader? May two itinerant match-vendors combine to sell matches below their value in order by competition to drive a third match-vendor from the street? In cases like these, where the elements of intimidation, molestation, or the other kinds of illegality to which I have alluded are not present, the question must be decided by the application of the test I have indicated. Assume that what is done is intentional, and that it is calculated to do harm to others. Then comes the question, Was it done with or without "just cause or excuse?" If it was bona fide done in the use of a man's own property, in the exercise of a man's own trade, such legal justification would, I think, exist not the less because what was done might seem to others to be selfish or unreasonable: see the summing-up of Erle, J., and the judgment of the Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Rowlands, 17 Q. B. 671. But such legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm, without reference to one's own lawful gain, or the lawful enjoyment of one's own rights. The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyze the circumstances and to discover on which side of the line each case fell. But if the real object were to enjoy what was one's own, or to acquire for one's self some advantage in one's property or trade, and what was done was done honestly, peaceably, and without any of the illegal acts above referred to, it could not, in my opinion, properly be said that it was done without just cause or excuse. One may with advantage borrow for the benefit of traders what was said by Erle, J., in Reg. v. Rowlands, 17 Q. B. 671, at page 687, n., of workmen and of masters: "The intention of the law is at present to allow either of them to follow the dictates of their own will, with respect to their own actions, and their own property; and either, I believe, has a right to study to promote his own advantage, or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage."

Lastly, we are asked to hold the defendants' Conference or association illegal, as being in restraint of trade. The term "illegal" here is a misleading one. Contracts, as they are called, in restraint of trade, are not, in my opinion, illegal in any sense, except that the law will not enforce them. It does not prohibit the making of such contracts; it merely declines, after they have been made, to recognize their validity. The law considers the disadvantage so imposed upon the contract a sufficient shelter to the public. The language of Crompton, J., in Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. & B. 47, is, I think, not to be supported. No action at common law will lie or ever has lain against any individual or individuals for entering into a contract merely because it is in restraint of trade. Lord Eldon's equity decisions in Cousins v. Smith, 13 Ves. 542, is not very intelligible, even if it be not open to the somewhat personal criticism passed on it by Lord Campbell in his "Lives of the Chancellors." If indeed it could be plainly proved that the mere formation of "conferences," "trusts," or "associations" such as these were always necessarily injurious to the public—a view which involves, perhaps, the disputable assumption that, in a country of free trade, and one which is not under the iron régime of statutory monopolies, such confederations can ever be really successful—and if the evil of them were not sufficiently dealt with by the common law rule, which held such agreements to be void as distinct from holding them to be criminal, there might be some reason for thinking that the common law ought to discover within its arsenal of sound common-sense principles some further remedy commensurate with the mischief. Neither of these assumptions are, to my mind, at all evident, nor is it the province of judges to mould and stretch the law of conspiracy in order to keep pace with the calculations of political economy. If peaceable and honest combinations of capital for purposes of trade competition are to be struck at, it must, I think, be by legislation, for I do not see that they are under the ban of the common law.

In the result, I agree with Lord Coleridge, C. J., and differ, with regret, from the Master of the Rolls. The substance of my view is this, that competition, however severe and egotistical, if unattended by circumstances of dishonesty, intimidation, molestation, or such illegalities as I have above referred to, gives rise to no cause of action at common law. I myself should deem it to be a misfortune if we were to attempt to prescribe to the business world how honest and peaceable trade was to be carried on in a case where no such illegal elements as I have mentioned exist, or were to adopt some standard of judicial "reasonableness," or of "normal" prices, or "fair freights," to which commercial adventurers, otherwise innocent, were bound to conform.

In my opinion, accordingly, this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.[23]

From this decision of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiffs appealed to the House of Lords.

[In the House of Lords]

Lord Field. My Lords, I think that this appeal may be decided upon the principles laid down by Holt, C. J., as far back as the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill, cited for the appellants, 11 Mod. 74, 131, and note to Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East, 574. In that case the plaintiff complained of the disturbance of his "decoy" by the defendant having discharged guns near to it and so driven away the wild-fowl, with the intention and effect of the consequent injury to his trade. Upon the trial a verdict passed for the plaintiff, but in arrest of judgment it was alleged that the declaration did not disclose any cause of action. Holt, C. J., however, held that the action, although new in instance, was not new in reason or principle, and well lay, for he said that the use of a "decoy" was a lawful trade, and that he who hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action if the injury is caused by "a violent or malicious act;" suppose "for instance," he said, "the defendant had shot in his own ground, if he had occasion to shoot it would have been one thing, but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing and a wrong." But, he added, if the defendant, "using the same employment as the plaintiff," had set up another decoy so near as to spoil the plaintiff's custom, no action would lie, because the defendant had "as much liberty to make and use a decoy" as the plaintiff. In support of this view he referred to earlier authorities. In one of them it had been held that for the setting up of a new school to the damage of an ancient one by alluring the scholars no action would lie, although it would have been otherwise if the scholars had been driven away by violence or threats.

It follows therefore from this authority, and is undoubted law, not only that it is not every act causing damage to another in his trade, nor even every intentional act of such damage, which is actionable, but also that acts done by a trader in the lawful way of his business, although by the necessary results of effective competition interfering injuriously with the trade of another, are not the subject of any action.

Of course it is otherwise, as pointed out by Lord Holt, if the acts complained of, although done in the way and under the guise of competition or other lawful right, are in themselves violent or purely malicious, or have for their ultimate object injury to another from ill-will to him, and not the pursuit of lawful rights. No doubt, also, there have been cases in which agreements to do acts injurious to others have been held to be indictable as amounting to conspiracy, the ultimate object or the means being unlawful, although if done by an individual no such consequence would have followed, but I think that in all such cases it will be found that there existed either an ultimate object of malice, or wrong, or wrongful means of execution involving elements of injury to the public, or, at least, negativing the pursuit of a lawful object.

Now, applying these principles to the case before your Lordships, it appears upon the evidence that the appellants and respondents are shipowners, and have for many years been engaged, sometimes in alliance, at other times in competition, in the carrying trade of the eastern seas to and from Europe and elsewhere. A very important portion of this trade consists of a large amount of freight to be earned at the ports of Hankow and Shanghai during the season by carrying to Europe the teas brought there for shipment, and it was of the respondents' action in that business during the season of 1885 that the appellants complain. They do not allege that the respondents have been guilty of any act of fraud or violence, or of any physical obstruction to the appellants' business, or have acted from any personal malice or ill-will, but they say that the respondents acted with the calculated intention and purpose of driving the appellants out of the Hankow season carrying trade by a course of conduct which, although not amounting to violence, was equally effective, and so being in fact productive of injury to them was wrongful and presumably malicious.

It appeared upon the evidence that both parties have been for some years trading in competition at Hankow for tea freights, which amounted to a very considerable sum, and the earning of which was spread over a short annual season. The trade was carried on by a large number of independent shipowners, and the tonnage which was employed may be roughly divided into two classes: First, tonnage engaged in regular lines to and from ports in the China and Japan seas all the year through, loading both outwards and inwards; and secondly, tonnage loading generally outwards to ports in Australia or elsewhere, and only seeking freights and taking up "homeward" berths at Hankow during the short period when freights are abundant there and scarce elsewhere. The several respondents and the "Messageries Maritimes" of France represent substantially the first class of shipowners. The appellants and other shipowners, who are no parties to this record, but some of whom were in alliance with the appellants, in the same interest, forming a very influential class of traders, may be taken to represent the second.

The two ports of Hankow and Shanghai are the centres of these competing interests, and it is hardly necessary to add that the competition was very severe, and the accumulation of tonnage for "homeward" freights produced by the circulation of an excessive number of ships rendered rates so unremunerative that in each of the years 1879, 1883, and 1885, a combination of shipowners known as a "conference," was formed, consisting in the main of the first class of owners, with the object of limiting the amount of tonnage to be sent up the river, and thus securing enhancement and regularity of rates. * * *[24]

It was under these circumstances that the appellants brought the present action, in which they in substance complain, first, of the return of 5 per cent. to the shippers who have not shipped with the appellants, and of the circular to that effect; secondly of the placing upon the berths of extra ships in order to meet the appellants' and other vessels; and thirdly, the reduction of freights to an unremunerative extent with the object of securing cargo. I fail, however, to see that any of those things are sufficient to support this action. Everything that was done by the respondents was done in the exercise of their right to carry on their own trade, and was bona fide so done. There was not only no malice or indirect object in fact, but the existence of the right to exercise a lawful employment, in the pursuance of which the respondents acted, negatives the presumption of malice which arises when the purposed infliction of loss and injury upon another cannot be attributed to any legitimate cause, and is therefore presumably due to nothing but its obvious object of harm. All the acts complained of were in themselves lawful, and if they caused loss to the appellants, that was one of the necessary results of competition.

It remains to consider the further contention of the appellants that these acts of the respondents, even if lawful in themselves if done by an individual, are illegal and give rise to an action as having been done in the execution of the conference agreement, which is said to amount to a conspiracy, as being in restraint of trade, and so against public policy, and illegal; but this contention I think, also fails. I cannot say upon the evidence that the agreement in question was calculated to have or had any such result, nor, even if it had, has any authority (except one, no doubt entitled to great weight, but which has not met with general approval) been cited to shew that such an agreement even if void is illegal, nor any that, even if it be so, any action lies by an individual.

For these, and the other reasons given by the learned Lords Justices Bowen and Fry, and which I need not recapitulate, I think that the appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed.[25]

[24] A portion of the opinion, giving a number of details, is omitted.

[25] The opinions of Lord Halsbury, L. C., Lord Watson, Lord Bramwell, Lord Morris, and Lord Hannen are omitted. They concur in holding that the appeal should be dismissed, and, for the most part, in expressly adopting the reasons assigned by Bowen and Fry, L. JJ., in the Court of Appeal.

TEMPERTON v. RUSSELL et al.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1893] 1 Q. B. 715.)

The plaintiff, a master mason and builder at Hull, sued the defendants, who were respectively the presidents and secretaries of three trade unions at Hull, called the Hull Branch of the Operative Bricklayers' Society, the Hull Branch of the Builders' Labourers' Society, and the Hull Branch of the Operative Plasterers' Society, and of a joint committee of such trade unions, and members of such committee, for (1) unlawfully and maliciously procuring certain persons who had entered into contracts with the plaintiff to break such contracts, and (2) for maliciously conspiring to induce certain persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, by reason whereof the plaintiff sustained damage. * * *

The learned judge at the trial directed the jury that to induce a person who had made a contract with another to break it, in order to hurt the person with whom it had been made, to hamper him in his trade, or to put undue pressure upon him, or to obtain an indirect advantage, was in point of law to do it maliciously and that, if the jury were satisfied that the defendants or any of them had induced persons to break contracts with the plaintiff, of the existence of which they were aware, and, if their object in doing so was to injure the plaintiff in his trade in order to compel him to do something which he did not want to do, that would be "maliciously" in point of law, and a cause of action would be established. He also directed the jury in substance, that a malicious conspiracy to prevent persons from entering into contracts with another, if followed by damage to the person conspired against, was actionable. He left the following questions to the jury: (1) Did the defendants or any of them maliciously induce the persons named (viz., Brentano, Gibson and others), or any of them, to break their contracts with the plaintiff? (2) Did the defendants, or any two or more of them, maliciously conspire to induce the persons named and others not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, and were such persons thereby induced not to make such contracts? The jury found for the plaintiff, against all the defendants, on both heads, with £50 damages on the first and £200 damages on the second. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for those amounts, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from inducing persons to refuse to take goods from the plaintiff, or endeavoring to induce persons to break their contracts with the plaintiff. The defendants moved for judgment or a new trial, on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury, and that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiff's claim against the defendants respectively.[26]

[26] The statement of facts is abridged, and the arguments of counsel are omitted.

LORD ESHER, M. R. In this case I propose first to state the facts of the case, as I understand the effect of the evidence, and then my views as to the law applicable to those facts. There appear to have been three trade unions formed in Hull, consisting respectively of persons employed in each of the three branches of labor connected with the building trade there. The members of such trade unions respectively agree together to form a union, to subscribe certain amounts, and to subject themselves to certain obligations, in consideration of which they are respectively to be entitled to certain benefits. The main condition upon which the members of the union are to be entitled to the benefits of membership is, that they will obey the directions given with regard to certain trade matters by the persons authorized by all of the members to give such directions. If they do not, they may be deprived of the benefits to which they would otherwise have been entitled or expelled from the union. Therefore the members of the union have given up their liberty of action in respect of certain matters, in the sense that they have bound themselves by agreement not to exercise it on pain of losing certain benefits. These trade unions appear to have agreed together that certain rules, which they thought to be for their benefit, should be observed by the master builders of Hull, and that, if any builder would not observe such rules, they would act upon their respective members with a view to compelling him to do so. For this purpose they formed a joint committee, which appears to have been the authority appointed to determine what action should be taken by the individual members of the trade unions in respect of such building controversies, and, therefore, to have been for this purpose the agent of each of the trade unions, and of the individual members of them. Apparently this committee had power to delegate their authority to one or more individual members. I think that the evidence in this case proves that they did delegate such authority to the defendant Russell, who therefore acted in what he did as the delegate of such committee, and so of each of the three unions, and in a sense of each member of them. He, therefore, had authority to give directions to the individual members of the unions what to do in the case of building controversies. The trade unions and the joint committee seem to have come to the conclusion that a certain mode of carrying on building operations in Hull was detrimental to their interests or those of their constituents. They therefore agreed, as I have said, to a set of rules, one of which was the 9th rule which has been referred to.[27] As between themselves, the members of these

[27] This ninth rule provided "that no member of the Operative Bricklayers' Society shall be permitted, under any circumstances, to contract for or take by measurement, either in the whole or part, any kind of brickwork, brick-pointing, or plastering, that may have been contracted for or sub-contracted for under the original contract, nor to take any work of any master builder who is building property for himself; and that no member of this society shall be allowed to work on such jobs; that no member of these societies be allowed to work on any job where labor alone is contracted for."

trade unions had a perfect right to do that and to bind themselves to comply with such rules. But these rules could not bind any person who did not belong to such unions, and they had no right to enforce obedience to them by such a person. A firm of Myers & Temperton, who were builders in Hull, thought fit to carry on their business, as they had a perfect right to do, in a manner inconsistent with the terms of rule 9. The trade unions and their joint committee objected to this, and resolved to coerce the firm into carrying on their business in accordance with the rule. Failing to effect their object by direct action upon the firm, they endeavored to coerce them through the persons who dealt with them and who supplied them with the means of carrying on their business. Among these persons was the plaintiff, a brother of one of the members of the firm. They desired to coerce the firm by preventing these persons from dealing with them. The plaintiff refused to fall in with these views, and would not agree to cease dealing with his brother's firm. Having failed in preventing him from doing so by direct action upon him, they desired to overcome his resistance and to coerce him, in the same manner as they had sought to coerce the firm, viz., through the persons who had dealings with him. The joint committee in effect said that, if any person connected with the building trade in Hull should deal with the plaintiff for materials, the members of the unions should refuse to work for that person upon goods supplied by the plaintiff. They intended thus to coerce the plaintiff to comply with their views, and they contemplated that, if he did not submit, his business would be destroyed. Though, of course, in point of law such other persons might be free to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, and would be bound to perform contracts made with him, as before, in point of fact the committee knew that the probable result would be that his business would come to an end, and they thought that the prospect of this would have a strongly coercive effect upon him.

They were not, I think, actuated in their proceedings by spite or malice against the plaintiff personally in the sense that their motive was the desire to injure him, but they desired to injure him in his business in order to force him not to do what he had a perfect right to do. Amongst those who had dealings with the plaintiff were two persons named Brentano and Gibson. The result of the evidence appears to me to be that the joint committee and the defendant Russell, who was acting as the delegate of such committee, knew that Brentano had entered into a contract with the plaintiff, and also, I think, that he would in the course of his business enter in the future into other contracts with the plaintiff of a similar description. Russell lets Brentano know that, if he goes on dealing with the plaintiff, harm will come to him, because none of the workmen at Hull who are comprised in the unions will touch the materials supplied by the plaintiff or will do his work. What was said by Russell to Brentano, and the previous resolution of the committee which was made known to Brentano, clearly had the object of preventing him from carrying out the contract he had already made with the plaintiff, and I should say that the inference any fair-minded man would draw would be that they also had the object of preventing Brentano from entering into contracts with the plaintiff in the future. The object was not to injure Brentano, but to injure the plaintiff in his business, in order to force him into obedience to the views of the unions. It was argued that the steps which the joint committee and Russell, their representative, took with regard to the men working for Brentano were only what they had a perfect right to take, that they merely gave notice or advice to such workmen that the rules were being infringed, and that they should withdraw from his employment if he carried out his contract with the plaintiff, and that the workmen could then do as they liked in the matter. It may be spoken of as "notice" or "advice" argumentatively; but those words do not represent the truth of the thing. These men had bound themselves to obey; and they knew that they had done so, and that, if they did not obey, they would be fined or expelled from the union to which they belonged. It was really an order which was given to them just as much as a direction given to a servant is one. It might be said that such a direction is not an order, because the servant could not be compelled to obey it; but, if he does not, he will lose his place. The unions through their joint committee, as it appears to me, ordered their members employed by Brentano to cease to work for him if he performed his contract with the plaintiff, or if he went on dealing with the plaintiff. I think that the meaning of what Russell said to Brentano was that, if he had made a contract with the plaintiff and proceeded to perform that contract, his men would leave him; and that, if he went on dealing with the plaintiff in the future, the same result would follow. The intention was that by so acting on Brentano the plaintiff should be compelled to obey their directions, and, if he did not, that his business should be ruined. I think that there was clearly evidence to go to the jury against all the defendants of having been parties to these transactions. They were all members of the unions and of the joint committee, and they none of them went into the box except Russell, which they would have done if they could have denied that they were parties to them. The evidence against the defendants with regard to the dealings with Gibson is substantially to the same effect. This is not simply a case of men saying that they will not work for a master if he does certain things which they do not like. Brentano and Gibson were dealt with thus for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff, in order to force him into obedience to the policy of the unions, which they had no right to impose upon him.

Then what is the law applicable to these facts? The questions of law were dealt with in the argument of the defendants' counsel boldly but briefly, the main bulk of their arguments being directed to the endeavor to make out that there was no evidence that the defendants were responsible for the matters complained of. It was argued that the action for inducing persons to break a contract is confined to cases of master and servant or cases of personal service. But the case of Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333, shows that the distinction relied on is not tenable. That was not a case of master and servant. In that case the majority of the judges in the Court of Appeal approved of the view taken by the majority of the judges in Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216. Their judgment, after stating that merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact, proceeds as follows: "If the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act, if injury ensues from it. We think that it cannot be doubted that a malicious act, such as is above described, is a wrongful act in law and in fact. The act complained of in such a case as Lumley v. Gye, and which is complained of in the present case, is therefore, because malicious, wrongful. That act is a persuasion by the defendant of a third person to break a contract existing between such third person and the plaintiff. It cannot be maintained that it is not a natural and probable consequence of that act of persuasion that the third person will break his contract. It is not only the natural and probable consequence, but, by the terms of the proposition which involves the success of the persuasion, it is the actual consequence." Nothing could be more directly in point to the present case with regard to the first ground of action set up. That case is an authority which is binding on us, and it appears to me to apply to the present case.

The next point is, whether the distinction taken for the defendants between the claim for inducing persons to break contracts already entered into with the plaintiff and that for inducing persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff can be sustained, and whether the latter claim is maintainable in law. I do not think that distinction can prevail. There was the same wrongful intent in both cases, wrongful because malicious. There was the same kind of injury to the plaintiff. It seems rather a fine distinction to say that, where a defendant maliciously induces a person not to carry out a contract already made with the plaintiff and so injures the plaintiff, it is actionable, but where he injures the plaintiff by maliciously preventing a person from entering into a contract with the plaintiff, which he would otherwise have entered into, it is not actionable. At any rate it appears to me that, on the principle acted on in the case of Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 953, where defendants conspire or combine together maliciously to injure the plaintiff by preventing persons from entering into contracts with him, and injury results to the plaintiff, it is actionable. The judgments in the case of Mogul Steamship Co. v. Macgregor, Gow & Co., [1892] A. C. 25, in the House of Lords, seem to show that such a combination if followed by damage to the plaintiff is actionable. With regard to what was there said, the counsel for the defendants relied on the distinction between an indictment and a civil action, and said that, though such a combination might be the subject of an indictment for conspiracy, it could not be the subject of an action for damages. I agree that there is this distinction, viz., that, in the case of an indictment, when the conspiracy is proved the indictment is proved, but in the case of an action it is necessary to go further and to prove damage. Therefore it will not suffice in an action, if the jury only find that the defendants agreed together to take an unlawful course of action, but they do not find that it was taken and that damage resulted to the plaintiff, or if there is no evidence on which the jury can find that damage resulted to the plaintiff. But, if there is evidence, and they do find, that damage resulted to the plaintiff, then I think what Lord Bramwell said in the case of Mogul Steamship Co. v. Macgregor, Gow & Co. applies, and the action will lie. He said: "The plaintiffs also say that these things, or some of them, if done by an individual, would be actionable. This need not be determined directly, because all the things complained of have their origin in what the plaintiffs say is unlawfulness, a conspiracy to injure: so that, if actionable when done by one, much more are they when done by several, and, if not actionable when done by several, certainly they are not when done by one. It has been objected by capable persons that it is strange that that should be unlawful, if done by several, which is not if done by one, and that the thing is wrong if done by one, if wrong when done by several; if not wrong when done by one, it cannot be when done by several. I think there is an obvious answer, indeed two: one is that a man may encounter the acts of a single person, yet not be fairly matched against several; the other is that the act when done by an individual is wrong, though not punishable, because the law avoids the multiplicity of crimes: De minimis non curat lex; while if done by several it is sufficiently important to be treated as a crime." It seems to me that that language recognizes the doctrine of law as being that, if there is an agreement to take an unlawful course of action which amounts to a conspiracy, and that conspiracy causes damage to the plaintiff, an action will lie in respect of such conspiracy. It appears to me, therefore, that the combination here entered into by the defendants was wrongful both in respect of the interference with existing contracts and in respect of the prevention of contracts being entered into in the future. I cannot doubt that there was evidence from which the jury might find that people were prevented from dealing with the plaintiff by the resolution of the joint committee and the action taken by the defendants, and that the plaintiff was thereby injured, and it appears to me that the jury have so found. For there reasons I think this application must be refused.

LOPES, L. J. The case which I think must govern our decision as to the first head of claim is Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333, which I understand to lay down the broad principle that a person who induces a party to a contract to break it, intending thereby to injure another person or to get a benefit for himself, commits an actionable wrong. That appears to me to be the effect of the decision in that case, which was decided in 1881, and never appears to have been since questioned. I presume that the principle is this, viz., that the contract confers certain rights on the person with whom it is made, and not only binds the parties to it by the obligation entered into, but also imposes on all the world the duty of respecting that contractual obligation. That being the law on the subject, the jury found that the defendants did maliciously induce persons who had contracted with the plaintiff to break their contracts. It seems to me that there was abundant evidence to support that finding.

The second question in the case is with regard to inducing persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff. The question left to the jury as to that was, whether the defendants maliciously conspired to induce persons not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff, and such persons were thereby induced not to make such contracts. The jury answered that question in the affirmative. That being so, the question is whether, upon that finding, it is shown that the defendants committed an actionable wrong. I think that it is. I will state shortly what I believe to be the law on the subject. The result of the authorities appears to me to be that a combination by two or more persons to induce others not to deal with a particular individual, or enter into contracts with him, if done with the intention of injuring him, is an actionable wrong if damage results to him therefrom. That appears to me to follow from what was said in Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 953, and in the House of Lords in the case of Mogul Steamship Co. v. Macgregor, Gow & Co., [1892] A. C. 25. It was argued here that there was no evidence that any persons were induced not to enter into contracts with the plaintiff. I cannot agree with that contention. I think there was sufficient evidence to that effect, and that injury was thereby occasioned to the plaintiff. For these reasons, I think that the verdict ought to stand, and this application should be dismissed.[28] Application dismissed.

(Court of Appeal in Ireland. [1899] 2 I. R. 744.)

Lord Ashbourne, C. This is an action instituted by Mr. Leathem, a flesher or butcher of Lisburn, against five fleshers' assistants and members of the Journeymen Butchers' Assistants' Association, to recover damages for maliciously and wrongfully procuring certain persons to break contracts into which they had entered with the plaintiff, and not to enter into other contracts with the plaintiff; and for maliciously and wrongfully enticing and procuring certain workmen in the employment of the said persons to leave the service of their employers, and to break their contracts of service with intent to injure the plaintiff, and to prevent the said persons from carrying out their contracts with the plaintiff; and for maliciously and wrongfully intimidating the said persons, and coercing them to break their contracts with the plaintiff, and intimidating the servants in their employ, and coercing them to leave the service of their employers; and for unlawfully conspiring together, and with certain other persons, to do the acts aforesaid with intent to injure the plaintiff.

The case was tried at the Summer Assizes of 1896, at Belfast, before Lord Justice FitzGibbon, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The Queen's Bench Division (Palles, C. B., dissenting) has upheld that verdict, and the defendants have brought the case before this Court on appeal.

The facts of the case are few and simple, and can be stated very shortly. The plaintiff offended the defendants by employing some men not members of the defendants' Association, and refused to dismiss them when requested. The plaintiff appears to have tried to come to an amicable agreement with the defendants' Association, and attended a meeting of theirs, where he practically offered to pay the dues and charges requisite to have his non-union men admitted to the Association, and thus remove the sole ground of trade dispute. In his evidence he says: "Shaw objected, and said my men should be put out and walk the streets for twelve months. I said it was a hard case to make a man with nine small children walk the streets for twelve months, and that I would not submit to it." The defendants then called out the plaintiff's union assistants, and induced one of them to break his contract of service, thus causing possibly some inconvenience to the plaintiff, though not much loss, as labour appears to have been abundant in the neighborhood.

The plaintiff, however, alleged a much graver element of loss, in the successful efforts of the defendants to prevent his customers dealing with him. Some evidence was given as to three, but attention may be concentrated on one. His principal customer appears to have been a Belfast butcher called Munce, who had dealt with him in a very large way for a great number of years. The course of dealing between them was that the plaintiff delivered a very extensive consignment of meat every week to Munce, which was invariably paid for in due course. The defendants determined to "put a screw" on Munce to withdraw his custom from the plaintiff, and he, yielding to a threat that his assistants would be otherwise called out, reluctantly telegraphed to the plaintiff to cease sending him meat.

The action of the defendants in reference to Munce was the cause of the most serious loss sustained by the plaintiff, and was the main element of damage proved by him at the trial. Unquestionably, the plaintiff was deprived of his best customer through the action of the defendants. A course of dealing most profitable for the plaintiff was broken owing to their intervention. No formal contract may have existed between the plaintiff and Munce, though possibly one might have been implied from week to week, determinable only by adequate notice. But the real ground of large damage was the driving away of the plaintiff's best customer by the combined action of the defendants, and their deliberate damage to a most lucrative part of his trade. In addition, his name was put on a "black list" under circumstances fully detailed in evidence.

Lord Justice FitzGibbon, in charging the jury, told them to ask themselves the question whether the action of the defendants was or was not taken for the purpose of injuring Leathem in his trade or business, as distinguished from being action for the legitimate advancement of the interest of the men themselves. He pointed out that "maliciously" meant with intent to injure, as distinguished from advancing their own interests. He also told them that in calculating damages they were to consider money injury to the plaintiff in his business; but in considering the amount they were not bound to confine themselves to £ s. d. that could be proved.

The learned Lord Justice left three questions to the jury: First, Did the defendants, or any of them, maliciously induce the plaintiff's customers or servants named in the evidence to refuse to deal, or to continue, with the plaintiff? Second, Did the defendants, or any of them, maliciously conspire to induce the plaintiff's customers and servants not to deal with the plaintiff, or not to continue in his employment, and whether the persons thereby induced did so? Third, Did the defendants Davey, Dornan, and Shaw, or any of them, publish the "black list" with the intention of injuring the plaintiff? The jury answered the first and second questions in the affirmative against all the defendants, assessing the damages at £200; they also answered the third question in the affirmative against the three defendants named therein, assessing the damages at £50. It was conceded in the argument that no separate damages could be given on the third question, and it may therefore be disregarded in the consideration of the case.

The case of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, had not been decided in the House of Lords at the time of the trial before Lord Justice FitzGibbon, and the argument addressed to us substantially amounted to a contention that the decision of the House of Lords had rendered it impossible to uphold the verdict in the present case, and had practically swept away the authority of Temperton v. Russell, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, on which the plaintiff might have otherwise relied.

The case of Temperton v. Russell, ibid., was unquestionably very like the present in its essential particulars. * * *[29] [29] Parts of the opinion of Lord Ashbourne, C., and the opinions of Porter, M. R., and Walker and Holmes, L. JJ., are omitted.

Before considering how far this decision is affected by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, I should like to refer to the case of the Mogul Steamship Company v. Macgregor & Co., [1892] A. C. 25, when the House of Lords laid down what could not be charged as a conspiracy to injure. The facts of that case are important.

"Owners of ships, in order to secure a carrying trade exclusively for themselves and at profitable rates, formed an association, and agreed that the number of ships to be sent by members of the association to the loading port, the division of cargoes and the freights to be demanded, should be the subject of regulation, that a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freights should be allowed to all shippers who shipped only with members; and that agents of members should be prohibited on pain of dismissal from acting in the interest of competing shipowners; any member to be at liberty to withdraw on giving certain notices. The plaintiffs, who were shipowners excluded from the association, sent ships to the loading ports to endeavour to obtain cargoes. The associated owners thereupon sent more ships to the port, underbid the plaintiffs, and reduced freights so low that the plaintiffs were obliged to carry at unremunerative rates. They also threatened to dismiss certain agents if they loaded the plaintiffs' ships, and circulated a notice that the rebate of 5 per cent. would not be allowed to any person who shipped cargoes on the plaintiffs' vessels. The plaintiffs having brought an action for damages against the associated owners alleging a conspiracy to injure the plaintiffs: Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal (23 Q. B. D. 598), that since the acts of the defendants were done with the lawful object of protecting and extending their trade and increasing their profits, and since they had not employed any unlawful means, the plaintiffs had no cause of action."

It will thus be seen that the case of Temperton v. Russell, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, is very like, while the Mogul Case, [1892] A. C. 25, is very unlike, the present; but each throws a flood of light on the principles which should guide our decision.

The facts of the case of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, have been stated so often that it is only necessary to refer to them very shortly. Flood and Taylor, the plaintiffs, were employed as shipwrights by the Glengall Iron Company, on the terms that they might be discharged at any time. The jury found that Allen, the defendant, maliciously induced the Company to discharge Flood and Taylor from the Company's employment and not to engage them, and that each had suffered £20 damages. The case, when finally presented for decision, was not one of conspiracy or unlawful combination.

None of the noble and learned Lords who concurred in the opinion of the majority laid it down that their decision would apply to a case of conspiracy, and several of them expressly guarded themselves against their judgments being quoted as applicable to a case of conspiracy. * * *

How does the decision of Allen v. Flood affect the authority of Temperton v. Russell? How does it necessarily compel us to regard the case as no longer entitled to weight? In my opinion it leaves entirely untouched and unshaken the larger part of that case—that in respect of which £200 damages was awarded for conspiracy.

In the present case the jury has expressly found that the defendants maliciously conspired to induce the plaintiff's customers and servants not to deal with the plaintiff, and not to continue in his service, and that he was damaged thereby to the extent of £200. Lord Justice FitzGibbon was careful to express what was meant by "maliciously"; and I take it that the jury found and meant that the defendants acted with motive and intention to injure and punish the plaintiff, and not to advance their own interests, or to further their own trade objects. I am disposed to think that there was evidence of coercion and intimidation; but as the jury did not return any separate finding on the subject, I do not enter on the subject as a separate or independent topic.

The Mogul Steamship Company's Case, [1892] A. C. 25, shows how carefully the law protects all legitimate trade competition, and that the law will not allow it to be interfered with because the combination which is formed for legal purposes is styled a conspiracy. On the other hand the case of Temperton v. Russell, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, shows that where the elements of a real conspiracy to injure exist, the law will not deny relief to a man who is thereby damaged.

I am unable to concur in the interesting argument founded on section 3 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875. I cannot regard the acts of the defendants as being done in contemplation and furtherance of a trade dispute; and I am also impressed by the argument of Mr. Justice Andrews that the enactment deals with criminal responsibility only, and not with the right of redress for civil wrongs.

I am unable to find anything in the case of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, as decided by the House of Lords, to apply to a case of conspiracy like the present; I can see nothing to justify our sending the case for a new trial; I think that the verdict for £200 damages should be upheld, and the decision of the Queen's Bench Division for that amount affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

QUINN, Appellant, and LEATHEM, Respondent.

(House of Lords, [1901] A. C. 495.)

Leathem brought an action in Ireland, against five defendants, and in the Queen's Bench Division obtained a judgment, on two causes of action, against all five, for £200 damages, and on an alleged third cause, the publication of a black list, had judgment in the further sum of £50 damages against three of the defendants. In the Irish Court of Appeal the decision below was affirmed as to the judgment for the £200 damages. Quinn, one of the five defendants, appealed.[30]

LORD LINDLEY. My Lords, the case of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, has so important a bearing on the present appeal that it is necessary to ascertain exactly what this House really decided in that celebrated case.[31]

It was an action by two workmen of an iron company against three members of a trade union, namely, Allen and two others, for maliciously, wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, procuring and inducing the iron company to discharge the plaintiffs. The action was tried before Kennedy, J., who ruled that there was no evidence to go to the jury of conspiracy, intimidation, coercion, or breach of contract. The result of the trial was that the plaintiffs obtained a verdict and judgment against Allen alone. He appealed, and the only question which this House had to determine was whether what he had done entitled the plaintiffs to maintain their action against him. What the jury found that he had done was, that he had maliciously induced the employers of the plaintiffs to discharge them, whereby the plaintiffs suffered damage. Different views were taken by the noble Lords who heard the appeal as to Allen's authority to call out the members of the union, and also as to the means used by Allen to induce the employers of the plaintiffs to discharge them; but, in the opinion of the noble Lords who formed the majority of your Lordships' House, all that Allen did was to inform the employers of the plaintiffs that most of their workmen would leave them if they did not discharge the plaintiffs. There being no question of conspiracy, intimidation, coercion, or breach of contract, for consideration by the House, and the majority of their Lordships having come to the conclusion that Allen had done no more than I have stated, the majority of the noble Lords held that the action against Allen would not lie; that he had infringed no right of the plaintiffs; that he had done nothing which he had no legal right to do, and that the fact that he had acted maliciously and with intent to injure the plaintiffs did not, without more, entitle the plaintiffs to maintain the action.

[30] The statement of facts is abridged, and the arguments of counsel and parts of Lord Lindley's opinion are omitted.

In the House of Lords, there were elaborate opinions, all concurring, from the Earl of Halsbury, L. C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord Shand, Lord Brampton, and Lord Lindley.

[31] On Allen v. Flood, the report of which in the House of Lords runs to 180 pages ([1898] A. C. 1–181), see Salmond on Torts (3d Ed.) 473, distinguishing the case from Quinn v. Leathem.

My Lords, this decision, as I understand it, establishes two propositions: one a far-reaching and extremely important proposition of law, and the other a comparatively unimportant proposition of mixed law and fact, useful as a guide, but of a very different character from the first.

The first and important proposition is that an act otherwise lawful, although harmful, does not become actionable by being done maliciously in the sense of proceeding from a bad motive, and with intent to annoy or harm another. This is a legal doctrine not new or laid down for the first time in Allen v. Flood; it had been gaining ground for some time, but it was never before so fully and authoritatively expounded as in that case. In applying this proposition care, however, must be taken to bear in mind, first, that in Allen v. Flood criminal responsibility had not to be considered. It would revolutionize criminal law to say that the criminal responsibility for conduct never depends on intention. Secondly, it must be borne in mind that even in considering a person's liability to civil proceedings the proposition in question only applies to "acts otherwise lawful," i. e., to acts involving no breach of duty, or, in other words, no wrong to any one. I shall refer to this matter later on.

The second proposition is that what Allen did infringed no right of the plaintiffs, even although he acted maliciously and with a view to injure them. I have already stated what he did, and all that he did, in the opinion of the majority of the noble Lords. If their view of the facts was correct, their conclusion that Allen infringed no right of the plaintiffs is perfectly intelligible, and indeed unavoidable. Truly, to inform a person that others will annoy or injure him unless he acts in a particular way cannot of itself be actionable, whatever the motive or intention of the informant may have been.

My Lords, the questions whether Allen had more power over the men than some of their Lordships thought, and whether Allen did more than they thought, are mere questions of fact. Neither of these questions is a question of law, and no court or jury is bound as a matter of law to draw from the facts before it inferences of fact similar to those drawn by noble Lords from the evidence relating to Allen in the case before them.

I will pass now to the facts of this case, and consider (1) what the plaintiff's rights were; (2) what the defendants' conduct was; (3) whether that conduct infringed the plaintiff's rights. For the sake of clearness it will be convenient to consider these questions in the first place apart from the statute which legalizes strikes, and in the next place with reference to that statute.

1. As to the plaintiff's rights. He had the ordinary rights of a British subject. He was at liberty to earn his own living in his own way, provided he did not violate some special law prohibiting him from so doing, and provided he did not infringe the rights of other people. This liberty involved liberty to deal with other persons who were willing to deal with him. This liberty is a right recognized by law; its correlative is the general duty of every one not to prevent the free exercise of this liberty, except so far as his own liberty of action may justify him in so doing. But a person's liberty or right to deal with others is nugatory, unless they are at liberty to deal with him if they choose to do so. Any interference with their liberty to deal with him affects him. If such interference is justifiable in point of law, he has no redress. Again, if such interference is wrongful, the only person who can sue in respect of it is, as a rule, the person immediately affected by it; another who suffers by it has usually no redress; the damage to him is too remote, and it would be obviously practically impossible and highly inconvenient to give legal redress to all who suffered from such wrongs. But if the interference is wrongful and is intended to damage a third person, and he is damaged in fact—in other words, if he is wrongfully and intentionally struck at through others, and is thereby damnified—the whole aspect of the case is changed: the wrong done to others reaches him, his rights are infringed although indirectly, and damage to him is not remote or unforeseen, but is the direct consequence of what has been done. Our law, as I understand it, is not so defective as to refuse him a remedy by an action under such circumstances. The cases collected in the old books on actions on the case, and the illustrations given by the late Bowen, L. J., in his admirable judgment in the Mogul Steamship Company's Case, 23 Q. B. D. 613, 614, may be referred to in support of the foregoing conclusion, and I do not understand the decision in Allen v. Flood to be opposed to it.

If the above reasoning is correct, Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216, was rightly decided, as I am of opinion it clearly was. Further, the principle involved in it cannot be confined to inducements to break contracts of service, nor indeed to inducements to break any contracts. The principle which underlies the decision reaches all wrongful acts done intentionally to damage a particular individual and actually damaging him. Temperton v. Russell, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, ought to have been decided and may be upheld on this principle. That case was much criticised in Allen v. Flood, and not without reason; for, according to the judgment of Lord Esher, the defendants' liability depended on motive or intention alone, whether anything wrong was done or not. This went too far, as was pointed out in Allen v. Flood. But in Temperton v. Russell there was a wrongful act, namely, conspiracy and unjustifiable interference with Brentano, who dealt with the plaintiff. This wrongful act warranted the decision, which I think was right.

2. I pass on to consider what the defendants did. The appellant and two of the other defendants were the officers of a trade union, and the jury have found that the defendants wrongfully and maliciously induced the customers of the plaintiff to refuse to deal with him, and maliciously conspired to induce them not to deal with him. There were similar findings as to inducing servants of the plaintiff to leave him. What the defendants did was to threaten to call out the union workmen of the plaintiff and of his customers if he would not discharge some non-union men in his employ. In other words, in order to compel the plaintiff to discharge some of his men, the defendants threatened to put the plaintiff and his customers, and persons lawfully working for them, to all the inconvenience they could without using violence. The defendants' conduct was the more reprehensible because the plaintiff offered to pay the fees necessary to enable his non-union men to become members of the defendants' union; but this would not satisfy the defendants. The facts of this case are entirely different from those which this House had to consider in Allen v. Flood. In the present case there was no dispute between the plaintiff and his men. None of them wanted to leave his employ. Nor was there any dispute between the plaintiff's customers and their own men, nor between the plaintiff and his customers, nor between the men they respectively employed. The defendants called no witnesses, and there was no evidence to justify or excuse the conduct of the defendants. That they acted as they did in furtherance of what they considered the interests of union men may probably be fairly assumed in their favour, although they did not come forward and say so themselves; but that is all that can be said for them. No one can, I think, say that the verdict was not amply warranted by the evidence. I have purposely said nothing about the black list, as the learned judge who tried the case considered that the evidence did not connect the appellant with that list. But the black list was, in my opinion, a very important feature in the case.

3. The remaining question is whether such conduct infringed the plaintiff's rights so as to give him a cause of action. In my opinion, it plainly did. The defendants were doing a great deal more than exercising their own rights: they were dictating to the plaintiff and his customers and servants what they were to do. The defendants were violating their duty to the plaintiff and his customers and servants, which was to leave them in the undisturbed enjoyment of their liberty of action as already explained. What is the legal justification or excuse for such conduct? None is alleged and none can be found. This violation of duty by the defendants resulted in damage to the plaintiff—not remote, but immediate and intended. The intention to injure the plaintiff negatives all excuses and disposes of any question of remoteness of damage. Your lordships have to deal with a case, not of damnum absque injuria, but of damnum cum injuria.

Every element necessary to give a cause of action on ordinary principles of law is present in this case. As regards authorities, they were all exhaustively examined in the Mogul Steamship Co. v. MacGregor and Allen v. Flood, and it is unnecessary to dwell upon them again. I have examined all those which are important, and I venture to say that there is not a single decision anterior to Allen v. Flood in favour of the appellant. His sheet anchor is Allen v. Flood, which is far from covering this case, and which can only be made to cover it by greatly extending its operation.

It was contended at the bar that if what was done in this case had been done by one person only, his conduct would not have been actionable, and that the fact that what was done was effected by many acting in concert makes no difference. My Lords, one man without others behind him who would obey his orders could not have done what these defendants did. One man exercising the same control over others as these defendants had could have acted as they did, and, if he had done so, I conceive that he would have committed a wrong towards the plaintiff for which the plaintiff could have maintained an action. I am aware that in Allen v. Flood, Lord Herschell, at pp. 128, 138, expressed his opinion to be that it was immaterial whether Allen said he would call the men out or not. This may have been so in that particular case, as there was evidence that Allen had no power to call out the men, and the men had determined to strike before Allen had anything to do with the matter. But if Lord Herschell meant to say that as a matter of law there is no difference between giving information that men will strike, and making them strike, or threatening to make them strike, by calling them out when they do not want to strike, I am unable to concur with him. It is all very well to talk about peaceable persuasion. It may be that in Allen v. Flood, there was nothing more; but here there was very much more. What may begin as peaceable persuasion may easily become, and in trades union disputes generally does become, peremptory ordering, with threats open or covert of very unpleasant consequences to those who are not persuaded. Calling workmen out involves very serious consequences to such of them as do not obey. Black lists are real instruments of coercion, as every man whose name is on one soon discovers to his cost. A combination not to work is one thing, and is lawful. A combination to prevent others from working by annoying them if they do is a very different thing, and is prima facie unlawful. Again, not to work oneself is lawful so long as one keeps off the poor-rates, but to order men not to work when they are willing to work is another thing. A threat to call men out given by a trade union official to an employer of men belonging to the union and willing to work with him is a form of coercion, intimidation, molestation, or annoyance to them and to him very difficult to resist, and, to say the least, requiring justification. None was offered in this case.

My Lords, it is said that conduct which is not actionable on the part of one person cannot be actionable if it is that of several acting in concert. This may be so where many do no more than one is supposed to do. But numbers may annoy and coerce where one may not. Annoyance and coercion by many may be so intolerable as to become actionable, and produce a result which one alone could not produce. I am aware of the difficulties which surround the law of conspiracy both in its criminal and civil aspects; and older views have been greatly and, if I may say so, most beneficially modified by the discussions and decisions in America and this country. Amongst the American cases I would refer especially to Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, where coercion by other means than violence, or threats of it, was held unlawful. In this country it is now settled by the decision of this House in the case of the Mogul Steamship Co., [1892] A. C. 25, 23 Q. B. D. 598, that no action for a conspiracy lies against persons who act in concert to damage another and do damage him, but who at the same time merely exercise their own rights and who infringe no rights of other people. Allen v. Flood emphasizes the same doctrine. The principle was strikingly illustrated in the Scottish Co-operative Society v. Glasgow Fleshers' Association (1898) 35 Sc. L. R. 645, which was referred to in the course of the argument. In this case some butchers induced some salesmen not to sell meat to the plaintiffs. The means employed were to threaten the salesmen that if they continued to sell meat to the plaintiffs, they, the butchers, would not buy from the salesmen. There was nothing unlawful in this, and the learned judge held that the plaintiffs showed no cause of action, although the butchers' object was to prevent the plaintiffs from buying for co-operative societies in competition with themselves, and the defendants were acting in concert.

The cardinal point of distinction between such cases and the present is that in them, although damage was intentionally inflicted on the plaintiffs, no one's right was infringed—no wrongful act was committed; whilst in the present case the coercion of the plaintiff's customers and servants, and of the plaintiff through them, was an infringement of their liberty as well as his, and was wrongful both to them and also to him, as I have already endeavoured to show.

Intentional damage which arises from the mere exercise of the rights of many is not, I apprehend, actionable by our law as now settled. To hold the contrary would be unduly to restrict the liberty of one set of persons in order to uphold the liberty of another set. According to our law, competition, with all its drawbacks, not only between individuals, but between associations, and between them and individuals, is permissible, provided nobody's rights are infringed. The law is the same for all persons, whatever their callings: it applies to masters as well as to men; the proviso, however, is all-important, and it also applies to both, and limits the rights of those who combine to lock-out as well as the rights of those who strike. But coercion by threats, open or disguised, not only of bodily harm but of serious annoyance and damage, is prima facie, at all events, a wrong inflicted on the persons coerced; and in considering whether coercion has been applied or not, numbers cannot be disregarded. * * *

I conclude this part of the case by saying that, in my opinion, the direction given to the jury by the learned judge who tried the case was correct, so far as the liability of the defendants turns on principles of common law, and that the objection taken to it by the counsel for the appellant is untenable. I mean the objection that the learned judge did not distinguish between coercion to break contracts of service, and coercion to break contracts of other kinds, and coercion not to enter into contracts. * * *

My Lords, I will detain your Lordships no longer. Allen v. Flood is in many respects a very valuable decision, but it may be easily misunderstood and carried too far.

Your Lordships are asked to extend it and to destroy that individual liberty which our laws so anxiously guard. The appellant seeks by means of Allen v. Flood, and by logical reasoning based upon some passages in the judgments given by the noble Lords who decided it, to drive your Lordships to hold that boycotting by trades unions in one of its most objectionable forms is lawful, and gives no cause of action to its victims although they may be pecuniarily ruined thereby.

My Lords, so to hold would, in my opinion, be contrary to well-settled principles of English law, and would be to do what is not yet authorized by any statute or legal decision.

In my opinion this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

READ v. FRIENDLY SOCIETY OF OPERATIVE STONEMASONS OF ENGLAND, IRELAND AND WALES et al.

(Court of Appeal. [1902] 2 K. B. 732.)

COLLINS, M. R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by the defendants from the decision of the Divisional Court ordering a new trial of a case decided by a county court judge in favour of the defendants. There is a cross-appeal by the plaintiff asking that this Court should give judgment for the plaintiff with damages. The Court below, while agreed that the decision was unsatisfactory, were divided as to the relief; Darling, J., and Channell, J., holding that there ought to be a new trial, while Lord Alverstone, C. J., was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The parties agreed before them and before us that if judgment were given for the plaintiff the Court should assess the damages.

The facts are stated in the judgments as reported below, and I need do no more than summarize them for the purpose of this judgment. The claim was for £50 damages for wrongfully and maliciously inducing Messrs. Wigg & Wright to break their contract of apprenticeship with the plaintiff. The evidence for the plaintiff was that he had become bound by an indenture of apprenticeship to Messrs. Wigg & Wright, stonemasons, of Ipswich, whereby they undertook to teach him the trade of a mason, paying him wages of 15s. a week during a period of three years. Messrs. Wigg & Wright had in their capacity as masters agreed to certain working rules with the defendant society, one of which (6) was as follows: "That boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons. Employers to have one apprentice to every four masons on an average." The plaintiff's father was a mason. The plaintiff was not a member of the society, and was twenty-five years of age when he entered into the indenture of apprenticeship. The defendant society in concert with the other defendants, on becoming aware that the plaintiff had been taken as an apprentice by Messrs. Wigg & Wright, took steps to enforce compliance by them with rule 6 as interpreted by the defendants by threatening in the language of their letter set out in Darling, J.'s, judgment: "If the man in question (the plaintiff) starts working at the trade, we are bound to protest against you for introducing an individual not of the trade; and in accordance with our general rule we have empowered our members working for your firm to take prompt action in the matter. We regret the thing has occurred, but we feel that the blame does not rest with us in any way." This was in effect a threat that they would call out the workmen in Messrs. Wigg & Wright's employ, all of whom were members of the defendant society, and, as was explained by counsel, if so empowered, would be supported while off work out of the funds of the society. Messrs. Wigg & Wright disputed the construction placed by the defendants on rule 6, contending, and as I think rightly, that it did not extend to masons' sons. Feeling, however, that they could not resist the coercion brought to bear on them, they dismissed the plaintiff. It was not suggested before us that the acts complained of were not all done by the defendants in concert. The plaintiff has therefore lost the opportunity, which he was lawfully entitled to, of emerging from the position of a labourer at 15s. a week to that of a mason who may earn up to 35s. and he has brought his action accordingly. No evidence was called for the defendants, and no proof given of assent by Messrs. Wigg & Wright to any rules other than those put in, of which rule 6 is one.

On these facts the learned county court judge held as follows: "I hold that the facts as proved and admitted before me fall short of giving any ground of action against the defendants. The defendants seem to me to have acted bona fide in the best interests of the society of masons, and not to have been in any way actuated by any improper motives. They gave a certain interpretation to rule 6 and acted upon it, and though their interpretation may or may not be correct, as it was honestly held, I do not consider they have acted improperly in their method of enforcing it."

On these facts the case seems to me to be clear. The plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the contract which he had made, and that benefit he would have continued to enjoy but for the intervention of the defendants. The object of the defendants' intervention was to deprive him of that benefit. The facts leave no room for doubt as to that. He was not a member of their society, and was under no obligation, legal or moral, to conform to their rules. In these circumstances they conspired to enforce, by threats of a formidable character which they had the means of carrying into effect, a breach by his employers and instructors of the contract which the latter had with him; and the only justification they can suggest for this conduct is that Messrs. Wigg & Wright had come under an obligation to them, not perhaps legally enforceable, if not illegal, not to make such a contract as they had made with the plaintiff. But the justification to be of any avail must cover their whole conduct, the means they used as well as the end they had in view. As against Messrs. Wigg & Wright they had whatever rights within the law the rules assented to by Messrs. Wigg & Wright afforded them. But to combine to coerce them, by threats of the character I have described, to break their contract with the plaintiff was in my judgment an illegal act carried out by illegal means. They cannot be in a better position if the rules are unenforceable than they would have been had a breach of them given them a legal cause of action. But in such case how can they possibly justify taking the law into their own hands and compelling the opposing litigant by coercion to give effect to their view of a disputed obligation by breaking his contract with the plaintiff? Further, does not such conduct demonstrate that their object was to defeat the plaintiff's purpose of becoming a mason? Belief, however honest, that in what they did they were acting in the best interest of the society of masons could be no excuse for conspiring to deprive the plaintiff of the advantages of his contract. Persuasion by an individual for the purpose of depriving another person of the benefit of a contract, if it is effectual in bringing about a breach of the contract to the damage of that person, gives a cause of action: Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216; and a strong belief on the part of the persuader that he is acting for his own interests does not seem to me to improve his position in any respect. Still less can it do so when he does not confine himself to persuasion, but joins with others to enforce their common interests at the plaintiff's expense by coercion. "That a conspiracy to injure —an oppressive combination—differs widely from an invasion of civil rights by a single individual cannot be doubted." See per Lord Macnaghten in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, at p. 511, and per Lord Brampton in the same case, [1901] A. C. at pp. 528 et seq. It seems to me, therefore, that this case stands wholly outside the debateable ground traversed in the discussion of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1. The action of the defendants was as clearly malicious, or, if the phrase be preferred, "without just cause or excuse," as in Lumley v. Gye, which, as well as Temperton v. Russell, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, has been finally established in Quinn v. Leathem to be a binding authority. "There are," says Lord Watson in Allen v. Flood, [1898] A C. 1, at p. 96, "in my opinion, two grounds only upon which a person who procures the act of another can be made legally responsible for its consequences. In the first place, he will incur liability if he knowingly and for his own ends induces that other person to commit an actionable wrong. In the second place, when the act induced is within the right of the immediate actor, and is therefore not wrongful in so far as he is concerned, it may yet be to the detriment of a third party; and in that case * * * the inducer may be held liable if he can be shewn to have procured his object by the use of illegal means directed against that third party." This view is approved by Lord Macnaghten and treated by him as embodying the opinion of the majority in that case. Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, at p. 509. The present case inevitably falls under one or other of those propositions, and I think within both. The defendants did knowingly and for their own ends induce the commission of an actionable wrong, and they employed illegal means to bring it about. Such conduct would be actionable in an individual and incapable of justification, a fortiori where the defendants acted in concert. These considerations seem to me to exclude from discussion in this case the illustrations given in argument of what might in given circumstances be "just cause," or, in other words, suffice to negative malice. There was no relation between the defendants and either of the parties in this case at all analogous to those existing in the instances put of father and child, or doctor and patient, which I leave for solution when the case arises. The defendants have no higher immunity from legal obligations than any other members of the community, and if they have legal rights they can enforce them by legal means only. It is not at all necessary in this case to embark upon the question whether "without just cause" is a complete equivalent for what was meant in the common law by malice. I am inclined to think that, though in many cases adequate as a description, it is not co-extensive with it, nor do I think that in civil actions any more than in criminal it will be possible to eliminate motives from the discussion. See the weighty observations of Lord Brampton on this point in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, at p. 524. It is, however, very desirable to guard against the notion that if the act done be illegal "just cause" may still be averred to purge the wrong. For instance, where illegal means have been used to bring about the breach of a contract to the detriment of a party thereto, "just cause" cannot come into the discussion at all. The use of illegal means evidenced malice, and in this connection malice was not equivalent to "without just cause." The cause of intervention might be just, but the means used to enforce it might be illegal. The common law action threw the burden of proof on the plaintiff. It was not enough for him to shew that the defendant had brought about the breach of a contract between a third party and the plaintiff. He had to shew that it was done maliciously, and the burden of proving malice lay upon him. It was not a case of a prima facie cause of action based on the fact that a breach of contract had been brought about to the detriment of the plaintiff, party thereto, by a stranger to the contract. The common law did not lightly extend rights arising out of contracts to and against persons not parties thereto, owing to the absence of privity. (See the cases collected in the notes to Pasley v. Freeman, 2 Sm. L. C. [10th Ed.] 64.) Some nexus had to be established between the plaintiff and the stranger, and this was found in malice. Unless the plaintiff could shew this he failed to bring the stranger into such relations with him as to ground a cause of action, and, therefore, the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove a cause of action, not upon the defendant to justify. I think some confusion has crept into the discussions on this matter through want of sufficient regard to these elementary points.

I think the materials before us are sufficient to enable us to enter judgment, and I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that the defendants' appeal should be dismissed and the plaintiff's cross-appeal allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £50.[32]

HOLBROOK et al. v. MORRISON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1913. 214 Mass. 209, 100 N. E. 1111, 44 L. R. A. [N. S.] 228, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 824.)

MORTON, J. The complainants are dealers in real estate and own a number of lots on Wellington Hill in the Dorchester district of the city of Boston. The respondent owns a house and lot abutting on two of the lots belonging to the complainants and in close proximity to the others. She has caused to be placed on the front of her house a large sign headed with the words "For Sale," and concluding with the words "Best Offer from Colored Family," all in large letters. The first entrance onto Wellington Hill and the way prospective purchasers would take in going there is past her house. She has also caused, it is alleged, advertisements of like tenor to be inserted in the "Boston Globe," a newspaper of large circulation, and has threatened and is threatening to sell her house and lot to a colored family. This is a bill to restrain the respondent from maliciously interfering with the complainants' business by means of such sign and advertisements and by such threats. The bill alleges that the effect of the respondent's acts has been greatly to injure the sale of the complainants' lots and that the respondent's purpose is to injure the complainants' business, and that she has no real intention of selling her house and lot to members of the negro race.

The case was heard by a single justice and comes here on a report by him of the evidence and of a finding made by him "that the respondent did not put up the sign for the sole purpose of selling her property, but that she did so for the purpose of annoying the complainants." This finding was made by the single justice "without going into the question of whether she [the respondent] was justified in having that ill feeling"; and the report concludes, "such decree to be entered by the court as justice and equity may require."

It appeared from the uncontradicted evidence that the threatened sale by the respondent of her house and lot to a colored family has injured and will continue to injure the business of the complainants unless prevented. We interpret the finding made by the single justice as meaning that one purpose which the respondent had in putting up the sign and in advertising her property as she did was to sell it. She also had the purpose, as he finds, of annoying the complainants.

There can be no doubt that the respondent has the right to advertise her property for sale by signs or otherwise in the usual way, and to sell it if she sees fit to a negro family, even though the effect may be to impair the business of the complainants; just as, for instance, the owner of land on a hillside may cultivate it in the usual way even though the effect of the surface drainage may be to fill up his neighbor's millpond below. Middlesex Co. v. McCue, 149 Mass. 103, 21 N. E. 230, 14 Am. St. Rep. 402. Does the presence in the sign and advertisements of a malevolent motive quoad the complainants although they are not named, intended to annoy and in fact annoying and injuring the complainants' business by announcing in effect that the property is for sale to a colored family change what otherwise would be a legal right into an actionable wrong? It would seem clear according to our own decisions that it does not. Rideout v. Knox, 148 Mass. 368, 19 N. E. 390, 2 L. R. A. 81, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560; Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 118; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555. See, also, Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49; Mahan v. Brown, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 261, 28 Am. Dec. 461. In the present case it is plain, as we have said, that the respondent has the right, if she sees fit to do so, to sell her house and lot to a negro family whatever the effect may be upon the complainants' business and property. If she had put up the sign and had caused the advertisements to be inserted without any real intention as alleged in the bill of selling her property but solely with the purpose of injuring the business and property of the complainants, there can be no doubt that such conduct on her part would have been actionable. As was said in Rideout v. Knox, 148 Mass. 368, 372, 19 N. E. 390, 391 (2 L. R. A. 81, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560), "the right to use one's property for the sole purpose of injuring others is not one of the immediate rights of ownership." But as we have construed the finding of the single justice, one of her purposes in putting up the sign was to sell her property, which was a lawful purpose and one of the indefeasible rights of ownership. The case is different, therefore, from Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307, 9 Am. St. Rep. 689; Quinn v. Leatham [1901] A. C. 495, and other similar cases relied on or referred to by the complainants into which we do not deem it necessary to go, where the motive was wholly malicious and the case lacked the element of justification which is present here. If the offering of her property for sale by the respondent in the manner in which it has been offered had been or had been found to be a mere pretext on her part for the purpose of gratifying her spite and ill will towards the complainants, or if that had been her dominant and controlling purpose there would have been no justification for her conduct. But there is no finding to that effect. On the contrary it is found that one purpose which she has is to sell her property, which is a legitimate purpose, and to enable her to accomplish it she has a right to as wide a market as she can command by advertisements and signs or otherwise. She has a right to ask for bids from white people or colored people, or both. She is not limited to bidders of any particular race or class or creed. And if one of her purposes in asking for bids from colored families is to annoy and injure the complainants, and she succeeds in doing so, her conduct is not thereby rendered unlawful so long as her object is to procure a purchaser for and to sell her house and lot. It follows that the bill must be dismissed.

Bill dismissed with costs.[33]

[33] Compare: Falloon v. Schilling (1883) 29 Kan. 292, 44 Am. Rep. 642, where the facts were thus given by Brewer, J.: "The facts, as stated in the petition, are that defendant was the owner of a tract of eighty acres adjoining the town of Hiawatha. Out of this tract he conveyed three-fourths of an acre to one Oscar Spalsbury, which last-named tract by sundry conveyances passed to and became the property of plaintiff. It was his homestead. His family consisted of himself, wife, and two boys aged respectively six and one years. Plaintiff's dwelling-house is located within thirteen feet of the east line of his lot, and has three windows opening on that side. The town of Hiawatha has been growing rapidly for the last few years, and there is quite a demand for town lots. The eighty-acre tract, which as alleged was once wholly owned by defendant, is eligibly situated for the purposes of an addition to the town of Hiawatha, and defendant was anxious to lay off the entire eighty acres as such as an addition. He offered plaintiff $1,600 for his property, which was refused, the same being reasonably worth $1,900 or $2,000. Thereupon defendant conceived the oppressive and unlawful idea of rendering plaintiff's home obnoxious and unendurable to himself and family by erecting cheap tenement houses on either side of plaintiff's land, and filling them with worthless negroes, that they might annoy plaintiff's wife, who is a person in delicate health, and thereby punish plaintiff for refusing defendant's inadequate offer for the property. In pursuance of this purpose, defendant started to build one of these tenement houses directly on the line of plaintiff's land, and thus distant only thirteen feet from plaintiff's house. Upon these facts the petition prays for an injunction restraining the defendant from erecting such buildings."

GAGNON et al. v. FRENCH LICK SPRINGS HOTEL CO.

The French Lick Springs Hotel Company filed its complaint in the circuit court of Orange county against George S. Gagnon, the Baden Lick Sulphur Springs Company, John L. Howard, and John C. Howard, asking that the defendants be temporarily restrained and enjoined from pumping water on the premises of the defendants, and from doing other acts alleged to be injurious to the property of the plaintiffs, and that on final hearing the injunction be made perpetual. Thereupon, an emergency being disclosed, the judge, in the vacation of the court and without notice issued a temporary restraining order pursuant to the prayer of the complaint, and fixed a day for the hearing of the application. The result was a temporary injunction as prayed, against all the defendants. Their motions to dissolve this injunction were subsequently overruled, and the defendants appealed.

The facts in the controversy, so far as material, were as follows:

The French Lick Springs Hotel Company owns some 550 acres of land situated in a valley 2½ miles long by three-fourths of a mile wide, known as "French Lick Valley," in Orange county, in this state. A group of springs, known as the "French Lick Springs," possessing healing and medicinal properties in a high degree, is situated on the lands of the appellee. The Baden Lick Company is the owner of 80 acres of land situated to the north and northeast of the lands of the French Lick Company, and adjoining the same. John C. and John L. Howard own a tract of land extending from the hilltops to the northeast of French Lick Springs down into said valley and to a point about 85 rods distant from the northeast corner of the lands owned by said French Lick Company. The waters flowing from the springs known as the French Lick Springs had for more than 30 years been known throughout the United States to possess healing and medicinal properties, and during that time had attracted many visitors to said valley from all parts of the United States, who came to drink and bathe in such waters. Underlying all the land in the said French Lick valley is a subterranean body of water, and the waters in the natural springs of the French Lick Company are forced upward through the rocks by the hydrostatic pressure of said body of water, and for more than 30 years said springs have had a natural flow resulting from said pressure. Within a year prior to the bringing of the action, the Baden Lick Company and the Howards have each sunk a well on their respective tracts of land in said valley for the purpose of tapping the body of water underlying said valley, and such wells were sunk to such depth as to penetrate such body of water; the Howard well being located at a point 85 rods northeast of the French Lick Company's premises, and 160 rods from the natural springs of said company, and the Baden Lick well being located at about one-half mile north of such springs.

About the 18th of July, 1903, having theretofore placed in said well a powerful steam pump, they commenced to operate the same, pumping water from said subterranean body of water, knowing that the same was connected with such springs, and knowing that their said pump had sufficient power of suction to draw the underlying waters away from said springs and destroy the same; and with such knowledge continued to operate said pump day and night, drawing millions of gallons of water from said body of water, which they allowed to escape on the ground and run into French Lick creek and be wasted, and such pumping being continued up to the time of the commencement of this action. Some weeks prior to the 18th of July, 1903, the appellant the Baden Lick Company, by Gagnon, who acted for it, also placed a powerful pump in its said well, and operated the same almost continually up to, on, and after said last-mentioned date, drawing from said subterranean basin more than a half million gallons of water every day, and allowing all of the same to escape into French Lick creek and be wasted; such pumping continuing up to the time of the service of the temporary restraining order herein. Gagnon and the Baden Lick Company knew that the removal of a large quantity of water from said subterranean body would result in the destruction of the natural springs, and after the 19th of July they also knew that the joint action of the Howards and themselves in such pumping was resulting in the injury of such springs, and, with such knowledge, continued so to pump and waste said waters until said natural springs of the French Lick Company ceased to flow, and became for the time practically worthless, and so remained until the service of the restraining order. Neither the Baden Lick Company nor the Howards had any use for the waters so pumped by them through their respective wells from said subterranean basin of water, but wasted all of it, and while their pumping was in progress they caused observations to be made to discover its effect on the natural springs of the French Lick Company; and when they learned that said springs were being exhausted by reason of such pumping they continued to pump and waste said waters until the flow of water in said springs stopped, and the value thereof for the time being was destroyed. The connection between the wells of the Baden Lick Company and the Howards and the said natural springs of the appellee through said subterranean body of water is so well defined that when the pumping from said wells from any cause ceased for a few hours, the waters would again begin to flow into and out of the said springs, and when said pumping was again resumed the suction from the pumps would again cause said springs to cease flowing. About 11 p. m. on July 21, 1903 (the day prior to the commencement of this action), while the pumps in both of the wells referred to were being operated, John L. Howard, one of the appellants, visited the natural spring of the French Lick Company known as "Pluto," and, finding, on examination that the same had ceased to flow, said to his companion, "We have got her down; she has gone to hell." John Stevens, Howard's manager, after the well was sunk on Howard's land, and prior to placing a pump therein, said to John C. Howard, "I want you to get me a good pump and put in there, and I will sink old Pluto to hell." After such pump was procured and placed in operation, and was operated until about the time of the commencement of this action, Stevens again declared, "I have them working on old Pluto, and I don't give a d——n if Pluto goes as dry as a chip." John L. Howard, before sinking the well referred to said: "I will drill a hole up there deep enough to reach the sulphur water, and it doesn't matter whether it flows out natural or not, for I will put in a compressed air pump, and by this means I can lift the water from the bottom of the well instead of the top, and when this is done it will lower the fresh-water pressure here, and whenever you affect the fresh-water pressure Pluto will not run out." He again said, "I will have Pluto right here at my door." And again: "When we get through with them [referring to the French Lick Company], they will either take us back in the company or buy me out at my figures. * * * I know more about Pluto than anybody in this valley, and when I get through with my well they will want me, because I can control Pluto." [34] "In certain portions of Indiana, and other states, hundreds of feet beneath the surface, natural gas was found confined under pressure in a stratum of porous rock. Owners of the surface claimed for themselves severally the right of making unrestricted drafts upon the common source of supply. Some owners opened up large wells—gushers—lighted the gas and let it burn day and night. Others who were putting their gas wells to beneficial use for heat, light or fuel purposes, protested against the reckless waste which was weakening their wells. But the wasters refused to quit. The beneficial users urged that, since their wells were being damaged without any benefit to the wasters, the act of the wasters could be attributed to nothing but pure malevolence. What of it, replied the wasters; we are on our own ground and can do as we please; we have as much right as you have to bore gas wells, and it is none of your concern what we do with the gas. This defense or justification has been stated in various forms: 'Where one exercises a legal right only, the DOWLING, C. J. * * * The English and American cases cited by counsel for appellants undoubtedly state the general rules which have been applied by the courts to subterranean waters, and we have no inclination to question their wisdom and authority in the particular cases to which they apply. But there are well-recognized exceptions to these rules, and doubtless further exceptions and departures from them will from time to time be found necessary or expedient. Where the diversion of the water is purely malicious, and is detrimental to another proprietor, it may be prevented by injunction. Miller v. Black Rock, 99 Va. 747, 40 S. E. 27, 86 Am. St. Rep. 924. motive which actuates him is immaterial.' Raycroft v. Tayntor (1896) 68 Vt. 219, 35 Atl. 53, 33 L. R. A. 225, 54 Am. St. Rep. 882. 'Mischievous motives cannot make that wrong which in its own essence is lawful.' Jenkins v. Fowler (1855) 24 Pa. 308. 'An act lawful in itself is not converted by a malicious or bad motive into an unlawful act.' Allen v. Flood [1898] A. C. 1. It seems to me that these explanations must be taken to mean one or the other of two things. One is, that where an act is lawful without regard to motive, motive need not be regarded. That is worthless as being a mere running around in a circle. The other is that, where an act is lawful if done under one kind of a motive, it is therefore lawful if done under any and every kind of a motive—in short, that motive can never be determinative of the lawfulness of an act. And this, I submit, is not true in morals or logic or law. Plant v. Woods (1899) 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330. In the natural gas cases the Supreme Court of Indiana ruled, in substance, that the surface proprietors had coequal rights of access to the common source of supply—the common fund; that the right of each was therefore not an absolute right, but was limited and restricted by the coexisting and coextensive rights of the others; that each therefore had the right to the beneficial use and enjoyment of the whole supply except as it was cut down by the beneficial use and enjoyment of the others; that while the loss that came to each from the beneficial use of the common fund by the others was damnum absque injuria, a loss without cause of complaint, none of them was bound to suffer a loss malevolently inflicted—inflicted 'for the sake of the harm as an end in itself and not merely as a means to some further end legitimately desired.' Aikens v. Wisconsin (1904) 195 U. S. 194, 25 Sup. Ct. 3, 49 L. Ed. 154. And so it was held that the wasters could be stopped by injunction. Further, a penal statute of the state, punishing the wasting of gas as a species of malicious mischief, was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States against an attack based on the ground that denying a landowner the right to do as he pleased with the gas flowing from a well in his own soil was a taking of private property without compensation. Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana (1900) 177 U. S. 190, 20 Sup. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729. So far as I know there are no natural gas decisions that deny malicious waste may be enjoined, and no cases that fail to treat natural gas and petroleum as being of the same class. If adjoining landowners bore down into an underlying porous stratum containing a fluid, I fail to see any reason why their rights should be different whether they find gas, or oil, or water. Yet the common law of England (Corporation of Bradford v.

prevents the raising on it of crops to which it was or would be peculiarly adapted, or destroys such crops after they are grown or partly grown, renders the city liable to the landowner for the damages he sustains, and entitles him to an injunction against the continuance of the wrong. A. 124, it was held that a use for natural purposes takes precedence over artificial ones. A further exception to the rules laid down in Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 335, Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. Cases, 340, and Ewart v. Belfast, 9 L. R. (Ireland) 172, was made in the recent case of Katz, Ex'r, v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, where it was declared that the owner of a portion of a tract of land which is saturated below the surface with an abundant supply of percolating water cannot remove water from wells thereon for sale, if the remainder of the tract is thereby deprived of water necessary for its profitable enjoyment. C. 687), that a landowner has an absolute and unqualified right to intercept on his own land underground percolating water, with the effect of preventing his neighbor from getting any from the common fund, even though his motive in so doing be not to benefit himself or his estate, but solely to injure his neighbor, has been quite generally followed in this country, and might be said to be sustained by the weight of authority, if a majority constitutes a preponderance. Huber v. Merkel (1903) 117 Wis. 355, 94 N. W. 354, 62 L. R. A. 589, 98 Am. St. Rep. 933, and cases cited in text and note. These decisions square with the natural gas and oil cases already mentioned, and properly accord, I believe, with the basic theory of our social system." Judge Francis E. Baker, before the Chicago Bar Ass'n, 1911. The paper is reprinted in 5 Illinois Law Rev. 452.

The "natural gas cases" referred to by Judge Baker are Manufacturers' Gas Co. v. Indiana Nat. Gas Co. (1900) 155 Ind. 461, 57 N. E. 912, 50 L. R. A. 768; Lippincott Glass Co. v. Ohio Oil Co. (1898) 150 Ind. 695, 49 N. E. 1106; State v. Ohio Oil Co. (1898) 150 Ind. 21, 49 N. E. 809, 47 L. R. A. 627; Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana (1900) 177 U. S. 190, 20 Sup. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729. See also, Westmoreland Nat. Gas Co. v. De Witt (1889) 130 Pa. 235, 18 Atl. 724, 5 L. R. A. 731. In Hague v. Wheeler (1893) 157 Pa. 324, 27 Atl. 714, 22 L. R. A. 141, 37 Am. St. Rep. 736, the trial court found that the waste was malicious and entered an injunction. The Supreme Court reversed the decree on the ground that the finding of malice was not sustained. "I think," remarks Judge Baker, that "the Supreme Court should have determined malice, not as a state of mind subjectively held by defendant, but objectively as determined by the nature and necessary consequence of the act."

18 App. Div. 340, 46 N. Y. Supp. 141. The strong trend of the later decisions is toward a qualification of the earlier doctrine that the landowner could exercise unlimited and irresponsible control over subterranean waters on his own land, without regard to the injuries which might thereby result to the lands of other proprietors in the neighborhood. Local conditions, the purpose for which the landowner excavates or drills holes or wells on his land, the use or nonuse intended to be made of the water, and other like circumstances have come to be regarded as more or less influential in this class of cases, and have justly led to an extension of the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas," to the rights of landowners over subterranean waters, and to some abridgment of their supposed power to injure their neighbors without benefiting themselves.

The only conclusions which can fairly be drawn from the verified pleadings and evidence in this case is that a bitter rivalry exists between the parties to this action, their stockholders and officers, and that, without a real necessity therefor, the appellants dug wells and put machinery and appliances in them and pumped large quantities of water therefrom for the purpose of stopping the flow of water of the mineral springs on the land of the appellee. The thinly disguised pretext that some of the acts complained of were done in an attempt to repair a well or stop a leak in it, is an insufficient explanation of the injurious proceedings of the appellants, and wholly fails to convince us of their good faith. * * *

In our opinion, the court did not err in any of its rulings, and the judgment is affirmed.[35]

ANGLE v. CHICAGO, ST. P., M. & O. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1894. 151 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 240, 38 L. Ed. 55.)

This was an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin dismissing plaintiff's bill. The facts in the case were shortly as follows:

The state of Wisconsin had granted certain lands to the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Company, hereafter referred to as the Omaha Company, for the purpose of constructing a defined railway. Certain other lands had been granted by Wisconsin to the Chicago, Portage & Superior Railway Company, hereafter referred to as the Portage Company, for the purpose of constructing another defined railway. The latter road, if constructed, would be, to some extent, a competitor of the Omaha road. The grant to the Portage Company was conditioned upon the completion of the road within a certain time. By a later act of the Wisconsin legislature this time was extended to May 9, 1882.

In 1881, the Portage Company made a contract with Horatio Angle for the construction of sixty-five miles of road covered by its land grant before May 5, 1882. Angle commenced work and made such progress that, on January 20th, 1882, he had 1,600 men employed along the line, and it was an assured fact that, unless interfered with, he would complete the railway, according to the terms of the contract, on or before May 5, 1882.

But in February, 1882, the Wisconsin legislature, without inquiry or hearing, hurriedly passed an act forfeiting and revoking the grant to the Portage Company, and bestowing it upon the Omaha Company. This action of the legislature was intentionally caused by certain false representations made to the legislators by persons acting on behalf of the Omaha Company. As a result of this, and of other machinations by the Omaha Company, the Portage Company failed to meet its contract with Angle, and he, on his part, was thereby prevented from going on with the building of the road.

The contract with Angle having been thus broken by the Portage Company, he commenced an action at law against that company. While this action was pending Angle died, but a revivor was had in the name of his administratrix, who recovered a judgment for some $200,000. Upon this judgment execution was issued and returned "nulla bona," and thereupon this bill was filed to reach the land grant in the hands of the Omaha Company.[36]

The bill charged, among other things, that the Omaha Company conspired with other parties to wrest from the Portage Company its land grant, and to that end to prevent the completion of the contract by Angle and the construction of the road. The defendant's demurrer to the bill was sustained in the Circuit Court, and the decree of dismissal was entered.[37]

MR. JUSTICE BREWER, after stating the facts, delivered the opinion of the court.

That which attracts notice on even a casual reading of the bill—the truth of all the allegations in which must be taken, upon this record, to be admitted by the demurrer—is the fact that, while Angle was actively engaged in executing a contract which he had with the Portage Company,—a contract whose execution had proceeded so far that its successful completion within the time necessary to secure to the Portage Company its land grant was assured, and when neither he nor the Portage Company was moving or had any disposition to break that contract or stop the work,—through the direct and active efforts of the Omaha Company the performance of that contract was prevented, the profits which Angle would have received from a completion of the contract were lost to him, and the land grant to the Portage Company was wrested from it.

Surely it would seem that the recital of these facts would carry with it an assurance that there was some remedy which the law would give to Angle and the Portage Company for the losses they had sustained, and that such remedy would reach to the party, the Omaha Company, by whose acts these losses were caused.

That there were both wrong and loss is beyond doubt. And, as said by Croke, J., in Baily v. Merrell, 3 Bulst. 94, 95, "damage without [36] The statement of the facts is abridged.

[37] For the case below, see Angle v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co. (C. C. 1889), 39 Fed. 912, and Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Chicago, P. & S. Ry. Co. (C. C. 1889) 39 Fed. 143. The opinion in the Circuit Court was by Mr. Justice Harlan, who dismissed the bill upon the ground that the Portage road had no interest in the lands which could be subjected in satisfaction of Angle's judgment against it.

fraud gives no cause of action; but where these two do concur and meet together, there an action lieth." The Portage Company held a land grant worth four millions of dollars. It had contracted for the construction of its road, such construction to be completed in time to perfect its title to the land. The contract had been so far executed that its full completion within the time prescribed was assured. The contractor had 1,600 men employed. The rails had been purchased. The company had lifted itself out of the embarrassments which years before had surrounded it. It had taken up all its old stock but $25,000, which was ignorantly or wrongfully withheld by one of its officers. It had issued 1,000,000 of new stock, had authorized a new issue of bonds, and had arranged for the canceling of all its obligations with 700,000 of these bonds and 1,000,000 of stock. It had consummated arrangements with a wealthy company for the advancement of moneys sufficient for its work, and had gone so far as to place in the hands of that company 100,000 of its bonds, upon which $50,000 in cash was to be advanced. Except through some wrongful interference, it was reasonably certain that everything would be carried out as thus planned and arranged.

At this time the Omaha Company, which was a rival in some respects, and which had located a line parallel and contiguous to the line of the Portage Company, interferes, and interferes in a wrongful way. It bribes the trusted officers of the Portage Company to transfer the entire outstanding stock into its hands, or at least place it under its control. Being thus the only stockholder, it induces the general manager to withdraw the several engineering corps, whose presence was necessary for the successful carrying on of the work of constructing the road; to give such notice as to result in the seizure of all the tools and supplies of the contractor and the company, and the dispersion of all laborers employed. To prevent any action by the faithful officers of the Portage Company, it wrongfully obtains an injunction tying their hands. In the face of this changed condition of affairs, the company, which had negotiated with the Portage Company, and was ready to advance it money, surrendered the 100,000 of the bonds, and abandoned the arrangement. By false representations to the legislature as to the facts of the case, it persuaded that body to revoke the grant to the Portage Company, and bestow the lands upon itself.

That this was a wrongful interference on the part of the Omaha Company, and that it resulted directly in loss to the contractor and to the Portage Company, is apparent. It is not an answer to say that there was no certainty that the contractor would have completed his contract, and so earned these lands for the Portage Company. If such a defense were tolerated, it would always be an answer in case of any wrongful interference with the performance of a contract, for there is always that lack of certainty. It is enough that there should be, as there was here, a reasonable assurance, considering all the surroundings, that the contract would be performed in the manner and within the time stipulated, and so performed as to secure the land to the company.

It certainly does not lie in the mouth of a wrongdoer, in the face of such probabilities as attend this case, to say that perhaps the contract would not have been completed even if no interference had been had, and that, therefore, there being no certainty of the loss, there is no liability.

Neither can it be said that the Omaha Company had a right to contend for these lands; that it simply made an effort, which any one might make, to obtain the benefit of this land grant. No rights of this kind, whatever may be their extent, justify such wrongs as were perpetrated by the Omaha Company. Here, bribery was resorted to to induce the trusted officers of the Portage Company to betray their trust, and to place at least the apparent ownership of the stock in the hands of the rival company.

Without notice, without hearing, and by false allegations, it secured an injunction to stay the hands of the honest officers of the Portage Company. Such wrongful use of the powers and processes of the court cannot be recognized as among the legitimate means of contest and competition. It burdens the whole conduct of the Omaha Company with the curse of wrongdoing, and makes its interference with the affairs of the Portage Company a wrongful interference.

Further, by false representations as to what the Portage Company has done and intends to do, it induced the legislature of the state to revoke the grant to the Portage Company, and bestow it upon itself. The result, and the natural result, of these wrongful actions on the part of the Omaha Company was the breaking down of the Portage Company, the disabling it from securing the means of carrying on this work, the dispersion of the laborers, and the prevention of the contractor from completing his contract. It will not do to say that the contractor was not bound to quit the work, but might have gone on and completed his contract, and thus earned the lands for the Portage Company; nor that the wrongful act of the trusted officers of the Portage Company in betraying their trust could have been corrected by the Portage Company by appropriate suit in the courts; that the law in one shape or another would have offered redress to the Portage Company for all the wrongs that were attempted and done by the Omaha Company. Granting all of this, yet the fact remains that the natural, the intended, result of these wrongful acts was the breaking down of the Portage Company, the unwillingness of the foreign company to furnish it with money, and the prevention of the contractor from completing his contract.

It is not enough to say that other remedies might have existed and been resorted to by the Portage Company, and that notwithstanding the hands of its officers were tied by this wrongful injunction. It is enough that the Portage Company did break down; that it broke down in consequence of these wrongful acts of the Omaha Company, and that they were resorted to by the latter with the intention of breaking it down. * * *

It follows from these considerations that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to this bill, and the decree of dismissal must be

Reversed, and the case remanded with instructions to overrule the demurrer, and for further proceedings in conformity to law.[38]

CUMBERLAND GLASS MFG. CO. v. DE WITT.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1913. 120 Md. 381, 87 Atl. 927, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 702.)

In this action, which was against the glass manufacturing company, the judgment below was for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

BURKE, J. The amended declaration upon which this case was tried alleged that since the year 1886 the plaintiff had been a dealer in imported and domestic bottles, demijohns, etc.; that the defendant, the Cumberland Glass Manufacturing Company, a foreign corporation, was engaged in the manufacture of glass bottles, window glass, etc., and conducted its factory at Bridgton in the state of New Jersey; that it complied with the requirements of the law of this state, which permit foreign corporations to transact business here, and that it was in fact doing business here. It further alleged that on February 8, 1906, the plaintiff entered into a written contract with the Mallard Distilling Company of New York to supply them with 1,000 gross of half-pint lettered gin flasks, eight-ounce capacity, at the price of $2.40 per gross, and that on or about the same date did verbally enter into an additional contract with said company for another 1,000 gross of bottles at $2.40 per gross, which bottles were to be made identical in every respect with those specified in the written contract. It then alleged "that the Cumberland Glass Manufacturing Company did, with knowledge of the existing contract, on or about the 15th day of February, 1906, by and through the medium of their agents, visit the said Mallard Distilling Company, and maliciously and without just cause, with the intent to injure the plaintiff and to derive a benefit for itself, cause, induce, and procure the said Mallard Distilling Company to rescind, break, and violate their contracts" with the plaintiff. It further alleged that at the time the Mallard Distilling Company broke its contracts, the plaintiff charged the defendant with having interfered with and caused the Mallard Company to break the contracts; that the defendant denied that it had in any way interfered with the contracts, or had procured, or caused the same to be broken; that the plaintiff was unable to procure sufficient proof against the defendant of its violation of duty, and that the proof of the facts was not known or exhibited to him until the latter part of the year 1909, but was fraudulently concealed and withheld by the defendant. * * *

[38] Part of the opinion is omitted. In this omitted portion, Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the Court, reached the conclusion that the wrongdoing of the Omaha Company had wrested the title of the lands from the Portage Company and transferred it to itself. "It has become, therefore, a trustee ex maleficio in respect to the property." On this question, Mr. Justice Harlan dissented.

The declaration is said to be bad for three reasons: First, because it contains no allegation that the plaintiff was able and willing to carry out his contracts with the Mallard Distilling Company; secondly, for duplicity, since it contains two complete, separate, and independent causes of action in one count; thirdly, because one of the contracts was unenforceable under the statute of frauds, and the declaration does not allege that but for the defendant's interference the Mallard Company would have carried out this contract, and would not have relied upon the defense of the statute. The first and second grounds of objection rest upon the doctrine declared in Dimmick v. Hendley, 117 Md. 458, 84 Atl. 171; Milske v. Steiner Mantel Company, 103 Md. 235, 63 Atl. 471, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, 15 Am. St. Rep. 354, and other cases. But those cases have no application to cases of this kind. The cause of action set out in the declaration is the wrongful interference by the defendant with the contract relations between the plaintiff and the Mallard Distilling Company. The cause of action is the tortious act of the defendant in procuring or causing the breach of the plaintiff's contracts with the Mallard Company. The suit is not upon the contracts, nor does it charge the defendant with several distinct torts. It charges one single tort, resulting in damages to the plaintiff. It is well settled that a declaration, whether it is based upon a contract or upon tort, cannot combine in one count two distinct causes of action. But we do not regard the declaration in this case as open to this objection. * * *

Nor does the fact that one of these contracts was oral affect the sufficiency of the narr. The contract is not void, although it might not have been enforceable against the Mallard Company. But this circumstance cannot avail the defendant. This was decided in Knickerbocker Ice Company v. Gardiner & Co., 107 Md. 556, 69 Atl. 405, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 746. We are of opinion that the declaration was sufficient. * * *

Since the decisions of this court in Knickerbocker Ice Company v. Gardiner Dairy Co., and the Sumwalt Ice Co. v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 114 Md. 403, 80 Atl. 48, there ought not to be any difficulty about the general principles of law in this state applicable to this class of actions. In those cases this court adopted the conclusion reached by the majority of the judges of the Queen's Bench in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216. The doctrine of that case has been followed in England in Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333; Read v. Friendly Society, etc., 2 K. B. 88; South Wales Miners' Federation et al. v. Glamorgan Coal Co., Limited, et al., Appeal Cases (1905) 239. It has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Angle v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 151 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 240, 38 L. Ed. 55, and is followed by many of the state courts. That decision, as stated by Lord Macnaghten in Quinn v. Leathem, Appeal Cases (1901) 495, established this general proposition: "That it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law, if there is no sufficient justification for the interference."

Malice in this form of action does not mean actual malice, or ill will, but consists in the intentional doing of a wrongful act without legal justification or excuse. In South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Company, supra, Lord Lindley said: "Bearing in mind that malice may or may not be used to denote ill will, and that in legal language presumptive or implied malice is distinguishable from express malice, it conduces to clearness, in discussing such cases as these, to drop the word 'malice' altogether, and to substitute for it the meaning which is really intended to be conveyed by it. Its use may be necessary in drawing indictments, but when all that is meant by malice is an intention to commit an unlawful act without reference to spite or ill will, it is better to drop the word 'malice' and so avoid all misunderstanding." The same principle was announced in the Knickerbocker Ice Company Case, supra, in which Judge Boyd said: "Although many of the cases speak of the act as being maliciously done, it would seem to be clear that express malice is not necessary if the act is wrongful and unjustifiable."

Turning now to an examination of the facts appearing in the record we find evidence tending to establish the contracts between the plaintiff and the Mallard Distilling Company. Did the defendant know of these contracts, and did it intentionally cause the Mallard Company to break them? These are questions of fact. It is not the province of this court to decide these questions. We are merely to determine whether the plaintiff offered evidence from which the jury might have reasonably found that the defendant had this knowledge, and that it intentionally procured their cancellation. In our opinion the evidence of the plaintiff and that of Robert B. Frist and Charles M. Kohn was abundantly sufficient to have carried the case to the jury upon these questions. This evidence is uncontradicted, and tends to show that the defendant acquired knowledge of these contracts through Arthur MacLellan, its agent in Baltimore, and that it intentionally deprived the plaintiff of the fruits of the contracts by offering the Mallard Company lower prices on the flasks. * * * Unless, therefore, the defendant had a legal excuse or justification for its act, the plaintiff was entitled to recover; provided the evidence supported the allegation of the replication to the plea of limitations.

Now, what is the justification upon which the defendant relies to exonerate itself from responsibility? It is the right of competition in trade. It asserts this proposition: That the right of competition justifies a defendant in knowingly and deliberately, for its own benefit or advantage, inducing the breach of a contract by offering lower prices. No case has been cited to support this contention. Counsel for appellant have cited a number of cases bearing upon the right of competition in trade or business. But this is altogether different from the right which one has to be protected from interference with his rights under existing contracts. There is a wide distinction between the two classes of cases, and they are governed by distinct rules of law. The principles applicable to the first class are stated in Klingel's Pharmacy v. Sharp & Dohme, 104 Md. 218, 64 Atl. 1029, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 976, 118 Am. St. Rep. 399, 9 Ann. Cas. 1184, and in Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor, Gow & Co., Appeal Cases (1892) 25, and other cases cited on appellant's brief.

In the last-cited case it was said "that the procuring of people to break their contracts" is an unlawful act. In his opinion in that case Lord Morris said: "All the acts done, and the means used, by the defendant were acts of competition for trade. There was nothing in the defendant's acts to disturb any existing contract of the plaintiffs, or to induce any one to break such." In discussing the right of competition in Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, the court said: "Every one has a right to enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill, and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition; but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance, or annoyance. If disturbance or loss come as a result of competition, or the exercise of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria, unless some superior right by contract or otherwise is interfered with." We, therefore, hold that the right to compete furnished no justification to the defendant in this case.

We also hold that the evidence was legally sufficient to be considered by the jury on the issue raised upon the plea of limitation. The plaintiff suspected that the contracts with the Mallard Company had been canceled through the act of the defendant, and it made an effort to ascertain that fact. The Mallard Company declined to give him any information, and John F. Perry deliberately misled him, and, except for the information derived from Frist in the fall of 1909, it is doubtful if he ever would have been able to connect the defendant with the violation of his contracts.

The defendant got the full benefit under the general issue plea of all the facts set out in its third plea, and no harm resulted to it in sustaining the demurrer to that plea.

The judgment will be affirmed.[39]

II. In Trade or Business Competition

BOHN MFG. CO. v. HOLLIS et al.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893. 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319.)

This action is by the Bohn Manufacturing Company for an injunction. Stripped of all extraneous matter, the case discloses just this state of facts:

The plaintiff is a manufacturer and vendor of lumber and other building material, having a large and profitable trade at wholesale and retail in this and adjoining states, a large and valuable part of this trade being with the retail lumber dealers. The defendant the Northwestern Lumberman's Association is a voluntary association of retail lumber dealers, comprising from 25 to 50 per cent. of the retail dealers doing business in the states referred to, many of whom are, or have been, customers of the plaintiff. A "retailer," as defined in the constitution of the association, is "any person who is engaged in retailing lumber, who carries at all times a stock of lumber adequate to the wants of the community, and who regularly maintains an office as a lumber dealer, and keeps the same open at proper times." Any wholesale dealer or manufacturer of lumber who conforms to the rules of the association may become an honorary member, and attend its meetings, but is not allowed to vote. The object of the association is stated in its constitution to be "the protection of its members against sales by wholesale dealers and manufacturers to contractors and consumers." The object is more fully stated, and the means by which it is to be carried into effect are fully set out, in sections 3, 3½, 4, and 6 of the by-laws, which are all that we consider material in this case. The plaintiff sold two bills of lumber directly to consumers or contractors at points where members of the association were engaged in business as retail dealers. Defendant Hollis, the secretary of the association, having been informed of this fact, notified plaintiff, in pursuance of section 3 of the by-laws, that he had a claim against it for 10 per cent. of the amount of these sales. Considerable correspondence with reference to the matter ensued, in which the plaintiff, from time to time, promised to adjust the matter, but procrastinated and evaded doing so for so long that finally Hollis threatened that unless plaintiff immediately settled the matter he would send to all the members of the association the lists or notices provided for by section 6 of the by-laws, notifying them that plaintiff refused to comply with the rules of the association, and was no longer in sympathy with it. Thereupon, plaintiff commenced this action for a permanent injunction, and obtained, ex parte, a temporary one, enjoining the defendants from issuing these notices, etc.

The appeal is from an order refusing to dissolve the temporary injunction. It is alleged, and in view of the facts was presumed by the court to be true, that if these notices should be issued the members of the association would thereafter refuse to deal with the plaintiff, thereby resulting in loss to it of gains and profits.

Mitchell, J. (after stating the facts). The case presents one phase of a subject which is likely to be one of the most important and difficult which will confront the courts during the next quarter of a century. This is the age of associations and unions, in all departments of labor and business, for purposes of mutual benefit and protection. Confined to proper limits, both as to end and means, they are not only lawful, but laudable. Carried beyond those limits, they are liable to become dangerous agencies for wrong and oppression. Beyond what limits these associations or combinations cannot go, without interfering with the legal rights of others, is the problem which, in various phases, the courts will doubtless be frequently called to pass upon. There is, perhaps, danger that, influenced by such terms of illusive meaning as "monopolies," "trusts," "boycotts," "strikes," and the like, they may be led to transcend the limits of their jurisdiction, and, like the court of king's bench in Bagg's Case, 11 Coke, 98a, assume that, on general principles, they have authority to correct or reform everything which they may deem wrong, or, as Lord Ellsmere puts it, "to manage the state." But whatever doubts or difficulties may arise in other cases, presenting other phases of the general subject involved here, it seems to us that there can be none on the facts of the present case. Both the affidavits and brief in behalf of the plaintiff indulge in a great deal of strong, and even exaggerated, assertion, and in many words and expressions of very indefinite and illusive meaning, such as "wreck," "coerce," "extort," "conspiracy," "monopoly," "drive out of business," and the like. This looks very formidable, but in law, as well as in mathematics, it simplifies things very much to reduce them to their lowest terms. It is conceded that retail lumber yards in the various cities, towns, and villages are not only a public convenience, but a public necessity: also, that, to enable the owners to maintain these yards, they must sell their lumber at a reasonable profit. It also goes without saying that to have manufacturers or wholesale dealers sell at retail, directly to consumers, in the territory upon which the retail dealer depends for his customers, injuriously affects and demoralizes his trade. This is so well recognized as a rule of trade, in every department, that generally wholesale dealers refrain from selling at retail within the territory from which their customers obtain their trade.

Now, when reduced to its ultimate analysis, all that the retail lumber dealers, in this case, have done, is to form an association to protect themselves from sales by wholesale dealers or manufacturers, directly to consumers or other nondealers, at points where a member of the association is engaged in the retail business. The means adopted to effect this object are simply these: They agree among themselves that they will not deal with any wholesale dealer or manufacturer who sells directly to customers, not dealers, at a point where a member of the association is doing business, and provide for notice being given to all their members whenever a wholesale dealer or manufacturer makes any such sale. That is the head and front of defendants' offense. It will be observed that defendants were not proposing to send notices to any one but members of the association. There was no element of fraud, coercion, or intimidation, either towards plaintiff or the members of the association. True, the secretary, in accordance with section 3 of the by-laws, made a demand on plaintiff for 10 per cent. on the amount of the two sales. But this involved no element of coercion or intimidation, in the legal sense of those terms. It was entirely optional with plaintiff whether it would pay or not. If it valued the trade of the members of the association higher than that of nondealers at the same points, it would probably conclude to pay; otherwise, not. It cannot be claimed that the act of making this demand was actionable; much less, that it constituted any ground for an injunction; and hence this matter may be laid entirely out of view. Nor was any coercion proposed to be brought to bear on the members of the association, to prevent them from trading with the plaintiff. After they received the notices, they would be at entire liberty to trade with plaintiff, or not, as they saw fit. By the provisions of the by-laws, if they traded with the plaintiff, they were liable to be "expelled;" but this simply meant to cease to be members. It was wholly a matter of their own free choice, which they preferred, —to trade with the plaintiff, or to continue members of the association. So much for the facts, and all that remains is to apply to them a few well-settled, elementary principles of law:

1. The mere fact that the proposed acts of the defendants would have resulted in plaintiff's loss of gains and profits does not, of itself, render those acts unlawful or actionable. That depends on whether the acts are, in and of themselves, unlawful. "Injury," in its legal sense, means damage resulting from an unlawful act. Associations may be entered into, the object of which is to adopt measures that may tend to diminish the gains and profits of another, and yet, so far from being unlawful, they may be highly meritorious. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346; Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 21 Q. B. Div. 544.

2. If an act be lawful,—one that the party has a legal right to do, —the fact that he may be actuated by an improper motive does not render it unlawful. As said in one case, "the exercise by one man of a legal right cannot be a legal wrong to another," or, as expressed in another case, "malicious motives make a bad case worse, but they cannot make that wrong which, in its own essence, is lawful." Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225, 46 Am. Rep. 373; Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 39, 28 Am. Rep. 93; Jenkins v. Fowler, 24 Pa. 308.

3. To enable the plaintiff to maintain this action, it must appear that defendants have committed, or are about to commit, some unlawful act, which will interfere with, and injuriously affect, some of its legal rights. We advert to this for the reason that counsel for plaintiff devotes much space to assailing this association as one whose object is unlawful because in restraint of trade. We fail to see wherein it is subject to this charge; but, even if it were, this would not, of itself, give plaintiff a cause of action. No case can be found in which it was ever held that, at common law, a contract or agreement in general restraint of trade was actionable at the instance of third parties or could constitute the foundation for such an action. The courts sometimes call such contracts "unlawful" or "illegal," but in every instance it will be found that these terms were used in the sense, merely, of "void" or "unenforceable" as between the parties; the law considering the disadvantage so imposed upon the contract a sufficient protection to the public. Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. Div. 598, [1892] App. Cas. 25.

4. What one man may lawfully do singly two or more may lawfully agree to do jointly. The number who unite to do the act cannot change its character from lawful to unlawful. The gist of a private action for the wrongful act of many is not the combination or conspiracy, but the damage done or threatened to the plaintiff by the acts of the defendants. If the act be unlawful, the combination of many to commit it may aggravate the injury, but cannot change the character of the act. In a few cases there may be some loose remarks apparently to the contrary, but they evidently have their origin in a confused and inaccurate idea of the law of criminal conspiracy, and in failing to distinguish between an unlawful act and a criminal one. It can never be a crime to combine to commit a lawful act, but it may be a crime for several to conspire to commit an unlawful act, which, if done by one individual alone, although unlawful would not be criminal. Hence, the fact that the defendants associated themselves together to do the act complained of is wholly immaterial in this case. We have referred to this for the reason that counsel has laid great stress upon the fact of the combination of a large number of persons, as if that, of itself, rendered their conduct actionable. Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen (Mass.) 499; Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. Div. 598, [1892] App. Cas. 25; Parker v. Huntington, 2 Gray (Mass.) 124; Wellington v. Small, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 145, 50 Am. Dec. 719; Payne v. Railway Co., 13 Lea (Tenn.) 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666.

5. With these propositions in mind, which bring the case down to a very small compass, we come to another proposition, which is entirely decisive of the case. It is perfectly lawful for any man (unless under contract obligation, or unless his employment charges him with some public duty) to refuse to work for or to deal with any man or class of men, as he sees fit. This doctrine is founded upon the fundamental right of every man to conduct his own business in his own way, subject only to the condition that he does not interfere with the legal rights of others. And, as has been already said, the right which one man may exercise singly, many, after consultation, may agree to exercise jointly, and make simultaneous declaration of their choice. This has been repeatedly held as to associations or unions of workmen, and associations of men in other occupations or lines of business must be governed by the same principles. Summed up, and stripped of all extraneous matter, this is all that defendants have done, or threatened to do, and we fail to see anything unlawful or actionable in it. Com. v. Hunt, supra; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Steamship Co. v. McGregor, [1892] App. Cas. 25.

Order reversed, and injunction dissolved.[40]

[40] Accord: Macauley Bros. v. Tierney (1895) 19 R. I. 255, 33 Atl. 1, 37 L. R. A. 455, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770: (The plaintiffs were master plumbers engaged in the plumbing business in Rhode Island. The National Association of Master Plumbers, of which the plaintiffs were not members, adopted a resolution that they would withdraw their patronage from any firm manufacturing or dealing in plumbing material who sold to a master plumber who was not a member of the National Association or one of its affiliated local associations. Notice of this was given to the wholesale dealers in plumbing materials throughout the United States. As a result, the wholesalers in Rhode Island from whom the plaintiffs were accustomed to buy refused to sell any longer to plaintiffs, nor could they purchase from wholesalers anywhere. The plaintiffs seek an injunction against the officers and members of the Providence Master Plumbers' Association, which was affiliated with the National Association. "The complainants proceed on the theory that they are entitled to protection in the legitimate exercise of their business; that the sending of the notices to wholesale dealers not to sell supplies to plumbers not members of the association, under the penalty, expressed in some instances and implied in others, of the withdrawal of the patronage of the members of the associations in case of a failure to comply, was unlawful, because it was intended injuriously to affect the plumbers not members of the association in the conduct of their business, and must necessarily have that effect. It is doubtless true, speaking generally, that no one has a right intentionally to do an act with the intent to injure another in his business. Injury, however, in its legal sense, means damage resulting from a violation of a legal right. It is this violation of a legal right which renders the act wrongful in the eye of the law and makes it actionable. If, therefore, there is a legal excuse for the act it is not wrongful, even though damage may result from its performance. The cause and excuse for the sending of the notices, it is evident, was a selfish desire on the part of the members of the association to rid themselves of the competition of those not members, with a view to increasing the profits of their own business. The question, then, resolves itself into this: Was the desire to free themselves from competition a sufficient excuse in legal contemplation for the sending of the notices?" Per Matteson, C. J.)

Scottish Co-op. Society v. Glasgow Fleshers' Ass'n (1898) 35 Sc. L. R. 645: ("Co-operative societies have of recent years been formed in this country with the object of supplying the public with provisions at cheaper rates than are usually charged in shops. Their tendency is no doubt to reduce the trade, the prices, and the profits of the ordinary shopkeeper, and among them of the butchers. The co-operative societies and the butchers are therefore in a position of antagonism and competition; and the butchers of Glasgow, or some of them, have recently formed themselves into an association in opposition to the co-operative societies. It occurred to them that the co-operative societies might be put in a position of disadvantage if they could be excluded from the American and Canadian meat market, which, as it happens, is at present carried on at only one place in Scotland,—the Yorkhill Wharf in Glasgow,—and is conducted there by means of sales by auction. The association considered that they would attain their object if they could induce the cattle salesmen who were in use to sell the cattle at Yorkhill to refuse to sell to the co-operative stores, and with that view they approached those cattle salesmen and intimated that they would not buy at their auction sales unless they declined to sell to the co-operative stores. The cattle salesmen were thus placed in a dilemma, and put to choose between the Glasgow Fleshers' Trade Association, as it is called, and the co-operative stores, and, judging (as I suppose) that the butchers were the better customers, they yielded to their pressure, and intimated in their conditions of sale that they would not accept the bids of persons connected with the co-operative stores, with the result that the co-operative societies have been cut out of the foreign meat market. The arrangement, it will be observed, is or seems to be doubly advantageous to the butchers, for it relieves them from the competition of the co-operative stores at the auction sales, so presumably reducing the prices when they, the butchers, buy, and also from their competition in the sale in their shops of American and Canadian meat, so presumably enabling the butchers to raise their prices when they sell. This action has been brought to try whether this arrangement can be supported in law." Per Lord Kincairney.)

Heim v. New York Stock Exchange (1909) 64 Misc. Rep. 529, 118 N. Y. Supp. 591: (By a resolution of the New York Stock Exchange any member of this Exchange who transacted business with an active member of the Consolidated Stock Exchange was liable to suspension or expulsion. "This plaintiff is and was an active member on the Consolidated Exchange, also transacting business with Albert Loeb & Co., a Stock Exchange house, through whom he bought and sold stocks and bonds upon the floor of said Stock Exchange. On May 21, 1909, Albert Loeb & Co. notified the plaintiff that, because of the above resolution of their exchange, he must withdraw his account, and that thereafter they could transact no further business with him. It is alleged, and not denied, that by reason of the constitution and resolution above referred to all the members of the Stock Exchange will refuse to buy or sell stocks and bonds for the plaintiff, or any other active member of the Consolidated Exchange. It is conceded that the Consolidated Exchange, organized in 1875 as a mining stock exchange, is to a degree a rival of the Stock Exchange: its sales of stocks averaging per annum nearly one-fourth of those of the latter. There are 1,225 members, of whom 450 are active. The nature of the business transacted upon the floor of the Consolidated Exchange is very largely the same as that of the Stock Exchange. The plaintiff by this action seeks to enjoin the Stock Exchange from enforcing this resolution of nonintercourse as to him, and to prevent Albert Loeb & Co. from rejecting his account upon the reasons stated by them." Per Crane, J.)

Montgomery Ward & Co. v. South Dakota Retail Merchants' & Hardware Dealers' Ass'n (C. C. 1907) 150 Fed. 413: (The complainants, Montgomery Ward & Co., seek to enjoin the defendants from coercing or inducing wholesalers and jobbers to cease selling merchandise to the complainants. The defendants are members of an association of retail dealers who have agreed among themselves that they will not purchase any merchandise from wholesalers and jobbers who sell to catalogue or mail order houses. The defendants have corresponded with jobbers and wholesalers stating that the retail dealers are opposed to wholesalers and jobbers selling to a catalogue or mail order house and request that they do not make such sales. By reason of these letters some wholesalers and jobbers have declined, and continue to decline, to sell to the complainants, so that the complainants are unable to procure many articles of merchandise which they have been accustomed to sell.)

Whether the defendant's act in such a case is within the statute forbidding contracts in restraint of trade, see Retail Lumber Dealers' Ass'n v. Mississippi (1909) 95 Miss. 337, 48 South. 1021, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1054, and note; Grenada Lumber Co. v. Mississippi (1910) 217 U. S. 433, 30 Sup. Ct. 535, 54 L. Ed. 826.

On the prima facie liability in these cases, compare Ertz v. Produce Exchange Co. of Minneapolis et al. (1900) 79 Minn. 140, 81 N. W. 737, 48 L. R. A. 90, 79 Am. St. Rep. 433. The question was on a demurrer to a complaint in which the following allegations appeared: That the defendant the Produce Exchange of Minneapolis and the other defendants were engaged in buying and selling farm produce in Minneapolis and were practically in control of this market; that the plaintiff was a commission merchant buying and selling farm produce in the Minneapolis market, and as such had been accustomed to buy of the defendants, paying them in full; that on a day named the defendant the Produce Exchange conspired with the other defendants not to sell to or buy from the plaintiff any farm produce; that in pursuance of this agreement the defendants and others refused to deal with the plaintiff and circulated among his patrons reports that he was unable to buy such produce, with the intent to induce his patrons to discontinue doing business with him; that as a result, the plaintiff's business was ruined, to his damage $20,000. Affirming the trial court in overruling the demurrer to this complaint, Start, C. J., remarked: "The defendants rely upon the case of Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis (1893) 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, in support of their contention that the defendants' acts in question were lawful. The general propositions of law laid down in the decision in that case are sound as applied to the facts of that particular case. * * * It is to be noted that the defendants in the Bohn Case had similar legitimate interests to protect, which were menaced by the practice of wholesale dealers in selling lumber to contractors and consumers, and that the defendants' efforts to induce parties not to deal with offending wholesale dealers were limited to the members of the association having similar interests to conserve, and that there was no agreement or combination or attempt to induce other persons not members of the association to withhold their patronage from such wholesale dealer. In this respect the case differs essentially from the one at bar, in which the complaint does not show that the defendants had any legitimate interests to protect by their alleged combination. On the contrary, it is expressly alleged in the complaint that the combination, which was carried into execution, was for the sole purpose of injuring the plaintiff's business, and that the defendants conspired to induce the plaintiff's patrons and persons, other than the defendants, to refuse to deal with him. Such alleged acts on the part of the defendants are clearly unlawful. It is true, as claimed by the defendants and as stated in the Bohn Case, that a man, not under contract obligations to the contrary, has a right to refuse to work for, or deal with, any man or class of men, as he sees fit, and that the right which one man may exercise singly, many may lawfully agree to do jointly by voluntary association, provided they do not interfere with the legal rights of others. But one man singly, or any number of men jointly, having no legitimate interests to protect, may not lawfully ruin the business of another by maliciously inducing his patrons and third parties not to deal with him. See Walker v. Cronin (1871) 107 Mass. 555, 562; Delz v. Winfree (1891) 80 Tex. 400, 16 S. W. 111, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755; Graham v. St. Charles St. R. Co. (1895) 47 La. Ann. 214, 16 South. 806, 27 L. R. A. 416, 49 Am. St. Rep. 366; Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co. (1894) 28 C. C. A. 99, 83 Fed. 912. This is just what the complaint in this case charges the defendants with doing, and we hold that it states a cause of action."

See, also, on the question of prima facie liability, Union Labor Hospital Ass'n v. Vance Redwood Lumber Co. et al. (1910) 158 Cal. 551, 112 Pac. 886, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1034. The action was by the hospital association against seven lumber companies to enjoin them from conspiring to annoy and destroy the hospital business of plaintiff. The scheme of annoyance and destruction consisted in this: The defendants compelled every employé to consent to the deduction of $1 from his monthly wage, 12½ cents of which went into a contingent fund to help needy employés who might be injured and 87½ cents went to a hospital for an employé's ticket. This ticket entitled the employé to medical and surgical care and attendance in case of injury. The hospital could be selected by the employé from a list of three or four presented to him, but the Union Labor Hospital was not mentioned and was not on this list. The defendants were all companies engaged in lumbering and milling. The occupations of their men were dangerous. That provision should be made for the medical and surgical care of the men injured was most proper. No objection is made to this, nor to the means adopted to effectuate it, saving that plaintiff contends that because its hospital was not upon the list and because the employés were compelled to take out hospital tickets in one or another of the enumerated hospitals, a species of unlawful discrimination by the defendants against the plaintiff was thus established, a discrimination which it is urged and which the trial court found was an illegal boycott. It was found by the trial judge that the defendants, without any interests of their own to subserve, or any lawful object to promote, did conspire and confederate together for the purpose of unlawfully injuring the plaintiff in the manner alleged in the complaint; but it was also found, as shown in the opinion of the court that, the agreement with the four favored hospitals was entered into by the defendants solely for the purpose and with the intent to subserve their own interests. "These two findings appear to me to stand in absolute and irreconcilable opposition to each other, and the result is no finding at all upon a point essential to the validity of the judgment." JACKSON et al. v. STANFIELD et al.

In this action, brought by Jackson, the judgment below was for the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal.

DAILEY, J. This is an action brought by the appellants against the appellees for damages, and for relief by injunction, on the ground that the defendants had entered into an unlawful combination for the purpose of injuring the appellees in their business, and that in consequence thereof plaintiffs had suffered actual damage and were threatened with great loss in their business. By request of the parties, the court below made a special finding of the facts and stated its conclusion of the law thereon,—that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. There was no motion for a new trial, and the only questions presented by the record are these: First. Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction. Second. If not entitled to an injunction, are they entitled to recover damages? * * *

We have, for convenience, taken so much of the special finding as we deemed material to the questions involved:

That the plaintiffs, Newton Jackson and Martha E. Jackson, are husband and wife. That Newton Jackson has no means, that his wife has means of her own, and for the past three years Newton Jackson has been engaged in the business of buying and selling lumber. That he has bought and sold lumber, dealing with his wife's means, and also on commission, by negotiating sales as agent of a wholesale dealer or manufacturer, and receiving a commission therefor, without owning the lumber himself. That the arrangement between plaintiffs was that the husband supported himself and family from his earnings and profits, and if any surplus remained it was the property of his wife. That the business was managed solely by Newton Jackson, in his own name, he occasionally using the word "agent" in connection with his own name, and using from $3,000 to $4,000 of his wife's means; but defendants had no knowledge that he was acting as agent for his wife. That plaintiffs have kept no lumber yard or stock on hand in South Bend, Ind., where they have done business for the past three years. That the defendants are partners, retail dealers in lumber in South Bend, Ind., and have kept a lumber yard and stock on hand. That prior to 1889 the defendants and other retail dealers in lumber in Indiana, about 150 in number, associated themselves together into an association known and designated as the "Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Indiana," and agreed to a constitution and by-laws for their government, which constitution and by-laws are in these words: * * *

"Article 2. Conditions of Membership. Any person who may be regularly in the retail lumber trade, owning or operating a lumber yard, in which a general assortment of stock in kind and quantity commensurate with the demands of the community where located is kept for sale, may become a member of this association by subscribing to the constitution and paying the annual dues prescribed by the by-laws. * * *

"Article 10. Any manufacturer or wholesale dealer may become an honorary member of this association, with all the privileges and benefits save that of voting, upon payment of the annual dues. * * * Sec. 5. Members are entitled to the protection of this association in the towns in which their yards are situated and the adjacent territory, which must be designated in the application for membership, and written in the membership certificate. If protection is wanted for more than one point, where applicant owns or operates a yard, separate memberships must be taken. * * *

"Relations with Wholesalers. * * * Sec. 3. Whenever and as often as any manufacturer or wholesale dealer, or their agents, shall sell lumber, sash, doors, or blinds to any person not a regular dealer, as contemplated by article 2 of the constitution of the association, any member doing business in the town to which such shipment was made may notify the shipper, manufacturer, or wholesale dealer who made such shipment that he has a claim against them for such shipment. If the parties cannot adjust the claim, it shall be the duty of the member to notify the secretary of the facts in the case, who shall refer the case to the executive committee, whose duty it shall be to hear both sides of the question and determine the claim. If the wholesaler or manufacturer refuses to abide by the decision of the executive committee, it shall be the duty of the secretary to notify the members of this association of the name of such wholesaler or manufacturer. It shall also be the duty of the members to no longer patronize said wholesaler or manufacturer. If any member continues to deal with such dealer or manufacturer, he shall be expelled from the association. If the member refuses to abide by the decision of the executive committee, his name shall be stricken from the membership of the association. It is provided that nothing in this section shall be so construed as to entitle members to make complaint on account of lumber sold to manufacturers, and actually used in articles manufactured, nor to railroads or transportation companies, nor, in case of sash, doors, or blinds, to hardware merchants who keep a regular stock of such goods. * * *

We infer from article 2 of the constitution, that "any person in the retail lumber trade, owning and operating a lumber yard in which a general assortment of stock in kind and quantity commensurate with the demands of the community where located is kept for sale, is a regular dealer." The regular dealer, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the by-laws, when his territory is encroached upon by a wholesale dealer or manufacturer, is authorized to notify the person so offending that he has a claim against him for such sale or shipment, and to make a demand therefor. If the parties cannot adjust it, it is made the duty of the member to notify the secretary of the facts in the case, who shall refer the matter to the executive committee, whose duty it is to hear the grievances and determine the claim. If the wholesaler or manufacturer ignores the decision of the committee, it is the duty of the secretary to notify the members of the association of the name of the person so offending, and of the members to no longer patronize him. If they continue to deal with the offender, they shall be expelled from the association; and if any member refuses to abide by the decision of the executive committee, his name is to be stricken from the membership of the society.

The facts found by the court disclose that the appellees, as members of the combination complained of availed themselves of the means provided for in section 3 to destroy the business of the appellants as brokers in lumber, because they were not retail dealers within the definition of the term, and that they effectuated their purpose. The special findings of fact clearly show it to be a compact to suppress the competition of those dealers who did not own yards with an adequate stock on hand, by driving them out of business. By this plan they reach the wholesale dealer and compel him to pay an arbitrary penalty, under a threat of financial injury, and they force him to assist in ruining the dealer who does not own a yard. There is such an element of coercion and intimidation in the by-law under consideration, towards the wholesale dealers, manufacturers, and even the members of the society, and such provision made for penalties and forfeitures against them, that it will not do to say it was optional with the wholesale dealer whether it would pay the demand or not, or that it was left to the discretion or choice of the members to either trade with the wholesaler or abandon the association. A conspiracy formed and intended, directly or indirectly, to prevent the carrying on of any lawful business, or to injure the business of any one, by wrongfully preventing those who would be customers from buying anything from the representatives of such business by threats or intimidation, is in restraint of trade and unlawful. * * *

The great weight of authority supports the doctrine that, where the policy pursued against a trade or business is of a menacing character, calculated to destroy or injure the business of the person so engaged, either by threats or intimidation, it becomes unlawful, and the person inflicting the wrong is amenable to the injured party in a civil action for damages therefor. It is not a mere passive, let-alone policy, a withdrawal of all business relations, intercourse, and fellowship, that creates the liability, but the threats and intimidation shown in the complaint. The learned counsel for the appellees, in his very able brief, contends that the plaintiffs were only incidentally injured by the acts of the defendants in enforcing a penalty of $100 against the West Michigan Lumber Company. It will be observed that the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association invites wholesalers to become honorary members, and that said lumber company is an honorary member. But the rules of the association do not affect, alone, members active and honorary. They extend to and reach any wholesale dealer in the United States with whom the threat to withdraw the trade of 150 retail dealers can have weight. It is shown in the finding that Michigan is the source from which most of the lumber in northern Indiana is procured, and that the rules of the association are published in pamphlet form and sent to every wholesale dealer in the United States. The retail dealers who organized the association in question are members of the various cities and towns where they are located. They have lumber yards containing stock in quantity and quality suited to and commensurate with the wants of the consumers in their several localities. These gentlemen are prominent, wealthy, and influential citizens of our state, whose power, from the elevated stations they occupy, so exercised, enables them to control the wholesale dealers of the United States against the agents and brokers within their own territory, and effectually drive them out of business. It is idle to say that the victim of such a combination is only "incidentally" affected thereby. The object of the association and the result attained is a monopoly of the trade by owners of yards, and the broker is simply ignored by the wholesale dealers.

It is not in point to cite cases where men voluntarily agree to observe rules adopted by themselves. This is no voluntary affair of the wholesale dealers. It is not even a combination of wholesalers. They may and do sometimes become honorary members, so as to keep within touch of the retail dealers and secure trade. It is, as stated, an association of retailers to restrict the liberty of wholesalers to sell to consumers and brokers, and the wholesalers must obey or lose their trade.

It is found as a fact that the market in which the plaintiffs could most profitably buy was in Michigan. Freight and railroad facilities necessarily limited the field. It is also found that the West Michigan Lumber Company is the dealer that made the plaintiff's trade most profitable, and that, for fear of the penalties, this company and another refused to deal with them. The West Michigan Lumber Company was willing and anxious to sell to the plaintiffs until fined by the defendants and mulcted in the sum of $100, when it refused to make further sales for the reason that it was afraid of the penalties. Such rules contravene the rights of nonmembers to earn their living by fair competition.

The case of Bohn Manuf'g Co. v. Hollis (1893) 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, is cited by appellees as sustaining the decision of the lower court. It was a case in which a large number of lumber dealers had formed an association very similar in its character to the one in the case at bar. * * * The opinion proceeds upon the theory that there was no element of coercion or intimidation in the acts complained of, but we think the decision in this respect is in conflict with approved authority, and is bad as a precedent.

It appears from the facts found by the court that, after the payment of the $100 fine so assessed, the appellant Newton Jackson made an offer to the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company, of South Bend, to sell said company two million feet of lumber, which offer was based on the price list of the West Michigan Lumber Company; that his commission thereon would have been $500; that the offer of said Jackson was accepted by the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company, but the West Michigan Lumber Company refused to sell to or through Jackson by reason of the rules of said association, and on account of having paid said penalty, and said Jackson thereupon did not contract with said Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company, but turned over such sale to the West Michigan Lumber Company, and allowed it to make such sale without paying any commission to him; that said Newton Jackson thereafter caused lumber to be purchased for his customers in the name of Smith & Jackson, a firm of regular dealers as defined by the association, in South Bend, and paid to them $83 of his commission for the use of their name, which was a reasonable and fair charge therefor; that by reason of the refusal of the said West Michigan Lumber Company to sell him lumber to fill an existing contract said Jackson went to Manistee, Mich., to purchase lumber, and expended in railroad fare and freight $82 more than it would have cost him had said West Michigan Lumber Company not refused to sell to him; that, except for such refusal, the West Michigan Lumber Company could have sold him lumber to fill such contract; that during the year 1890 plaintiffs' business had decreased, and before the commencement of this suit plaintiffs requested defendants to permit them to do business as heretofore, and to abandon their position in this matter, and not to complain to the association of sales made to plaintiffs, but defendants refused to do so, and declared their intention to adhere to their position, and that they intended to enforce the rules and by-laws of said association.

Without further extending this opinion, we only need to say that, if it had not been for the wrongful acts of the appellees, the plaintiffs would have made $583 in profits upon contracts of which they were deprived. They are entitled as compensation to the amount of damages sustained, which is measured by the loss actually incurred. If there was any circumstance to be considered in mitigation of damages, it was incumbent on the defendants to show that fact; but as the record is silent on this question, we must infer that none existed. We think the claim for expenses to Manistee and return too remote to be considered in this case. The judgment is reversed, with instructions to restate conclusions of law and render judgment upon the special findings in favor of the appellants for $583, and with the further instruction to render a judgment perpetually enjoining the defendants from in any way, other than fair, open competition, interfering with the plaintiffs in their business, and from demanding a penalty or making a claim against any one, under the by-laws of said association, who may sell to the plaintiffs, or through them to a consumer.[41]

MARTELL v. WHITE et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. 1904. 185 Mass. 255, 69 N. E. 1085, 64 L. R. A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341.)

Tort by Martell for conspiracy to injure his business. In the superior court a verdict was ordered for the defendants. The plaintiff excepted.

HAMMOND, J. The evidence warranted the finding of the following facts, many of which were not in dispute: The plaintiff was engaged in a profitable business in quarrying granite and selling the same to granite workers in Quincy and vicinity. About January, 1899, his customers left him, and his business was ruined, through the action of the defendants and their associates. The defendants were all members of a voluntary association known as the Granite Manufacturers' Association of Quincy, Mass., and some of them were on the executive committee. The association was composed of "such individuals, firms, or corporations as are, or are about to become manufacturers, quarriers, or polishers of granite." There was no constitution, and, while there were by-laws, still, except as hereinafter stated, there was in them no statement of the objects for which the association was formed The by-laws provided among other things, for the admission, suspension, and expulsion of members, the election of officers, including an executive committee and defined the respective powers and duties of the officers. One of the by-laws read as follows: "For the purpose of defraying in part the expense of the maintenance of this organization, any member thereof having business transactions with any party or concern in Quincy or its vicinity, not members hereof, and in any way relating to the cutting, quarrying, polishing, buying or selling of granite (hand polishers excepted) shall for each of said transactions contribute at least $1 and not more than $500. The amount to be fixed by the association upon its determining the amount and nature of said transaction."

Acting under the by-laws the association investigated charges which were made against several of its members that they had purchased granite from a party "not a member" of the association. The charges were proved, and, under the section above quoted, it was voted that the offending parties "should respectively contribute to the funds of the association" the sums named in the votes. These sums ranged from $10 to $100. Only the contribution of $100 has been paid, but it is a fair inference that the proceedings to collect the others have been delayed only by reason of this suit. The party "not a member" was the present plaintiff, and the members of the association knew it. Most of the customers of the plaintiff were members of the association, and after these proceedings they declined to deal with him. This action on their part was due to the course of the association in compelling them to contribute as above stated, and to their fear that a similar vote for contribution would be passed, should they continue to trade with the plaintiff. The jury might properly have found, also, that the euphemistic expression, "shall contribute to the funds of the association," contained an idea which could be more tersely and accurately expressed by the phrase "shall pay a fine," or, in other words, that the plain intent of the section was to provide for the imposition upon those who came within its provisions of a penalty in the nature of a substantial fine.

The bill of exceptions recites that "there was no evidence of threats or intimidation practiced upon the plaintiff himself, and the acts complained of were confined to the action of the society upon its own members." We understand this statement to mean simply that the acts of the association concerned only such of the plaintiff's customers as were members, and that no pressure was brought to bear upon the plaintiff, except such as fairly resulted from action upon his customers. While it is true that the by-law was not directed expressly against the plaintiff by name, still he belonged to the class whose business it was intended to affect, and the proceedings actually taken were based upon transactions with him alone, and in that way were directed against his business alone. It was the intention of the defendants to withdraw his customers from him, if possible, by the imposition of fines upon them, with the knowledge that the result would be a great loss to the plaintiff. The defendants must be presumed to have intended the natural result of their acts. Here, then, is a clear and deliberate interference with the business of a person, with the intention of causing damage to him, and ending in that result. The defendants combined and conspired together to ruin the plaintiff in his business, and they accomplished their purpose. In all this, have they kept within lawful bounds? It is elemental that the unlawfulness of a conspiracy may be found either in the end sought, or the means to be used. If either is unlawful, within the meaning of the term as applied to the subject, then the conspiracy is unlawful. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine into the nature of the conspiracy in this case, both as to the object sought and the means used.

The case presents one phase of a general subject which gravely concerns the interests of the business world, and, indeed, those of all organized society, and which in recent years has demanded and received great consideration in the courts and elsewhere. Much remains to be done to clear the atmosphere, but some things, at least, appear to have been settled; and certainly at this stage of the judicial inquiry it cannot be necessary to enter upon a course of reasoning or to cite authorities in support of the proposition that, while a person must submit to competition, he has the right to be protected from malicious interference with his business. The rule is well stated in Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, 564, in the following language: "Every one has a right to enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition, but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance, or annoyance. If disturbance or loss come as a result of competition, or the exercise of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria, unless some superior right by contract or otherwise is interfered with. But if it come from the merely wanton or malicious acts of others, without the justification of competition or the service of any interest or lawful purpose, it then stands upon a different footing." In a case like this, where the injury is intentionally inflicted, the crucial question is whether there is justifiable cause for the act. If the injury be inflicted without just cause or excuse, then it is actionable. Bowen, L. J., in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. D. 598, 613; Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330. The justification must be as broad as the act, and must cover not only the motive and the purpose, or, in other words, the object sought, but also the means used.

The defendants contend that both as to object and means, they are justified by the law applicable to business competition. In considering this defense, it is to be remembered, as was said by Bowen, L. J., in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 23 Q. B. D. 598, 611, that there is presented "an apparent conflict or antinomy between two rights that are equally regarded by the law—the right of the plaintiff to be protected in the legitimate exercise of his trade, and the right of the defendants to carry on their business as seems best to them, provided they commit no wrong to others." Here, as in most cases where there is a conflict between two important principles, either of which is sound, and to be sustained within proper bounds, but each of which must finally yield, to some extent, to the other, it frequently is not possible by a general formula to mark out the dividing line with reference to every conceivable case, and it is not wise to attempt it. The best and only practicable course is to consider the cases as they arise, and, bearing in mind the grounds upon which the soundness of each principle is supposed to rest, by a process of elimination and comparison to establish points through which, at least, the line must run, and beyond which the party charged with trespass shall not be allowed to go.

While the purpose to injure the plaintiff appears clearly enough, the object or motive is left somewhat obscure, upon the evidence. The association had no written constitution, and the by-laws do not expressly set forth its objects. It is true that from the by-laws it appears that none but persons engaged in the granite business can be members, and that a member transacting any business of this kind with a person not a member is liable to a fine, from which it may be inferred that it is the idea of the members that, for the protection of their business, it would be well to confine it to transactions among themselves, and that one, at least, of the objects of the association is to advance the interests of the members in that way. The oral testimony tends to show that one object of the association is to see that agreements made between its members and their employés and between this association and similar associations in the same line of business, be kept and "lived up to." Whether this failure to set out fully in writing the objects, is due to any reluctance to have them clearly appear or to some other cause, is, of course, not material to this case. The result, however, is that its objects do not so clearly appear as might be desired; but, in view of the conclusion to which we have come as to the means used, it is not necessary to inquire more closely as to the objects. It may be assumed that one of the objects was to enable the members to compete more successfully with others in the same business, and that the acts of which the plaintiff complains were done for the ultimate protection and advancement of their own business interests, with no intention or desire to injure the plaintiff, except so far as such injury was the necessary result of measures taken for their own interests. If that was true, then, so far as respects the end sought, the conspiracy does not seem to have been illegal.

The next question is whether there is anything unlawful or wrongful in the means used, as applied to the acts in question. Nothing need be said in support of the general right to compete. To what extent combination may be allowed in competition is a matter about which there is as yet much conflict, but it is possible that, in a more advanced stage of the discussion, the day may come when it will be more clearly seen, and will more distinctly appear in the adjudication of the courts, than as yet has been the case, that the proposition that, what one man lawfully can do any number of men, acting together by combined agreement lawfully may do, is to be received with newly disclosed qualifications, arising out of the changed conditions of civilized life and of the increased facility and power of organized combination, and that the difference between the power of individuals, acting each according to his own preference, and that of an organized and extensive combination, may be so great in its effect upon public and private interests as to cease to be simply one of degree, and to reach the dignity of a difference in kind. Indeed, in the language of Bowen, L. J., in the Mogul Steamship Case ubi supra (page 616): "Of the general proposition that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several, there can be no doubt. The distinction is based on sound reason, for a combination may make oppressive or dangerous that which, if it proceeded only from a single person, would be otherwise; and the very fact of the combination may show that the object is simply to do harm, and not to exercise one's own just rights." See, also, opinion of Stirling, L. J., in Giblan v. National Amalgamated Labourers' Union, [1903] 2 K. B. 600, 621. Speaking generally, however, competition in business is permitted although frequently disastrous to those engaged in it. It is always selfish, often sharp, and sometimes deadly. Conspicuous illustrations of the destructive extent to which it may be carried are to be found in the Mogul Steamship Case, above cited, and in Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499. The fact, therefore, that the plaintiff was vanquished is not enough, provided that the contest was carried on within the rules allowable in such warfare. It is a right however, which is to be exercised with reference to the existence of a similar right on the part of others. The trader has not a free lance. He may fight, but as a soldier, not as a guerilla. The right of competition rests upon the doctrine that the interests of the great public are best subserved by permitting the general and natural laws of business to have their full and free operation, and that this end is best attained when the trader is allowed, in his business, to make free use of these laws. He may praise his wares, may offer more advantageous terms than his rival, may sell at less than cost, or in the words of Bowen, L. J., in the Mogul Steamship Case, ubi supra, may adopt "the expedient of sowing one year a crop of apparently unfruitful prices, in order, by driving competition away to realize a fuller harvest of profit in the future." In these and many other obvious ways he may secure the customers of his rival, and build up his own business to the destruction of that of others; and, so long as he keeps within the operation of the laws of trade, his justification is complete. But from the very nature of the case, it is manifest that the right of competition furnishes no justification for an act done by the use of means which in their nature are in violation of the principle upon which it rests. The weapons used by the trader who relies upon this right for justification must be those furnished by the laws of trade, or at least must not be inconsistent with their free operation. No man can justify an interference with another man's business through fraud or misrepresentation, nor by intimidation, obstruction, or molestation. In the case before us the members of the association were to be held to the policy of refusing to trade with the plaintiff by the imposition of heavy fines, or, in other words, they were coerced by actual or threatened injury to their property. It is true that one may leave the association if he desires, but, if he stays in it, he is subjected to the coercive effect of a fine to be determined and enforced by the majority. This method of procedure is arbitrary and artificial, and is based in no respect upon the grounds upon which competition in business is permitted, but, on the contrary, it creates a motive for business action inconsistent with that freedom of choice out of which springs the benefit of competition to the public, and has no natural or logical relation to the grounds upon which the right to compete is based. Such a method of influencing a person may be coercive and illegal. Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287.

Nor is the nature of the coercion changed by the fact that the persons fined were members of the association. The words of Munson, J., in Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 9, 42 Atl. 607, 609, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746, are applicable here: "The law cannot be compelled, by any initial agreement of an associate member, to treat him as one having no choice but that of the majority, nor as a willing participant in whatever action may be taken. The voluntary acceptance of by-laws providing for the imposition of coercive fines does not make them legal and collectible, and the standing threat of their imposition may properly be classed with the ordinary threat of suits upon groundless claims. The fact that the relations and processes deemed essential to a recovery are brought within the membership and proceedings of an organized body cannot change the result. The law sees in the membership of an association of this character both the authors of its coercive system and the victim of its unlawful pressure. If this were not so, men could deprive their fellows of established rights and evade the duty of compensation simply by working through an association."

In view of the considerations upon which the right of competition is based we are of opinion that as against the plaintiff the defendants have failed to show that the coercion or intimidation of the plaintiff's customers by means of a fine is justified by the law of competition. The ground of the justification is not broad enough to cover the acts of interference in their entirety, and the interference, being injurious and unjustifiable, is unlawful. We do not mean to be understood as saying that a fine is of itself necessarily, or even generally, an illegal implement. In many cases it is so slight as not to be coercive in its nature; in many it serves a useful purpose to call the attention of a member of an organization to the fact of the infraction of some innocent regulation; and, in many, it serves as an extra incentive to the performance of some absolute duty or the assertion of some absolute right. But where, as in the case before us, the fine is so large as to amount to moral intimidation or coercion, and is used as a means to enforce a right not absolute in its nature, but conditional, and is inconsistent with those conditions upon which the right rests, then the coercion becomes unjustifiable, and taints with illegality the act.

The defendants strongly rely upon Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor [1892] A. C. 25; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319; Macauley Bros. v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 33 Atl. 1, 37 L. R. A. 455, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770; and Cote v. Murphy, 159 Pa. 420, 28 Atl. 190, 23 L. R. A. 135, 39 Am. St. Rep. 686. In none of these cases was there any coercion by means of fines upon those who traded with the plaintiff. Inducements were held out, but they were such as are naturally incident to competition—for instance, more advantageous terms in the way of discounts, increased trade, and otherwise. In the Minnesota case there was among the rules of the association a clause requiring the plaintiff to pay 10 per cent., but the propriety or the legality of that provision was not involved. In Bowen v. Matheson, it is true that the by-laws provided for a fine, but the declaration did not charge that any coercion by means of a fine had been used. A demurrer to the declaration was sustained upon the ground that there was no sufficient allegation of an illegal act. The only allegation which need be noticed here was that the defendants "did prevent men from shipping with" the plaintiff, and as to this the court said: "This might be done in many ways which are legal and proper and, as no illegal methods are stated, the allegation is bad." This comes far short of sustaining the defendants in their course of coercion by means of fines.

For the reasons above stated, a majority of the court are of opinion that the case should have been submitted to the jury. Exceptions sustained.[42]

CHAMBERS et al. v. BALDWIN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1891. 91 Ky. 121, 15 S. W. 57, 11 L. R. A. 545, 34 Am. St. Rep. 165.)

Appeal by the plaintiffs below from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to their petition. The cause of action as stated in this petition was substantially as follows:

That, as partners doing business under the firm name of Chambers & Marshall, they made a contract with one Wise, whereby he sold, and agreed to deliver to them in good order during delivery season of 1877, his half of a crop of tobacco, then undivided, which he had raised on shares upon the farm of appellee; in consideration whereof they promised to pay on delivery at the rate of five cents per pound. That they were ready, able, and willing to receive and pay for the tobacco as and at the time agreed on, and demanded of him compliance with the contract; but he had already delivered it to appellee and Newton Cooper, tobacco dealers, and then notified appellants he would not deliver it to them, and they might treat the contract as broken and at an end. That appellee knew of the existence of said contract, but maliciously, on account of his personal ill will to Chambers, one of appellants, and with design to injure by depriving them of profit on their purchase, and to benefit himself by becoming purchaser in their stead, advised and procured Wise, who would else have kept and performed, to break the contract, whereby they have been damaged $———. That he (Wise) was at the time known by appellee to be, and now is, insolvent; so, being without other redress, they bring this action.

LEWIS, J., after stating the substance of the petition. Appellee is alleged to have been actuated to do the act complained of by ill will to one of appellants only, which, however, to avoid confusion we will treat as a malicious intent to injure both; and also by a design to benefit himself by becoming purchaser of the tobacco for the firm of which he was a member. And thus two questions of law arise on demurrer to the petition: First, whether one party to a contract can maintain an action against a person who has maliciously advised and procured the other party to break it; second, whether an act lawful in itself can become actionable solely because it was done maliciously.

As appellee, being no party to the contract, did not, nor could, himself break it, his wrong, if any, was in advising and procuring the equivalent of canceling, and inducing Wise to do so. Consequently, while the remedy of appellants against him (Wise) was by action ex contractu, recovery being limited to actual damage sustained, their action against appellee is, and could be, in no other than in form ex delicto; recovery, if any at all, not being so limited. Nevertheless, in Addison on Torts (volume 1, p. 37) it is said: "Maliciously inducing a party to a contract to break his contract, to the injury of the person with whom the contract was made, creates that conjunction of wrong and damage which supports an action." The authority cited in support of the proposition thus stated, without qualification, is the English case of Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 228, decided in 1853, followed by Bowen v. Hall, decided in 1881, and reported in 20 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 578, though it is proper to say there was a dissenting opinion in each case. The action of Lumley v. Gye was in tort, the complaint being that the defendant maliciously enticed and procured a person, under a binding contract to perform at plaintiff's theater, to refuse to perform, and abandon the contract. The majority of judges held, and the case was decided upon the theory, that remedies given by the common law in such cases are not in terms limited to any description of servants or service; and the action could be maintained upon the principle, laid own in Comyn's Digest, that, "in all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action upon the case to be repaired in damages." The position of Justice Coleridge was to the contrary,—that, as between master and servant, there was an admitted exception to the general rule of the common law confining remedies by action to the contracting parties, dating from the statute of laborers, passed in 25 Edw. III., and both on principle and authority limited by it; and that "the existence of intention, that is, malice, will in some cases be an essential ingredient in order to constitute the wrongfulness or injurious nature of the act; but it will neither supply the want of the act itself, or its hurtful consequences."

We have been referred to some American cases as being in harmony with the two cases mentioned. In Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, it was held that where a contract exists by which a person has a legal right to continuance of service of workmen in business of manufacturing boots and shoes, and another knowingly and intentionally procures it to be violated, he may be held liable for the wrong, although he did it for the purpose of promoting his own business. But it was not alleged the defendant in that case had any such purpose in procuring the persons to leave and abandon the employment of the plaintiff; the real grievance complained of being damage by the wanton and malicious act of defendant and others. In Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, 16 Am. Rep. 780, it was held that if a person maliciously entices laborers or croppers on a farm to break their contract, and desert the service of their employer, damages may be recovered against him. But both those cases relate to rights and duties growing out of the relation of employer and persons agreeing to do labor and personal service, and do not apply here, except so far as the decisions rest upon other grounds than the statute of laborers. In Jones v. Stanly, 76 N. C. 355, it was, however, held that the same reasons which controlled the decisions rendered in Haskins v. Royster "cover every case in which one person maliciously persuades another to break any contract with a third person. It is not confined to contracts for service." But we have not seen any other case in which the doctrine is stated so broadly. Chesley v. King, 74 Me. 164, 43 Am. Rep. 569, we do not regard at all decisive, because the court went no further than to say they were inclined to the view that there may be cases where an act, otherwise lawful, when done for the sole purpose of damage to a person, without design to benefit the doer or others, may be an invasion of the legal rights of such person. Cooley on Torts, 497, agreeing with Justice Coleridge, says: "An action cannot, in general, be maintained for inducing a third person to break his contract with the plaintiff; the consequence, after all, being only a broken contract, for which the party to the contract may have his remedy by suing upon it." And it seems to us that the rule harmonizes with both principle and policy, and to it there can be safely and consistently made but two classes of exception; for, as to make a contract binding, the parties must be competent to contract and do so freely, the natural and reasonable presumption is that each party enters into it with his eyes open, and purpose and expectation of looking alone to the other for redress in case of breach by him. One such exception was made by the English statute of laborers to apply where apprentices, menial servants, and others, whose sole means of living was manual labor, were enticed to leave their employment, and may be applied in this state in virtue of and as regulated by our own statutes. The other arises where a person has been procured against his will, or contrary to his purpose, by coercion or deception of another to break his contract. Green v. Button, 2 Cromp. M. & R. 707; Ashley v. Dixon, 48 N. Y. 430, 8 Am. Rep. 559. But as Wise was not induced by either force or fraud to break the contract in question, it must be regarded as having been done of his own will, and for his own benefit. And his voluntary and distinct act, not that of appellee, being the proximate cause of damage to appellants, they, according to a familiar and reasonable principle of law, cannot seek redress elsewhere than from him.

That an action on the case will lie whenever there is concurrence of actual damage to the plaintiff, and wrongful act by the defendant, is a truism, yet, unexplained, misleading. The act must not only be the direct cause of the damage, but a legal wrong, else it is damnum absque injuria. But whether a legal wrong has been done for which the law affords reparation in damages depends upon the nature of the act, and cannot be consistently or fitly made to depend upon the motive of the person doing it; for an act may be tortious, and consequently actionable, though not malicious, nor even willful. If it was not so, there could be no reparation for an act of pure negligence, though ever so hurtful in its effects. And it is just as plain that an act which does not of itself amount to a legal wrong, without, cannot be made so by a bad motive accompanying it; for there is no logical process by which a lawful act, done in a lawful way, can be transformed or not into a legal wrong according to the motive, bad or good, actuating the person doing it. The proposition is clearly and forcibly stated in Jenkins v. Fowler, 24 Pa. 308, as follows: "Malicious motives make a bad case worse, but they cannot make that wrong which in its own essence is lawful. Where a creditor who has a just debt brings a suit or issues execution, though he does it out of pure enmity to the debtor, he is safe. In slander, if the defendant proves the words spoken to be true, his intention to injure the plaintiff by proclaiming his infamy will not defeat justification. One who prosecutes another for a crime need not show he was actuated by correct feelings, if he can prove that there was good reason to believe the charge was well founded. In short, any transaction which would be lawful if the parties were friends cannot be made the foundation of an action merely because they happen to be enemies. As long as a man keeps himself within the law by doing no act which violates it, we must leave his motives to Him who searches hearts." In Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294, the cause of action stated was diversion, with malicious intent, by the defendant of subterraneous water on his own land from adjoining land of the plaintiff; but it was held there could be no recovery, because, as said by the court, "the act done, to wit, the using of one's own property, being lawful in itself, the motive with which it is done,—whatever it may be as a matter of conscience,—is, in law a matter of indifference." In Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49, the action was for the same cause substantially, and the language of the court was: "An act legal in itself, and which violates no right, cannot be made actionable on account of the motive which induced it." In Mahan v. Brown, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 261, 28 Am. Dec. 461, the complaint was that the defendant wantonly and maliciously erected on his own premises a high fence near to and in front of plaintiff's window, without benefit to himself, and for the sole purpose of annoying the plaintiff, thereby rendering her house uninhabitable. But it was held the action would not lie, because, no legal right of the plaintiff having been injured, the defendant had not so used his property as to injure another, and, whether his motive was good or bad, she had no legal cause of complaint. To the same effect is the decided weight of authority in the United States. Adler v. Fenton, 24 How. 412, 16 L. Ed. 696; Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 39, 28 Am. Rep. 93; Benjamin v. Wheeler, 8 Gray (Mass.) 410; Iron Co. v. Uhler, 75 Pa. 467, 15 Am. Rep. 599; Plank-Road Co. v. Douglass, 9 N. Y. 444.

Upon neither principle nor authority could this action have been maintained if the same thing it is complained appellee did had been done by a person on friendly terms with appellant Chambers, or by a stranger, though he might have profited by the purchase to the damage of appellants; for competition in every branch of business being not only lawful, but necessary and proper, no person should, or can upon principle, be made liable in damages for buying what may be freely offered for sale by a person having the right to sell, if done without fraud, merely because there may be a pre-existing contract between the seller and a rival in business, for a breach of which each party may have his legal remedy against the other. Nor, the right to buy existing, should it make any difference, in a legal aspect, what motive influenced the purchaser. Competition frequently engenders, not only a spirit of rivalry, but enmity; and, if the motive influencing every business transaction that may result in injury or inconvenience to a business rival was made the test of its legality, litigation and strife would be vexatiously and unnecessarily increased, and the sale and exchange of commodities very much hindered. As pertinently inquired in Plank-Road Co. v. Douglass, "Independently of authority, if malignant motive is sufficient to make a man's dealings with his own property, when accompanied by damage to another, actionable, where is this principle to stop?" And as correctly said by Lord Coleridge in Bowen v. Hall: "The inquiries to which this view of the law [making an act lawful or not according to motive] would lead, are dangerous and inexpedient inquiries for courts of justice. Judges are not very fit for them, and juries are very unfit."

In our opinion, no cause of action is stated in the petition, and the demurrer was properly sustained. Judgment affirmed.[43]

BITTERMAN v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1907. 207 U. S. 205, 28 Sup. Ct. 91, 52 L. Ed. 171, 12 Ann. Cas. 693.)

Upon a bill filed on behalf of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana entered a decree perpetually enjoining Bitterman and four other ticket brokers, engaged in business in the city of New Orleans, from dealing in nontransferable round-trip tickets issued at reduced rates for passage over the lines of railway of the complainant on account of the United Confederate Veterans' Reunion and the Mardi Gras celebration held in the city of New Orleans in the years 1903 and 1904, respectively. On an appeal prosecuted by the railroad company, complaining of the limited relief awarded, the circuit court of appeals held that the defendants should also be enjoined generally from dealing in nontransferable round-trip reduced-rate tickets whenever issued by the complainant, and ordered the cause to be remanded to the circuit court with directions to enter a decree in accordance with the views expressed in the opinion. 75 C. C. A. 192, 144 Fed. 34. A writ of certiorari was thereupon allowed.

It was averred in the bill that complainant was a Kentucky corporation, operating about 3,000 miles of railway for the carriage of passengers, baggage, mail, express, and freight, its lines of road extending from New Orleans through various states, and making connections by which it reached all railroad stations in the United States, Canada, and Mexico. The persons named as defendants were averred to be citizens and residents of Louisiana, each engaged in the city of

New Orleans as a ticket broker or scalper in the business of buying and selling the unused return portions of railroad passenger tickets, especially excursion or special-rate tickets issued on occasions of fairs, expositions, conventions, and the like. It was further averred that the defendants were joined in the bill, "because their business and transactions complained of are in act, purpose, and effect identical, and in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits, the same relief being sought as to each and all of them."

Six articles or paragraphs of the bill related to an approaching reunion of United Confederate Veterans to be held in the city of New Orleans, which it was expected would necessitate the transportation by the railroads entering New Orleans of 100,000 visitors, one fourth of which number would pass over the lines of railway of the complainant. A necessity was alleged to exist for special reduced rates of fare to secure a large attendance at such reunion, and it was averred that a rate of 1 cent a mile, one-third the regular rate, had been agreed upon for nontransferable round-trip, reduced-rate tickets which were to be issued for the occasion, and it was stated "that among the conditions on the face of said ticket, which ticket contract is signed by the original purchaser and the company, is one that said ticket is nontransferable, and, if presented by any other than the original purchaser, who is required to sign the same at date of purchase, it will not be honored, but will be forfeited, and any agent or conductor of any of the lines over which it reads shall have the right to take up and cancel the entire ticket." And for various alleged reasons, based mainly upon the large number of expected purchasers, it was averred that the return portion of each ticket was not required to be signed by the original purchaser or presented to an agent of the complainant in the city of New Orleans for the purpose of the identification of the holder as the purchaser of the ticket.

It was averred that each defendant was accustomed to buy and sell the return coupons of nontransferable tickets, for the express purpose, and no other, of putting them in the hands of purchasers, to be fraudulently used for passage on the trains of complainant, and it was further averred that the defendants intended in like manner to fraudulently deal in the return portion of the tickets about to be issued for the reunion in question, and that complainant would sustain irreparable injury, for which it would have no adequate remedy at law, unless it was protected from such wrongful acts.

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court. * * * That the complainant had the lawful right to sell nontransferable tickets of the character alleged in the bill at reduced rates we think is not open to controversy, and that the condition of nontransferability and forfeiture embodied in such tickets was not only binding upon the original purchaser, but upon anyone who acquired such a ticket and attempted to use the same in violation of its terms, is also settled. Mosher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 127 U.

S. 390, 32 L. Ed. 249, 8 Sup. Ct. 1324. See also Boylan v. Hot Springs R. Co., 132 U. S. 146, 33 L. Ed. 290, 10 Sup. Ct. 50. * * * Any third person acquiring a nontransferable reduced-rate railroad ticket from the original purchaser, being therefore bound by the clause forbidding transfer, and the ticket in the hands of all such persons being subject to forfeiture on an attempt being made to use the same for passage, it may well be questioned whether the purchaser of such ticket acquired anything more than a limited and qualified ownership thereof, and whether the carrier did not, for the purpose of enforcing the forfeiture, retain a subordinate interest in the ticket, amounting to a right of property therein, which a court of equity would protect. Board of Trade v. Christie Grain & Stock Co., 198 U. S. 236, 49 L. Ed. 1031, 25 Sup. Ct. 637, and authorities there cited. See also Sperry & H. Co. v. Mechanics' Clothing Co. (C. C.) 128 Fed. 800.

We pass this question, however, because the want of merit in the contention that the case as made did not disclose the commission of a legal wrong conclusively results from a previous decision of this court. The case is Angle v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co., 151 U. S. 1, 38 L. Ed. 55, 14 Sup. Ct. 240, where it was held that an actionable wrong is committed by one "who maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties and induces one of them to break that contract to the injury of the other." That this principle embraces a case like the present, that is, the carrying on of the business of purchasing and selling nontransferable reduced-rate railroad tickets for profit, to the injury of the railroad company issuing such tickets, is, we think clear. It is not necessary that the ingredient of actual malice, in the sense of personal ill will, should exist to bring this controversy within the doctrine of the Angle Case. The wanton disregard of the rights of a carrier, causing injury to it, which the business of purchasing and selling nontransferable reduced-rate tickets of necessity involved, constitute legal malice within the doctrine of the Angle Case. We deem it unnecessary to restate the grounds upon which the ruling in the Angle Case was rested, or to trace the evolution of the principle in that case announced, because of the consideration given to the subject in the Angle Case and the full reference to the authorities which was made in the opinion in that case. * * *

NATIONAL PHONOGRAPH CO., Limited, v. EDISON-BELL CONSOLIDATED PHONOGRAPH CO., Limited.

(Court of Appeal. [1908] 1 Ch. 335.)

The plaintiffs were dealers in Edison phonographs, records, and blanks. To secure uniformity of price and prevent their business from being injured by any dealer cutting prices, the plaintiffs sold their goods only upon the terms of two printed documents, described as the "factor's agreement" and "the retail dealer's agreement" applicable to the wholesale and the retail trade respectively. Both the factor's agreement and the retail dealer's agreement provided that the plaintiff's goods should not be sold at less than current list prices, or to dealers on the plaintiffs' suspended list. The defendant company dealt in phonographic goods and wished to sell the plaintiffs' machines. The plaintiffs, however, for trade reasons, desired to prevent the defendant company from having this trade, and to that end placed their name on the suspended list. The defendant company sought to frustrate this design to embarrass them in their business.

In 1903 one Ell, a dealer in phonographic materials, became a customer of one of the plaintiffs' factors, Simpson & Co., for the purpose of obtaining through them the plaintiffs' goods. Simpson & Co., before doing business with Ell, required him to sign the retail dealer's agreement, which he accordingly did. Ell was also a customer of the defendant company, and had purchased goods from them. In 1904 Ell, as the result of an interview with one Presland, an employee of the defendant company, obtained twenty-seven of the plaintiffs' phonographs from Simpson & Co., and supplied them through Presland to the defendant company. Ell paid to Simpson & Co. the prescribed factor's price for the machines with money paid to him by the defendant company, making no profit himself out of the transaction.

In 1904, two persons, Hughes and Leach, acting on behalf of and with the authority of the defendant company, assumed fictitious names, and, representing falsely that they were independent dealers in phonographic goods, applied to wholesale dealers who had entered into factors' agreements with the plaintiffs, and, having signed retailers' agreements in fictitious names, obtained from the wholesale dealers a large number of the plaintiffs' machines with the usual trade discounts. These machines were in fact, though not to the knowledge of the wholesale dealers, obtained for and were handed over to the defendant company.

It appeared from the evidence that the defendant company sold phonograph records, which fitted the plaintiffs' machines, at a cheaper rate than the records sold by the plaintiffs (1s., as against 1s. 6d.), and that records were a better paying product than the machines themselves. It was stated that the defendant company had obtained about 700 of the plaintiff's machines. The plaintiffs alleged that the acts of the defendant company of which they complained had caused them great injury in their business. No direct pecuniary loss was proved, but a general falling off of business was shewn, which, it was said, was due to the fact that the sale of the plaintiffs' machines by the defendant company caused a demand for the records of the defendant company rather than for those of the plaintiffs, whereas if the plaintiffs' machines could only be obtained by the public from retailers who had signed the plaintiffs' retailer's agreement, the retailers would have obtained from the factors, and the public from the retailers, the plaintiff's records; it was also said that persons going to the defendant company's place of business to purchase the plaintiffs' machines might ultimately be induced to purchase the defendant company's machines instead of the plaintiff's, and it was further said that the plaintiffs' business would be injured by the acts of the defendant company, because if retailers saw that the plaintiffs' machines were being sold by the defendant company, and knew that the defendant company were on the suspended list, the retailers would think that the plaintiffs were incapable of maintaining their agreements, and would consequently cease to stock the plaintiffs' goods.

In respect of both these transactions—the Ell transaction and the Hughes and Leach transaction—the plaintiffs sued for an injunction and damages. The action came on for hearing before Joyce, J., who held that it failed altogether, and dismissed it with costs. The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal.[45]

KENNEDY, L. J., read the following judgment: In this case the plaintiffs' claim for damages and an injunction is based upon two distinct sets of circumstances, with which I will deal in the same order as that in which they have been dealt with in the judgment appealed against. The real defendant is the defendant company. The other defendants are practically nominal defendants only. The plaintiffs deal in phonographs and phonographic goods. These they sell to wholesale traders, whom they call factors, and they in their turn resell to retail dealers. The plaintiffs act upon a system of restrictive and exclusive trading. They exact from the factors who purchase from them an agreement not to sell to retail dealers except for certain discounts which the plaintiffs prescribe; not to sell to any retail dealers who decline to sign an agreement form to which I will presently refer;

[45] The statement of facts is abridged, and the arguments of counsel are omitted.

For the defendant it was urged by Hughes, K. C., and J. G. Wood that "neither Quinn v. Leathem nor South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. has anything to do with this case. In the former there was a conspiracy deliberately to injure, and in the latter case the miners were induced to break their contract in order to coerce the masters, and there necessarily was loss to the masters. With regard to the complaint that the defendants obtained goods by using fictitious names, it is not wrongful or a tort to buy goods under an alias. The only result is that the seller's malicious intent to boycott is frustrated." and not to sell to any person whose name is on a list which they describe as "our suspended list," and which, although it is in the agreement itself only stated to include those who are referred to in the seventh condition, is a list in which the plaintiffs include the name of any person whom they choose in this way to proscribe. If a factor fails to observe any of these or certain further stipulations of the agreement, he may be at once cut off from any further supply of goods and be placed on the suspended list. The retail dealer's agreement, which he must sign and give to the factor before he can buy from the factor, purports to bind the retail dealer (inter alia) not to sell to any one at a discount or at less than current list prices, or to any dealer who is on the plaintiffs' suspended list. If a retail dealer fails to observe any of the stipulations, he may be placed by the plaintiffs on their suspended list, and so be cut off from any further supply of goods. The justification alleged by the plaintiffs for this system consists, as alleged by them, in the maintenance of price and the encouragement to hold large stocks of the plaintiffs' wares, which the assurance of this is said to afford to factors and dealers. * * *[46]

The learned judge has given judgment for the defendants in regard to both of the transactions.

In regard to the first, which I will call the Ell transaction, he has held, first, that there was no contract existing between the plaintiffs and Ell upon which the plaintiffs could have successfully sued Ell; secondly, that the plaintiffs failed to prove that the defendant company or Presland directly procured or incited Ell to violate the contract, if any existed; thirdly, that, if any contract existed between the plaintiffs and Ell, it did not create a contractual relation between them within the meaning of Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495; and fourthly, that the plaintiffs had failed to prove the real and actual damage which was essential to their case. I agree with Joyce, J., as to the first of these grounds; as to the second, which is one of fact, I should be slow to differ from the learned judge who himself heard the witnesses give their testimony. If either of these conclusions is correct the plaintiffs' claim on this part of their case fails, and it is unnecessary for the purposes of this appeal to consider the third and fourth grounds on which the learned judge has also decided adversely to the plaintiffs. I reserve, till I deal with the Leach and Hughes case, any consideration of the question of damage. But, as the question of contractual relation involves a legal point of much general importance, and as, with sincere respect, I am not disposed to concur in the view which Joyce, J., has expressed, I do not think that, whilst agreeing for other reasons with the result of his judgment on this branch of the case, I ought to pass over the point altogether without comment. The learned judge holds that a valid contract by A. with B. not to do a particular act or acts [46] Part of the opinion, stating the facts of the two transactions, is omitted.

—for instance, not to purchase goods from or sell goods to C.—does not constitute a contractual relation in the sense in which Lord Macnaghten must be understood to have used that phrase in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, and in substance, as I understand his judgment, that an action at the suit of B. against one who procured or incited A. to break his contract not to do the particular act or acts could not properly be based upon any principles which are laid down in such cases as Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216, Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, and South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co., [1905] A. C. 239. Now, I agree that in these cases, as well as in Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333, and Temperton v. Russell, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, the contractual relation, which the parties sued in those cases were held to have unlawfully interrupted, involved something more than an obligation to abstain from doing a particular act or acts. In each case there subsisted between the contracting parties, by virtue of the contract, that which, for want of a better phrase, I think might be described as a more or less continuous course of dealing, as, for example, of personal service, though the case is not confined to personal service, of which without justification the party sued had successfully tried to procure the rupture. I agree with the defendants' counsel that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Exchange Telegraph Co. v. Gregory & Co., [1896] 1 Q. B. 147, 157, cited by the plaintiffs, does not throw light upon this part of the case when carefully looked at. That decision as is correctly stated at the close of the head-note in the Law Reports, simply was that the plaintiffs in that case had a right of property at common law, and were entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing that right. And indeed, in the following passage in his judgment Rigby, L. J., suggested that there is some limitation: "It is not every procuring of a breach of contract that will give a right of action." [47]

[47] On this remark by Rigby, J., this comment is made by Joyce, J., in the principal case, [1908] 1 Ch. 335, 350: "For instance, sometimes it happens that a lady, having contracted to marry A., is induced to change her mind and marry B., as, it must be presumed, upon a pressing invitation by him to do so. If B. was aware of the lady's previous engagement to A., can A., instead of bringing an action for breach of promise against the lady, recover damages in an action of tort against her husband B., upon the ground that he has interfered with a contractual relation between the lady and A. and induced her to break her contract? Could A., if he commenced his action soon enough, obtain an injunction against B. to restrain him from procuring the lady to marry him? If the contention of the counsel of the plaintiffs before me be correct, these questions would have to be answered in the affirmative. Again, suppose A. is employed by B., with a stipulation that after the termination of the engagement he shall not enter into any similar employment in the same neighbourhood, then suppose A., being no longer employed by B., enters the service of C., carrying on a similar business in the same town, can B. sue C. for damages and obtain an injunction to prevent his employing A. when he is no longer in the service of B.? We have heard lately that publishers, when they issue a book at a net price, stipulate that the booksellers they supply shall not resell within six months at less than such net price. Does any one who, within six months from the publication of such a book at a net price, asks, or if you like induces, the bookseller to let him have a copy for less than the net price, render himself liable to an action at the suit of the publisher?"

I am not aware of any case in which the line or nature of the limitation has been defined. But, if it had been necessary, which it is not, to decide the point, I do not see how, in view of the decisions of the House of Lords to which I have just referred, and of the language used by Lord Watson in Allen v. Flood, Lord Lindley in Quinn v. Leathem, and Lord Macnaghten in the same case, I could concur with Joyce, J., if he has held that in no circumstances could the intentional procurement of a breach of contract not to do a particular act constitute in law an actionable wrong.

The case made out by the plaintiffs in regard to the Hughes and Leach transactions appears to me to differ, in important respects, from the Ell transaction. By intentional misrepresentations the defendant company, through their agents or servants, procured from the factors goods of the plaintiffs' manufacture which the factors would not have parted with if they had known that the persons with whom they were dealing were agents or servants of a firm included in the suspended list. There has been, in a sense, a sale contrary to the terms and the intention of the factor's agreement. Then comes the question, Did such a transaction constitute, on the part of the factors, in each case an actionable violation of their contract with the plaintiffs, which I assume to be valid in point of law? I do not think it did. The factors did not know, or have reason to suppose, that they were selling to the defendants; on the contrary, they were intentionally misled by Hughes and Leach into the belief that they were selling to independent retail dealers, who had their own places of business and were in no way connected with the defendants. The names given by Hughes and Leach were not names on the suspended list. It seems to me that a sale honestly made by a factor under these circumstances ought not, according to the proper interpretation of the agreement, to be held to be a sale to a person on the suspended list, and, as such, constituting a breach of the agreement. The defendants' counsel contended that, if this be so—if the plaintiffs could not successfully sue the factor for damages or justly place him on the suspended list under the seventh condition—the plaintiffs' case at once fails, because (they argue) the defendants' stratagem, however reprehensible, did not produce a violation by the factors of the contracts with the plaintiffs. I think that this is too narrow a view. I am certainly disposed to hold that if A., who knows that B., the producer of an article, has stipulated in selling it to C., the factor, that he shall not resell it to A., procures by an intentional misrepresentation to C. a sale to himself, he has committed towards B. an actionable wrong provided that B. can prove he has been thereby damaged, although, in the particular circumstances, B. may have no cause of action against C. in respect of the transaction. I agree with the defendants' counsel that Exchange Telegraph Co. v. Gregory & Co., [1896] 1 Q. B. 147, is not an authority for such a proposition, for in that case the subscriber who improperly supplied the defendant with the information in which the plaintiffs had proprietary rights must have known that he was violating his contract with the plaintiffs in so doing. There is no suggestion in the case, as reported, that he did not. But I think a sufficient declaration of the soundness of the view which I have expressed appears in a passage in the judgment of Bowen, L. J., in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co., 23 Q. B. D. 614, to which my attention has been drawn: "No man, whether trader or not, can, however, justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it." And in Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 96, Lord Watson remarks: "When the act induced is within the right of the immediate actor and is therefore not wrongful in so far as he is concerned, it may yet be to the detriment of a third party; and in that case, according to the law laid down by the majority in Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216, the inducer may be held liable if he can be shewn to have procured his object by the use of illegal means directed against that third party." [48]

WEST VIRGINIA TRANSP. CO. v. STANDARD OIL CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1902. 50 W. Va. 611, 40 S. E. 591, 56 L. R. A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895.)

Trespass on the case against the Standard Oil Company and the Eureka Pipe Line Company. A demurrer to the declaration, which was framed in two counts, was sustained by the Circuit Court, and the plaintiff brings error.[49]

BRANNON, J. * * * What wrongful acts does this first count state? The formation of trade combination—call it "monopoly"—is not actionable alone. How far the grant of exclusive privilege by the state (and this is the only monopoly, legally speaking) is valid when its right is contested, is one thing. We are not dealing with that. This monopoly is not that. It is the act of persons and corporations, by union of means and effort, drawing to themselves, in the field of competition, the lion's share of trade. This is not monopoly condemned by law. * * *

Observe the question here is not one of enforcing a contract in favor of a monopoly, or of determining whether its conditions are

[48] The opinions of Lord Alverstone, C. J., and Buckley, L. J., are omitted. The result of the case was that "the defendant company agreed to an injunction in the form suggested by Buckley, L. J.;" that is, "to restrain the defendant company, their servants and agents, from inducing any persons or firms who have entered into factors' agreements with the plaintiff company to deal with the defendant company in goods of the plaintiff company by representing or leading to the belief that the purchaser is not the defendant company."

[49] The statement of facts is abridged.

reasonable; not a question of how far the courts would go to enforce a contract between the Standard Oil Company and producers, or between the Eureka Company and producers binding the latter to transport oil only over that line; not a proceeding by the state to forfeit a charter for misuse. The question here is, has the company, by illegal act, violated the rights of the plaintiff? Counsel for plaintiff put emphasis on the charge of conspiracy and malice; but there can be no conspiracy to do a legitimate act,—an act which the law allows,—nor malice therein. To give action there must not only be conspiracy, but conspiracy to do a wrongful act. If the act is lawful, no matter how many unite to do it. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319. "A conspiracy cannot be made the subject of an action, though damages result, unless something is done which, without the conspiracy, would give right of action. The true test as to whether such action will lie is whether the act accomplished after the conspiracy is formed is itself actionable." Delz v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, 16 S. W. 111, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755. An agreement to get trade into your own hands,—that being the sole purpose,—though it harm others, is not actionable. Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 21 Q. B. Div. 544, 23 Q. B. Div. 598 (see note below); Huttley v. Simmons, [1898] 1 Q. B. Div. 181. The case cited by counsel (Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co., 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159), was a combination of coal companies to enhance prices to the public. So People v. Sheldon, 139 N. Y. 251, 34 N. E. 785, 23 L. R. A. 221, 36 Am. St. Rep. 690, and People v. Milk Exchange, 145 N. Y. 267, 39 N. E. 1062, 27 L. R. A. 437, 45 Am. St. Rep. 609, involved right of a corporation to fix prices of milk, and it was declared against public policy, so as to forfeit charter. Jackson v. Stanfield, 137 Ind. 592, 36 N. E. 345, 37 N. E. 14, 23 L. R. A. 588, comes nearer the point, though it, too, has in it the element of an agreement harmful to the public, and is not a case where owners of property and business, as here, seek to further their interests by inducing others to trade with them, and not with competitors. There it was a pure agreement to compel others not to deal with a party (a boycott), not, as in this instance, to compel persons to deal with the defendants. State v. Standard Oil Co., 49 Ohio St. 137, 30 N. E. 279, 15 L. R. A. 145, 34 Am. St. Rep. 541, was an agreement to control production and prices against the public interests, and was a proceeding by the state to withdraw a charter, not an action by an individual on the theory of private injury. I do not say that an individual damaged by a combination against public policy and law cannot sue. I say he can. In Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, it is held that "any man, unless under contract obligation, or unless his employment charges him with some public duty, has right to refuse to work for or deal with any man or class of men, as he sees fit; and this right, which one man may exercise singly, any number may exercise jointly." The wholesale merchants refuse to deal with consumers in favor of retail dealers. Can we consumers sue them? "He may refuse to deal with any man or class of men. It is no crime for any number of persons, without any unlawful object in view, to associate and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men, or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions." Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 14, 8 Am. Rep. 287. The great Chief Justice Shaw said that the legality of the association depends upon its object, and whether it be innocent or otherwise. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346. The law allows men to combine to obtain a lawful benefit to themselves. Greenh. Pub. Pol. 651. In Olive v. Van Patten, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 630, 25 S. W. 428, while condemning the particular act involved in that case, the court declared the right to compete, though it injured the plaintiff. "This would be legitimate. They could do this without responsibility for injurious consequence to the plaintiff's business; but they could not, without some legal purpose directly serving their own business, maliciously induce others not to trade with the plaintiff." Who can say that the acts attributed to the defendants did not benefit them? Had they done these acts to benefit strangers, from malice, it would be different. Now, these companies were furthering their own interests in lawful competition with others. If they possessed the lawful right above stated, what matters it that they did have the intent to cut down the business of others, or that they did cut it down and injure others, though they did this that they might themselves fatten? So far this first count charges only the exercise by the defendants of a right of constitutional liberty, accorded alike to all,—simply the right of self-advancement in legitimate business,—self-preservation, we may say. * * *

Second Count. It specifies as its pointed gravamen that the defendants and Shattuck conspired to destroy the plant and business of the plaintiff, and did by threats and unfair means oblige persons owning and producing oil to ship it by other means of transportation than those of the plaintiff, which persons had before been the customers of the plaintiff; and that the West Virginia Oil Company and Shattuck notified such customers not to ship any oil over the plaintiff's line, and not to permit plaintiff to do any business in transporting oil, so far as such customers could prevent it. While the first count does, the second count does not, state that the defendants were engaged in the business of buying, refining, and transporting oil as competitors with the plaintiff, and thus present a justification for their action, but simply charges that they interfered unlawfully and maliciously with the plaintiff's business, with malign purpose to destroy it. This, I think, is a legal cause of action. It is argued for the defendants that it is not stated that the plaintiff had contracts with its patrons with which the defendants interfered, and without right induced such patrons to break such contracts; and that, as such customers had right to deal with whom they pleased, the defendants could not commit an actionable wrong in inducing them to withdraw their usual patronage from the plaintiff. But it does seem to me that, though those customers had such right, it did not impart to the defendants any right and immunity to step in between them and the plaintiff, and induce those customers to withdraw their patronage, not for the benefit of the defendants in the exercise of the right of free competition, but in malice only to injure and destroy the plaintiff. Cases above cited show this. In Delz v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, 16 S. W. 111, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755, it is held that while one has a right to deal with whom he pleases, yet this right is limited to him, and does not give another the right to influence him not to deal. It is an officious act, hurtful to another, not done in legitimate competition, without just excuse, done only to injure a fellow. It is a "boycott." Cook, Trade & Labor Combin. § 9; Crump's Case, 84 Va. 927, 6 S. E. 620, 10 Am. St. Rep. 895; Beach, Monop. 311, 322. "In all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action on the case to be repaired in damages. The intentional causing of such loss to another, without justifiable cause, and with the malicious purpose to inflict it, is of itself a wrong." Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287. "Every one has a right to enjoy the fruits of his own enterprise, industry, skill, and credit. He has no right to be protected against skill and competition, but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance, and annoyance. If disturbance and annoyance come as a result of competition, or the execution of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria, unless some superior right by contract or otherwise is interfered with. But if it comes from the mere wanton or malicious acts of others, without the justification of competition, or the service of any interest or lawful purpose, it then stands on a different footing," and the wrong is actionable. Walker v. Cronin, supra; 1 Eddy, Trade Comb. § 480.

Counsel for defendants, in answer to the second count, take the position that no contract is stated as subsisting between the plaintiff and its patrons, and that the defendants are not charged with inducing the violation of any contract, and that as these patrons of the plaintiff had perfect right to withhold their patronage, and could not be sued for so doing, the defendants did no legal wrong in inducing those patrons to do so. I do not concur in this view. The authorities above logically repel it. That there is no binding contract between employer and employé, or between the trader and his usual customers, makes no difference. Presumably, the customers would have continued their voluntary patronage but for the wrongful intervention and influence of the intervener. I think this contention is met by Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 1 South. 934, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367; Benton v. Pratt,

2 Wend. (N. Y.) 385, 20 Am. Dec. 623; Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, 23 Am. Rep. 30.

I understand the law to be as follows: One may without liability induce the customers of another to withdraw their custom from him, in the race of competition, in order that the former may himself get the custom, there being no contract; and it is no matter that such person is injured, and it is no matter that the other party was moved by express intent to injure him; motive being immaterial where the act is not unlawful. But where the act is not done under the right of competition, or under the cover of friendly, neighborly counsel, but wantonly or maliciously, with intent to injure another, it is actionable, if loss ensue. Nor is it material in the latter case that there was no binding contract between the business man and his customers. * * * [50]

DUNSHEE v. STANDARD OIL CO. et al.

This was an action at law against the Standard Oil Company and others, to recover damages for an alleged unlawful interference with the trade of plaintiff's assignor. The judgment below was for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed. There was an appeal by the plaintiff also, but in the discussion of the case the defendants only are spoken of as appellants.

WEAVER, J. During all the period covered by this controversy, the Standard Oil Company has been a wholesale dealer in oil at the city of Des Moines. In the year 1893 the Crystal Oil Company (plaintiff's assignor), a local corporation, entered the retail trade in oil, selling its goods from tank wagons hauled about the streets, and delivered to its customers at their homes. Its business grew from year to year until, in 1898, it employed from four to eight wagons, covering the territory of the city very generally. During the period mentioned, the Crystal Company purchased its supplies from the defendant, but in 1898 it for some reason began to make purchases from other wholesale dealers. Trouble at once ensued. The defendant, which, up to that time, had abstained from the retail trade, proceeded to equip itself with tank wagons, teams, and drivers substantially equal in number to those of the Crystal Company, and began active solicitation for the patronage of the "ultimate consumer." At the end of some months of strife, the Crystal Company abandoned the contest and quit the business at a loss, claiming to have been driven out by the tactics of its rival. The plaintiff, as assignee of said company, brings this action for damages, alleging a conspiracy between the Standard Oil Company and its managers, agents, and employés to ruin the business of said Crystal Company, and setting forth alleged wrongful acts done in pursuance of such conspiracy by which said company's business was destroyed. * * *

1. Upon the issues of fact, we shall attempt no general review of the testimony. For present purposes it is enough to say that the case as made by the plaintiff tends strongly to show that defendant installed its scheme of retail distribution of oil in the city of Des Moines not for the purpose of establishing a retail trade, but as a mere temporary expedient to drive out the Crystal Company, and that, this being accomplished and having the field to itself, it withdrew its wagons and drivers, and gave its whole attention to its wholesale business. In the prosecution of its business, the Crystal Company was accustomed to supply its customers with cards to be displayed from a window or other conspicuous place, indicating a desire to purchase oil and inviting the distributor to stop and furnish the needed supply. The evidence further tends to show that when the Standard entered the field its drivers were directed to give special attention to the Crystal Company's "green cards," and that, at the outset at least, there was little or no attempt to build up a retail trade with the public generally, but to take away or destroy the trade of the Crystal Company. Some of the witnesses say the Standard's drivers would make it a point to get in advance of the Crystal's wagons, and wherever a green card was displayed would stop and make the sale if possible, sometimes permitting the buyer to suppose that he or she was dealing with a Crystal agent, and in other cases appropriating or carrying away the Crystal's cards. The Standard's hand in these efforts was not disclosed to the public. The drivers were instructed to do business ostensibly as independent dealers driving their own wagons, none of which were marked with the Standard's name, though in fact the outfits were furnished and all expenses paid by it, and the entire business was carried on under the secret management of its agent, who held frequent meetings with the drivers, urging them to "go after the green cards," to "hustle the green cards," to "go after the Crystal Oil Company," and at the same time cautioned them to "keep quiet" about the real ownership and management. It is further testified that when the Crystal Company had been eliminated the manager in charge had a final meeting of the drivers at his residence, where he said, "The fight is over and we have bought them out." Plaintiff also shows that defendants' movement in the matter followed closely upon the Crystal Company's exercise of its right to purchase part of its oil from another dealer, and had refused to yield to the Standard's insistence that it wanted "all or none" of the Crystal's trade. In short, the record as a whole is sufficient to justify the inference that the real end sought to be accomplished was to bar or exclude from the retail trade one who would not give the Standard Company, as a wholesale dealer, its exclusive patronage. The defendants take issue upon the charge as thus preferred, but the jury could properly find the facts to be as above outlined.

As we understand appellants' contention, it is that their conduct did not transgress the bounds of legitimate competition, and that so long as they kept within this limitation the question of the alleged malice or motive inspiring their acts is wholly immaterial. Cases involving the question thus suggested have frequently arisen, both in this country and in England, and there is much inharmony in the expressions of judicial opinion thereon. Many authorities may be found holding without apparent qualification or exception, that the law takes no account whatever of motives as constituting an element of civil wrong. In other words, if a man do a thing which is otherwise lawful, the fact that he does it maliciously and for the express purpose of injuring his neighbor affords the latter no remedy at law. Such is the net effect of Raycroft v. Tayntor, 68 Vt. 219, 35 Atl. 53, 33 L. R. A. 225, 54 Am. St. Rep. 882; Jenkins v. Fowler, 24 Pa. 308, and others of that class. If this be the correct view of the law, a man may excavate the earth near the boundary of his own land for the mere purpose of seeing the foundation of the house of his neighbor slide into the pit thus prepared for it; he may dig through his own soil to the subterranean sources of his neighbor's spring or well and divert the water into a ditch, where it will serve no purpose of use or profit to himself or any one else; if a banker or merchant, he may punish the blacksmith who refuses to patronize him by temporarily establishing a shop on the next lot and hiring men to shoe horses without money and without price, until he has driven the offending smith to come to his terms or to go out of business; and if a farmer, dependent upon a subterranean supply of water for the irrigation of his soil or watering of his live stock, he may contrive to ruin his competing neighbor by wasting the surplus not reasonably required for his own use. The laws of competition in business are harsh enough at best; but if the rule here suggested were to be carried to its logical and seemingly unavoidable extreme there is no practical limit to the wrongs which may be justified upon the theory that "it is business." Fortunately, we think, there has for many years been a distinct and growing tendency of the courts to look beneath the letter of the law and give some effect to its beneficent spirit, thereby preventing the perversion of the rules intended for the protection of human rights into engines of oppression and wrong. It is doubtless true that under many circumstances an act is legally right and defensible without regard to the motive which induces or characterizes it; but there is abundance of authority for saying that this is by no means the universal rule, and that an act which is legally right when done without malice may become legally wrong when done malicious-ly, wantonly, or without reasonable cause. * * *[51] In Parkinson v. Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165, the court, while reaching the opposite conclusion generally, concedes it to be the law that: "Any injury to a lawful business, whether the result of conspiracy or not, is prima facie actionable, but may be defended on the ground that it was merely a lawful effort of the defendants to promote their own welfare. To defeat this plea of justification, the plaintiff may offer evidence that the acts of the defendants were inspired by express malice, and were done for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff, and not to benefit themselves." * * *[52]

Coming to the case in hand, we may concede to the appellants the undoubted right to establish a retail oil business in Des Moines, to employ agents and drivers, and send them out over the same routes and make sales to the same people with whom the Crystal Oil Company was dealing; but in so doing it was bound to conduct such business with reasonable regard and consideration for the equal right of the Crystal Company to continue supplying oil to such of its customers as desired to remain with it. If, however, there was no real purpose or desire to establish a competing business, but, under the guise or pretense of competition, to accomplish a malicious purpose to ruin the Crystal Company or drive it out of business, intending themselves to retire therefrom when their end had been secured, then they can claim no immunity under the rules of law which recognize and protect competition between dealers in the same line of business seeking in good faith the patronage of the same people. And if, under such pretense of competition, defendants maliciously interfered with the business of the Crystal Oil Company in the manner charged, and injury to the latter was thereby inflicted, a right of action exists for the recovery of damages. It may be conceded that authorities are not wanting to sustain the position that, even though the Standard Oil Company had no intention of becoming a retail dealer in oil in Des Moines, but entered the business of selling oil in this manner temporarily, for the sole purpose of driving the Crystal Company out, it is a matter into which the courts will not inquire; but we think such precedents are out of harmony with fundamental principles of justice, which, as we have said, underlie the law, as well as out of harmony with the later and better-considered cases. True the Standard Company, as a wholesale dealer, would violate no law in offering its product for sale at retail at half price in the territory supplied by the Crystal Company, but such fact, if proven, would have a distinct bearing upon the reasonableness of its methods employed in diverting trade from said company, as well as upon the charge that in interfering between the Crystal Company and its customers the Standard Company was actuated by malice or spirit of wanton assault upon the business of another, who had given it offense. * * *[53] No man entering or carrying on business has any right to demand protection against fair competition, and if he cannot meet it and succeed he must expect to fail, and for losses and injuries resulting the law affords him no remedy. But if competition be "war," in which "everything is fair," or if it be so regarded by those who participate therein, certainly the law will not give that doctrine its sanction. It follows of necessity that the trial court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict in defendants' favor.

2. In ruling upon the defendants' motion for a directed verdict, the trial court seems to have held or suggested that proof that defendants, in pursuance of their alleged conspiracy, had interfered with contracts made between the Crystal Company and its patrons would give rise to a cause of action, and upon the final submission of the cause it instructed the jury, as a matter of law, that the display of the green cards were orders upon the Crystal Company for the delivery of oil, and that a malicious interference by the defendants with the filling of such orders by the Crystal Company would be a wrong for which an action would lie, if such interference was in pursuance of a conspiracy between the defendants to injure the business of said company. Of this instruction both parties complain, and we are inclined to the view that it cannot be sustained as broadly as stated.

Referring, first, to plaintiff's exception, we think the proposition last stated places a too narrow construction upon the rule of law here applicable, in that it seems to require, not only the proof of a malicious wrong and injury therefrom, but further proof that such wrong was done in pursuance of a conspiracy previously formed. The gravamen of the charge made is not the alleged conspiracy, but the wrong done to the plaintiff's assignor, and if the wrong is sufficiently established by the evidence a recovery may be had by the party injured, although there be a failure of proof of the conspiracy.

The defendants' exception to the instruction is that the display of the cards by the Crystal Company's customers cannot be said as a matter of law, to constitute orders upon that company. The point is well made. True, if there were some prior arrangement or agreement with a customer by which the display of a card would evidence a definite order, such act might be as effective as the sending of a written request to the company for a stated quantity of oil at a definite price; but the record does not disclose such a state of facts, and we think that, so far as the evidence goes, the display should be treated rather as a notice or invitation to the Crystal Company's drivers, observance of which on their part would lead to a sale.

But we are not of the opinion that an actual contract must exist before wanton interference by a third party would amount to a legal wrong. For illustration, if, instead of displaying cards, it was the habit of the Crystal Company's customers to communicate their wants by messenger or by telephone, and that defendant in the zeal of competition should maliciously intercept the messenger and induce him to reveal the nature of his errand, or should maliciously tap the telephone wire and with the advantage thus acquired should rush their wagons to the front and deprive the company of the sales which it would otherwise have made, we think no advocate of the widest allowable license of unrestricted competition would contend that this would not constitute a legal wrong, even though the conduct complained of did not in fact amount to an interference with an existing contract. For the same reason we think the defendants could not, upon the plea of competition, justify any malicious interference with existing contracts or orders of the Crystal Company, or interfere with or remove the cards posted as an invitation or notice to said company for the delivery of oil; but we think the court cannot assume to say, as a matter of law, that the display of such cards constituted in itself either a contract or order. It may be open to some question whether the error of the instruction was of a prejudicial character, but, taking the record as a whole, we think it the safer conclusion to solve that doubt in the appellants' favor.

3. The trial court correctly instructed the jury that, if plaintiff had established his right to recover because of the wrongful and malicious acts of the defendants as charged, he was entitled to a verdict for the actual damages so sustained by the Crystal Company, to which sum the jury were at liberty to add exemplary damages. It also, in another connection and in a general way, told the jury that, if found entitled to recover, plaintiff should also be allowed interest on the damages so sustained. The jury returned a general verdict for plaintiff for a sum stated in round numbers, but not indicating what part, if any, of said amount was allowed as exemplary damages. Neither does it indicate how much of the verdict is for interest, nor on what part of it interest was computed. The point is made that interest is not allowable upon exemplary damages, and as there are no data or basis from which to determine what part of the verdict represents damages of that kind there is no way in which the court can cure or remove the prejudice. We see no way to avoid the force of this objection. It may be that little or no allowance was made for exemplary damages; it may also be that no interest was computed; but there is nothing by which to determine that fact. It may also be that much the larger part of the verdict was for exemplary damages, and if so, and interest was computed thereon (as the jury under the court's charge may have felt authorized to do), the amount of the recovery must have been very materially increased by that item. Interest as such upon exemplary damages is not recoverable. 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1031. The error is one which is not amenable to correction in this court, except by an order for a new trial. * * *

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BOGGS v. DUNCAN-SCHELL FURNITURE CO.

This action was brought against the Duncan-Schell Furniture Company to recover damages for an alleged injury to the plaintiff's business. The plaintiff claimed that on February 1, 1910, he was the exclusive agent for the sale of the New Improved White sewing machine in Lee county and adjoining counties; that the defendant Duncan-Schell Furniture Company, prior to that time, had been selling the same machines for profit, or as agents for the said sewing machine company; that, after plaintiff had secured the sole and exclusive agency for said machine, and while he was selling the same as agent, the defendants, for the purpose of destroying plaintiff's business, and breaking him up financially, and putting him out of business, maliciously and willfully procured various old styles of said White sewing machine, and advertised the same at a price of $24.75, and published that they were selling the latest improved drop head White sewing machine for that price, the same kind of machine which the plaintiff was handling, and was selling for $45; that the selling price of the sewing machines, and the price at which the defendants sold the machine during the time the defendant company was the agent, was $45; that defendants further advertised and published that they had just received new White sewing machines, both rotary and vibrator, which they would sell at $24.75; that they did not have any such machines, and the statement that they had just received them was untrue; that the defendants had not received, at any time, any new White sewing machines of the rotary type; that they further falsely said that the machines just received by them were of the latest pattern of said machine. The usual market price of the latest improved White sewing machine was $45, and the defendants knew this at the time. Plaintiff says all the foregoing acts were committed by the defendants willfully and maliciously, and for the sole purpose of driving the plaintiff out of business in the sale of his machines, and for the purpose of falsely putting the plaintiff in the light of a dishonest dealer, and unworthy of patronage, in that he was attempting to sell a $25 machine for $45. Defendants' answer to plaintiff's claim is a general denial. Upon the issues thus tendered, the cause was tried to a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

On the trial these facts appeared in the evidence:

The defendant Duncan inserted the following advertisments in one of the daily papers published in Keokuk on or about March 2d:

"Duncan-Schell Furniture Co. March Sale Special.

"[Followed by a cut of a White Sewing Machine.]

"Automatic Drop Lift White Sewing Machine, both Vibratory and Rotary, Latest Pattern.....$24.75"

And again:

"March Sale Prices on Sewing Machines.

"More White Machines just received. March Sale price on White Sewing Machines, the latest patterns, both Vibratory and Rotary....$24.75"

Again:

"March Sale on Special Sewing Machines.

"[With cut of White Machine in advertisement.]

"More White Sewing Machines just received.

"March Sale Special.

"White Sewing Machines in latest patterns, both vibratory and rotary .....$24.75"

Again, with the same heading:

"The March Sale of Drop Head White Sewing Machines of the latest pattern.....$25.00"

Again, with the same caption:

"$25.00 buys the latest improved 6 Drawer Drop Head White Sewing Machine, with Automatic Lift and best set of attachments."

Again, the same caption, with cut of White Sewing Machine:

"The best machine at any price.....$25.00

"Your money back in 365 days if you are not convinced you have the best on earth. White Sewing Machine with White Sewing Machine Co.'s guarantee.....$25.00"

Then in September appeared the following advertisement:

"Duncan-Schell Furniture Co.'s Annual September Sale.

"$25.00 buys the latest improved 6 Drawer, Drop Head White Sewing Machine, with Automatic Lift and best set of attachments."

Then follows practically the same advertisement that appeared in March.

Some time before these advertisements appeared, and on or about February 1st, Duncan had said to the plaintiff: "Boggs, I understand that you are going to take the agency for the White sewing machine. You know you have no money, and you cannot get the machines, and, if you get them, I will run you out of business with the same machine." After the advertisements came out in March, Duncan said to the plaintiff: "Boggs, have we starved you out yet? If you are not starved out yet, we will soon see that you are starved out."

The defendants did not buy any White sewing machines of the White Sewing Machine Company in 1910, or at any time after that. On an offer by the White Sewing Machine Company in September, 1910, to buy, at the defendants' own price, all the White machines which the defendants then had, Duncan declined to sell at all, saying that he wanted to keep them as souvenirs. When told that he was hurting Boggs and the White Sewing Machine Company, he answered that he did not care for that; he advertised as he pleased.

The Duncan-Schell Furniture Company, prior to the time Boggs became the sole agent, had handled these White sewing machines, and sold them at retail, and had done so for a number of years. Boggs was then in the service of the defendant company as its agent in disposing of those machines. When Boggs quit, the company had 12 White machines on hand, eight in its Keokuk store, and four in its Carthage store. The latter were brought to Keokuk in March, 1910. The company had bought these machines outright from the White Sewing Machine Company. They were not the latest improved pattern of the White machine, and did not have the attachments advertised. The company had not just received them, as stated in the advertisement, and they were not furnished with the improvements advertised. The machines handled by the plaintiff were of that character and kind, and had the latest improvements. [55]

GAYNOR, J., after stating the facts shown in the evidence: So it is apparent that, upon the issues tendered by the plaintiff, there was evidence upon which the jury might well find all the material facts, upon which plaintiff bases his right to recover, established, both as to what the defendants did, and as to the motive by which they were actuated in the doing. We do not understand that the defendants seriously questioned this, but contend that, conceding the facts to be established as alleged, and as established by the evidence, still the plaintiff has no right to recover: (1) Because the defendants had an absolute right to publish the advertisements complained of, and their motive in so doing cannot be questioned. (2) That, inasmuch as the advertisements complained of made no attack upon the plaintiff, or upon the machines kept for sale by the plaintiff, no legal right of Boggs was assailed by the defendants, and whether they thought good or ill of him when they published these articles is immaterial. (3) That public policy forbids that the motive of established trader, in publishing a legal advertisement of his own wares, shall be inquired into or questioned.

Defendants' contention resolves itself into the proposition that malicious motives in the doing of an act may make the act worse, where the act is wrongful or unlawful, yet it cannot make that wrong or unlawful which is, in itself not unlawful or wrongful; or, in other words, that an action cannot be predicated upon the doing of an act which does not, in itself, amount to a legal wrong, because the party doing the act was moved to it by a wicked or malevolent heart. Therefore the defendant contends that, as it had in its possession certain White sewing machines, and had the same for sale, the fact that they wrongfully or purposely deceived the public as to the character or the quality of the articles for sale would not entitle one engaged in the same business to complain, though the defendant, in the doing of the act, had the purpose and intent to injure his competitor, and was, in fact, actuated by malice towards his competitor, and though the competitor lost his business by reason of the defendant's conduct.

This would seem like a simple proposition, and, abstractly considered, would appeal to any mind, possessing legal acumen, as sound. No one could seriously question the proposition that, if one does that only which he has a right to do under the law, and does it in a legal way, he ought not to be called to account for his conduct, no matter what his motive might be, and there are many authorities to support the abstract proposition that a lawful act cannot be made the foundation of an action because it was done with an evil motive, and some cases have held that the motive with which an act is done is not an element of a civil wrong. It may go to enhance the damages, but is not an element of the wrong itself.

In Guethler v. Altman, 26 Ind. App. 587, 60 N. E. 355, 84 Am. St. Rep. 313, an action in which a merchant sought to recover damages of the members of the school board and a teacher in the school, on the ground that they had willfully and maliciously prevented their students, by threats and intimidations, from trading at plaintiff's store, alleging that they had talked to the pupils, advising them to stay away from plaintiff's place of business, and to purchase their supplies elsewhere, and threatening that, if they did not do so, they would be suspended, and that, as a result of the wrongful act of the defendants, plaintiff was injured in his business, plaintiff alleged that, when high school pupils started to enter his store, they would discover they were being watched by the defendant, Crull, and they would turn away and not enter; that Crull wrote letters to the parents of the pupils containing threats that, if the pupils visited plaintiff's store, they would be suspended, and that it was all done with the systematic purpose and intent of injuring plaintiff in his business; that Crull was following the instructions of the other defendants in what he did; and that plaintiff was thereby injured in his business. The case was disposed of on demurrer. In the opinion delivered by the Supreme Court, it says: "It was not an unlawful act for Crull to advise or persuade the pupils not to visit appellant's store. The fact that he acted maliciously does not change the rule. The act which is not unlawful in itself, and which violates no right, cannot be made actionable because of the motive which induced it. A malicious motive will not make that wrong which, in its own essence, is lawful, and cites, in support of that rule, Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49; Jenkins v. Fowler, 24 Pa. 308; Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294; Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 39, 28 Am. Rep. 93; Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) 832; Boyson v. Thorn, 98 Cal. 578, 33 Pac. 492, 21 L. R. A. 233. Many other cases might be cited in support of this abstract proposition.

These cases present, as strongly as any, the application of the abstract rule contended for by appellant. They present the general rule to concrete cases that, what a man has a lawful right to do, he may do, no matter what his motive may be, no matter what injuries may result from it, and yet not be called to answer for his conduct.

It is not so difficult to know what the law is as to know what is a just and fair and right application of the law to a given state of facts. As civilization advances, and the social and business conditions become more involved and complicated, when even legitimate competition has become so strong that even honest men are tempted to force their way beyond the limits of legitimate competition, the law—which is a rule of civil conduct for the government of men in their social and business relationships—ought to keep pace with the new conditions. The integrity of the social order, the stability of business itself, requires, and the law should require, that every man conduct himself in full recognition of the fact that he is a member of that social order; that he not only has rights, but has corresponding duties; and that the performance of those duties is as binding upon him as a member of the social order as are the rights given to him. Men, as members of organized society, under the law, have the right to do certain things; but that right is restricted and limited by the duty imposed upon them not to exercise those rights wantonly and willfully to the injury of another. In the exercise of the law-given right, the well-being of the social order requires that each person should exercise his right consistently with the fact that he is a member of the social order out of which his rights grew. While a person has the right to pursue his avocations and his business for his own pleasure and profit, he has no right, directly or indirectly, to willfully and maliciously injure another in his lawful business or occupation. Men have the right to engage in lawful competition, and, though the competition may have the effect of driving another out of business, if the competition is lawful, no action arises, though injury resulted from the competition. Where there is lawful competition for gain, for supremacy in business, for the legitimate control of business, even though the purpose and effect of the competition is to drive from business competitors, yet, if the competition is lawful and carried on in a lawful way, no action will lie. There is a difference between lawful competition and simulated competition carried on with the sole purpose and intent, not of profit and gain, but of maliciously injuring others engaged in that particular business.

The case before us does not present a case of lawful competition, but a case of simulated or pretended competition, designed and carried out with malice for the purpose of injury to the plaintiff in his business. At least the jury might have so found from the evidence. * * *

Every man has the legal right to advance himself before his fellows, and to build up his own business enterprises, and to use all lawful means to that end, although in the path of his impetuous movements he leaves strewn the victims of his greater industry, energy, skill, prowess or foresight. But the law will not permit him to wear the garb of honor only to destroy. The law will not permit him to masquerade in the guise of honest competition solely for the purpose of injuring his neighbor. The law will not permit him to simulate that which is right for the sole purpose of protecting himself in the doing of that which is palpably wrong. * * *

We find no error in the record, and the case is affirmed.

III. In Labor Contests; Strikes, Lockouts, Boycotts

But the vital question remains whether a court of equity will, under any circumstances, by injunction, prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another? An affirmative answer to this question is not, we think, justified by any authority to which our attention has been called or of which we are aware. It would be an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for or to remain in the personal service of another. One who is placed under such constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude,—a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States, or in any place subject to their jurisdiction. Courts of equity have sometimes sought to sustain a contract for services requiring special knowledge or peculiar skill, by enjoining acts or conduct that would constitute a breach of such contract. To this class belong the cases of singers, actors, or musicians, who after agreeing, for a valuable consideration, to give their professional service, at a named place and during a specified time, for the benefit of certain parties, refuse to meet their engagement, and undertake to appear during the same period for the benefit of other parties at another place. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604, 617; Id., 5 De Gex & S. 485, 16 Jur. 871; Montagne v. Flockton, L. R. 16 Eq. 189. While in such cases the singer, actor, or musician has been enjoined from appearing during the period named at a place and for parties different from those specified in his first engagement, it was never supposed that the court could by injunction compel the affirmative performance of the agreement to sing or to act or to play. In Powell Duffryn Steam-Coal Co. v. Taff Vale Ry. Co., 9 Ch. App. 331, 335, Lord Justice James observed that when what is required is not merely to restrain a party from doing an act or wrong, but to oblige him to do some continuous act involving labor and care, the court has never found its way to do this by injunction. In the same case Lord Justice Mellish stated the principle still more broadly, perhaps too broadly, when he said that a court can only order the doing of something which has to be done once for all, so that the court can see to its being done.

The rule, we think, is without exception that equity will not compel the actual, affirmative performance by an employé of merely personal services, any more than it will compel an employer to retain in his personal service one who, no matter for what cause, is not acceptable to him for service of that character. The right of an employé engaged to perform personal service to quit that service rests upon the same basis as the right of his employer to discharge him from further personal service. If the quitting in the one case or the discharging in the other is in violation of the contract between the parties, the one injured by the breach has his action for damages; and a court of equity will not, indirectly or negatively, by means of an injunction restraining the violation of the contract compel the affirmative performance from day to day or the affirmative acceptance of merely personal services. Relief of that character has always been regarded as impracticable.

Mr. Justice Harlan, in Arthur v. Oakes (1894).[56]

In 1705 it was decided that, if wild ducks alight in the plaintiff's decoy pond, the defendant, though he has the right to set up a rival decoy pond on his own land and by offering greater inducements persuade the wild ducks to pass by the plaintiff's pond and come to his own, and though he has the further right on his own land to shoot or shoot at the wild ducks that are on or are passing over his own land, even if the effect is to scare away the wild ducks that are on the plaintiff's land, still he has no right to shoot off guns or explode rockets on his own land, when the purpose and the only possible effect is to frighten the wild ducks from the plaintiff's pond. Whether the law was so determined on account of the difficulty of enforcing statutes to regulate the movements of ducks, or because the competition was between members of the same caste, it is needless to speculate; but certain it is that the court had no difficulty in deciding that an action would lie even if the plaintiff had no dominant right over the defendant—would lie simply because the defendant was abusing a coequal right of his own—was doing a harm purely for the sake of the harm.

Through all these instances, and more can undoubtedly be found, one broad principle runs—a principle broad enough to serve as a basis for a classification of all litigation under one or the other of two heads. Under one the plaintiff complains of a harm that flows from the defendant's invasion of the plaintiff's absolute, exclusive, dominant right; under the other the plaintiff complains of a harm that flows from the manner in which the defendant exercises his coequal, competitive right. And the principle running through all the instances I have given of the latter class is this: Wherever there is an antinomy —a conflict between coequal and competitive rights—the one party must suffer in silence the harm that is the direct and natural consequence of the other's bona fide effort to benefit himself by the exercise of his competitive right, but does not have to submit to the harm that is attributable exclusively to malevolence. Take the spite fence, for instance. The harm to you is one and the same whether your neighbor limits your access to light and air by means of a useless fence fifty feet high or a useful house fifty feet high. If he builds the useful house, he knows that your supply of light and air will be curtailed, and in that sense he intends harm. But the harm you suffer is only the inevitable harm that comes from his beneficial enjoyment of his property. Organized society, government, has conferred upon you and your neighbor coequal rights, limited and conditioned by coequal obligations. If he builds the useless fence to punish you, I say he is exercising neither a legal nor a moral right. If he thinks you guilty of violating the laws of the land, organized society, government, has not authorized him to act as prosecutor, judge, jury, and executioner. If he thinks you guilty of violating the laws of God, he has not been ordained to administer God's punishment.

On the point that the relief suggested was impracticable, specific reference was made to Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (C. C. 1893) 54 Fed. 730, 740, 19 L. R. A. 387, Taft, J., and authorities cited; Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Am. Ed.) §§ 87–91, and authorities cited.

The underlying principle above stated may be expressed in a slightly different form: Wherever there is a conflict between coequal and competitive rights, so exercise your right that you do not unnecessarily interfere with your neighbor in the exercise of his equal, reciprocal right. This was a universal maxim of the civil law. "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas." It was transported sporadically by the old English chancellors into the English common law. In our land, under our pledges of manhood equality, no interpretation of our common law should long endure that gives to any man under any circumstances the right to inflict a wanton and malicious injury.

By "wanton and malicious" I do not mean the subjective state of mind of the doer of the harm, as determined by some psychologist or other; I mean the character of the act as determined objectively by weighing the external facts and circumstances; I mean motive as judged by setting up ideally the average good neighbor as a standard, just as in the law of negligence we set up ideally the average prudent man as a standard.

I have been endeavoring to develop before you the idea that the strike is not a question that stands by itself, to be solved according to separate and unique principles, to be dealt with by processes that are applicable to it alone. While at first blush it may seem a far cry from wild ducks to strikes, yet on reflection I hope you will agree that the contestants in the wild game cases, in the light and air cases, in the spring and well cases, in the natural oil and gas cases, did not have—any one of them as against his opponent—an absolute and exclusive right; that the right of each was limited and qualified by the right of the other; and that their rights in the common source of supply—the common fund—were coexistent and coequal. And since, as I have already stated, a strike, originating in a competition or struggle over the division between wages and dividends, involves a competition or struggle for control of the labor market—involves the effort of each side to draw to itself the common fund of available labor

—I hope you will also agree that the strike case is not unique, but is merely one of a broad class. And if the principles of truth and justice that govern all other cases of the same kind have been properly declared, then a means for measuring the rights of labor in its conflict with capital is to apply the same principles to the strike case.

If we examine, for example, a supposititious strike of bricklayers against their employing contractor, we find that they intend to deprive him of their own labor and to prevent him from getting other labor to take their places. They knowingly inflict the harm as a means of compelling him to grant their demands. This infliction of harm is unjustifiable unless the harm comes from a truly competitive act. That is, the demands must be pending. For if there were no demands pending, the infliction of harm would properly be charged to a desire to harm for the sake of harm as the end. And further, the demands must really and substantially relate to the terms and conditions of the bricklayers' employment. For instance, a demand that the contractor somehow or other compel the theaters to employ union musicians is outside of the direct and immediate interests of bricklayers as bricklayers; and a strike merely to enforce such a demand—a sympathetic strike—is therefore unlawful. For the sympathetic strike, like the spite fence, is not the beneficial use of a coequal right, but is the usurpation of the power to punish.

This infliction of harm is unjustifiable unless the harm is only the harm that naturally and directly flows from the good-faith exercise of the competitive right. That is, the loss to his business that the contractor suffers by reason of the striking bricklayers presenting their side of the controversy to other bricklayers (actual or potential) so that the other bricklayers freely and of their own judgment decline to work for the contractor, must be suffered by him without complaint. Therefore, persuasion and picketing limited to learning who the new bricklayers are to whom to present their cause, are lawful; and all judgments to the contrary are wrong, as I believe. But the use of force or intimidation to keep other bricklayers away from the contractor against their will is unjustifiable, because it deprives the contractor of his coequal right of access to a free labor market. And it must not be forgotten that force and intimidation are just as unlawful when exercised under the guise of persuasion or picketing. More unjustifiable than the use of force and intimidation to keep new bricklayers away is the combined assault of the striking bricklayers upon the business of outsiders for the purpose of compelling them to cut off all intercourse with the contractor. The strikers may deprive the contractor of their own society and trade, if they choose, for that is in the exercise of a coequal right; but concerted pressure by the strikers to coerce members of society who are not directly concerned in the pending controversy with the contractor to make raids in the rear—the secondary boycott—is wrong not only because such action is not within the immediate field of competition, but because the direct, the primary attack is upon society itself.

Without attempting to follow further this supposititious case of the bricklayers, and without considering the many difficult complications of fact that have arisen or may hereafter arise in labor cases, I venture to express my belief that a just decree can always be framed by applying to the controversy the principle of coequal and coexistent rights in a common fund as the means of solution.

Society—government—has a definite interest in seeing to it that harm shall be kept at the minimum and that harm shall never be inflicted for the mere sake of the harm. But independently of the interests of society, one set of rules should govern the action of both contestants. Any fighter who wants to be fair would not ask for more. If blows below the belt are prohibited on one side, they should be prohibited to the other. If the sympathetic strike is a foul blow, a sympathetic lock-out is equally foul. If a boycott under certain circumstances is held to be an attack in the rear and therefore prohibited, under like circumstances a blacklist as an attack in the rear should also be prohibited. In short, the same rights and the same restrictions should be applied to both. And for the enforcement of these mutual and reciprocal rights and restraints the courts of our land offer to both parties equally, all the instrumentalities of law and of equity.

Judge Francis E. Baker, before Chicago Bar Ass'n (1911).[57]

The word "boycott" at the present time is no more obnoxious than was the word "strike" a quarter of a century ago. Then it was sought through the courts of equity to invoke the injunctive writ to restrain laboring men from organizing a peaceable strike. In some instances, inferior federal courts granted injunctions, but they were never upheld in the superior courts of the country. It is well settled now that a man, or a number of men, may refuse to continue to work for their employer, and they may combine for the purpose of organizing a strike. They may advise others to quit work and join in the strike, so long as no contractual rights are invaded, and they may advise others not to engage their services to the employer against whom the strike is directed. All this is within their constitutional rights, and is justified by their freedom to do those things which they think will better their condition. It is no answer that it may not, in many instances, accomplish that end, or that it invariably damages the employer and interferes with his property rights. Of course, a man has a property right in his business, so has a laboring man a property right equally sacred in his labor; and when these rights conflict, there must, of necessity, be injury to one or the other, or both. This is the result of conflicting opinion and an exigency of the contractual relation, for which the law furnishes no relief.

I am not unmindful of the rule of the common law that combinations of two or more persons to injure the rights of others were held to be illegal. But if the injury there referred to be held to include the combination of two or more persons to withhold patronage from another, then the rule of the common law has long since been overruled by the courts of this country in dealing with strikes. I am aware that, at common law, a combination of two or more persons to do an unlawful thing, even if nothing is done in furtherance of the intent, is a conspiracy,—a substantive offense; while in the case of an individual, there can be no offense until there is some affirmative act tending to carry the intent into effect. But that has no bearing where the unlawful intent is the same, and the offense has actually been committed, either by the individual or by a number of persons combined together for that purpose.

The old rule that one may do lawfully what, if done by two or more persons in combination together, may become unlawful, has been greatly modified in this country. It is a rule that gained currency at a time when even the right of assembly was looked upon with disapproval and suspicion. When this rule was first announced by the English courts, a labor union would not have been tolerated. In one of the early English cases, decided in 1721 (Tubwomen v. Brewers of London, 3 Columbia L. Rev. 447), it was held to be a criminal conspiracy for two or more persons to combine together and refuse to continue to work for their employer unless he should comply with their demand for higher wages. In other words, it was held to be a criminal conspiracy for workmen to join together and strike. It was conceded in the same case that one person might abandon his employment if his demand was not complied with, but it was held unlawful for two or more persons to combine together for the purpose of demanding higher wages. It was held that such a combination constituted a criminal conspiracy. The same rule was applied as late as 1809 in New York, in the case of Re Journeymen Cordwainers, reported in Yates, Sel. Cas. 111.

The right of laboring men to organize into unions, and the right of these unions to conduct peaceable strikes, is justified because of their inability to compete single-handed in contests with their employers. In this competition, any peaceable and lawful means may be resorted to, and it is only when the means employed become unlawful that the courts will interfere. The law recognizes the right of both labor and capital to organize. The contest between employer and employé is one which courts of equity should recognize as entitled to be fought out upon the basis of equality; and the rule applied by the courts to the strike is based, I think, upon that principle. The fundamental principle underlying this contest is, that the employer who employs one thousand workmen is in possession of the same competitive power to force those workmen to his terms as the one thousand workmen, by the most powerful lawful organization, have to force him to a compliance with their terms. The contest, therefore, opens with the one on one side and a thousand on the other upon a substantial basis of equality. The employer has a property right in his business which he asks the courts to protect, and which is entitled to protection. It consists, among other things, in his right to employ whom he pleases. That right extends to a discrimination against workmen of a certain class, or to men belonging to labor organizations. He may use in his business such types of machinery and appliances as he may think adapted to carry out his work most successfully, so long as they are reasonably safe and sanitary. The law protects him in these rights, and the courts will require others to respect them. On the other hand, the thousand employés have a property right in their labor, which is equally sacred with that of the employer. They have a right to engage their services wherever and to whomsoever they can secure the largest rewards and the fairest treatment. They have a right to cease working for their employer, with due regard for their contractual relations, when in their judgment, they can better their condition by so doing. They have a right to organize for this purpose, and they have a right to advise others to join their organization, and the law will protect them in the exercise of these rights equally with the rights of the employer. The refusal of the employés to work for the employer may result in his financial ruin, but the loss will be no greater than the damage his refusal to employ the one thousand laborers may work in the aggregate upon them and those dependent upon their labor. In this contest between employer and employed, it should be remembered that the one who most strictly recognizes and observes the legal and equitable rights of the other enters the struggle with tremendous odds in his favor.

Applying the same principle, I conceive it to be the privilege of one man, or a number of men, to individually conclude not to patronize a certain person or corporation. It is also the right of these men to agree together, and to advise others, not to extend such patronage. That advice may be given by direct communication or through the medium of the press, so long as it is neither in the nature of coercion or a threat. As long as the actions of this combination of individuals are lawful, to this point it is not clear how they can become unlawful because of their subsequent acts directed against the same person or corporation. To this point, there is no conspiracy,—no boycott. The word "boycott" is here used as referring to what is usually understood as "the secondary boycott." It is, therefore, only when the combination becomes a conspiracy to injure by threats and coercion the property rights of another, that the power of the courts can be invoked.

This point must be passed before the unlawful and unwarranted acts which the courts will punish and restrain are committed.

PICKETT et al. v. WALSH et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1906. 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638.)

Bill to enjoin Walsh and others from combining and conspiring to interfere with the plaintiffs in pursuing their trade of brick and stone pointers. The facts in dispute are thus stated by Loring, J.:

It appears from the evidence that the trade of brick and stone pointing is a trade which, in the neighborhood of the city of Boston at any rate, has been carried on to some extent as a separate trade for nearly if not quite 100 years. It further appears that there are now some 45 men engaged in that trade in the vicinity of that city.

The trade of a brick or stone pointer consists in going over a building (generally when it is first erected) to clean it and put a finish on the mortar of the joints. Apparently in the city of Worcester, and to some extent in the city of Boston, this work of pointing is done by bricklayers and stone masons.

The dispute which gave rise to the suit now before us had its origin in a set of rules adopted in January, 1905, by the Bricklayers' and Masons' International Union of America, to which the two unions here in question were subordinate unions. This set of rules contained a provision that bricklaying masonry should consist (inter alia) of "all pointing and cleaning brick wall," and that stone masonry should consist (inter alia) of the "cleaning and pointing of stone work." The practical working of the principles of brick and stone masonry as defined in these rules was left to the subordinate unions.

By the constitution, by-laws and rules of order of the Bricklayers' Union No. 3, it is provided that members shall not accept employment "where a difficulty exists in consequence of questions involving the rules which govern the union," and that any member violating a law of the union shall on conviction "be reprimanded, suspended or fined at the discretion of the union." * * *

There was an executive committee of the two unions. On July 28, 1905, this executive committee voted "that beginning September 18, 1905, no member of the bricklayers' and masons' unions of Boston and vicinity, will work on any building where the contractor will not agree to have the pointing done by bricklayers or masons."

This action of the executive committee was formally adopted by the Bricklayers' Union No. 3, and seems to have been informally adopted by the Stone Masons' Union No. 9. In pursuance thereof the following circular letter was issued: "The bricklayers' and masons' unions of Boston and vicinity have voted that no bricklayer or mason will work for any firm or contractor who will not employ bricklayers or masons to do the pointing of brick, terra cotta and stone masonry. This action will go into effect September 18, 1905."

In September, 1905, L. D. Willcutt & Son as general contractors were erecting (among other buildings) a stone building on the corner of Massachusetts avenue and Boylston street in Boston. On the 18th day of that month, Mr. L. D. Willcutt of that firm was notified that if he did not discharge the pointers who were working for his firm in pointing that building all the masons and bricklayers working for his firm on other buildings in Boston (all of whom were union men) would strike. Thereupon he suspended the work which was being done by the pointers on the building on the corner of Massachusetts avenue and Boylston street. This evidence was admitted to show that there was a general scheme that where pointing was given to any one besides union bricklayers and stone masons there would be a strike.

On November 13, 1905, the defendant Walsh, the walking delegate of the Stone Masons' Union No. 9, and the defendant Driscoll, the walking delegate of the Bricklayers' Union No. 3, came to the Ford Building, for which the corporation of L. P. Soule & Son Company were the general contractors, and found that the cleaning and pointing of that building was being done under a contract between the owners of the building and Robert H. Pickett, one of the plaintiffs here. They then went to a brick building which was being erected by the L. P. Soule & Son Company as contractors, namely, a cold storage warehouse on Eastern avenue, where Driscoll notified the man that the pointing at the Ford Building was being done by pointers. In consequence all the bricklayers employed by the L. P. Soule & Son Company on the cold storage building, 50 in all, being union men, struck work on that or the next day. The next day, November 14, Walsh went to a stone building which was being erected by the same corporation for the International Trust Company on the corner of Arch and Devonshire streets, and told the workmen there of the pointing on the Ford building; whereupon all the stone masons working there, 5 or 6 in all, being union men, struck work. * * *

It appeared from the testimony of Parker F. Soule, an officer of the L. P. Soule & Son Company, that it was cheaper to make a contract with pointers for the work of pointing and cleaning than to employ stone masons and bricklayers to do that work. It appeared from other evidence that the wages of a bricklayer or stone mason were 55 cents an hour, while pointers are paid $3.00 a day of eight hours, or 37½ cents an hour. It further appeared from Mr. Soule's testimony that he preferred to give the work to the pointers because in cleaning a building acid has to be used, and, if the acid is used to excess, stains are caused which in some instances it is impossible to "get out"; he did not think that the bricklayers and stone masons were competent to use these acids. He preferred also to give the work to the pointers because the work which is done by the pointers usually is done by contract, in which case the general contractor who employs the pointers is relieved from responsibility on account of accidents which may occur because of the fact that the work is done on a swinging stage, at times at great heights. It also appeared from the evidence that L. P. Soule & Son Company were not the only contractors who thought they got better work at a smaller cost and with less liability by making a contract with stone pointers for the doing of this work than by employing stone masons and bricklayers to do it.

All this was explained to the walking delegate of the Bricklayers' Union here in question, at an interview between Mr. Soule and the walking delegate of that union held within two days of the strike. It also appeared that at that interview the delegate told Mr. Soule that while it had been against the rules of the union that any member should take piece work, the taking of piece work recently had been allowed; whereupon Mr. Soule told him that "if he had any members of his union who were reliable men, whom we could have confidence enough in to let a contract to, who would give prices as low, * * * he would have no trouble in getting all the stone pointing there was going." No offer to make a contract on these terms was made, and on the evidence it must be assumed that there was nothing in this statement of the defendant Walsh.

On these facts, inter alia, a bill was filed, on November 20, 1905, against the officers of the Unincorporated Bricklayers' Union No. 3, the officers of the Unincorporated Stone Masons' Union No. 9, the walking delegates of these unions respectively, Driscoll and Walsh, and certain other persons. The purpose of the bill as stated in the prayers for relief was to enjoin the defendants (1) "from combining and conspiring in any way to compel L. P. Soule & Son Company, or any other person, firm or corporation, by force, threats, intimidation or coercion, to discharge the complainants in the bill of complaint, * * * or to refrain from further employing them in and about their trade and occupation"; (2) "from combining and conspiring to compel the owners of the so-called Ford Building on Ashburton Place in the city of Boston to break or decline to carry out their said contract with the complainant Robert H. Pickett"; and (3) "from combining and conspiring to interfere with the said complainants, or any of them, in the practice of their trade and occupation, or to prevent them from obtaining further employment thereat."

At the hearing, a final decree in favor of the plaintiff, on all those grounds, was made in the superior court, and the defendants appealed.[59]

LORING, J., after stating the facts and the pleading. There seem therefore to be three causes of action upheld by the decree.[60] * * * In the third cause, the plaintiffs sought to be protected against a strike by the defendants in order to get the work of pointing for the members of their unions. * * *

The question, so far as this the third cause of action goes, apart from a question of fact which we will deal with later, is whether the defendant unions have a right to strike for the purpose for which they struck; or, to put it more accurately and more narrowly, it is this: Is a union of bricklayers and stone masons justified in striking to force a contractor to employ them by the day to do cleaning and pointing at higher wages than pointers are paid, where the contractors wish to make contracts with the pointers for such work to be done by the piece, because they think they get better work at less cost with no liability for accidents, and where the pointers wish to make contracts for that work with the contractors on terms satisfactory to them?

In other words, we have to deal with one of the great and pressing questions growing out of the powerful combinations, sometimes of capital and sometimes of labor, which have been instituted in recent years where their actions come into conflict with the interests of individuals. The combination in the case at bar is a combination of workmen, and the conflict is between a labor union on the one hand and several unorganized laborers on the other hand.

It is only in recent years that these great and powerful combinations have made their appearance, and the limits to which they may go in enforcing their demands are far from being settled.

It is settled however that laborers have a right to organize as labor unions to promote their welfare. Further, there is no question of the general right of a labor union to strike.

On the other hand, it is settled that some strikes by a labor union are illegal. It was held in Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, that a strike by the members of labor unions was illegal when set on foot to force their employer to pay a fine imposed upon him by the union of which he was not a member, for not giving the union all his work. * * *

[59] The statement of the case is abridged.

[60] Only so much of the opinion is given as relates to this third cause.

We are brought to the question of the legality of the strike in the case at bar, namely, a strike of bricklayers and masons to get the work of pointing, or, to put it more accurately, a combination by the defendants, who are bricklayers and masons, to refuse to lay bricks and stone where the pointing of them is given to others. The defendants in effect say we want the work of pointing the bricks and stone laid by us, and you must give us all or none of the work.

The case is a case of competition between the defendant unions and the individual plaintiffs for the work of pointing. The work of pointing for which these two sets of workmen are competing is work which the contractors are obliged to have. One peculiarity of the case therefore is that the fight here is necessarily a triangular one. It necessarily involves the two sets of competing workmen and the contractor, and is not confined to the two parties to the contract, as is the case where workmen strike to get better wages from their employer or other conditions which are better for them. In this respect the case is like Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. D. 598, on appeal [1892] A. C. 25.

The right which the defendant unions claim to exercise in carrying their point in the course of this competition is a trade advantage, namely, that they have labor which the contractors want, or, if you please, cannot get elsewhere; and they insist upon using this trade advantage to get additional work, namely, the work of pointing the bricks and stone which they lay. It is somewhat like the advantage which the owner of back land has when he has bought the front lot. He is not bound to sell them separately. To be sure the right of an individual owner to sell both or none is not decisive of the right of a labor union to combine to refuse to lay bricks or stone unless they are given the job of pointing the bricks laid by them. There are things which an individual can do which a combination of individuals cannot do. But having regard to the right on which the defendants' organization as a labor union rests, the correlative duty owed by it to others, and the limitation of the defendants' rights coming from the increased power of organization, we are of opinion that it was within the rights of these unions to compete for the work of doing the pointing and, in the exercise of their right of competition, to refuse to lay bricks and set stones unless they were given the work of pointing them when laid. See in this connection Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 502, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 357, 74 N. E. 603, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 3 Ann. Cas. 738.

The result to which that conclusion brings us in the case at bar ought not to be passed by without consideration.

The result is harsh on the contractors, who prefer to give the work to the pointers because (1) the pointers do it by contract (in which case the contractors escape the liability incident to the relation of employer and employé); because (2) the contractors think that the pointers do the work better, and if not well done the buildings may be permanently injured by acid; and finally (3) because they get from the pointers better work with less liability at a smaller cost. Again, so far as the pointers (who cannot lay brick or stone) are concerned, the result is disastrous. But all that the labor unions have done is to say you must employ us for all the work or none of it. They have not said that if you employ the pointers you must pay us a fine, as they did in Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287. They have not undertaken to forbid the contractors employing pointers, as they did in Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330. So far as the labor unions are concerned the contractors can employ pointers if they choose, but if the contractors choose to give the work of pointing the bricks and stones to others, the unions take the stand that the contractors will have to get some one else to lay them. The effect of this in the case at bar appears to be that the contractors are forced against their will to give the work of pointing to the masons and bricklayers. But the fact that the contractors are forced to do what they do not want to do is not decisive of the legality of the labor union's acts. That is true wherever a strike is successful. The contractors doubtless would have liked it better if there had been no competition between the bricklayers and masons on the one hand and the individual pointers on the other hand. But there is competition. There being competition, they prefer the course they have taken. They prefer to give all the work to the unions rather than get nonunion men to lay bricks and stone to be pointed by the plaintiffs.

Further, the effect of complying with the labor unions' demands apparently will be the destruction of the plaintiff's business. But the fact that the business of a plaintiff is destroyed by the acts of the defendants done in pursuance of their right of competition is not decisive of the illegality of them. It was well said by Hammond, J., in Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255, 260, 69 N. E. 1085, 1087, 64 L. R. A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341, in regard to the right of a citizen to pursue his business without interference by a combination to destroy it: "Speaking generally, however, competition in business is permitted, although frequently disastrous to those engaged in it. It is always selfish, often sharp, and sometimes deadly."

We cannot say on the evidence that pointing is something foreign to the work of a bricklayer or a stone mason, and therefore something which a union of bricklayers and stone masons have no right to compete for or insist upon and so to bring the case within Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287; March v. Bricklayers' and Plasterers' Union No. 1, 79 Conn. 7, 63 Atl. 291, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.)

1198, 118 Am. St. Rep. 127, 6 Ann. Cas. 848; and Giblan v. National Amalgamated Labourers' Union, [1903] 2 K. B. 600. On the contrary the evidence shows that in Boston the pointing is done to some extent by bricklayers and stone masons, and there is no evidence that the trade of pointing exists outside that city.

The protest of the defendant unions against the plaintiffs' being allowed to organize a pointers' union is not an act of oppression.[61] It is not like the refusal of the union in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, to work with the nonunion men or to admit the nonunion men to their union. The defendants' unions are not shown to be unwilling to admit the plaintiffs to membership if they are qualified as bricklayers or stone masons. But the difficulty is that the plaintiffs are not so qualified. They are not bricklayers or masons. The unions have a right to determine what kind of workmen shall compose the union, and to insist that pointing shall not be a separate trade so far as union work is concerned. They have not undertaken to say that the contractors shall not treat the two trades as distinct. What they insist upon is that if the contractors employ them they shall employ them to do both kinds of work.

The application of the right of the defendant unions, who are composed of bricklayers and stone masons, to compete with the individual plaintiffs, who can do nothing but pointing (as we have said), is in the case at bar disastrous to the pointers and hard on the contractors. But this is not the first case where the exercise of the right of competition ends in such a result. The case at bar is an instance where the evils which are or may be incident to competition bear very harshly on those interested but in spite of such evils competition is necessary to the welfare of the community. * * *

TEMPERTON v. RUSSELL et al.

(Court of Appeal. [1893] 1 Q. B. 715.)

[This case is given in the text, ante p. 1274.[62]]

[61] It appeared from the evidence that the brick and stone pointers of Boston had applied to the Building Trades Council for a charter, that the defendant unions had protested, and that the requested charter had been denied.

[62] On the question whether Temperton v. Russell "denies to the laborer a right which is allowed to the trader," see Professor Jeremiah Smith, "Crucial Issues in Labor Litigation," 20 Harv. Law Rev. 429, 443, 444 (1907).

PLANT et al. v. WOODS et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. 1900. 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330.)

Bill in equity by the officers and members of a labor union to restrain the officers and members of another labor union from any acts or the use of any methods tending to prevent the members of the plaintiff association from securing employment or continuing in their employment. From a decree for the plaintiffs the defendants appeal.

HAMMOND, J. This case arises out of a contest for supremacy between two labor unions of the same craft, having substantially the same constitution and by-laws. The chief difference between them is that the plaintiff union is affiliated with a national organization having its headquarters in Lafayette, in the state of Indiana, while the defendant union is affiliated with a similar organization having its headquarters in Baltimore, in the state of Maryland. The plaintiff union was composed of workmen who, in 1897, withdrew from the defendant union. There does not appear to be anything illegal in the object of either union, as expressed in its constitution and by-laws. The defendant union is also represented by delegates in the Central Labor Union, which is an organization composed of five delegates from each trades union in the city of Springfield, and had in its constitution a provision for levying a boycott upon a complaint made by any union. The case is before us upon the appeal of the defendants from a final decree in favor of the plaintiffs, based upon the findings stated in the report of the master.

The contest became active early in the fall of 1898. In September of that year the members of the defendant union declared "all painters not affiliated with the Baltimore headquarters to be nonunion men," and voted "to notify bosses" of that declaration. The manifest object of the defendants was to have all the members of the craft subjected to the rules and discipline of their particular union, in order that they might have better control over the whole business, and to that end they combined and conspired to get the plaintiffs, and each of them, to join the defendant association, peaceably, if possible, but by threat and intimidation if necessary. Accordingly, on October 7th, they voted that, "If our demands are not complied with, all men working in shops where Lafayette people are employed refuse to go to work." The plaintiffs resisting whatever persuasive measures, if any, were used by the defendants, the latter proceeded to carry out their plan in the manner fully set forth in the master's report. Without rehearsing the circumstances in detail, it is sufficient to say here that the general method of operations was substantially as follows:

A duly authorized agent of the defendants would visit a shop where one or more of the plaintiffs were at work, and inform the employer of the action of the defendant union with reference to the plaintiffs, and ask him to induce such of the plaintiffs as were in his employ to sign applications for reinstatement in the defendant union. As to the general nature of these interviews the master finds that the defendants have been courteous in manner, have made no threats of personal violence, have referred to the plaintiffs as nonunion men, but have not otherwise represented them as men lacking good standing in their craft; that they have not asked that the Lafayette men be discharged, and in some cases have expressly stated that they did not wish to have them discharged, but only that they sign the blanks for reinstatement in the defendant union. The master, however, further finds, from all the circumstances under which those requests were made, that the defendants intended that employers of Lafayette men should fear trouble in their business if they continued to employ such men, and that employers to whom these requests were made were justified in believing that a failure on the part of their employés who were Lafayette men to sign such reinstatement blanks, and a failure on the part of the employers to discharge them for not doing so, would lead to trouble in the business of the employers in the nature of strikes or a boycott; and the employers to whom these requests were made did believe that such results would follow, and did suggest their belief to the defendants, and the defendants did not deny that such results might occur; that the strikes which did occur appear to have been steps taken by the defendants to obtain the discharge of such employés as were Lafayette men who declined to sign application blanks for reinstatement; that these defendants did not in all cases threaten a boycott of the employers' business, but did threaten that the place of business of at least one such employer would be left off from a so-called "fair list" to be published by the Baltimore union. The master also found that, from all the evidence presented, the object which the Baltimore men and the defendant association sought to accomplish in all the acts which were testified to was to compel the members of the Lafayette union to join the Baltimore union, and as a means to this end they caused strikes to be instituted in the shops where strikes would seriously interfere with the business of the shops, and in all other shops they made such representations as would lead the proprietors thereof to expect trouble in their business.

We have, therefore, a case where the defendants have conspired to compel the members of the plaintiff union to join the defendant union, and, to carry out their purpose, have resolved upon such coercion and intimidation as naturally may be caused by threats of loss of property by strikes and boycotts, to induce the employers either to get the plaintiffs to ask for reinstatement in the defendant union, or, that failing, then to discharge them. It matters not that this request to discharge has not been expressly made. There can be no doubt, upon the findings of the master and the facts stated in his report, that the compulsory discharge of the plaintiffs in case of noncompliance with the demands of the defendant union is one of the prominent features of the plan agreed upon. It is well to see what is the meaning of this threat to strike, when taken in connection with the intimation that the employer may "expect trouble in his business." It means more than that the strikers will cease to work. That is only the preliminary skirmish. It means that those who have ceased to work will by strong, persistent and organized persuasion and social pressure of every description do all they can to prevent the employer from procuring workmen to take their places. It means much more. It means that, if these peaceful measures fail, the employer may reasonably expect that unlawful physical injury may be done to his property; that attempts in all the ways practiced by organized labor will be made to injure him in his business, even to his ruin, if possible; and that by the use of vile and opprobrious epithets and other annoying conduct, and actual and threatened personal violence, attempts will be made to intimidate those who enter or desire to enter his employ; and that whether or not all this be done by the strikers or only by their sympathizers, or with the open sanction and approval of the former, he will have no help from them in his efforts to protect himself. However mild the language or suave the manner in which the threat to strike is made under such circumstances as are disclosed in this case, the employer knows that he is in danger of passing through such an ordeal as that above described, and those who make the threat know that as well as he does. Even if the intent of the strikers, so far as respects their own conduct and influence, be to discountenance all actual or threatened injury to person or property or business except that which is the direct necessary result of the interruption of the work, and even if their connection with the injurious and violent conduct of the turbulent among them or of their sympathizers be not such as to make them liable criminally, or even answerable civilly in damages to those who suffer, still, with full knowledge of what is to be expected, they give the signal, and in so doing must be held to avail themselves of the degree of fear and dread which the knowledge of such consequences will cause in the mind of those—whether their employer or fellow workmen—against whom the strike is directed; and the measure of coercion and intimidation imposed upon those against whom the strike is threatened or directed is not fully realized until all those probable consequences are considered. Such is the nature of the threat, and such the degree of coercion and intimidation involved in it. If the defendants can lawfully perform the acts complained of in the city of Springfield, they can pursue the plaintiffs all over the state in the same manner, and compel them to abandon their trade, or bow to the behests of their pursuers.

It is to be observed that this is not a case between the employer and employed, or, to use a hackneyed expression, between capital and labor, but between laborers all of the same craft, and each having the same right as any one of the others to pursue his calling. In this as in every other case of equal rights the right of each individual is to be exercised with due regard to the similar right of all others, and the right of one be said to end where that of another begins. The right involved is the right to dispose of one's labor with full freedom. This is a legal right, and it is entitled to legal protection. Sir William Erle, in his book on Trades Unions (page 12), has stated this in the following language, which has been several times quoted with approval by judges in England: "Every person has a right, under the law, as between himself and his fellow subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labor or his own capital according to his own will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description, done not in the exercise of the actor's own right, but for the purpose of obstruction, would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition." The same rule is stated with care and discrimination by Wells, J., in Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555: "Every one has a right to enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill, and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition, but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance, or annoyance. If disturbance or loss come as the result of competition, or the exercise of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria, unless some superior right by contract, or otherwise, is interfered with. But if it come from the merely wanton or malicious acts of others, without the justification of competition, or the service of any interest or lawful purpose, it then stands upon a different footing." In this case the acts complained of were calculated to cause damage to the plaintiffs, and did actually cause such damage; and they were intentionally done for that purpose. Unless, therefore, there was justifiable cause, the acts were malicious and unlawful. Walker v. Cronin, ubi supra; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, and cases cited therein.

The defendants contend that they have done nothing unlawful, and in support of that contention they say that a person may work for whom he pleases, and, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, may cease to work when he pleases, and for any reason whatever, whether the same be good or bad; that he may give notice of his intention in advance, with or without stating the reason; that what one man may do several men acting in concert may do, and may agree beforehand that they will do, and may give notice of the agreement; and that all this may be lawfully done, notwithstanding such concerted action may, by reason of the consequent interruption of the work, result in great loss to the employer and his other employés, and that such a result was intended. In a general sense, and without reference to exceptions arising out of conflicting public and private interests, all this may be true. It is said also that, where one has the lawful right to do a thing, the motive by which he is actuated is immaterial. One form of this statement appears in the first headnote in Allen v. Flood, as reported in (1898) App. Cas. 1, as follows: "An act lawful in itself is not converted, by a bad or malicious motive, into an unlawful act, so as to make the doer of the act liable to a civil action." If the meaning of this and similar expressions is that, where a person has the lawful right to do a thing irrespective of his motive, his motive is immaterial, the proposition is a mere truism. If, however, the meaning is that where a person, if actuated by one kind of a motive, has a lawful right to do a thing, the act is lawful when done under any conceivable motive, or that an act lawful under one set of circumstances is therefore lawful under every conceivable set of circumstances, the proposition does not commend itself to us as either logically or legally accurate. In so far as a right is lawful it it lawful, and in many cases the right is so far absolute as to be lawful whatever may be the motive of the actor,—as, where one digs upon his own land for water (Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 117), or makes a written lease of his land for the purpose of terminating a tenancy at will (Gronstra v. Bourges, 141 Mass. 7, 4 N. E. 623); but in many cases the lawfulness of an act which causes damage to another may depend upon whether the act is for justifiable cause, and this justification may be found sometimes in the circumstances under which it is done, irrespective of motive, sometimes in the motive alone, and sometimes in the circumstances and motive combined. This principle is of very general application in criminal law, and also is illustrated in many branches of the civil law, as in cases of libel, and of procuring a wife to leave her husband. Tasker v. Stanley, 153 Mass. 148, 26 N. E. 417, 10 L. R. A. 468, and cases therein cited. Indeed, the principle is a prominent feature underlying the whole doctrine of privilege, malice, and intent. See, on this, an instructive article in 8 Harv. Law Rev. 1, where the subject is considered at some length. It is manifest that not much progress is made by such general statements as those quoted above from Allen v. Flood, whatever may be their meaning.

Still standing for solution is the question, under what circumstances, including the motive of the actor, is the act complained of lawful, and to what extent? In cases somewhat akin to the one at bar this court has had occasion to consider the question how far acts manifestly coercive and intimidating in their nature, which cause damage and injury to the business or property of another, and are done with intent to cause such injury, and partly in reliance upon such coercion, are justifiable. In Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499, it was held to be lawful for persons engaged in the business of shipping seamen to combine together into a society for the purpose of competing with other persons engaged in the same business, and it was held lawful for them, in pursuance of that purpose, to take men out of a ship if men shipped by a nonmember were in that ship, to refuse to furnish seamen through a nonmember, to notify the public that they had combined against nonmembers and had "laid the plaintiff on the shelf," to notify the plaintiff's customers and friends that the plaintiff could not ship seamen for them, and to interfere in all these ways with the business of the plaintiff as a shipping agent, and compel him to abandon the same. The justification for these acts so injurious to the business of the plaintiff, and so intimidating in their nature, is to be found in the law of competition. No legal right of the plaintiff was infringed upon, and, as stated by Chapman, J., in giving the opinion of the court (page 503), "if the effect of these acts was to destroy the business of shipping masters who are not members of the association, it is such a result as, in the competition of business, often follows from a course of proceeding that the law permits." The primary object of the defendants was to build up their own business, and this they might lawfully do to the extent disclosed in that case, even to the injury of their rivals. Similar decisions have been made in other courts where acts somewhat coercive in their nature and effect have been held justifiable under the law of competition. Steamship Co. v. McGregor (1892) App. Cas. 25; Manufacturing Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319; Macauley v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 33 Atl. 1, 37 L. R. A. 455, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770.

On the other hand, it was held in Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, that a conspiracy against a mechanic—who is under the necessity of employing workmen in order to carry on his business—to obtain a sum of money from him, which he is under no legal obligation to pay, by inducing his workmen to leave him, or by deterring others from entering into his employ, or by threatening to do this, so that he is induced to pay the money demanded under a reasonable apprehension that he cannot carry on his business without yielding to the demands, is illegal, if not criminal, conspiracy; that the acts done under it are illegal, and that the money thus obtained may be recovered back. Chapman, C. J., speaking for the court, says that "there is no doubt that, if the parties under such circumstances succeed in injuring the business of the mechanic, they are liable to pay all the damages done to him." That case bears a close analogy to the one at bar. The acts there threatened were like those in this case, and the purpose was, in substance, to force the plaintiff to give his work to the defendants, and to extort from him a fine because he had given some of his work to other persons. Without now indicating to what extent workmen may combine, and in pursuance of an agreement may act by means of strikes and boycotts to get the hours of labor reduced, or their wages increased, or to procure from their employers any other concession directly and immediately affecting their own interests, or to help themselves in competition with their fellow workmen, we think this case must be governed by the principles laid down in Carew v. Rutherford, ubi supra. The purpose of these defendants was to force the plaintiffs to join the defendant association, and to that end they injured the plaintiffs in their business, and molested and disturbed them in their efforts to work at their trade. It is true they committed no acts of personal violence, or of physical injury to property, although they threatened to do something which might reasonably be expected to lead to such results. In their threat, however, there was plainly that which was coercive in its effect upon the will. It is not necessary that the liberty of the body should be restrained. Restraint of the mind, provided it would be such as would be likely to force a man against his will to grant the thing demanded, and actually has that effect, is sufficient in cases like this. As stated by Lord Bramwell in Reg. v. Druitt, 10 Cox, Cr. Cas. 592: "No right of property or capital is so sacred or carefully guarded by the law of the land as that of personal liberty. That liberty is not liberty of the mind only; it is also a liberty of the mind and will; and the liberty of a man's mind and will to say how he should bestow himself, his means, his talent, and his industry is as much a subject of the law's protection as that of his body." It was not the intention of the defendants to give fairly to the employer the option to employ them or the plaintiffs, but to compel the latter against their will to join the association, and to that end to molest and interfere with them in their efforts to procure work by acts and threats well calculated by their coercive and intimidating nature to overcome the will. The defendants might make such lawful rules as they please for the regulation of their own conduct, but they had no right to force other persons to join them. The necessity that the plaintiffs should join this association is not so great, nor is its relation to the rights of the defendants, as compared with the right of the plaintiffs to be free from molestation, such as to bring the acts of the defendant under the shelter of the principles of trade competition. Such acts are without justification, and therefore are malicious and unlawful, and the conspiracy thus to force the plaintiffs was unlawful. Such conduct is intolerable, and inconsistent with the spirit of our laws. The language used by this court in Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, may be repeated here with emphasis, as applicable to this case: "The facts alleged and proved in this case are peculiarly offensive to the free principles which prevail in this country, and, if such practices could enjoy impunity, they would tend to establish a tyranny of irresponsible persons over labor and mechanical business which would be extremely injurious to both." See, in addition to the authorities above cited, Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346; Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 214, 17 N. E. 307, 9 Am. St. Rep. 689; Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 97, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443; St. 1894, c. 508, § 2; State v. Donaldson, 32 N. J. Law, 151, 90 Am. Dec. 649; State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 9 Atl. 559, 59 Am. Rep. 710; State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46, 8 Atl. 890, 3 Am. St. Rep. 23; State v. Dyer, 67 Vt. 690, 32 Atl. 814; Lucke v. Assembly, 77 Md. 396, 26

Atl. 505, 19 L. R. A. 408, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421. As the plaintiffs have been injured by these acts, and there is reason to believe that the defendants contemplate further proceedings of the same kind, which will be likely still more to injure the plaintiffs, equity lies to enjoin the defendants. Vegelahn v. Guntner, ubi supra.

Some phases of the labor question have recently been discussed in the very elaborately considered case of Allen v. Flood, ubi supra. Whether or not the decision made therein is inconsistent with the propositions upon which we base our decision in this case, we are not disposed, in view of the circumstances under which that decision was made, to follow it. We prefer the view expressed by the dissenting judges, which view, it may be remarked, was entertained not only by three of the nine lords who sat in the case, but also by the great majority of the common-law judges who had occasion officially to express an opinion. There must be, therefore, a decree for the plaintiffs. We think, however, that the clause, "or by causing or attempting to cause any person to discriminate against any employer or members of plaintiffs' said association (because he is such employer) in giving or allowing the performance of contracts to or by such employer," is too broad and indefinite, inasmuch as it might seem to include mere lawful persuasion and other similar and peaceful acts; and for that reason, and also because, so far as respects unlawful acts, it seems to cover only such acts as are prohibited by other parts of the decree, we think it should be omitted. Inasmuch as the association of the defendants is not a corporation, an injunction cannot be issued against it as such, but only against its members, their agents and servants. As thus modified, in the opinion of the majority of the court, the decree should stand. Decree accordingly.

HOLMES, C. J. (dissenting). When a question has been decided by the court, I think it proper, as a general rule, that a dissenting judge, however strong his convictions may be, should thereafter accept the law from the majority, and leave the remedy to the legislature, if that body sees fit to interfere. If the decision in the present case simply had relied upon Vegelahn v. Guntner, I should have hesitated to say anything, although I might have stated that my personal opinion had not been weakened by the substantial agreement with my views to be found in the judgments of the majority of the house of lords in Allen v. Flood. But, much to my satisfaction, if I may say so, the court has seen fit to adopt the mode of approaching the question which I believe to be the correct one, and to open an issue which otherwise I might have thought closed. The difference between my Brethren and me now seems to be a difference of degree, and the line of reasoning followed makes it proper for me to explain where the difference lies.

I agree that the conduct of the defendants is actionable unless justified. May v. Wood, 172 Mass. 11, 14, 51 N. E. 191, and cases cited. I agree that the presence or absence of justification may depend upon the object of their conduct; that is, upon the motive with which they acted. Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 105, 106, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443. I agree, for instance, that, if a boycott or a strike is intended to override the jurisdiction of the courts by the action of a private association, it may be illegal. Weston v. Barnicoat, 175 Mass. 454, 56 N. E. 619, 49 L. R. A. 612. On the other hand, I infer that a majority of my Brethren would admit that a boycott or strike intended to raise wages directly might be lawful, if it did not embrace in its scheme or intent violence, breach of contract, or other conduct unlawful on grounds independent of the mere fact that the action of the defendants was combined. A sensible workingman would not contend that the courts should sanction a combination for the purpose of inflicting or threatening violence, or the infraction of admitted rights. To come directly to the point, the issue is narrowed to the question whether, assuming that some purposes would be a justification, the purpose in this case of the threatened boycotts and strikes was such as to justify the threats. That purpose was not directly concerned with wages. It was one degree more remote. The immediate object and motive was to strengthen the defendants' society as a preliminary and means to enable it to make a better fight on questions of wages or other matters of clashing interests.

I differ from my Brethren in thinking that the threats were as lawful for this preliminary purpose as for the final one to which strengthening the union was a means. I think that unity of organization is necessary to make the contest of labor effectual, and that societies of laborers lawfully may employ in their preparation the means which they might use in the final contest.

Although this is not the place for extended economic discussion, and although the law may not always reach ultimate economic conceptions, I think it well to add that I cherish no illusions as to the meaning and effect of strikes. While I think the strike a lawful instrument in the universal struggle of life, I think it pure phantasy to suppose that there is a body of capital of which labor, as a whole, secures a larger share by that means.

The annual product, subject to an infinitesimal deduction for the luxuries of the few, is directed to consumption by the multitude, and is consumed by the multitude always. Organization and strikes may get a larger share for the members of an organization, but, if they do, they get it at the expense of the less organized and less powerful portion of the laboring mass. They do not create something out of nothing.

It is only by devesting our minds of questions of ownership and other machinery of distribution, and by looking solely at the question of consumption,—asking ourselves what is the annual product, who consumes it, and what changes would or could we make,—that we can keep in the world of realities.

But, subject to the qualifications which I have expressed, I think it lawful for a body of workmen to try by combination to get more than they now are getting, although they do it at the expense of their fellows, and to that end to strengthen their union by the boycott and the strike.

NATIONAL PROTECTIVE ASS'N OF STEAM FITTERS AND HELPERS et al. v. CUMMING et al.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1902. 170 N. Y. 315, 63 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648.)

This action was brought by the National Protective Association of Steam Fitters and Helpers, a domestic corporation, and Charles McQueed, a member of the corporation, suing for the benefit of himself and his fellow members. The defendants were two individuals, Cumming, the walking delegate of the Enterprise Association of Steam Fitters, and Nugent, the walking delegate of the Progress Association of Steam Fitters, these associations, as such, each being an unincorporated association of more than seven members, and certain other persons. The prayer was to restrain the defendants, and each of them, from preventing the employment of members of the plaintiff corporation, and from coercing or obtaining by command, threats, strikes, or otherwise, the dismissal or discharge by any employer, contractor, or owner, of members of this corporation, or the plaintiff McQueed, from their work, employment, or business.

On the issues raised by the denials of the several defendants, the trial Justice, in stating the grounds upon which he proceeded, found specifically as follows:

"That the defendants have entered into a combination which, in effect prevents, and will continue to prevent, the plaintiff McQueed and the other members of the plaintiff association from working at his or their trade in the city of New York; * * * that the defendant Cumming threatened to cause a general strike against the plaintiff association and against the plaintiff McQueed wherever he found them at work, and that he would not allow them to work at any job in the city of New York, except some small jobs where the men of the Enterprise Association were not employed, and that he and the defendant Nugent threatened to drive the plaintiff association out of existence; * * * that the defendants, Cumming and Nugent, while acting in their capacity of walking delegates for their respective associations, and members of the board of delegates, caused the plaintiff McQueed and other members of the plaintiff association to be discharged by their employers from various places of work upon buildings in the course of erection by [naming three different employers who were erecting buildings at different places in the boroughs of Brooklyn and Manhattan], by threatening the said employers that if they did not discharge the members of the plaintiff association, and employ the members of the Enterprise Progress Association in their stead, the said walking delegates would cause a general strike of all men of other trades employed on said buildings, and that the defendant Cumming, as such walking delegate, did cause strikes * * * in order to prevent the members of the plaintiff association from continuing with the work they were doing at the time the strike was ordered, and that the said employers, by reason of said threats and the acts of the defendants Cumming and Nugent, discharged the members of the plaintiff association, * * * and employed the members of the Enterprise and Progress Associations in their stead; * * * that the threats made by the defendants, and the acts of said walking delegates in causing the discharge of the members of the plaintiff association by means of threats of a general strike of other working men, constituted an illegal combination and conspiracy, injured the plaintiff association in its business, deprived its members of employment and an opportunity to labor, prevented them from earning their livelihood in their trade or business. * * *"

A judgment was directed and entered restraining the defendants from "preventing the work, business, or employment of the plaintiff corporation, or any of its members, in the city of New York or elsewhere, and from coercing or obtaining, by command, threats, strikes, or otherwise, the dismissal or discharge by any employer, contractor, or owner of the members of the plaintiff corporation, or the plaintiff McQueed, or any or either of them, from their work, employment, or business, or in any wise interfering with the lawful business or work of the plaintiff corporation or of its members. But the defendants are not, nor is any one of them, enjoined and restrained from refusing to work with the plaintiff or any member of the plaintiff corporation."

The decision in the Special Term awarded to the plaintiffs substantially all the relief demanded in their complaint, and a judgment was entered accordingly. Cumming and the Enterprise Association and Nugent and the Progress Association appealed. In the Appellate Division the judgment of the Special Term was reversed.[63] The plaintiffs then appealed to the Court of Appeals.[64]

PARKER, C. J. The order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, on the ground that the facts found do not support the judgment of the Special Term. * * *

If the organization notifies the employer that its members will not work with nonmembers, and its real object is to benefit the organization and secure employment for its members, it is lawful. If its sole purpose be to prevent nonmembers working, then it is unlawful. I do not assent to this proposition, although there is authority for it. It seems to me illogical and little short of absurd to say that the everyday acts of the business world, apparently within the domain of competition, may be either lawful or unlawful according to the motive of the actor. If the motive be good, the act is lawful. If it be bad, the act is unlawful. Within all the authorities upholding the principle of competition, if the motive be to destroy another's business in order to secure business for yourself, the motive is good, but, according to a few recent authorities, if you do not need the business, or do not wish it, then the motive is bad; and some court may say to a jury, who are generally the triors of fact, that a given act of competition which destroyed A.'s business was legal if the act was prompted by a desire on the part of the defendant to secure to himself the benefit of it, but illegal if its purpose was to destroy A.'s business in revenge for an insult given. But for the purpose of this discussion I shall assume this proposition to be sound, for it is clear to me that, applying that rule to the facts found, it will appear that the Appellate Division order should be sustained.

[63] See National Protective Ass'n of Steam Fitters v. Cumming (1900) 53 App. Div. 227, 65 N. Y. Supp. 946.

[64] The statement of the case is taken partly from the report of the case in the Appellate Division, and partly from the statement of the findings given in the introductory portion of Judge Vann's opinion. Several passages are omitted, as indicated, from the opinions given, and a short opinion by Judge Gray is entirely omitted.

While I shall consider every fact found by the learned trial judge, I shall consider the findings in a different order, because it seems to me the more logical order. He finds "that the defendants Cumming and Nugent, while acting in their capacity of walking delegates for their respective associations and members of the board of delegates, caused the plaintiff McQueed and other members of the plaintiff association to be discharged by their employers from various pieces of work upon buildings in the course of erection, * * * by threatening the * * * employers that if they did not discharge the members of the plaintiff association, and employ the members of the Enterprise and Progress Associations in their stead, the said walking delegates would cause a general strike of all men of other trades employed on said buildings, and that the defendant Cumming, as such walking delegate, did cause strikes * * * in order to prevent the members of the plaintiff association from continuing with the work they were doing at the time the strike was ordered, and that said employers, by reason of said threats and the acts of the defendants Cumming and Nugent, discharged the members of the plaintiff association, and employed the members of the Enterprise and Progress Associations in their stead." Now there is not a fact stated in that finding which is not lawful, within the rules which I have quoted supra. Those principles concede the right of an association to strike in order to benefit its members; and one method of benefiting them is to secure them employment,—a method conceded to be within the right of an organization to employ. There is no pretense that the defendant associations or their walking delegates had any other motive than one which the law justifies,—of attempting to benefit their members by securing their employment. Nowhere throughout that finding will be found even a hint that a strike was ordered, or a notification given of the intention to order a strike, for the purpose of accomplishing any other result than that of securing the discharge of the members of the plaintiff association, and the substitution of members of the defendant associations in their place. Such a purpose is not illegal within the rules laid down in the opinion of Judge VANN, nor within the authorities cited therein. On the contrary, such a motive is conceded to be a legal one. It is only where the sole purpose is to do injury to another, or the act is prompted by malice, that it is insisted that the act becomes illegal. No such motive is alleged in that finding. It is not hinted at. On the contrary, the motive which always underlies competition is asserted to have been the animating one. It is beyond the right and the power of this court to import into that finding, in contradiction of another finding or otherwise, the further finding that the motive which prompted the conduct of defendants was an unlawful one, prompted by malice, and a desire to do injury to plaintiffs, without benefiting the members of the defendant associations. I doubt if it would ever have occurred to any one to claim that there was anything in that finding importing a different motive from that specially alleged in the finding, had not the draftsman characterized the notice given to the employers by the associations of their intention to strike as "threats." The defendant associations, as appears from the finding quoted, wanted to put their men in the place of certain men at work who were nonmembers, working for smaller pay, and they set about doing it in a perfectly lawful way. They determined that if it were necessary they would bear the burden and expense of a strike to accomplish that result, and in so determining they were clearly within their rights, as all agree. They could have gone upon a strike without offering any explanation until the contractors should have come in distress to the officers of the associations, asking the reason for the strike. Then, after explanations, the nonmembers would have been discharged, and the men of defendant associations sent back to work. Instead of taking that course, they chose to inform the contractors of their determination, and the reason for it. It is the giving of this information—a simple notification of their determination, which it was right and proper and reasonable to give—that has been characterized as "threats" by the Special Term, and which has led to no inconsiderable amount of misunderstanding since. But the sense in which the word was employed by the court is of no consequence, for the defendant associations had the absolute right to threaten to do that which they had the right to do. Having the right to insist that plaintiff's men be discharged, and defendants' men put in their place, if the services of the other members of the organization were to be retained, they also had the right to threaten that none of their men would stay unless their members could have all the work there was to do.

The findings further stated that the defendants Cumming and Nugent were the walking delegates of the defendant associations, and as such were members of the board of delegates of the building trades in New York, and were therefore in control of the matters in their respective trades. The trial court also found "that the defendant Cumming threatened to cause a general strike against the plaintiff association and against the plaintiff McQueed wherever he found them at work, and that he would not allow them to work at any job in the city of New York, except some small jobs where the men of the Enterprise Association were not employed, and that he and the defendant Nugent threatened to drive the plaintiff association out of existence." Now, this finding should be read in connection with and in the light of the other findings which I have already read and commented on, and which show that the purpose of the strike was to secure the employment of members of the defendant associations in the places filled by the members of plaintiff's association, who were willing to work for smaller wages,—a perfectly proper and legitimate motive, as we have seen. But if the other findings be driven from the mind while considering this one, which the opinions of the Appellate Division indicate was not justified by the evidence, it will be found that it fairly means no more than that the defendant associations did not purpose to allow McQueed and the members of his association to work upon any jobs where members of defendant associations were employed; that they were perfectly willing to allow them to have small jobs, fitted, perhaps, for men who were willing to work for small wages, but that the larger jobs, where they could afford to pay and would pay the rate of wages demanded by defendant associations, they intended to secure for their members alone,—a determination to which they had a perfect right to come, as is conceded by the rules which I have quoted. Having reached that conclusion, defendants notified McQueed, who had organized an association when he failed to pass the defendants' examination, that they would prevent him and the men of his association from working on a certain class of jobs. They did not threaten to employ any illegal method to accomplish that result. They notified them of the purpose of the defendants to secure this work for themselves, and to prevent McQueed and his associates from getting it, and in doing that they but informed them of their intention to do what they had a right to do; and, when an man purposes to do something which he has the legal right to do, there is no law which prevents him from telling another, who will be affected by his act, of his intention. A man has a right, under the law, to start a store, and to sell at such reduced prices that he is able in a short time to drive the other storekeepers in his vicinity out of business, when, having possession of the trade, he finds himself soon able to recover the loss sustained while ruining the others. Such has been the law for centuries. The reason, of course, is that the doctrine has generally been accepted that free competition is worth more to society than it costs, and that on this ground the infliction of damages is privileged. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 134, 38 Am. Dec. 346. Nor could this storekeeper be prevented from carrying out his scheme because, instead of hiding his purpose, he openly declared to those storekeepers that he intended to drive them out of business in order that he might later profit thereby. Nor would it avail such storekeepers, in the event of their bringing an action to restrain him from accomplishing their ruin by underselling them, to persuade the trial court to characterize the notification as a "threat," for on review the answer would be, "A man may threaten to do that which the law says he may do, provided that, within the rules laid down in those cases, his motive is to help himself." A labor organization is endowed with precisely the same legal right as is an individual to threaten to do that which it may lawfully do.

Having finished the discussion of the facts, I reiterate that, within the rules of law I have quoted, it must appear, in order to make out a cause of action against these defendants, that in what they did they were actuated by improper motives,—by a malicious desire to injure the plaintiffs. There is no such finding of fact, and there is no right in this court to infer it if it would, and, from the other facts found, it is plain that it should not if it could.

The findings conclude with a sentence which commences as follows: "I find that the threats made by the defendants, and the acts of the said walking delegates in causing the discharge of the members of the plaintiff association by means of threats of a general strike of other workmen, constituted an illegal combination and conspiracy." That is not a finding of fact, but a conclusion of law, that the trial court erroneously, as I think, attempted to draw from the facts found, which I have already discussed, and which clearly, in my judgment, require this court to hold that the defendants acted within their legal rights.

In the last analysis of the findings, therefore, it appears that they declare that members of the organizations refused to work any longer, as they lawfully might; that they threatened to strike, which was also within their lawful right, but without any suggestion whatever in the findings that they threatened an illegal or unlawful act. And such findings are claimed to be sufficient to uphold a judgment that absolutely enjoins the defendant associations and their members from striking. This is certainly a long step in advance of any decision brought to my attention. * * *

VANN, J., dissenting, after stating the findings of the trial justice. * * * The Appellate Division, according to its order, which is the only evidence of its action that we can consider, did not reverse upon a question of fact; and a reversal upon the law, only, is an affirmance of the facts found, which are thus placed beyond our control, as there was some evidence to support the findings. People v. Adirondack Ry. Co., 160 N. Y. 225, 235, 54 N. E. 689; Code Civ. Proc. § 1338. Thus we have before us a controversy, not between employer and employé, but between different labor organizations, wherein one seeks to restrain the others from driving its members out of business, and absolutely preventing them from earning a living by working at their trade, through threats, made to the common employer of members of all the organizations, to destroy his business unless he discharged the plaintiff's members from his employment. The primary question is whether the action of the defendants was unlawful, for a lawful act done in a lawful manner cannot cause actionable injury. It is not the duty of one man to work for another unless he has agreed to, and if he has so agreed, but for no fixed period, either may end the contract whenever he chooses. The one may work or refuse to work at will, and the other may hire or discharge at will. The terms of employment are subject to mutual agreement, without let or hindrance from any one. If the terms do not suit, or the employer does not please, the right to quit is absolute, and no one may demand a reason therefor. Whatever one man may do alone, he may do in combination with others, provided they have no unlawful object in view. Mere numbers do not ordinarily affect the quality of the act. Workingmen have the right to organize for the purpose of securing higher wages, shorter hours of labor, or improving their relations with their employers. They have the right to strike (that is, to cease working in a body by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed), provided the object is not to gratify malice, or inflict injury upon others, but to secure better terms of employment for themselves. A peaceable and orderly strike, not to harm others, but to improve their own condition, is not a violation of law. They have the right to go farther, and to solicit and persuade others, who do not belong to their organization, and are employed for no fixed period, to quit work, also, unless the common employer of all assents to lawful conditions, designed to improve their material welfare. They have no right, however, through the exercise of coercion, to prevent others from working. When persuasion ends, and pressure begins, the law is violated; for that is a trespass upon the rights of others, and is expressly forbidden by statute. Pen. Code, § 168. They have no right, by force, threats, or intimidation, to prevent members of another labor organization from working, or a contractor from hiring them or continuing them in his employment. They may not threaten to cripple his business unless he will discharge them, for that infringes upon liberty of action, and violates the right which every man has to conduct his business as he sees fit, or to work for whom and on what terms he pleases. Their labor is their property, to do with as they choose; but the labor of others is their property, in turn, and is entitled to protection against wrongful interference. Both may do what they please with their own, but neither may coerce another into doing what he does not wish to with his own. The defendant associations made their own rules and regulations, and the plaintiff corporation did the same. Neither was entitled to any exclusive privilege, but both had equal rights according to law. The defendants could not drive the plaintiff's members from the labor market absolutely, and the plaintiff could not drive the defendants' members therefrom. The members of each organization had the right to follow their chosen calling without unwarrantable interference from others. Public policy requires that the wages of labor should be regulated by the law of competition and of supply and demand, the same as the sale of food or clothing. Any combination to restrain "the free pursuit in this state of any lawful business," in order "to create or maintain a monopoly," is expressly prohibited by statute, and an injunction is authorized to prevent it. In re Davies, 168 N. Y. 89, 96, 61 N. E. 118, 56 L. R. A. 855; Laws 1897, c. 383; Laws 1899, c. 690.

A combination of workmen to secure a lawful benefit to themselves should be distinguished from one to injure other workmen in their trade. Here we have a conspiracy to injure the plaintiffs in their business, as distinguished from a legitimate advancement of the defendants' own interests. While they had the right by fair persuasion to get the work of the plaintiff McQueed, for instance, they had no right, either by force or by threats, to prevent him from getting any work whatever, or to deprive him of the right to earn his living by plying his trade. Competition in the labor market is lawful, but a combination to shut workmen out of the market altogether is unlawful. One set of laborers, whether organized or not, has no right to drive another set out of business, or prevent them from working for any person upon any terms satisfactory to themselves. By threatening to call a general strike of the related trades, the defendants forced the contractor to discharge competent workmen who wanted to work for him, and whom he wished to keep in his employment. They conspired to do harm to the contractor in order to compel him to do harm to the plaintiffs, and their acts in execution of the conspiracy caused substantial damage to the members of the plaintiff corporation. * * *

The object of the defendants was not to get higher wages, shorter hours, or better terms for themselves, but to prevent others from following their lawful calling. Thus one of the defendants said to the plaintiff McQueed: "I will strike against your men wherever I find them, and not allow them to work on any job in the city, except some small place where the Enterprise men are not employed." The same man said to one of the contractors that he could not have the plaintiff's men in his employment and unless they were discharged he would order a "general strike of the whole building." They were discharged accordingly, although the contractor testified that they were good workmen, that their work was satisfactory, and that he had no reason for discharging them, other than the threats made. Another contractor testified that two of the defendants told him that he must take the plaintiff's men off and put their men on, "or else the whole building would be tied up, as they would not allow the other men to work." The usual discharge followed, although the men were satisfactory to their employer. The same witness testified that "Mr. Cumming would neither allow my men to work, nor would he allow his men to go to work until the time had been paid for between the interval they struck and the time they were to go to work again." A member of the plaintiff corporation swore that "Mr. Cumming told us that, if he ever found us on a job in the vicinity of New York, he would strike it by order of the board of delegates. He said they would not allow us to work on any job, except it was a small job,—a cheap job,—and he allowed us to do it." The threat was repeated in substance to the employer, who discharged the witness, and he was not employed on the building afterwards. There was other evidence to the same effect, and, although the defendants denied making these threats, the trial judge accepted the version of the plaintiff's witnesses, and hence we must do the same. I assume, therefore, that the defendants caused the discharge of the plaintiff's men by threatening to cripple their employer's business unless he discharged them, and that they also molested them by threatening to prevent them from working at their trade in the city of New York, by calling a general strike of all trades on any building where they might be employed. The action of the defendants was wrongful and malicious, and their object was to force men who had learned a trade to abandon it and take up some other pursuit. There is no finding that the defendants maintain a higher standard of skill than the plaintiffs. * * *

The conclusions I have announced are supported by the weight of authority in this country and in England. The leading case in this state is controlling in principle, and requires a reversal of the order appealed from. Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, 46 N. E. 297, 37 L. R. A. 802, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496. The plaintiff in that case alleged in his complaint that the defendants wrongfully conspired to injure him and take away his means of earning a livelihood; that they threatened to accomplish this unless he would join their association; that in pursuance of the conspiracy, "upon plaintiff's refusing to become a member of said association," the defendants "made complaint to the plaintiff's employers, and forced them to discharge him from their employ, and, by false and malicious reports in regard to him, sought to bring him into ill repute with members of his trade and employers, and to prevent him from prosecuting his trade and earning a livelihood." The answer set forth an agreement between a brewer's association and a labor organization, of which defendants were members, to the effect that all employés of the brewery companies belonging to the former should be members of the latter, and that no employé should work for a longer period than four weeks without becoming a member. It was further alleged that the plaintiff was retained in the employment of one of the brewing companies for more than four weeks after he was notified of the provisions of said agreement requiring him to become a member of the local assembly; that the defendants requested him to become a member, and, on his refusal to comply, they, through their committee, notified the officers of said company that the plaintiff, after repeated requests, had refused for more than four weeks to become a member of said assembly; and that they did so solely in pursuance of said agreement, and in accordance with the terms thereof, without intent or purpose to injure plaintiff in any way. The plaintiff demurred to this defense upon the ground that it was insufficient, in law, upon the face thereof. The demurrer was sustained in all the courts. 77 Hun, 610, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1134; 152 N. Y. 33, 46 N. E. 297, 37 L. R. A. 802, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496. All the judges who sat in this court united with Judge Gray in saying that: "Public policy and the interests of society favor the utmost freedom in the citizen to pursue his lawful trade or calling, and if the purpose of an organization or combination of workingmen be to hamper or to restrict that freedom, and, through contracts or arrangements with employers, to coerce other workingmen to become members of the organization, and to come under its rules and conditions, under the penalty of the loss of their position and of deprivation of employment, then that purpose seems clearly unlawful, and militates against the spirit of our government and the nature of our institutions. The effectuation of such a purpose would conflict with that principle of public policy which prohibits monopolies and exclusive privileges. It would tend to deprive the public of the services of men in useful employment and capacities. It would, to use the language of Mr. Justice Barrett in People v. Smith, 5 N. Y. Cr. R., at page 513, 'impoverish and crush a citizen for no reason connected in the slightest degree with the advancement of wages or the maintenance of the rate.'" * * * [65]

This bill, brought by the L. D. Willcutt & Sons Company, ran originally against two unincorporated labor unions by name, but was amended so as to run only against certain individuals as officers and members of these unions and against their other members as thus represented. No question was made that the defendants did not sufficiently represent all the members of both unions.

In the Superior Court the justice who heard the case entered a decree in favor of the defendants and reported the facts for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court. The case grew out of a trade dispute between the plaintiff and certain members of the union who were in the plaintiff's employ. Briefly, the facts were as follows:

In April, 1906, these unions adopted a code of working rules, in which, beside some minor demands not now material, they demanded that wages be increased five cents an hour, that all foremen should be members of the unions, that the business agent of the unions should be allowed to visit any building under construction to attend to his official duties, and that wages should be paid during working hours. The plaintiff declined to accept these rules, and a strike followed.

By the constitution and rules of the unions it appeared that a code of fines and penalties was established by the International Union, an association composed of these and other similar unions throughout the country, and that this code was being actively enforced by the local unions. One rule provided that any member violating any section of the working code should be fined upon conviction not less than $5 nor more than $25, one of these sections being that "no member of the union shall work with a nonunion man who refuses to join the union." Various other penalties were provided, varying from $5 to $500 for each offense, to be imposed upon persons designated as "common scabs," "inveterate or notorious scabs," and "union wreckers"; these terms being applied to those who in different ways persist in working after a strike has been called. These fines in their operation are likely to be coercive in their nature.

This code was actively enforced by the unions, and most of the members of the unions who left their work did so through fear of the fines that would be imposed upon them if they continued to work. The defendants Driscoll and Reagan on one occasion found two men at work for the plaintiff, one a journeyman who had been and the other a foreman who was a member of the union. Reagan threatened the journeyman with a fine of $100 if he continued to work, and Driscoll notified the foreman that he was called out. Both refused to leave. Driscoll reported the fact at a meeting of the union and a vote was passed that charges be preferred against the men for working contrary to the rules. A preliminary injunction was issued in this case, and no further steps were taken under the vote.

The defendants established a strike headquarters, and provided a strike fund from which payments were made to the strikers and other men out of work. Some of the defendants made constant visits to a job of the plaintiff, generally at noontime, to persuade men whom the plaintiff had hired to leave its employ. They offered as inducements in some cases to nonunion men membership without the full payments usually required, and in other cases work elsewhere. Men frequently left the plaintiff's employ after these talks, in some cases stating that they would like to work but could not run the risk of being fined. The defendant Driscoll induced two men to go who otherwise would have continued at work, by paying them with funds of the unions the wages due them from the plaintiff and providing them with transportation to Utica, N. Y., where he had secured other work for them.

HAMMOND, J. (after stating the facts). * * * The strike had four objects. Of these the demand for an increase of wages was properly enforceable by a strike. The demand that wages should be paid during working hours amounts merely to a demand for a shorter day, and also was properly enforceable by a strike. The reasonableness of such demands we have not the means of determining; and it is settled that such matters are best left to be adjudicated in the freedom of private contract between the interested parties. More difficult questions are presented by the demands that all foremen shall be members of the unions, and that the business agent of the unions shall be allowed to visit any building under construction. See as to the first of these points a very interesting article by Professor Smith, 20 Harvard Law Review, 431, note 1. But it is unnecessary under the circumstances to determine these questions, as the plaintiff replied with a bare refusal of all the demands.

We are of opinion therefore that this strike must be regarded as simply a strike for higher wages and a shorter day. It was not a mere sympathetic strike, as in Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 587, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638, or one whose immediate object was only remotely connected with the ultimate object of the strikers, as in Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330. It was a direct strike by the defendants against the other party to the dispute, instituted for the protection and furtherance of the interests of the defendants in matters in which both parties were directly interested and as to which each party had the right, within all lawful limits, to determine its own course. Such a strike must be treated as a justifiable strike so far as respects its ultimate object.

But however justifiable or even laudable may be the ultimate objects of a strike, unlawful means must not be employed in carrying it on; and it is contended by the plaintiff that the use of fines and threats of fines, under the circumstances disclosed in the record, are unlawful. The question is stated by the trial judge in the following language: "In case of a justifiable strike, has the contractor the right to invoke the aid of the court to prevent the labor union from imposing a fine [which the court has found to be coercive in its nature] or taking action to impose one upon one or more of its members under its rules to induce them to leave the contractor's employ to his injury?" Under the findings of the court it would seem that the question is not intended to be quite so broad as otherwise might be inferred from its language. The language is broad enough to include the case where the employé is under a contract to stay with his employer and where to leave would be a violation of that contract. But no such state of things appears upon the record. The plaintiff "hired its masons by the day and paid them on the basis of the number of hours worked, and it might have discharged them and they might have left at the close of any day." The question must therefore be considered as applying only to cases where the employé by leaving violates no contractual right of the employer.

The question how far the imposition of fines by an organization upon its members where the effect is to injure a third party is justifiable, was considered by this court in Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255, 69 N. E. 1085, 64 L. R. A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341, and it was there adjudged that the imposition of such a fine by which members of the organization were coerced into refusing to trade with the plaintiff, not a member, to his great damage, was inconsistent with the ground upon which the right to competition in trade is based, and as against him was not justifiable. * * *

That principle, if applicable to the facts of this case, is decisive. The majority of the court are of the opinion that it is applicable, and hence that there should be a decree for the plaintiff enjoining intimidation or coercion by fines.

Under ordinary circumstances this opinion would end here. But inasmuch as a minority of the court still think that the principle laid down in Martell v. White, with reference to intimidation by fines imposed by an organization upon its members, is not correct, and also perhaps, that, even if correct, it is not applicable to the facts of this case, and are unwilling to accept that principle as law in this commonwealth notwithstanding the authority of that case, it may be well to say something in addition to what was there said. We are also somewhat influenced to take this action by reason of the importance of the question and its relation to a part of the law still in the nebulous but clearing stage.

Before entering more fully upon the discussion it is well to get a clear conception of what the case is. To begin with, it is not a contest between the members of two competing labor unions, as was Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330, nor is it a conflict between an organization and one of its members in a matter in which no third party is interested. Nor does the plaintiff corporation contend that it has any right to compel the intimidated workman to enter its employ. Neither is it seeking, in behalf of a member of a union, to enforce or defend the right of such member to be free from a fine or threat of a fine. The plaintiff has no concern with the imposition of fines by a union upon its members unless, and only so far as, such an imposition is in violation of a right of the plaintiff. Even if the fine be illegal the plaintiff has no standing in court to complain unless some one of its rights is invaded to its damage. In a word, the case is not between the party imposing the fine and the person fined, nor between the person fined as such and a third party who suffers, but on the contrary it is between such third party and the party imposing the fine. If it were only between the person fined and the party imposing the fine, then with some degree of plausibility it might be said that the former had no right to complain, or at least had waived that right; but it is manifest that neither of the immediate parties to the fine can, either by an agreement among themselves or by waiver, justify the invasion of the right of a third party, if any he has, to object to it.

What is the complaint of the plaintiff? It is a corporation engaged in the construction of buildings and employing a number of men. Its men left its employ on a strike. To keep them away the defendants threatened with fines such as were members of the unions, and by that means kept them away from the plaintiff when otherwise they would have stayed; all to the great damage of the plaintiff. Shortly stated the case is this: The plaintiff's men are being coerced by threats of a fine to leave its employ, greatly to its injury, the fines to be levied in accordance with the by-laws of a voluntary association of which the proposed victims are members. This injury to the plaintiff is intended by the defendants. Has the plaintiff any standing in equity to an injunction against the infliction of such injury?

It is to be premised that the right which the plaintiff seeks to have protected against the acts of the defendants arises from no contract or statute, but out of the nature of things. It is one of the large body of rights which have their foundation in the fitting necessities of civilized society. It is the common law right to a reasonably free labor market. Vice Chancellor Stevenson, in speaking of it, says it has been called a "probable expectancy" and describes it as "the right which every man has to earn his living or pursue his trade without undue interference." Jersey City Printing Co. v. Cassidy, 63 N. J. Eq. 759, 765, 53 Atl. 230. He further remarks (pages 765, 766 of 63 N. J. Eq., and page 233 of 53 Atl.): "It will probably be found * * * that the natural expectancy of employers in relation to the labor market and the natural expectancy of merchants in respect to the merchandise market must be recognized to the same extent by courts of law and courts of equity and protected by substantially the same rules. It is freedom in the market, freedom in the purchase and sale of all things, including both goods and labor, that our modern law is endeavoring to insure to every dealer on either side of the market." And in Atkins v. Fletcher Co., 65 N. J. Eq. 658, 664, 55 Atl. 1074, 1076, the same judge says: "The elemental right of the employer of labor which the courts recognize today no doubt is the right to employ, while the corresponding right of the workman is the right to be employed. In other words, the right to buy labor and the right to sell labor are recognized by the law, and their enjoyment is greatly impaired or destroyed unless freedom in the labor market—freedom on both sides of the labor market—is maintained. Each party to a contract for the sale of labor has an interest in the freedom of the other party with respect to making the contract." In the words of Lord Lindley in Quinn v. Leathem [1901] A. C. 495, 534, "a person's liberty or right to deal with others is nugatory unless they are at liberty to deal with him if they choose to do so." This right of the employer is conclusively established by the numerous cases which hold that he may maintain an action against those who by intimidation prevent persons from entering into his employ. See remarks of Lord Halsbury in Allen v. Flood [1898] A. C. 1, 71, 72. In our own reports such a case may be found in Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443. This is the right—the right to a free labor market—which the plaintiff claims has been invaded by the defendants, and for which he seeks protection.

The defendants also have rights. They have the right to work or not to work, to sell their labor upon such terms as they see fit and to combine for the purpose of getting more pay or a shorter day. And for the purpose of strengthening their organization and making it more effective they have the right to make appropriate by-laws for its internal management, and for the regulation of the conduct of its members toward each other in matters affecting the general interests of the body; and they may enforce obedience to such by-laws and regulations by fines or other suitable penalties.

But not much progress is made by this general statement of the rights of the respective parties. We are still only on the skirmish line. In the jurisprudence of any civilized country there are but few, if any, absolute rights—rights which bend to nothing and to which everything else must bend. The right to one's life would seem to be quite absolute, but it must yield to the private right of self-defense and to the public right to punish for crime. And so in the case before us, neither the right of the plaintiff to a free labor market nor the right of the union to impose a fine upon its members is absolute. Neither is to be considered apart from the other, or without reference to any other conflicting right, whether public or private; but each must be regarded as having in the rules of human conduct its own place beyond the limits of which it must not go. Moreover it must be borne in mind (what sometimes seems to be forgotten by the actors upon each side of such controversies) that the controversy is not a warfare in the sense that for the time being the usual rules of conduct are changed, as in the case of an actual war between two countries. There is no martial law in these cases, no change in the ordinary rules of society, but these rules remain the same as before, commanding what was theretofore right and prohibiting what was theretofore wrong.

The right of an employer to free labor is subject to the right of the laborer to hamper him by many expedients short of fraud or intimidation amounting to injury to the person or property of those who desire to enter his employ, or threats of such injury. For instance, persuasion not amounting to such intimidation is lawful, and perhaps the same may be said of social pressure even when carried to the extent of social ostracism, not including however any threat in a business point of view. See Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443; Jersey City Printing Co. v. Cassidy, 63 N. J. Eq. 759, 769, 53 Atl. 230; 20 Harvard Law Review, 267. Social rights and privileges must take care of themselves. The law cannot prescribe with whom one shall shake hands or associate as a friend.

So long also as the by-laws of a union relate to matters in which no one is interested except the association and its members, and violate no right of a third party or no rule of public policy, they are valid. Fines may be imposed, for instance for tardiness, absence, failure to pay dues, or for misconduct affecting the organization or any of its members; and for numerous other acts. It cannot be successfully contended, however, that as against the right of some party other than the association and its members an act, otherwise a violation of the third party's rights, is any less a violation because done by some member in obedience to a by-law. If a member commits an assault upon a person, and is called into court by the commonwealth upon a criminal complaint or in a civil action by the victim, he can find no valid ground of defense in the fact that he committed the assault in compliance with the requirements of a contract with some other person, or in obedience to a by-law of an association of which he was a member. So a by-law providing that, upon an order to strike, every employé shall quit work even although such an act should be in violation of a contract then existing between him and his employer for continuous service, and that for failure thus to break his contract the member should be fined, doubtless would be declared invalid. And the principle at the bottom of such a decision is this, namely: An interference with the right of a third party cannot be justified upon the ground that the intruder is acting in accordance with an agreement between him and some other person. In a word, so long as a fine is imposed for the guidance of members in matters in which outside parties have no interest, or in which there is no violation of a right of an outside party, then no such party can complain. But when the right of such a party is invaded, it is no defense, either to the person fined or to those who have imposed the fine, that the invasive act was done in accordance with the by-laws of an association.

In the case before us, standing opposed to each other are these two rights: The right of the employer to a free labor market, and the right of the striking employés in their strife with him to impair that freedom; and the crucial question is, how far can the latter go? On which side of the line shall stand the matter of coercion by fines imposed by a union upon its members to impair that freedom? Is the employer's right to a free market subject to this system of mutual intimidation and coercion by fines, or is the right to establish such a system subject to the right of the employer to a free market? If the employer's right is not subject to this method of intimidation, then of course as against him it is unlawful. If it is subject to it, then he cannot complain, no matter how severe the blow.

So far as concerns the law of this commonwealth at least, some things seem to be settled. It is settled that the flow of labor to the employer cannot be obstructed by intimidation or coercion produced by means of injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury. Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443. In that case Allen, J., said: "Such an act [picketing as a means of intimidation] is an unlawful interference with the rights both of employer and employed. An employer has a right to engage all persons who are willing to work for him at such prices as may be mutually agreed upon; and persons employed or seeking employment have a corresponding right to enter into or remain in the employment of any person or corporation willing to employ them. These rights are secured by the Constitution itself. Com. v. Perry, 155 Mass. 117, 28 N. E. 1126, 14 L. R. A. 325, 31 Am. St. Rep. 533; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 17 N. E. 343, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 71, 35 N. E. 62, 22 L. R. A. 340, 37 Am. St. Rep. 206; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 40 N. E. 454, 29 L. R. A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315; Low v. Rees Printing Co., 41 Neb. 127, 59 N. W. 362, 24 L. R. A. 702, 43 Am. St. Rep. 670." See, also, Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307, 9 Am. St. Rep. 689. And it is unnecessary to cite cases in support of the proposition that such is the great weight of authority elsewhere, even though the ultimate object of the strike be legal.

There can be no doubt that fining is one method of injuring a man in his estate, and that a threat to fine is a threat of such an injury. Indeed this is recognized by the decree made by the trial court in this very case, so far as it affects Reagan, one of the defendants, who it was found had threatened with a fine a man once but not then a member of a union.

It is urged however that although this method of intimidation is generally an invasion of the employer's right to a free market and therefore illegal, yet when the intimidation is exerted by a union upon its members in accordance with its by-laws in a strike whose object is legal, it is justifiable and legal. To this the obvious reply is that the rule of freedom to contract is founded upon principles of public policy, that each party to a contract is interested in the freedom of the other party, that it can make no difference to the public or to the employer (who in this case is the other party) that the person intimidated is or is not a member of the society intimidating. In either case the injury is the same and is from the same cause namely intimidation. The workman is no longer free. In Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 26 Or. 527, 38 Pac. 547, 28 L. R. A. 464, 46 Am. St. Rep. 640, the court, after speaking of the general right of labor unions to make rules, proceeds thus: "It must be understood, however, that these associations, like other voluntary societies, must depend for their membership upon the free and untrammelled choice of each individual member. No resort can be had to compulsory methods of any kind to increase or keep up or maintain such membership. Nor is it permissible for associations of this kind to enforce the observance of their laws, rules and regulations through violence, threats or intimidation, or to employ any methods that would induce the intimidation or deprive persons of perfect freedom of action."

The keynote on this matter is struck in Booth v. Burgess, 72 N. J. Eq. 181, 197, 65 Atl. 226, 233, in the following language: "No surrender of liberty or voluntary agreement to abide by by-laws on the part of the employés who are first coerced, made by them when they enter their labor unions, can * * * affect the right of the complainant to a free market, which right he will enjoy for all it may be worth if these employés are permitted to exercise their liberty. The employés may be able to surrender their own right but they certainly cannot surrender the rights of other parties"—citing Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 42 Atl. 607, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746, and Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 74 N. E. 603, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 3 Ann. Cas. 738. And in Downes v. Bennett, 63 Kan. 653, 662, 66 Pac. 623, 626 (55 L. R. A. 560, 88 Am. St. Rep. 256), there is a recognition of the same doctrine: "This is not the case of a union or association of persons intimidating its members from engaging in a specific service offered by an employer and standing ready and open to be entered. In such cases, on a showing of continuous damage caused by inability to secure employés, preventive relief has been afforded." Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 42 Atl. 607, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746.

An opposite doctrine leads to strange conclusions. For instance, if ten men banded together undertake by coercion to keep two other men from entering an employment, and they do this in order to force the employer, for lack of ability to get the two, to employ them (the ten), the employer's right to a free market is invaded, and if he suffers thereby he may proceed either in equity or law against the ten; but if the ten men first induce the two other men to enroll themselves in the same organization with the ten, then, it is said, the ten man may by fines or threats of fines so intimidate the two men as to frighten them from the employer, and that such intimidation is no violation of the employer's right. A rule of law which leads to such inconsistencies is not to be adopted. It does not distinguish between coercion and noncoercion, but between organized coercion and sporadic coercion. It makes a distinction entirely foreign and immaterial to the ground upon which the right to a free market is based.

If it be said that fines are not in themselves illegal, and that consequently their use cannot be illegal, the answer is that when they are used as a method of coercion and create a kind of coercion inconsistent with the right of a person they are, as against that person's right, illegal. If it be said as we have heard it said that fines are innocent and cannot be illegal because they are used by all governments as a method of punishing criminals, the answer is that if the principle is true that, what a government may do to punish for crime, individuals or societies may do to enforce private rights, then it follows that a by-law providing for imprisonment or even death may be legal.

If it be said that the member fined may take his choice either to leave the organization or abide by its rules to which he has before assented, and that where there is a choice there can be no coercion, the answer is that in almost every conceivable case of coercion short of an actual overpowering of the physical forces of the victim there is a choice. The highwayman, who presents his cocked pistol to the traveler and demands his purse under pain of instant death in case of refusal, offers his victim a choice. He may either give up his purse and live, or refuse and die. In Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, the victim had a choice either to pay a fine or take the consequences of a refusal. And so the member of a labor union has the choice either to pay the fine or leave the union. Is it difficult to realize what that choice is in these days of organized labor? Is it too much to say that many times it is very difficult, indeed practically impossible, for a workman to get bread for himself and his family by working at his trade unless he is a member of a union? It is true he has a choice between paying his fine and not paying it, but is it not frequently a hard one? May not the coercion upon him sometimes be most severe and effective? Such is not a free choice. And a market filled with such men is not a reasonably free market. In this connection the language of Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 42 Atl. 607, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746, seems significant and appropriate: "The law cannot be compelled by any initial agreement of an associate member to treat him as one having no choice but that of the majority, nor as a willing participant in whatever action may be taken. The voluntary acceptance of by-laws providing for the imposition of coercive fines does not make them legal and collectible. * * * The fact that the relations and processes deemed essential to a recovery are brought within the membership and proceedings of an organized body cannot change the result. The law sees in the member of an association of this character both the authors of its coercive system and the victims of this unlawful pressure. If this were not so, men could deprive their fellows of established rights, and evade the duty of compensation simply by working through an association."

If it be said that without fines the same result may be indirectly reached by the organization by exercising two rights, namely the right to expel a member and the right to charge an initiation fee upon his return, and since the same result may thus be legitimately reached, nobody is harmed if it be reached by fine, the reply is that if the purpose of expulsion and the subsequent initiation fee be each a part of one and the same transaction, namely, the imposition of a fine, and the two acts are in substance the procedure by which the intimidation by fine is exercised, and such is the intention, then there may be a strong reason for holding that such a procedure is one imposing a fine and should be treated as such. Ordinarily, however, each separate act should be treated by itself and its validity judged by itself. The fact that separately and independently executed they incidentally may have the effect of a fine is immaterial on the question of the right to fine. The fact that a result may be incidentally reached in one way does not show that the same result may be lawfully reached in another way.

In considering this question we cannot lose sight of the great power of organization. It should be taken into account when one is considering where the line should be drawn between the right of the employer to a free market and the right of workmen to interfere with that market by coercion through the rules of a labor union. It is not universally true that what one man may do any number of men by concerted action may do. In Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638, Loring, J., after alluding to the great increase of power by combination, says: "The result of this greater power of coercion on the part of a combination of individuals is that what is lawful for an individual is not the test of what is lawful for a combination of individuals, or to state it in another way, there are things which it is lawful for an individual to do which it is not lawful for a combination of individuals to do."

This organization of labor to better the condition of the laborer is natural and proper. There can be no doubt that it is the most effective way, perhaps the only effective way, in which as against the organization of capital the rights of the laborer can be adequately protected. In many ways the labor unions have succeeded in bettering the condition of the laborer; and so far as their ultimate intentions and the means used in accomplishing them are legal they are entitled to protection to the extreme limit of the law.

But their powers must not be so far extended as to encroach upon the rights of others. It is clear that if the power to intimidate by fine be regarded as one of the powers which labor unions may rightfully exercise, then the right to a free market for labor—nay, even the right of the laborer to be free—is seriously interfered with, to the injury both of the public and the employer as well as the laborer.

In Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255, 69 N. E. 1085, 64 L. R. A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341, it was said: "The right of competition rests upon the doctrine that the interests of the public are best subserved by permitting the general and natural laws of business to have their full and free operation, and that this end is best attained when the trader is allowed in his business to make free use of those laws." So of competition in labor; and so of competition between the employer and employé. The contest between them is only competition on a wide basis. As was said by Knowlton, C. J., in Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 358, 74 N. E. 603, 605, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 3 Ann. Cas. 738, "In a broad sense the contending forces may be called competitors." If the contest be carried on under the rules which regulate the law of supply and demand, leaving those engaged on either side to act under the general and natural laws of business, free from artificial coercion or intimidation as the words are ordinarily understood in this connection, then neither party has the right to complain; but if the coercion or intimidation by threats of a direct personal loss, due not to causes arising out of the situation or logical to the situation, but to a cause having no natural relation to the situation and entirely inconsistent with the basic principle of freedom of action under the natural laws of business, then there is cause for the complaint. Such a method of coercion must be declared illegal, as in violation of the right of the public and all concerned to a reasonably free labor market, that is, a market where all may act under this basic principle of freedom.

In view of these considerations and of others more fully set forth, in Martell v. White, which are not here repeated, and in Boutwell v. Marr, ubi supra, a majority of the court are of opinion that the overwhelming sense of the thing is that the principle that the right of the employer is not subject to coercion or intimidation by injury or threats of injury to the persons or property of laborers standing in the market to meet him, should apply to the coercion and intimidation exerted by labor unions upon their members by fines or threats of fines. Any other conclusion is inconsistent with the existence of a reasonably free labor market to which both the employer and the employé are entitled.

Our attention has not been called to any case, nor are we aware of any, in which the precise point here involved has been discussed, which is inconsistent with the conclusion which we have reached. We are not aware of any case in which it has been adjudged that where a third party has a right to insist that those with whom he deals shall be free from coercion the rule does not apply to coercive acts by way of fines or threats of fines, imposed or to be imposed, by a voluntary association upon its members in accordance with its by-laws. The case of Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499, was explained in Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 57 N. E. 1011, 51 L. R. A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330. Neither in that case nor in Pickett v. Walsh, supra, was there any evidence of coercion by fines. And the same may be said of Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 15 Q. B. D. 476, 21 Q. B. D. 544, 23 Q. B. D. 598, [1892] A. C. 25. In that case there was simply a withdrawal of trade advantages under certain conditions. The defendants had two prices—one price for one class of customers, and a different one for another class. There was nothing in the nature of an arbitrary fine. As stated by Fry, L. J., in the case as reported in 23 Q. B. D. 598, 622: "Competition was in substance the only weapon which the defendants intended to use against their rivals in trade. No thought of using violence, molestation, intimidation, fraud, or misrepresentation was entertained by the defendants." See, also, in same case the language of Coleridge, C. J., 21 Q. B. D. 544, 552, and that of Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, [1892] A. C., on p. 36, as follows: "After a most careful survey of the evidence in this case, I have been unable to discover anything done by the members of the associated body of traders other than an offer of reduced freights to persons who would deal exclusively with them"—and that of Lord Watson, on page 43 of the same volume. * * *

The result is that in the opinion of a majority of the court there should be a decree restraining and enjoining the defendants, their agents and servants from intimidating by the imposition of a fine, or by a threat of such fine, any person or persons from entering into the employ of the plaintiff or remaining therein, or from in any way being a party or privy to the imposition of any fine or threat of such imposition upon any person desiring to enter into or remain in the employ of the plaintiff; and it is

So ordered.[66]

GIBLAN v. NATIONAL AMALGAMATED LABOURERS' UNION OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

(Court of Appeal. [1903] 2 K. B. 600.)

The action was brought by James Giblan, a labourer, residing at Newport, Mon., against the National Amalgamated Labourers' Union of Great Britain and Ireland, Harry W. Williams, its general secretary, and John Toomey, its local secretary at Newport, claiming damages for loss of wages; also an injunction to restrain the defendants respectively, or their agents or coadjutors, (a) from interfering in any manner howsoever with any person or persons, company or corporation, with a view to causing such person or persons, company or corporation, to break his or their contract or contracts with the plaintiff, or to cease to employ him, or to abstain from entering into contracts with him; (b) from preventing, or attempting to prevent, any person or persons from working with the plaintiff; and (c) from otherwise molesting or interfering in any manner with the plaintiff in follow-be treated as instituted and carried on for the lawful purpose of obtaining higher wages and shorter periods of labor," and the method employed was neither forbidden by any rule of law or "inconsistent with some rule of public policy. * * * What seems to us the fallacy of the majority opinion is its failure to act upon the fact that the strike in this case was upon justifiable grounds, and of course was lawful. It follows that the action of each member of the union in trying to maintain the strike, without force, or wrongful coercion or intimidation exercised upon any one, was justifiable and lawful. It was not an interference with the rights of the plaintiff, because, as we have seen, the right of an employer to conduct his business without interference in the labor market is subordinate to the right of his employés to strike and to maintain the strike in a lawful manner. As against this right of the employés the employer has no right to have their labor flow to him uninfluenced or undiverted."

But compare the remark of Professor Jeremiah Smith in 20 Harv. Law Rev. 355 (1907): "Assuming that a combination, in its intrinsic nature, is not necessarily unlawful, and assuming also that the obvious aiming at monopoly by labor combinations does not make them unlawful, still such combinations may use special methods which are unlawful. Two methods deserve particular consideration here: The expulsion of members and the imposition of fines. * * * Suppose that is one of the articles of agreement that disobedient members may be heavily fined; and that thereafter the majority use the threat of imposing a heavy fine in order to induce a minority member to join in action damaging to a third person. Is this, as against the third person, an unlawful method of inducement?"

It has been held unlawful in Vermont and Massachusetts. Boutwell v. Marr (1899) 71 Vt. 1, 42 Atl. 607, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746, and Martell v. White (1904) 185 Mass. 255, 69 N. E. 1085, 64 L. R. A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341. And this result seems correct. The initial agreement of the member does not make the imposition of the fine a lawful method of coercion. "* * * When the will of the majority of an organized body, in matters involving the rights of outside parties, is enforced upon its members by means of fines and penalties, the situation is essentially the same as when unity of action is secured among unorganized individuals by threats or intimidation." Munson, J., in Boutwell v. Marr (1899) 71 Vt. 1, 8, 42 Atl. 607, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746.

ing his calling. The facts leading to the commencement of the action were as follows:

In 1891 the plaintiff, who was at the time a riveter employed in the business of repairing ships, became a member of the defendant union. He lived at Newport, Mon., where there was a branch of the union, and ultimately he became treasurer of that branch, holding that office in 1896 and 1897. In 1899 some difficulties arose with reference to his accounts; and it was alleged that he had retained a sum in hand of about £38, which should have been handed over to the society. He was seen by the general secretary, the defendant Williams, in reference to the matter, and on September 28, 1899, an agreement was signed by which he admitted his indebtedness to the society in a sum of £36. 9s. 2d., and agreed to pay this by £10 on October 9, 1899, and £1 a month until the whole debt was liquidated. As he failed to carry out this agreement an action was brought against him in the county court, at the instance of the union, in December, 1899, when judgment was obtained against him for the amount of the arrears payable under the agreement, which at that time amounted to about £11. By the judgment he was ordered to pay £5 forthwith, and the balance of the amount by installments of £1 per month. Shortly afterwards he paid £4, but after making that payment he failed to make any further payments under the judgment or the agreement.

On February 5, 1900, whilst the plaintiff was engaged at work at the Prince of Wales Dry Dock at Swansea, the defendant Williams went to the foreman and gave him notice that unless the plaintiff was dismissed the other union men who were employed there would be called out on strike. In consequence of that the plaintiff's employers discharged him, and for some two or three weeks he was out of employment. After that, however, he again obtained employment, and was in full work until nearly the close of the year 1900. Meanwhile, he had made no payments in respect of the amount he owed the union, and in June, 1900, a judgment summons was issued against him at the instance of the union in the county court, claiming that £11 was due from him. This proved to be an error, and the summons was dismissed with costs. This fact, according to the plaintiff's case, irritated the officials and members of the union, and determined them, by the course they subsequently took, to punish him by preventing him from obtaining employment or from continuing to work if he happened to obtain a job. He was still a member of the union, and had duly paid his contributions as such. In August, 1900, his position in relation to the union, and his indebtedness to that body, came up for consideration at the annual general meeting of the union, which took place on August 6, 7, and 8, at the town hall, Newport, when a resolution for his expulsion was passed, which was embodied in the following minutes: "The general secretary explained what he had done in this matter, and the position at present. He said that Giblan seemed determined not to pay back to the society his defalcations, but was putting it to all the trouble and expense he could. After the whole of the facts had been stated, it was moved by brothers J. Burns and Kenny, 'That after hearing the general secretary's statement re Giblan's actions, and the amount of his defalcations, he shall be expelled from this union and shall only be allowed to rejoin by paying to the society such moneys as are due, being defalcations when treasurer of Newport No. 4 branch. The terms of payment to be arranged with the general secretary on the basis of this resolution.'"

The plaintiff having thus been expelled from the union, the defendant Williams, on August 11, 1900, wrote to the then treasurer of the Newport branch, informing him of the resolution, and requesting him to post by registered letter to the plaintiff a notice of his expulsion, also requesting him to consider the plaintiff a non-member, and so to inform the members of that and other branches, and to post up in the club-room a notification that he was not a member, and that he must be treated by the members as a non-unionist until further orders. Notice of expulsion was accordingly sent to the plaintiff. At a district joint committee meeting held at Newport on October 13, 1900, several union men were fined for working with the plaintiff as being an expelled member.

On December 29, 1900, the plaintiff was in employment at Newport, when the defendant Toomey, the union's local secretary there, went to his employer and gave him notice that unless the plaintiff was discharged other men in the employment would be called out by the union; and Toomey also gave notice to the other men, being members of the union, that if they worked with the plaintiff they would be called out. Consequently the plaintiff was discharged. In a similar way, on four subsequent occasions, at Newport, Sharpness, and Swansea, the last occasion being on April 19, 1901, once through the intervention of the defendant Williams, and thrice through that of the defendant Toomey, the plaintiff was prevented from retaining employment, in each case notice being given to the union men in the employment that if they worked with the plaintiff they would be called out. It appeared that another ground for those proceedings against the plaintiff was that he, a non-unionist, was obtaining employment when union men were out of work.

The action was tried at Cardiff before Walton, J., with a jury, when after hearing a considerable amount of evidence the learned judge left the following questions to the jury:

(1) Did the defendants Williams and Toomey, acting together or individually, call out the union men or threaten to call them out unless the plaintiff was stopped? (2) If they or either of them did, did they or he by so doing prevent, or endeavour to prevent, the plaintiff from getting employment or retaining his employment? (3) Was this done in order to compel the plaintiff to pay the arrears of his defalcations? (4) Was it done in order to punish the plaintiff for not paying such arrears? The following alternative questions were also submitted to the jury in the event of their answering the above questions in the affirmative: (5) Was what the defendants Williams and Toomey, or either of them, did only to warn the employers that the union men would leave in consequence of union workmen being unwilling to work with the plaintiff? (6) Was this done in consequence of the union men objecting to work with the plaintiff? (7) What damages, if any? The jury answered the first three questions in the affirmative, and the fourth also as regarded Williams, but in the negative as regarded Toomey. Their replies to the alternative questions were in the negative, and they assessed the damages at £100.

The result was that Walton, J., came to the conclusion that the defendant Williams was individually liable to the plaintiff for the acts complained of, but he gave judgment for the other defendants, the union and Toomey. The plaintiff appealed against so much of the judgment as refused the relief he claimed by his action. The defendant Williams did not appeal from the judgment against him.[67]

Romer, L. J. What are the facts of this case as stated by Walton, J., and found by the jury? In effect they are that the defendants Williams and Toomey, as officers of the defendant union, had, by virtue of their position, control over the men of the union, and consequently power to influence employers by calling out or threatening to call out the men unless the demands of the defendants Williams and Toomey were complied with; and accordingly that the defendants combined to prevent, and did prevent, the plaintiff from getting or retaining employment by calling out or threatening to call out the men; and, further, that this caused damage to the plaintiff to the extent of £100, and the jury negatived the suggestion that what the defendants did, first, was only to warn the employers that the men would leave in consequence of the men objecting to work with the plaintiff; and, secondly, was done in fact in consequence of the men objecting to work with the plaintiff. Lastly, it is found that the defendants acted as they did in order to compel the plaintiff to pay the arrears of some moneys due from him to the union.

The question then is whether, on these facts, the defendant Toomey ought not to have been held liable to the plaintiff, as well as the defendant Williams who was also found to have been actuated by a desire to punish the plaintiff for not paying the arrears. Now, since the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, I take it to be clear, even if it had not been clear before, that a combination of two or more persons, without justification, to injure a workman by inducing employers not to employ him or continue to employ him, is, if it results in damage to him, actionable. But although I think there is no difficulty in stating the law, I fully realize that considerable difficulty may often arise in particular cases in ascertaining what is a "justification" within the meaning of my statement. As to this, I can only say that regard must be had to the circumstances of each case as it arises, and that it is not practically feasible to give an exhaustive definition of the word to cover all cases; and I would refer to what I have already said on a similar point in the judgment I have just delivered in the case of the Glamorgan Coal Co. v. South Wales Miners' Federation, [1903] 2 K. B. 545. I will only add that I do not think any excessive practical difficulty would arise in directing a jury on the point in any particular case; and I may refer as illustrating this, to the direction given to the jury by FitzGibbons, L. J., in the case of Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. at p. 500. In the case now before us I cannot say that I feel any difficulty in applying the law as regards the defendant Toomey. For, on the facts, I have simply to determine whether two or more persons, who by virtue of their position have special power to carry out their design, are justified in combining to prevent, and in fact preventing, a workman from obtaining any employment in his trade or calling, to his injury, merely because they wish to compel him to pay a debt due from him. In my opinion they are not justified; and consequently the defendants Toomey and Williams are, in my opinion, liable to the plaintiff for the damage suffered by him through the conduct of the defendants.

I may point out, with reference to some observations made in the course of the argument, that this is not a case where the defendants, knowing of the plaintiff's defalcations, thought it their duty to warn employers as to the plaintiff's character, or where the plaintiff's fellow-workmen, by reason of that character, declined to work with him. The findings of the jury negative any such case. And, further, I desire to add, with reference to an argument addressed to us on behalf of the defendants, that the intent on the part of the defendants Williams and Toomey to injure the plaintiff appears from the findings of the jury. The intent of the defendants was to prevent the plaintiff's obtaining or retaining employment, in order to compel him to pay a debt due from him; and from this the intent to injure the plaintiff appears to me to follow.

But I should be sorry to leave this case without observing that, in my opinion, it was not essential, in order for the plaintiff to succeed, that he should establish a combination of two or more persons to do the acts complained of. In my judgment, if a person who, by virtue of his position or influence, has power to carry out his design, sets himself to the task of preventing, and succeeds in preventing, a man from obtaining or holding employment in his calling, to his injury, by reason of threats to or special influence upon the man's employers, or would be employers, and the design was to carry out some spite against the man, or had for its object the compelling him to pay a debt, or any similar object not justifying the acts against the man, then that person is liable to the man for the damage consequently suffered. The conduct of that person would be, in my opinion, such an unjustifiable molestation of the man, such an improper and inexcusable interference with the man's ordinary rights of citizenship, as to make that person liable in an action. And I think this view is borne out by the views expressed by the members of the House of Lords who decided the case of Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495.[68]

The remaining question is as to the liability of the defendant union. That depends upon whether, if the acts complained of had been done by the executive committee, the union would have been liable. I have come to the conclusion that the union would have been liable on the principle stated in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, L. R. 2 Ex. 259,—that the acts were done in the service and for the benefit of the union.

STIRLING, L. J. The findings of the jury in this case, even when taken most favourably for the defendants, appear to amount to this—that the defendants Williams and Toomey, acting together, prevented or endeavoured to prevent the plaintiff from being employed, by threatening his employers that the union men would be called out on strike unless they dismissed him (which those employers could do without breach of any contract between them and the plaintiff), and that Williams and Toomey so acted with the object of compelling the plaintiff to pay the arrears of his defalcations as a former officer of the union.

I shall first consider the case as against the defendant Toomey, which appears to turn on the question whether he and his codefendant Williams have been engaged in an unlawful conspiracy.

In the case of Mulcahy v. Reg. (1868) L. R. 3 H. L. 306, 317, Willes, J. (advising the House of Lords), defined a conspiracy as consisting in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means.[69]

In this case I assume that the defendants agreed to do what they did for a lawful object, namely, to obtain payment from the plaintiff of what he owed to the trade union. It must then be made out that they sought to do so by unlawful means. It was contended in argument that unlawful means must be such as would be wrongful if committed by a single individual: I cannot agree. In Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor (1889) 23 Q. B. D. 598, 616, Bowen, L. J., states the law thus: "Of the general proposition, that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several, there can be no doubt. The distinction is based on sound reason, for a combination may make oppressive or dangerous that which if it proceeded only from a single person would be otherwise, and the very fact of the combination may shew that the object is simply to do harm and not to exercise one's own just rights. In the application of this undoubted principle it is necessary to be very careful not to press the doctrine of illegal conspiracy beyond that which is necessary for the protection of individuals or of the public; and it may be observed in passing that as a rule it is the damage wrongfully done, and not the conspiracy, that is the gist of actions on the case for conspiracy." This view of the law has been recognized in the House of Lords in the same case on appeal, [1892] A. C. 25, and also in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, particularly by Lord Macnaghten, at pp. 510, 511, by Lord Brampton, at pp. 529–531, and by Lord Lindley, at p. 538. Lord Brampton further says, at pp. 528, 529; "The essential elements, whether of a criminal or of an actionable conspiracy, are, in my opinion, the same, though to sustain an action special damage must be proved." This agrees with what is laid down by Bowen, L. J., in the last sentence cited above, and is supported by the case of Barber v. Lesiter (1860) 7 C. B. (N. S.) 175, to which Lord Brampton refers. In the present case damage has been found by the jury.

The question then arises whether the preventing the plaintiff from obtaining employment, by threats of calling out the union men unless he was dismissed, is an unlawful act on the part of Toomey and Williams acting in combination; and in considering this question there must be borne in mind the observation of Bowen, L. J., just quoted, as to the necessity of using great care not to extend too far the doctrine of illegal conspiracy. In the Mogul Case, [1892] A. C. 25, it was decided that acts done by traders in the exercise of their right to carry on a legal business were not illegal, although highly detrimental to another trader engaged in a similar and competing business. Fry, L. J., puts the matter thus, 23 Q. B. D. 625: "The right of the plaintiffs to trade is not an absolute but a qualified right—a right conditioned by the like right in the defendants and all Her Majesty's subjects, and a right therefore to trade subject to competition." So also every workman is entitled to dispose of his labour on his own terms; but that right is conditioned by the right of every other workman to do the like. In particular, each employee is, as I think, at liberty to decide for himself whether he will or will not work along with another individual in the same employ; and if all the workmen but one determine that they will not continue their labour in company with that one, they may inform their employer of their decision. On this I refer to what was said in Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, by Lord Watson, at pp. 98–9, and Lord Davey, at p. 173. Those who desire to exercise such a right must indeed proceed with care, for the law forbids in this connection various classes of acts. I think, however, that it is unnecessary on this occasion to discuss this part of the subject, for the fifth and sixth findings of the jury appear to me to negative any suggestion that the acts of Williams and Toomey were done on behalf of the fellow-labourers of the plaintiff, or in exercise of any right of theirs to withdraw themselves from an employment in which he took part. These acts were directed to inflict harm on the plaintiff by preventing him from obtaining or retaining employment, and consequently from earning his livelihood in the only way in which he could do so. By their acts they, Williams and Toomey, caused him as serious an injury as can well be done to a working man; and that injury resulted in damage. They did those acts from time to time, as the plaintiff succeeded in obtaining employment, by going to his employer and threatening that they would resort to the powers which were, or were believed to be, vested in them as officers of a trade union, and which involved a resort to the power of numbers in a way which might and probably would cause detriment to the employer. It may, in my opinion, be fairly inferred from the evidence that this course of conduct was intended to be continued until the plaintiff made terms satisfactory to the trade union. Such acts, so persisted in, seem to me to be in the nature of molestation or coercion; and although they do not involve recourse to physical force, I am far from satisfied that they are not such as to be illegal even if done by a single individual. Fry, L. J., in the same judgment in the Mogul Case, says: "I do not doubt that it is unlawful and actionable for one man to interfere with another's trade by fraud or misrepresentation, or by molesting his customers, or those who would be his customers, whether by physical obstruction or moral intimidation." It is unnecessary, however, to decide this point, for these acts which inflicted injury on the plaintiff, resulting in damage, were done by two persons in combination, and amounted to an interference with the plaintiff's rights no less serious than that which was the subject of the action of Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick (1843–44) 6 Man. & G. 205, 953, a case which has been treated as an authority in the House of Lords in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. at p. 503. It was there held that a conspiracy to hiss an actor off the stage, and so injure him in his trade or calling, was illegal, and that acts done in pursuance of such a conspiracy were not excused by shewing that the actor was an unfit person to appear before the public. So here, the acts of the defendants Williams and Toomey were not excused, in my opinion, by the fact that the plaintiff had been guilty of defalcations and owed a considerable sum to the trade union. I do not in the least extenuate the wrongs suffered by the trade union at the hands of the plaintiff: I think he behaved badly and the trade union shewed him great forbearance: still, even a criminal ought not to be persecuted but to be punished according to law. If the plaintiff was guilty of a criminal offence he might and ought to have been prosecuted, in which case the appropriate punishment would have been meted out to him by a legal tribunal. If he failed to pay a just debt, the law provides ample means for enforcing payment of it. In certain cases, though not universally, the non-payment of a debt is punishable by imprisonment. The plaintiff might possibly have been punished in this way: an attempt to punish him was made and was defeated on technical grounds only; but, so far as I can see, the attempt might have been repeated with a fair prospect of success. This was not done, but Williams and Toomey adopted the course which has resulted in the present action. If the existence of the default or debt were admitted as a valid excuse for depriving a defaulter or debtor of his employment, a punishment might be inflicted on him far greater than that which is allowed by law.

[69] On conspiracy as a substantive wrong, see also Pollock on Torts (9th Ed.) 328; Salmond on Torts (3d Ed.) 471; Burdick on Torts (3d Ed.) 325; 27 Halsbury's Laws of England, 655–658.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the defendants Williams and Toomey were guilty of a tort in respect of which they are liable to the plaintiff in this action; and I pass on to consider whether the defendants, the trade union, are also liable. * * *[70]

Appeal allowed.[71]

GLAMORGAN COAL CO., Limited, et al. v. SOUTH WALES MINERS' FEDERATION et al.

(King's Bench Division. [1903] 1 K. B. 118. Court of Appeal. [1903] 2 K. B. 545.)

This action was brought by the Glamorgan Coal Company, Limited, and seventy-three other plaintiffs against the South Wales Miners' Federation, its trustees, its officers, and a number of the members of its executive council, to recover damages for wrongfully and maliciously procuring and inducing the workmen in the plaintiffs' collieries to break their contracts of service with the plaintiffs. In the alternative, the plaintiffs also sue the defendants for wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously conspiring together to do the acts complained of. The conspiracy count is put this way: The defendant federation, by its agents, its executive council, and the other defendants (naming them), well knowing the terms and conditions of the contracts of service with the workmen, wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously conspired together to do the acts complained of, that is, to procure the workmen to break their contracts of service by taking holidays, called stop-days. The plaintiffs claim both damages and an injunction.

The defendants, after denying the material allegations in the statement of claim, alleged in substance that the acts complained of, if done at all, were done with reasonable justification and excuse.

In his written judgment in the Divisional Court Bigham, J., made a finding of facts, in which the following, among other facts, appear:

The plaintiffs are seventy-four limited liability companies associated together for the protection of their own interests under the style of the Monmouthshire and South Wales Coal Owners' Association. They work upwards of 200 collieries in the South Wales district, and in these collieries they employ about 100,000 men. For the last twenty or twenty-five years the masters and the men in the South Wales colliery district have worked together under an agreement, called the sliding scale agreement, by which the rate of wages paid to the men is made to depend on the price for the time being of a certain agreed class of coal—that is to say, as the price of that coal rises or falls so the rate of wages moves up or down. It is thus to the interest, not only of the masters, but also of the men, to keep up the price of coal, but, at the same time, not to drive it up to such a point as will unduly interfere with the demand. Against the producers of coal there are always arrayed a number of coal dealers, known as merchants or middlemen, who buy coal to be shipped to foreign ports, or for resale in the South Wales market. The interest of these men is, of course, to keep down prices, so that they may buy as cheaply as possible. They frequently sell large quantities of coal for forward delivery at prices below those current for immediate delivery, trusting to supply themselves later on by purchases from one or other of the many collieries at prices which will make their bargains remunerative. This has the effect of depressing the market, and on more than one occasion, and particularly in the years 1896 and 1897, the masters and men have tried together to devise some scheme to so regulate the output of the mines, by means of stop-days or otherwise, as to counteract this effect. There has, however, always been a difficulty in getting a sufficient number of the colliery proprietors to fall in with any scheme having for its object the restriction of output, and thus nothing has been done. On April 1, 1898, a strike broke out in the South Wales district, and the collieries were closed from that date to August 31. On September 1 work was resumed throughout the district. At the collieries of forty-seven of the plaintiff companies it was resumed under an agreement which embodied the old sliding scale. By this agreement it was provided that a joint committee of masters and men should be formed, which should be called the joint sliding scale committee; and that it should be comprised of twelve masters, representing the forty-seven firms, and of twelve men elected by the colliers in the employment of those firms. Each half of this committee was to have its own secretary, elected from its own twelve members, and it was contemplated that each half might from time to time meet separately to discuss matters affecting its own interests. One of the principal objects of the joint committee was to ascertain, by audits of the sales of the forty-seven firms, the average price of coal, for the purpose of regulating wages thereby. The agreement contained many other provisions in addition to the provision for the formation of the joint committee, but it is only necessary to refer to one of them—clause 23 of the embodied sliding scale agreement, which is as follows: 'It is hereby agreed that all notices to terminate contracts on the part of the employers, as well as employed, shall be given only on the first day of any calendar month, and to terminate on the last day of the same month.' Although only forty-seven of the plaintiffs were parties to that agreement and were alone to be represented on the joint sliding scale committee, the men employed by the other twenty-seven plaintiffs went back to work on the same terms, both as to wages and notice, as those contained in the agreement. On October 11, 1898, the defendant federation was formed, and practically all the miners in the South Wales district became members of it. They number about 128,000, and they include all, or very nearly all, the men who work for the plaintiffs.

The federation prospered greatly so that by the end of 1900 it found itself in the possession of funds amounting to £100,000. The price of coals also rose, and with it the rate of wages. But in October or November, 1900, the council of the federation seemed to have felt some apprehension that this prosperity was being threatened by the merchant and the middleman. It is at this season of the year that foreign governments and others make their contracts for forward delivery of coal, and the prices at which these contracts were being effected alarmed the council, and foreshadowed a fall in prices.

To guard against this, and in the honest belief that the danger was real, the council of the federation passed a resolution ordering a stop-day for Friday, November 9. A further resolution was passed that a general conference of the federation should be convened for November 12. In the meanwhile the following manifesto was ordered to be circulated: "Fellow Workmen—Your council, having seriously considered the present condition of the coal trade, are strongly of opinion that an organized attempt is being made to unduly interfere with trade and prices to such an extent as will prejudice the interest of the members of the federation. With a view of preventing the industry being exploited by merchants and middlemen, we have unanimously resolved that a general holiday be taken throughout the coal field by all colliery workmen on Friday next, November 9, 1900. We also request you upon that day to hold general meetings for the purpose of appointing delegates to attend a conference at the Cory Memorial Hall on Monday next, November 12, 1900, to consider and determine our future policy, as embodied in the following resolution: That the conference hereby authorizes the council to declare a general holiday at any time they think it necessary for the protection of our wages and the industry generally. W. Abraham." This manifesto had the desired effect, and on November 9 all the colliers in the coal field, including the men working in the plaintiffs' collieries, stopped work. No notice of any kind was served on the masters, and they knew nothing of the matter until they saw a report of Mr. Abraham's speech in the newspapers of November 6. This stoppage on November 9 is the first matter of which the plaintiffs complain in this action. On November 12, 1900, the conference which had been convened for that day was held, and at it a resolution was passed authorizing the council of the federation to declare a general holiday at any time they might think it necessary for the protection of wages and of the industry generally.

In ordering the stop-day on November 9, the federation acted as they thought in the best interest of the men, and without any intention, malicious or otherwise, of injuring the plaintiffs. About three weeks after this stop-day, the associated owners met, and, after negativing the expediency of prosecuting the men, resolved as follows: "That the owners' side of the sliding scale committee point out to the workmen's representatives that a resolution has been passed by the association, that, if the men make any future illegal stoppage, the owners will take proceedings against the men."

On October 23, 1901, the federation published the following signed manifesto: "To the workmen employed at the South Wales and Monmouthshire Collieries. It having come to the knowledge of your representatives upon the sliding scale committee that large contracts have already been made at considerably lower prices than the average price declared by the last sliding scale audit, and fearing the result of those contracts upon annual and other contracts about to be made, which must of necessity mean a heavy reduction in wages, it was unanimously resolved that the workmen shall observe as general holidays Friday and Saturday next." Telegrams were then sent to all the collieries in South Wales, notifying the fact that the stop-days had been declared. Subsequently two other stop-days were ordered by the federation, one for October 31 and one for November 6.

The result of all this was that the men stayed away from work on the four days, and so broke their contracts with the masters.

In concluding his finding of facts, Bigham, J., remarked as follows:

"There was no quarrel at all between the masters and the men, and, so far as I can see, no ill will. The men objected to the course of business adopted by the middlemen, and in this objection some, at least, of the masters seem to have shared. The evidence satisfies me that the action of the federation, and of the other defendants in 1901, was dictated by an honest desire to forward the interest of the workmen, and was not, in any sense, prompted by a wish to injure the masters. Neither the federation nor the other defendants had any prospect of personal gain from the operation of the stop-days. Having been requested by the men, by the resolution of November 12, 1900, to advise and direct them as to when to stop work, the federation and the other defendants, who were its officers, in my opinion, did to the best of their ability advise and direct the men. Whether they advised them wisely I cannot say, though I am inclined to think not. But I am satisfied that they advised them honestly and without malice of any kind against the plaintiffs.

"I have to decide, in these circumstances, whether an action in tort will lie against the defendants. The advice and guidance of the defendants was solicited and given. If followed, it involved, as the defendants knew, the breaking of the subsisting contracts. It was followed, as the defendants wished it should be; and damage resulted to the masters; but there was no malicious intention to cause injury, no profit was gained for themselves by the defendants, and their sole object was to benefit the men, whom they were advising and directing."

On these facts the judgment in the Divisional Court was for the defendants on both branches of the plaintiffs' claim. The plaintiffs appealed.

[In the Court of Appeal]

The following judgments were read:

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L. J. * * * This decision of Bigham, J., does not, of course, involve any such proposition as that the workmen have a right to break the contracts entered into by them respectively because each one of them may think honestly that it is either for his individual advantage, or for the advantage of the workmen collectively, that the contracts should be broken. Each workman will, of course, be liable to be sued for his own breach of contract. The question is whether an action will lie for procuring a breach of contract or for conspiracy. Taken in its simplest form, the question would be whether, if a hundred men in the same employ agreed that they would each of them with the same object break their respective contracts on a given day, an action would lie, either against each of them for procuring breaches of contract by the others, or against the hundred collectively for conspiracy, or whether it could be said that there was anything in the relation of the men one to another which negatived an action in the form of an action for procuring a breach of contract, or an action for conspiracy, in a case in which that which was agreed to be done, or to do which the combination was formed, was undoubtedly a wrongful act, for which each one could be sued for breach of his own personal contract. It seems to me that if these prima facie causes of action, arising for procuring a breach of contract or combining to procure it, do not lie, it must be either on the ground that community of interest excludes a procuring each of the other connected by community of interest, or because the relation of the parties, whoever they are, raises a duty to counsel one another and to arrange for concerted action. Some such proposition would cover the instances suggested by the learned judge and by counsel in argument, such as a brother advising a sister, or a parent a child, or a doctor a patient, or a solicitor a client, but the principle is the same in each case, and the question must be the same in each case. Is the relation such as to raise the duty? In each of those cases the person breaking the contract is not the agent of the person giving the advice, however influential the adviser may be. The action for procuring a breach of contract is an action for wrongfully interfering in the contractual relations of other persons. The effect, if any, of the duty or right arising from the relation is only that it negatives the prima facie presumption of malice which the law supposes from interference with the contractual rights between the parties to a contract of which the interferer has notice; and the defendant can always rebut the prima facie presumption thus arising by the proof of circumstances raising a duty to advise; but the plaintiff on his part can neutralize this by proof of express malice. In no other sense is it true to say that, in an action for procuring a breach of contract, it is necessary to prove malice or motive, or anything more than mere notice of the contract. I think that similar observations arise on conspiracy; for, prima facie, a combination to interfere with the civil rights of another, whether it be his right to full freedom in disposal of his own labor or his own capital or any other right of citizenship, is an unlawful combination, because such interference, if carried into effect, is an actionable wrong, and it is this fact, and not any mere malicious motive, which constitutes the combination a conspiracy. This prima facie wrongful interference may be negatived by showing that the exercise of the defendants' own rights involved the interference complained of, which interference is merely the exercise of the right of a man to interfere in a matter in which he is jointly interested with others, and such interference gives no cause of action. In such a case there will be intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, but just cause for it, as being done for the maintenance of the equal civil rights of the defendants. * * *

But whatever may be the identity of the federation and the men, it seems impossible in any action for breach of contract merely, and nothing else, brought against the federation, as the collective forensic name of the men, to sign a judgment against the federation, because the federation are not parties to the contract which has been broken. It follows that, if the federation is liable at all, it must be either in an action for procuring breaches of contract or conspiracy, and in either form of action there is a prima facie case against the federation, and the federation, being a separate entity from the men, must shew some sufficient justification for their interference. The federation and the members of their council who are defendants seek to base this justification on the suggestion that their relation to the men raises a duty on their part to advise the men, or, at all events, negatives their being mere meddlers. It was argued before us that the defendants were not mere advisers, but that they were actors who did the very thing complained of, in that they issued the notices ordering the stop-days, and compelled reluctant men to break their contracts by staying away from work without giving proper notices to their employers, and that the view of the federation was that men who refused to stay away would be guilty of disloyalty to the federation; but this argument does not convince me that the federation were not acting as advisers, nor does the fact that the federation actually issued the notices deprive the defendants of their character of advisers. It is not suggested in this case that the men stayed away from work under threats, intimidation, or physical compulsion. I think, therefore, the judgment of Bigham, J., must be affirmed for the reasons given by him. * * *

Romer, L. J. The law applicable to this case is, I think, well settled. I need only refer to two passages in which that law is shortly and comprehensively stated. In Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, at p. 510, Lord Macnaghten said: "A violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law if there be no sufficient justification for the interference." And in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co., 23 Q. B. D. 598, at p. 614, Bowen, L. J., included in what is forbidden "the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it." But although, in my judgment, there is no doubt as to the law, yet I fully recognize that considerable difficulties may arise in applying it to the circumstances of any particular case. When a person has knowingly procured another to break his contract, it may be difficult under the circumstances to say whether or not there was "sufficient justification or just cause" for his act. I think it would be extremely difficult, even if it were possible, to give a complete and satisfactory definition of what is "sufficient justification," and most attempts to do so would probably be mischievous. I certainly shall not make the attempt. * * * But, though I deprecate the attempt to define justification, I think it right to express my opinion on certain points in connection with breaches of contract procured where the contract is one of master and servant. In my opinion, a defendant sued for knowingly procuring such a breach is not justified of necessity merely by his showing that he had no personal animus against the employer, or that it was to the advantage or interest of both the defendant and the workman that the contract should be broken. I take the following simple case to illustrate my view. If A. wants to get a specially good workman, who is under contract with B., as A. knows, and A. gets the workman to break his contract to B.'s injury by giving him higher wages, it would not, in my opinion, afford A. a defence to an action against him by B. that he could establish he had no personal animus against B., and that it was both to the interest of himself and of the workman that the contract with B. should be broken. I think that the principle involved in this simple case, taken by me by way of illustration, really governs the present case. For it is to be remembered that what A. has to justify is his action, not as between him and the workman, but as regards the employer B. And, if I proceed to apply the law I have stated to the circumstances of the present case, what do I find? On the findings of fact it is to my mind clear that the defendants, the federation, procured the men to break their contracts with the plaintiffs—so that I need not consider how the question would have stood if what the federation had done had been merely to advise the men, or if the men, after taking advice, had arranged between themselves to break their contracts, and the federation had merely notified the men's intentions to the plaintiffs. The federation did more than advise. They acted, and by their agents actually procured the men to leave their work and break their contracts. In short, it was the federation who caused the injury to the plaintiffs. This was practically admitted before us by the counsel for the federation, and, indeed, such an admission could not, in my opinion, be avoided, having regard to the facts stated by the learned judge in his judgment. And it is not disputed that the federation acted as they did knowingly. So that the only question which remains is one of justification. Now the justification urged is that it was thought, and I will assume for this purpose rightly thought, to be in the interest of the men that they should leave their work in order to keep up the price of coal, on which the amount of wages of the men depended. As to this, I can only say that to my mind the ground alleged affords no justification for the conduct of the federation towards the employers; for, as I have already pointed out, the absence on the part of the federation of any malicious intention to injure the employers in itself affords no sufficient justification. But it was said that the federation had a duty towards the men which justified them in doing what they did. For myself I cannot see that they had any duty which in any way compelled them to act, or justified them in acting, as they did towards the plaintiffs. And the fact that the men and the federation, as being interested in or acting for the benefit of the men, were both interested in keeping up prices, and so in breaking the contracts, affords in itself no sufficient justification for the action of the federation as against the plaintiffs, as I have already pointed out. I think, therefore, that the appeal must succeed.

STIRLING, L. J. The law applicable to the decision of this case is, in my judgment, as stated by Lord Macnaghten in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, at p. 510. Referring to Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216, his lordship said: "Speaking for myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I think the decision was right, not on the ground of malicious intention—that was not, I think, the gist of the action—but on the ground that a violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and that it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law if there be no sufficient justification for the interference." If it were necessary to say anything more on the subject of Lumley v. Gye, I should be content to refer to what was said by Lord Herschell in Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. at pp. 121–123, to which I can add nothing.

In my opinion, therefore, only two questions have to be considered: (1) Did the defendants interfere with the contractual relations between the plaintiffs and their workmen? (2) Was there in law sufficient justification for the interference?

As to the first question: Bigham, J., has expressly found that whatever was done in the way of interference was the act of the federation. I need not refer to specific acts beyond this—that all the men working at the South Wales and Monmouthshire Collieries were directed to observe as holidays two days, October 25 and 26, 1901, contrary to the contracts entered into by the workmen. The uncontradicted evidence of Evan Williams at the trial shows that in consequence of that direction men who otherwise would have worked on those two days did not do so. In these circumstances it seems to me to be made out that the federation wilfully and with notice of the contracts procured some men to break their contracts, and therefore knowingly brought about a violation of legal rights, which is actionable unless there is sufficient justification for what was done. That interference with contractual relations known to the law may in some cases be justified is not, in my opinion, open to doubt. For example, I think that a father who discovered that a child of his had entered into an engagement to marry a person of immoral character would not only be justified in interfering to prevent that contract from being carried into effect, but would greatly fail in his duty to his child if he did not. This duty is recognized by the courts; for the Court of Chancery and the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice have continually so interfered on behalf of wards of Court, sometimes with a heavy hand; and the principle on which the judges of those courts have acted is simply that of doing on behalf of the ward that which a right-minded father would do in the true interest of his child. I conceive that circumstances might occur which would give rise to the same duty in the case of a contract of service. I need not say that the present is a very different case from that which I have just put. It would no doubt be desirable if a general rule could be formulated which would determine in what cases such a justification exists; but no such rule has been laid down, and I doubt whether this can be done; so far as I can see it must be left (in the language of Lord Bowen) to the tribunal to analyze the circumstances of each particular case and discover whether a justification exists or not.

In the present case the learned judge finds that the federation and the other defendants "had lawful justification or excuse for what they did in this, that having been solicited by the men to advise and guide them on the question of stop-days, it was their duty and right to give them advice, and to do what might be necessary to secure that the advice should be followed"; and the existence of this duty has been strongly pressed upon us in argument by the learned counsel for the several defendants. It will be observed that the learned judge expressly finds that the defendants were not merely advisers, but also agents "to do what might be necessary to secure that the advice should be followed." In the view which I take of the facts the defendants not only gave advice, but acted, and their action took the form of interfering with the contractual relations between the masters and the men. If in so doing they committed a tort, it would be no answer to say that they acted upon the advice of a third person, as, for example, their own solicitor; and it is difficult to see how they can be in a better position simply because the advice on which they acted emanated from themselves.

In my judgment the liability of the defendants must turn on the answer to be given to the question whether the circumstances of the case were in fact such as to justify the defendants, or any of them, in acting as they did.

The circumstances were these: Middlemen at Cardiff were attempting to reduce the price of coal, and it was feared that some employers might yield to the pressure of competition and enter into agreements for the sale of coal at prices lower than those existing at the time, with the result that the wages of the miners, which were regulated by a sliding scale, would be reduced.

To counteract this it was considered desirable by the men's advisers that prices should be sustained by diminishing the output of coal, and that this should be effected by the men taking the holidays complained of. It was not contended or suggested that a limitation of the output of coal was an illegitimate object or aim on the part of the men, or that, if it could have been attained without the breach of contracts (as, for example, by the service of proper notices putting an end to those contracts), the men would not have been within their legal rights. The difficulty which presented itself was this,—that one of the terms of the arrangement under which the sliding scale of wages existed was that notices of the determination of contracts of employment should only be given on the first day of a calendar month to terminate on the last day, and this prevented notices of determination being effective at the desired moment. The critical period was known to occur in October or November. The men persuaded themselves that it was the masters' interest as well as their own that they should have power to take holidays at this period; but this was a point on which the masters were entitled to have their own opinion; and from what occurred in November, 1900, it was known to the men that the masters' view did not agree with that of the men. If the men had faith in the soundness of their opinion, their course was to negotiate through the defendants for a modification of the sliding scale arrangement; what they actually thought fit to do was that while insisting on the benefit of the sliding scale they treated themselves as emancipated from the observance of one of the terms on which that scale had been agreed to, although the masters objected, and although the course taken by the men might result in serious damage to the masters, or some of them. This is, I think, a difficult position to maintain. The justification set up seems to me to amount to no more than this—that the course which they took, although it might be to the detriment of the masters, was for the pecuniary interest of the men; and I think it wholly insufficient. The defendants took active steps to carry this policy into effect, and, as I have said, interfered to bring about the violation of legal rights. In my judgment they fail to justify those acts, and the appeal ought to be allowed. * * *

Appeal allowed.[72]

SOUTH WALES MINERS' FEDERATION et al., Appellants, v. GLAMORGAN COAL CO., Limited, et al., Respondents.

(House of Lords. [1905] A. C. 239.)

In this action, brought by the Glamorgan Coal Company, the judgment in the King's Bench Division was for the defendants.[73] This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal,[74] which entered judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants then appealed to the House of Lords.[75]

EARL OF HALSBURY, L. C. My Lords, I cannot think that in this case there is anything to be determined except the question of fact. I say so because the questions of law discussed are so well settled by authority, and by authority in this House.

To combine to procure a number of persons to break contracts is manifestly unlawful. This is found as a fact to have been done here, and is also found to have caused serious damage to the persons who were entitled to have these contracts performed.

It is, further, a principle of the law, applicable even to the criminal law, that people are presumed to intend the reasonable consequences of their acts. It is not, perhaps, necessary to have recourse to such a presumption where, as upon the facts stated, it is apparent that what they were doing must necessarily cause injury to the employers. We start, then, with the infliction of an unlawful injury upon the persons entitled to have the services of their workmen. It follows that this is an actionable wrong unless it can be justified.

Now it is sought to be justified, first, because it is said that the men were acting in their own interest, and that they were sincerely under the belief that the employers would themselves benefit by their collieries being interrupted in their work; but what sort of excuse is this for breaking a contract when the co-contractor refuses to allow the breach? It seems to me to be absurd to suppose that a benefit which he refuses to accept justified an intentional breach of contractual rights. It may, indeed, be urged in proof of the allegation that there was no ill-will against the employers. I assume this to be true, but I have no conception what can be meant by an excuse for breaking a contract because you really think it will not harm your co-contractor.

I absolutely refuse to discuss the cases which have been suggested widely apart from the question of what pecuniary advantage may be reaped from breaking a contract, where, upon moral or religious grounds, people may be justly advised to refuse to perform what they have agreed to do.

Some cases may be suggested when higher and deeper considerations may, in a moral point of view, justify the refusal to do what has been agreed to be done. Such cases may give rise to the consideration whether, in a moral or religious point of view, you are not bound to indemnify the person whom your refusal injures; but a court of law has only to decide whether there is a legal justification.

Again, I refuse to go into a discussion of the duty or the moral right to tender advice. The facts in this case shew nothing in the nature of advice, even if the supposed duty could be created by people who made them their official advisers who were to advise them even to break the law. But, as I have said, these are peremptory orders given by the official superiors of the body, and it has been found by the learned judge who tried the case that the body sued was responsible for the interference with the workmen.

I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Macnaghten. My Lords, I agree in the motion which my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor proposes, and I also agree with him in thinking that the question before your Lordships lies in a very narrow compass.

It is not disputed now—it never was disputed seriously—that the union known as the South Wales Miners' Federation, acting by its executive, induced and procured a vast body of workmen, members of the union, who were at the time in the employment of the plaintiffs, to break their contracts of service, and thus the federation acting by its executive knowingly and intentionally inflicted pecuniary loss on the plaintiffs. It is not disputed that the federation committed an actionable wrong. It is no defence to say that there was no malice or ill-will against the masters on the part of the federation or on the part of the workmen at any of the collieries thrown out of work by the action of the federation. It is settled now that malice in the sense of spite or ill-will is not the gist of such an action as that which the plaintiffs have instituted. Still less is it a defence to say that if the masters had only known their own interest they would have welcomed the interference of the federation.

It was argued—and that was the only argument—that although the thing done was prima facie an actionable wrong, it was justifiable under the circumstances. That there may be a justification for that which in itself is an actionable wrong I do not for a moment doubt. And I do not think it would be difficult to give instances putting aside altogether cases complicated by the introduction of moral considerations. But what is the alleged justification in the present case? It was said that the council—the executive of the federation—had a duty cast upon them to protect the interests of the members of the union, and that they could not be made legally responsible for the consequences of their action if they acted honestly in good faith and without any sinister or indirect motive. The case was argued with equal candour and ability. But it seems to me that the argument may be disposed of by two simple questions. How was the duty created? What in fact was the alleged duty? The alleged duty was created by the members of the union themselves, who elected or appointed the officials of the union to guide and direct their action; and then it was contended that the body to whom the members of the union have thus committed their individual freedom of action are not responsible for what they do if they act according to their honest judgment in furtherance of what they consider to be the interest of their constituents. It seems to me that if that plea were admitted there would be an end of all responsibility. It would be idle to sue the workmen, the individual wrong-doers, even if it were practicable to do so. Their counsellors and protectors, the real authors of the mischief, would be safe from legal proceedings. The only other question is, What is the alleged duty set up by the federation? I do not think it can be better described than it was by Mr. Lush. It comes to this—it is the duty on all proper occasions, of which the federation or their officials are to be the sole judges, to counsel and procure a breach of duty.

I agree with Romer and Stirling, L. JJ., and I think the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord James. My Lords, * * * at the trial and at the bar of your Lordships' House the counsel for the appellants contended that their clients had good cause and excuse for the alleged unlawful act they committed. That such justification—such "good cause and excuse"—may exist is, I think, a sound proposition. The above words of Lord Macnaghten and of Bowen, L. J., so declare. The facts upon which this attempted justification in this case is based are fully before your Lordships and need not be recapitulated. I take the results of them to be that in one sense the defendants acted in good faith. They, I think, honestly believed that the stoppage of work they resolved upon would increase the price of coal and so benefit both the workmen and the employers. Towards their employers the defendants entertained no malice. At the same time they knew that the employers had given notice of their objection to any such stoppage of work. And so the federation not only advised, but resolved and ordered that the workmen should break their contracts under conditions that would constitute an unlawful act in the men. As far as the defendants could exercise control the men were not allowed to make use of their own discretion. In order, therefore, to establish the existence of good cause and excuse all the defendants can say is, "We, the federation, had the duty cast upon us to advise the workmen. We did advise them to commit an unlawful act, but in giving that advice we honestly believed that they would be in a better financial position than if they acted lawfully and fulfilled their contracts." Even if it be assumed that such allegations are correct in fact, I think that no justification in law is established by them. The intention of the defendants was directly to procure the breach of contracts. The fact that their motives were good in the interests of those they moved to action does not form any answer to those who have suffered from the unlawful act. During the arguments that have been addressed to your Lordships I do not think quite sufficient distinction was drawn between the intention and the motives of the defendants.[76] Their intention clearly was that the workmen should break their contracts. The defendants' motives no doubt, were that by so doing wages should be raised. But if in carrying out the intention the defendants purposely procured an unlawful act to be committed, the wrong that is thereby inflicted cannot be obliterated by the existence of a motive to secure a money benefit to the wrong-doers.

For these reasons I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs.[77]

LARKIN et al., Appellants, v. LONG, Respondent.

(House of Lords. [1915] A. C. 814.)

This action was brought against Larkin, who was the organizing secretary of an association of dock labourers known as the Transport Workers' Union, Hopkins and Redmond, who were delegates of this association, and three other defendants, Newman, William Long, and Donohoe, members of an association of employers called the Stevedores' Association. The action was for damages and an injunction in respect of an alleged conspiracy on the part of the defendants to procure and induce the plaintiff's labourers to leave his employment. The facts out of which the action arose were as follows:

The plaintiff, Matthew Long, had been a stevedore in the port of Dublin for many years. He had never had any dispute with his men or with the Transport Workers' Union and he had always paid the highest rate of wages. Until 1912 there had been no stevedores' association in the port. In June, 1912, the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union proposed a change in the conditions of employment of labour in the port of Dublin, with a view to procuring [76] "At present 'intent' and 'motive' are often used interchangeably, as though they were exact equivalents of each other." Professor Jeremiah Smith, 20 Harv. Law Rev. 256 (1907). For the distinction between the two terms, and for instances in which they have been confounded, see Ibid. 256–259.

the employment of a larger number of men in the discharge of a ship, and the Dublin stevedores were invited by circular to meet representatives of the Transport Workers' Union at the headquarters of the union, to discuss the matter. The plaintiff attended this meeting. Larkin submitted to the stevedores a manuscript list of new prices for labourers in some branches of the stevedoring business. Some of the stevedores objected that they could not pay the proposed rates of wages owing to the undercutting of prices due to competition amongst themselves. Larkin then suggested that the stevedores ought to form an association to protect themselves against the shipowners. No decision was arrived at and the meeting was adjourned. At the adjourned meeting, held on June 18, which the plaintiff also attended, the new list of prices was produced and discussed. The plaintiff informed the meeting that the list did not affect his business as the rate of wages and terms of employment were the same as those then current in his business, and he took no further interest in the matter and attended no further meetings. He first became aware that the Stevedores' Association had been formed on July 24, 1912, from his brother William Long, who showed him the list of rates that the stevedores had drawn up to charge to the shipowners, and told him that he had been sent by Newman to give him the list. William Long then asked the plaintiff to join the association and, on the plaintiff's refusal, told him that unless he joined and charged the same rates he would get no men to work for him, as they (the stevedores) had made an arrangement with Larkin not to allow the men to work. The plaintiff replied that he had no dispute with his workmen and that it was none of Larkin's business. William Long then said: "That is all nonsense. What is it Larkin cannot do?"

On July 27 the plaintiff met Newman, William Long, and Donohoe in Dublin. Newman asked the plaintiff what he was going to do, and he replied that he had made up his mind not to join the association. Newman then warned the plaintiff that he would not get men to work for him, as Larkin had promised to assist the association in every way and to withdraw men from the plaintiff unless he joined. On August 6 a meeting was held of the Transport Workers' Union, when the attitude of the plaintiff in refusing to join the Stevedores' Association was discussed and eventually the meeting was adjourned. The adjourned meeting was held on August 7, and it was then resolved that members of the union should not be allowed to work for the plaintiff and that the union officials be instructed to that effect. On the same day, the Sieben Jarl arrived at the port, and on that evening the plaintiff was informed by Larkin that he had arranged with the stevedores to assist them in every way and to withdraw the men from the plaintiff unless he joined the association. The plaintiff had engaged thirty-three men to discharge the Sieben Jarl, and the work of discharging was begun at 6 a. m. the next day. At 7:15 a. m. Hopkins and Redmond, acting under Larkin's directions, came down to the ship and ordered the men off, and told the plaintiff that he would be further stopped unless he joined the association. The men thereupon ceased work and reported themselves at headquarters.

On August 19, the plaintiff issued the writ in this action. On two subsequent occasions, namely, on August 22 and September 23, Hopkins prevented the plaintiff from discharging ships by calling off the men he had engaged.

The statement of claim, delivered on October 21, 1912, succinctly set forth the plaintiff's cause or causes of action, in these terms:

"In or about the months of August and September, 1912, the defendants wrongfully and maliciously conspired and agreed to combine amongst themselves and did so combine to procure, cause, and induce the aforesaid workmen of the plaintiff to leave his employment and abstain from continuing therein, and did further procure, cause, and induce dock labourers and others to refuse to work for the plaintiff. In furtherance and pursuance of the said conspiracy the defendants did in fact procure, cause, and induce workmen of the plaintiff to leave his employment and abstain from continuing therein and did further in fact procure, cause, and induce dock labourers and others to refuse to work for the plaintiff."

On the trial of the action, Palles, C. B., upon the findings of a special jury, entered judgment for the plaintiff for £200 and granted an injunction. An application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial was refused by the Divisional Court and afterwards by the Court of Appeal. The officials of the Transport Workers' Union then appealed to the House of Lords.

Serjeant Sullivan, K. C. (of the Irish and also of the English Bar), and H. R. Poole (of the Irish Bar), for the appellants. * * * There was here no unlawful combination amongst the defendants. That depends upon the object of the defendants in compelling the plaintiff to join the Stevedores' Association. If the object of the defendants was not the injury of the plaintiff but the furtherance of their trade interests, that was perfectly legitimate. A combination to secure a monopoly necessarily involves the prevention of other persons from carrying on that trade, but although injury may result to those persons, no action for conspiracy will lie if the object is to improve the trade and not to injure others. This test applies equally whether it is a combination of men or of masters: Ward, Lock & Co. v. Operative Printers' Assistants' Society, [1906] 22 Times L. R. 327; Bulcock v. St. Anne's Master Builders' Federation, [1902] 19 Times L. R. 27. Here the object of the defendants in compelling the plaintiff to join the Stevedores' Association was to find employment in the trade for as many union men as possible. Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, differs from the present case in almost every particular; the combination, the acts done, and the end sought to be achieved were all different in character. There were here no threats and intimidation such as existed in that case.*

Lord Atkinson. My Lords, this is an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, affirming an order of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland * * *†

The next ground relied on by the appellants in support of the appeal was that set forth in the fifth paragraph of their defence, to the effect that at the time the things complained of were done by them a trade dispute was pending between the plaintiff, the dock labourers of the port of Dublin, and the Transport Workers' Union acting on their behalf, relative to the wages and rate of remuneration to be paid by the plaintiff to dock labourers for their work in discharging cargoes, and that in refusing to allow any of such labourers to work for the plaintiff, and in withdrawing them from his employment, they were acting as they lawfully might in contemplation and furtherance of such trade dispute within the meaning of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII, c. 47).

The jury have found on the issues raised on this plea that there was no dispute between the plaintiff and the dock labourers. And they have also found that the dispute was a dispute between the plaintiff and the Stevedores' Association, into which the stevedores brought Larkin, Hopkins, and Redmond to assist. And further, that the labourers did not insist that the plaintiff should become a member of the Stevedores' Association.

There was, in my opinion, ample evidence to sustain all these findings. The evidence of the two defendants, William Long and Newman, would be quite sufficient in itself for that purpose. It was plain upon the evidence that the only dispute which existed was a dispute between the members of the Stevedores' Association and the plaintiff. The Association sought to force the plaintiff to enter its ranks in order that he might thereby be compelled to adopt the scale of remuneration for any dock labourers he might employ which this Association had adopted. Larkin, Hopkins, and Redmond, at the request of the Association, came to their aid, and sought to bring pressure to bear upon the plaintiff to force him to enter it, by refusing to permit the dock labourers who were members of the Transport Union to work for him.

But these officers of the union of employés by so aiding the association of employers in its contest with the plaintiff, another employer, did not change the character of the original dispute. It was from the first a dispute between an individual stevedore and an association of stevedores.

The Trade Disputes Act of 1906 has no application to such disputes.‡ It only deals with disputes between employers and workmen and workmen and workmen. This dispute was neither of these. This defence, therefore, wholly fails.

On behalf of the appellants, Serjeant Sullivan insisted that the fact that the members of the Transport Union thought it for their own interest to pass a rule that they should not work for a stevedore who was not a member of the Stevedores' Union was quite legitimate, that they were not bound to work for him or for any other person for whom they did not choose to work, and were, in the legitimate pro-

‡ The Trades Dispute Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII, c. 47), to "provide for the regulation of Trade Unions and Trade Disputes," declares, in its third section, that "an act done by a person in furtherance or contemplation of a trade dispute shall not be actionable on the ground only that it induces some other person to break a contract of employment or that it is an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person, or with the right of some other person to dispose of his capital or his labour as he wills." The definition of a "trade dispute" is thus framed in section 5, subsection 3, of the same act: "The expression 'trade dispute' means any dispute between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, which is connected with the employment and non-employment, or the terms of employment, or with the conditions of labour." The scope of these provisions was considered by Lord Parmoor, in Larkin v. Long, [1915] A. C. 814, 844-846, who remarks: "To hold that the acts in this case bring the dispute within the Act of 1906 would be in effect to disregard the definition of the Act of 1906, and to bring within the protection of the Act every dispute of whatever character in which workmen and their representatives determined to take part with one side or the other."

motion of their own interest, entitled, within the decision of Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co., [1892] A. C. 25, to observe that rule, though it might incidentally cause injury to those who desired to employ these workmen, but for whom they themselves did not desire to work. It is undoubtedly true that the members of a trade union need not work for whom they do not desire to work. That is the right to personal freedom of action referred to in the following well-known passages from the judgment of Lord Bramwell in Reg. v. Druitt (1867) 10 Cox, C. C. 592, at p. 600, and from the essay of Sir W. Erle on Trade Unions (p. 12). They have been many times approved of in your Lordships' House. They respectively run thus: "The Liberty of a man's mind and will, to say how he should bestow himself and his means, his talents, and his industry was as much a subject of the law's protection as was that of his body." And, "Every person has a right under the law, as between himself and his fellow subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital, according to his own will. It follows that every person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others."

But it is equally true that the members of trade unions are bound to respect the right of other workmen to work for whom they please, on what terms and at what times they please, so long as they do nothing illegal, and are also bound to respect the right of an employer to undertake any work he pleases to undertake, and to employ what workmen he chooses, on whatever terms they both agree to, unless there is something unlawful in his action. If, therefore, any two or more members of a trade union, whatever its rules may be, wilfully and knowingly combine to injure an employer by inducing his workmen to break their contracts with him, or not to enter into contracts with him, resulting in damage to him, that is an entirely different matter. That is an invasion of the liberty of action of others, and has no analogy to the action of the defendant in the Mogul Case, [1892] A. C. 25; for there, as Lord Halsbury pointed out in Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, no legal right has been interfered with, no coercion of mind or will had been effected, all were left free to trade on what terms they willed, and nothing was done except in rival trading which could be supposed to interfere with the appellant's interest.

The fact that members of a trade union are merely acting in obedience to a rule of their union believed by them to be for their benefit is no defence to an action for the breach of any contracts they have entered into,—Read v. Friendly Society of Operative Stonemasons, [1902] 2 K. B. 88, 732,—and still less is it a defence to the wilful and malicious infringement in combination of that legal right of personal freedom of action which they claim for themselves, but which others are entitled to quite as fully and as absolutely as they are.

I am clearly of opinion that the decision appealed from was right and should be upheld, and the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

My Lords, I am directed by the Lord Chancellor to say that he concurs in the judgment I have just read.††

IRON MOLDERS UNION et al. v. ALLIS-CHALMERS CO.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, 1908. 91 C. C. A. 631, 166 Fed. 45, 20 L. R. A. [N. S.] 315.)

This is an appeal,[78] in a strike injunction suit, from a final decree which enjoined four Wisconsin labor unions[79] and some sixty individuals who were officers and members from doing the following:[80]

"(4) And from congregating upon or about the company's premises or the streets, approaches and places adjacent or leading to said premises for the purpose of intimidating its employés or preventing or hindering them from fulfilling their duties as such employés or for the purpose of in such manner as to induce or coerce by threats, violence, intimidation or persuasion, any of the said company's employés to leave its service or any person to refuse to enter its service.

"(5) From congregating upon or about the company's premises or the sidewalk, streets, alleys or approaches adjoining or adjacent to or leading to said premises, and from picketing the said complainant's places of business or the homes or boarding houses or residences of the said complainant's employés.

†† Lord Parker of Waddington, Lord Sumner, Lord Parmoor, and Lord Dunedin concurred, the first three in judgments which are here omitted. The order of the Court of Appeal in Ireland was affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

78 For the report of this case in the District Court, see Allis-Chalmers Co. v. Iron Molders Union (1906) 150 Fed. 155.

79 These unions were unincorporated. On the procedural question of suing them in their association names, Judge Baker remarked: "No Wisconsin statute authorized an unincorporated voluntary association to be sued in its common name. So the objection might have prevailed if it had been seasonably made. Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Wood Workers' Union (1905) 165 Ind. 421, 75 N. E. 877, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788, 6 Ann. Cas. 829; Pickett v. Walsh (1906) 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638. But the members could have been reached, of course, either by naming and serving them all, or, if that were impracticable on account of their numbers, by suing some as representatives of all. The bill treated the unions as representative of their membership; an individual member filed a verified answer in the names of the unions, alleging that he had been authorized by them so to do; and the case was carried through three hearings (temporary injunction, contempt, final decree) without a suggestion that there was a defect of parties, or rather a defect in the form under which appellee asked to have the membership of the unions brought into court. An objection of this kind will not be entertained on appeal unless it has been first duly presented in the trial court. Barnes v. Chicago Typographical Union (1908) 232 Ill. 424, 83 N. E. 940, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018, 13 Ann. Cas. 54."

80 Eleven sections of this decree are omitted.

"(6) From interfering with the said company's employés in going to and from their work.

"(7) From going singly or collectively to the homes of the said company's employés for the purpose of intimidating or threatening them or collectively persuading them to leave its service."

"(16) From by threats, intimidation, persuasion, force or violence, compelling or attempting to compel or induce any of the apprentices in the employ of the said complainant to break their contracts and leave the employ of the said complainant."

BAKER, Circuit Judge. * * * So far as persuasion was used to induce apprentices or others (section 16 of the decree) to break their contracts to serve for definite times, the prohibition was right. And the reason, we believe, is quite plain. Each party to such a contract has a property interest in it. If either breaks it, he does a wrong, for which the other is entitled to a remedy. And whoever knowingly makes himself a party to a wrongful and injurious act becomes equally liable. But in the present case the generality of the men who took or sought the places left by the strikers were employed or were offered employment at will, as the strikers had been. If either party, with or without cause, ends an employment at will, the other has no legal ground of complaint. So if the course of the new men who quit or who declined employment was the result of the free play of their intellects and wills, then against them appellee had no cause of action, and much less against men who merely furnished information and arguments to aid them in forming their judgments. Now it must not be forgotten that the suit was to protect appellee's property rights. Regarding employments at will, those rights reached their limit at this line: For the maintenance of the incorporeal value of a going business appellee had the right to a free access to the labor market, and the further right to the continuing services of those who accepted employment at will until such services were terminated by the free act of one or the other party to the employment. On the other side of this limiting line, appellants, we think, had the right, for the purpose of maintaining or increasing the incorporeal value of their capacity to labor, to an equally free access to the labor market. The right of the one to persuade (but not coerce) the unemployed to accept certain terms is limited and conditioned by the right of the other to dissuade (but not restrain) them from accepting. For another thing that must not be forgotten is that a strike is one manifestation of the competition, the struggle for survival or place, that is inevitable in individualistic society. Dividends and wages must both come from the joint product of capital and labor. And in the struggle wherein each is seeking to hold or enlarge his ground, we believe it is fundamental that one and the same set of rules should govern the action of both contestants. For instance, employers may lock out (or threaten to lock out) employés at will, with the idea that idleness will force them to accept lower wages or more onerous conditions; and employés at will may strike (or threaten to strike), with the idea that idleness of the capital involved will force employers to grant better terms. These rights (or legitimate means of contest) are mutual and are fairly balanced against each other. Again, an employer of molders, having locked out his men, in order to effectuate the purpose of his lockout, may persuade (but not coerce) other foundrymen not to employ molders for higher wages or on better terms than those for which he made his stand, and not to take in his late employés at all, so that they may be forced back to his foundry at his own terms; and molders, having struck, in order to make their strike effective may persuade (but not coerce) other molders not to work for less wages or under worse conditions than those for which they struck, and not to work for their late employer at all, so that he may be forced to take them back into his foundry at their own terms. Here, also, the rights are mutual and fairly balanced. On the other hand, an employer, having locked out his men, will not be permitted, though it would reduce their fighting strength, to coerce their landlords and grocers into cutting off shelter and food; and employés, having struck, will not be permitted, though it might subdue their late employer, to coerce dealers and users into starving his business. The restraints, likewise, apply to both combatants and are fairly balanced. These illustrations, we believe, mark out the line that must be observed by both. In contests between capital and labor the only means of injuring each other that are lawful are those that operate directly and immediately upon the control and supply of work to be done and of labor to do it, and thus directly affect the apportionment of the common fund, for only at this point exists the competition, the evils of which organized society will endure rather than suppress the freedom and initiative of the individual. But attempts to injure each other by coercing members of society who are not directly concerned in the pending controversy to make raids in the rear cannot be tolerated by organized society, for the direct, the primary, attack is upon society itself. And for the enforcement of these mutual rights and restraints organized society offers to both parties, equally, all the instrumentalities of law and of equity.

With respect to picketing as well as persuasion, we think the decree went beyond the line. The right to persuade new men to quit or decline employment is of little worth unless the strikers may ascertain who are the men that their late employer has persuaded or is attempting to persuade to accept employment. Under the name of persuasion, duress may be used; but it is duress, not persuasion, that should be restrained and punished. In the guise of picketing, strikers may obstruct and annoy the new men, and by insult and menacing attitude intimidate them as effectually as by physical assault. But from the evidence it can always be determined whether the efforts of the pickets are limited to getting into communication with the new men for the purpose of presenting arguments and appeals to their free judgments.

Prohibitions of persuasion and picketing, as such, should not be included in the decree. Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Wood Workers' Union, 165 Ind. 421, 75 N. E. 877, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788, 6 Ann. Cas. 829; Everett-Waddy Co. v. Typographical Union, 105 Va. 188, 53 S. E. 273, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 792, 8 Ann. Cas. 798. * * *[81]

[81] Part of Judge Baker's opinion and the corresponding parts of the order are omitted. A concurring opinion by Judge Grosscup is omitted.

Compare the remarks of Hadley, J., in Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated W. W. U. No. 131 (1905) 165 Ind. 421, 75 N. E. 877, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788, 6 Ann. Cas 829: "It is argued that the maintenance of pickets at the plaintiff's factory was an unlawful interference with its business, and that the appointment, instruction, and the receiving of daily reports from such pickets constituted all participating members of the union civil conspirators. Whether picketing is lawful or unlawful depends in each particular case upon the conduct of the pickets themselves. The fact that they are serving under appointment and instructions from their union adds nothing to their rights and privileges as affecting third persons. Under no circumstances have pickets the right to employ force, menaces, or intimidation of any kind in their efforts to induce nonstriking workmen to quit, or to prevent those about to take the strikers' places to refrain from doing so; neither have they the right, as pickets or otherwise, to assemble about the working place in such numbers or in such manner as to impress workmen employed, or contemplating employment, with fear and intimidation. Beaton v. Tarrant (1902) 102 Ill. App. 124; Vegelahn v. Guntner (1896) 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443; Murdock v. Walker (1893) 152 Pa. 595, 25 Atl. 492, 34 Am. St. Rep. 678. It is, however, generally conceded in this country and in England that workmen, when free from contract obligations, may not only themselves, singly and in combination, cease to work for any employer, but may also, as a means of accomplishing a legitimate purpose, use all lawful and peaceful means to induce others to quit or refuse employment. The law, having granted workmen the right to strike to secure better conditions from their employers, grants them also the use of those means and agencies, not inconsistent with the rights of others, that are necessary to make the strike effective. This embraces the right to support their contest by argument, persuasion, and such favors and accommodations as they have within their control. The law will not deprive endeavor and energy of their just reward, when exercised for a legitimate purpose and in a legitimate manner. So, in a contest between capital and labor on the one hand to secure higher wages, and on the other to resist it, argument and persuasion to win support and co-operation from others are proper to either side, provided they are of a character to leave the persons solicited feeling at liberty to comply or not, as they please. Likewise a union may appoint pickets or a committee to visit the vicinity of factories for purpose of taking note of the persons employed, and to secure, if it can be done by lawful means, their names and places of residence for the purpose of peaceful visitation. Eddy on Comb. § 537; Perkins v. Rogg (1892) 28 Wkly. Law Bul. 32. The decided cases are not in harmony with respect to the right to persuade, but the clear weight of authority is to the effect that so long as a moving party does not exceed his absolute legal rights, and so does not invade the absolute rights of another, he may do as he pleases, and may persuade others to do like him. To illustrate: A. resides in a populous, residential part of the city. B. has established a saloon in the same square. Keeping a saloon there is lawful business. Many of the neighbors patronize the saloon, and the business prospers. A. disapproves of the business in that place, and withholds his patronage. He has the absolute right to withhold it. The other neighbors have the absolute right to bestow theirs. B. has no absolute right to the patronage of either, and without patronage will fail in business. Here it is plain that A. has the absolute right to stand on the street corner and note all his neighbors who enter and leave the saloon, hail them on the street, or visit them at their respective homes, and by argument and persuasion (they being willing to listen) endeavor to induce them to cease their patronage. A.'s object is to make B.'s business unprofitable and losing, and thus compel him to move away, and improve the

PIERCE v. STABLEMEN'S UNION, LOCAL NO. 8,760 et al.

(Supreme Court of California, 1909. 156 Cal. 70, 103 Pac. 324.)

This was an action by Pierce against the Stablemen's Union and others, to enjoin the defendants from illegal interference with the plaintiff's business. The following facts were found:

The plaintiff conducted a livery stable in San Francisco. The officers of the defendant union asked him to "unionize" his stable by discharging his nonunion employés, and employing union men in their places. Upon his refusal a strike of the union men was declared. Following the strike, a boycott was decreed. A patrol about plaintiff's place of business was established, and, under the findings, these representatives of the defendants, the pickets, "called forth in loud, threatening, and menacing tones to the patrons and customers of plaintiffs not to patronize plaintiffs in their said business. Defendant, the Stablemen's Union, through its agents and representatives, has stated to, and threatened, patrons and customers and other persons dealing with plaintiffs that, if said patrons and customers and other persons continued to patronize and do business with plaintiffs, said Stablemen's Union would cause them respectively to be boycotted in their business." Menacing terms and threatening language were made use of by the agents, representatives, and pickets of the union toward the employés of the plaintiff, such as: "Unfair stable, union men locked out, and nonunion men put in. Look at this stable; the only unfair stable on Market street; the stable that always was, and always will be, unfair. This is a scab stable. When we catch you outside, we will finish you. We will get you yet. It is a scab stable, full of scabs. We will fix you yet. It is a matter of time when we will get you all right. You will never get out of the stable alive. We will break you in half. We will beat you to death. When we catch you outside, we will finish you."

Upon these findings in the superior court a judgment for an injunction was granted. This judgment by its terms commanded the defendant, its agents, and employés to desist and refrain—place and attractiveness of A.'s neighborhood. Now if A. converts all of his neighbors to his course of conduct by argument, reason, entreaty, and other fair and proper means, and thereby effects the suppression of the saloon and financial ruin of B., it is damnum absque injuria. A. has done nothing but what the law protects him in doing. Eddy on Comb. §§ 537, 539; Beach on Mon. & Ind. Trusts, § 107; Union P. Ry. Co. v. Reuf (C. C. 1902) 120 Fed. 102; Foster v. Retail Clk., etc., Ass'n (1902) 39 Misc. Rep. 48, 78 N. Y. Supp. 860; Rogers v. Evarts (Sup. 1891) 17 N. Y. Supp. 264; Perkins v. Rogg, 28 Wkly. Law Bul. 32; Reg. v. Druitt, 10 Cox, Cr. R. 592; Reg. v. Hilbert, 13 Cox, Cr. R. 82. According to the finding, the pickets, after being chosen and before going out, were "invariably" instructed by the presiding officer of the union to observe only peaceable means, and under no circumstances resort to force, menaces, threats, or intimidation of any kind. There is no finding of any departure from these instructions by any picket, and we must therefore presume, as against the plaintiff, that there was none, and consequently hold that the maintaining of the pickets at the plaintiff's factory under the facts proved was not unlawful."

From the judgment as thus framed and rendered the defendants have appealed.

HENSHAW, J. * * * We think that to-day no court would question the right of an organized union of employés, by concerted action, to cease their employment (no contractual obligation standing in the way), and this action constitutes a "strike." We think, moreover, that no court questions the right of those same men to cease dealing by concerted action, either socially or by way of business, with their former employer, and this latter act, in its essence, constitutes the primary boycott. But what acts organized labor may do, and what means it may adopt to accomplish its end, without violation of the law, have presented questions of much nicety, over which the courts have stood, and still stand, widely divided. It would not be profitable to discuss and analyze these widely divergent cases. It is sufficient to formulate briefly the principles adopted in this state many of which have recently found elaborate expression in the case of Parkinson v. Building & Trades Council of Santa Clara, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1040, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. The right of united labor to strike, in furtherance of trade interests (no contractual obligation standing in the way) is fully recognized. The reason for the strike may be based upon the refusal to comply with the employés' demand for the betterment of wages, conditions, hours of labor, the discharge of one employé, the engagement of another—any one or more of the multifarious considerations which in good faith may be believed to tend toward the advancement of the employés. After striking, the employé may engage in a "boycott," as that word is here employed. As here employed, it means not only the right to the concerted withdrawal of social and business intercourse, but the right by all legitimate means—of fair publication, and fair oral or written persuasion—to induce others interested in, or sympathetic with, their cause to withdraw their social intercourse and business patronage from the employer. They may go even further than this, and request of another that he withdraw his patronage from the employer, and may use the moral intimidation and coercion of threatening a like boycott against him if he refuse so to do. This last proposition necessarily involves the bringing into a labor dispute between A. and B., C., who has no difference with either. It contemplates that C., upon the request of B., and under the moral intimidation lest B. boycott him, may thus be constrained to withdraw his patronage from A., with whom he has no controversy. This is the "secondary boycott," the legality of which is vigorously denied by the English courts, the federal courts, and by the courts of many of the states of this nation.

Without presenting the authorities, which are multitudinous, suffice it to state the other view, in language of the president of the United States, but recently uttered: "A body of workmen are dissatisfied with the terms of their employment. They seek to compel their employer to come to their terms by striking. They may legally do so. The loss and inconvenience he suffers he cannot complain of. But when they seek to compel third persons, who have no quarrel with their employer, to withdraw from all association with him by threats that, unless such third persons do so, the workmen will inflict similar injury on such third persons, the combination is oppressive, involves duress, and, if injury results, it is actionable." President Taft, McClure's Magazine, June, 1909, p. 204. Notwithstanding the great dignity which attaches to an utterance such as this, which, as has been said, is but the expression of numerous courts upon the subject-matter, this court, after great deliberation, took what it believed to be the truer and more advanced ground, above indicated and fully set forth in Parkinson v. Building Trades Council, etc., supra. In this respect this court recognizes no substantial distinction between the so-called primary and secondary boycott. Each rests upon the right of the union to withdraw its patronage from its employer, and to induce by fair means any and all other persons to do the same, and, in exercise of those means, as the unions would have the unquestioned right to withhold their patronage from a third person who continued to deal with their employer, so they have the unquestioned right to notify such third person that they will withdraw their patronage if he continues so to deal. However opposed to the weight of federal authority the views of this court are, that they are not unique may be noted by reading National Protective Association v. Cumming, 170 N. Y. 315, 63 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648; Lindsay v. Montana Federation of Labor, 37 Mont. 264, 96 Pac. 127, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707, 127 Am. St. Rep. 722, where the highest courts of those states formulate and adopt like principles.

It has been said that it is important to any correct understanding of, or adjudication upon, such questions that a definition of the word "boycott" should be first stated. Thus, to say that a boycott is a "conspiracy" immediately implies illegality, and puts the conduct of the boycotters under the ban of the law. So also does the definition which describes boycotting as "illegal coercion," designed to accomplish a certain end. As we have undertaken to define boycott, it is an organized effort to persuade or coerce, which may be legal or illegal, according to the means employed. In other jurisdictions where a definition is given to a boycott which imports illegality, the injunction will of course lie against boycotting as such. In this state the injunction will issue depending upon the circumstance whether the means employed, or threatened to be employed, are legal or illegal.

We are thus brought to consider the method of "picketing," the use of which appellants contend is a legal weapon in their hands. So far in this discussion we have dealt exclusively with the respective rights of the employer and of the employé. There are other parties, however, whose rights are entitled to equal consideration, and whose rights always become involved and imperiled when picketing is adopted as a coercive measure in aid of a boycott.

If the strikers have the right, as above indicated, to withdraw patronage themselves, and by fair publication, written and oral persuasion, to induce others to join in their cause, and finally by threat of like boycott, to coerce others into so doing, their rights go no further than this. It is the equal right of the employer to insist before the law that his business shall be subject at the hands of the strikers to no other detriment than that which follows as a consequence of the legal acts of the strikers so above set forth. It is not to be forgotten that when the employés have struck, they occupy no contractual relationship whatsoever to their former employer, and have no right to coerce him, or attempt to coerce him, by the employment of any other means than those which are equally open to any other individual, or association of individuals. No sanctity attaches to a trades union which puts it above the law, or which confers upon it rights not enjoyed by any other individual or association. The two classes of persons to whom we have adverted, and whose rights necessarily become involved where a picket or patrol is established, are, first, the rights of those employed, or seeking employment, in the place of the striking laborers; and, second, the rights of the general public. It is the absolute, unqualified right of every employé, as well as of every other person, to go about his legal business unmolested and unobstructed, and free from intimidation, force, or duress. The right of a labor association to strike is no higher than the right of a nonunion workman to take employment in place of the strikers. Under the assurance and shield of the Constitution and of the laws, the nonunion laborer may go to and from his labor, and remain at his place of labor, in absolute security from unlawful molestations, and wherever such protection is not fully accorded, their execution, and not the laws themselves, is to be blamed. In this country a man's constitutional liberty means far more than his mere personal freedom. It means that, among other rights, his is the right freely to labor and to own the fruits of his toil. Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 468, 44 Pac. 803, 32 L. R. A. 664. Any act of boycotting, therefore, which tends to impair this constitutional right freely to labor, by means passing beyond moral suasion, and playing by intimidation upon the physical fears, is unlawful.

The inconvenience which the public may suffer by reason of a boycott lawfully conducted is in no sense a legal injury. But the public's rights are invaded the moment the means employed are such as are calculated to, and naturally do, incite to crowds, riots, and disturbances of the peace. A picket, in its very nature, tends to accomplish, and is designed to accomplish, these very things. It tends to, and is designed by physical intimidation to, deter other men from seeking employment in the places vacated by the strikers. It tends, and is designed, to drive business away from the boycotted place, not by the legitimate methods of persuasion, but by the illegitimate means of physical intimidation and fear. Crowds naturally collect; disturbances of the peace are always imminent and of frequent occurrence. Many peaceful citizens, men and women, are always deterred by physical trepidation from entering places of business so under a boycott patrol. It is idle to split hairs upon so plain a proposition, and to say that the picket may consist of nothing more than a single individual, peacefully endeavoring by persuasion to prevent customers from entering the boycotted place. The plain facts are always at variance with such refinements of reason. Says Chief Justice Shaw, in Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346: "The law is not to be hoodwinked by colorable pretenses; it looks at truth and reality through whatever disguise it may assume." If it be said that neither threats nor intimidations are used, no man can fail to see that there may be threats, and there may be intimidations, and there may be molesting, and there may be obstructing, without there being any express words used by which a man should show violent threats toward another, or any express intimidation. We think it plain that the very end to be attained by picketing, however artful may be the means to accomplish that end, is the injury of the boycotted business through physical molestation and physical fear, caused to the employer, to those whom he may have employed, or who may seek employment from him, and to the general public. The boycott having employed these means for this unquestioned purpose is illegal, and a court will not seek by overniceties and refinements to legalize the use of this unquestionably illegal instrument. Vegelahn v. Guntner [167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443], supra; Crump v. Commonwealth, 84 Va. 927, 6 S. E. 620, 10 Am. St. Rep. 895; Union Pacific v. Reuf (C. C.) 120 Fed. 124; 18 Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 85.

In conclusion, then, and applying these principles to the injunction here under consideration, it appears that, while the injunction was properly granted, it was broader in its terms than the law warrants.

It was, for example, too broad in restraining defendants from "in any wise interfering with" plaintiff's business, since the interference which we have discussed, of publication, reasonable persuasion, and threat to withdraw patronage, is legal, and such as defendants could employ. So, also, was the injunction too broad in restraining defendants from "intimidating any customer by boycott or threat of boycott" since, as has been said, the secondary boycott is likewise a legal weapon. In all other respects, however, the injunction was proper.

The trial court is directed to modify its injunction in the particulars here specified, and in all other respects the judgment will stand affirmed.[82]

SHAW, J. I agree with all that is said by Justice HENSHAW in his opinion, except the part relating to the so-called "secondary boycott" and the attempt to draw a distinction between the compulsion of third persons caused by picketing and the compulsion of third persons produced by a boycott. My views concerning the "secondary boycott" are expressed in my dissenting opinion in Parkinson v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1040, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. The means employed for the coercion or intimidation of a third person in a "secondary boycott" are unlawful whenever they are such as are calculated to, and actually do, destroy his free will, and cause him to act contrary to his own volition in his own business, to the detriment of the person toward whom the main boycott or strike is directed; in other words, whenever the means used constitute duress, menace, or undue influence. Whether this coercion or compulsion comes from fear of physical violence, as in the case of picketing, or from fear of financial loss, as in the "secondary boycott," or from fear of any other infliction, is, in my opinion, immaterial, so long as the fear is sufficiently potent to control the action of those upon whom it is cast. I can see no logical or just reason for the distinction thus sought to be made. There is no such distinction in cases where contracts or wills are declared void, because procured by duress, menace, or undue influence. There should be none where actual injury is produced or threatened through such means acting upon third persons. Nor do I believe any well-considered case authorizes any such distinction. The opinions in the case of National Protective Association v. Cumming, 170 N. Y. 315, 63 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. St. Rep. 648, are devoted to a discussion of the right to strike, and the limitations of that right, and not to a discussion of the "secondary boycott." A close analysis of the cases on the subject will, as I believe, show that this court stands alone on this point.

[82] A part of Mr. Justice Henshaw's opinion is omitted. Beatty, C. J., and Lorigan and Melvin, JJ., concurred in the opinion. Angellotti and Sloss, JJ., concurred in the judgment, on the facts as found, although not prepared to hold that there may not be acts coming within the term "picketing," as it is accepted and understood in labor disputes, that are entirely lawful.

For these reasons I do not agree to that part of the judgment directing a modification of the injunction. I believe that it should stand in the form as given by the court below.

MARCH v. BRICKLAYERS' AND PLASTERERS' UNION NO. 1 et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1906. 79 Conn. 7, 63 Atl. 291, 4 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1198, 118 Am. St. Rep. 127, 6 Ann. Cas. 848.)

In this action, brought by March against the union, the plaintiff seeks to recover $100 which he paid to the defendant union under the circumstances shown in the opinion. The judgment below was for the plaintiff. The defendants appeal.

PRENTICE, J. The complaint alleges that the defendants conspired, combined, and confederated with each other and other persons to extort, demand, and obtain from the plaintiff the sum of $100; that in pursuance of that conspiracy and combination they threatened to injure the plaintiff in his property and business, unless said sum was paid; and that by reason of said conspiracy and combination, and by reasons of said threats, intimidation, and coercion, and by such means alone said sum was paid by the plaintiff to the defendants. It is found that the payment was made, that the combination between the members of the defendant union to secure that payment and Butler's agency for it existed, and that the money was paid through the operation of that combination. So far there is no contention here. The plaintiff further claims that the combination for the purposes of its controversy with him, resulting in the payment by him, was an unlawful one. He claims that it was unlawful (1) because its object was unlawful; and (2) because the means to accomplish that object were unlawful. He also claims that, as the payment was one into which he was coerced through the operation of this unlawful conspiracy, he is entitled to recover it back. The defendants do not deny that a combination or confederation of men either for the accomplishment of an unlawful object or for the accomplishment of a lawful object by unlawful means is unlawful, neither do they deny that, if the combination between them which resulted in the payment in question was an unlawful one, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

The contention between the parties, therefore, becomes primarily resolved into one as to whether the conceded confederation of the defendants through which the payment was obtained was an unlawful one by reason of the unlawful character of either its object or the means employed. The plaintiff asserts the right to a judgment upon narrower grounds than those thus suggested and notwithstanding a failure to establish an unlawful conspiracy. This claim, however, is subordinate to his main proposition, and need not be considered unless it shall appear that his principal contention already stated fails him. The disagreement between the plaintiff and the defendants as to the lawfulness of the object of the latter's combination is one which arises chiefly, if not entirely, out of a difference of view as to what is to be regarded as that object. The defendants say that the object was the ultimate object of the union, to wit, among other things, the promotion of the welfare of its members and the advancement of their rights and privileges as laboring men, or, if not that, the freeing of themselves from the competition of those not members of the union, or, if not that, and the object is to be brought into closer relation to the matters in controversy, the compelling of "unfair" bosses to become "fair." The plaintiff finds the object sought in the immediate injury attempted to be inflicted upon him—the extortion of the $100 from him as the price of his freedom from harassment in the marketing of his product. These differences in the analysis of the situation disclosed by the record are more formal than vital. Their chief importance arises from the changed form which must be given to the discussion of the underlying questions involved and the different use of terms which must be made according, as one view or the other be adopted. For the purposes of our consideration, therefore, we may well assume, as did the court below, that the object sought by the defendants in what they confederated to do was some one of the more remote objects, as claimed by them, and that this object was a lawful one. This, of course, involves the transferring into the field of means that which would in the other view be regarded as an end and the consideration of all that the defendants did in the accomplishment of its object as means to that accomplishment.

The question before us thus becomes narrowed down to the single inquiry as to whether or not the defendants in the pursuit of their object, whether it be regarded as their general welfare as laboring men, or the diminution of outside competition, or the enlargement of their field of opportunity by increasing the number of employers of union labor only, used unlawful means. This question suggests the possibility of a wide range of inquiry, involving the consideration of important legal principles which have been much discussed, and upon certain of which there has been some divergence of opinion. The facts of this case, however, are such as to require from us the application of no principles which have not been long and well established, and but few of them. The salient facts in the story spread upon the record are that this defendant association through their representative, the defendant Butler, demanded of the plaintiff the payment to them of a sum of money upon the threatened alternative that, if payment was refused, he would by their action in refusing to handle his product in their work then in progress be annoyed and harassed in the enjoyment of the benefit of the market for that product which he had obtained, and in all probability be wholly deprived of that market.

The action thus threatened was within the power of the defendants to take. The consequences which would flow to the plaintiff from it, if taken, were such as might well excite in him a reasonable apprehension of serious injury. To the pressure thus brought to bear upon him he yielded and paid the sum exacted. There is nothing in the record to relieve this picture. It does not improve it to say that the defendants were seeking to enforce a penalty or to collect damages assessed. They had no right to inflict a penalty upon or assess damages against this man, who owed them no duty through association in the membership of the union, by contract or otherwise. The plaintiff owed them nothing. To overawe him into the payment of something by means of threats of injury in their power to inflict and of such a character as to naturally arouse a reasonable apprehension of serious consequences to him, in the event of his refusal, was an act of the purest extortion, using that word in its widest meaning, by means of threats and intimidation, and in the plainest violation of our statute (Gen. St. 1902, § 1296), our decisions, and the universally accepted principles of the common law. State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46, 8 Atl. 890, 3 Am. St. Rep. 23; State v. Stockford, 77 Conn. 227, 58 Atl. 769, 107 Am. St. Rep. 28. The statement of what the defendants undertook to do easily discloses that this is not the ordinary case found in the books involving the exercise by trade, capital, or labor combinations of claimed powers in their struggles for success. These cases have not infrequently called for the determination of nice legal questions, and the application of doctrines which, while they might be pertinent to the present situation, are wholly unnecessary for the decision of the simpler question before us. The most elemental principles of justice and right which have by universal consent been adopted into the common law suffice for a conclusion that money cannot be lawfully exacted of a man in the manner here successful. We are aware of no case wherein the progress of a labor or trade controversy a similar attempt to extort money as the price of forbearance from threatened injurious action has ever come before the courts, save that of Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, where the attempt is characterized as a species of annoyance and extortion which the common law has never tolerated.

It is attempted to justify the action of the union in its money demand upon the proposition that, as its members had the right to decline to handle the plaintiff's brick, they had the right to waive the exercise of that right upon such conditions as they might impose. The proposition is that money demanded and obtained as the price of forbearance from the commission of an act of injury, even when the commission of that act is held over the man to coerce and intimidate him into compliance with the demand, is lawfully obtained, if the threatened act was one which the threatener might lawfully do. Such a proposition could oftentimes be used to justify the vilest blackmailer, and is palpably unsound, in that it ignores certain elements which may be present to convert the proceeding into a wrong or a crime. 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 141.

It is further said that the action of the defendants was justified in the exercise of the rights of fair trade competition. If it be assumed that these journeymen, bricklayers, and this brick manufacturer whose business touched each other, only in that the latter sold brick to persons for whom the former worked, are to be regarded as trade competitors, so that the recognized doctrines applicable to such competitors are applicable to them, it yet remains that the means resorted to in this case would not be permitted.

There is no error. All concur.[83]

BURNHAM et al. v. DOWD.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1914. 217 Mass. 351, 104 N. E. 841, 51 L. R. A. [N. S.] 778.)

SHELDON, J.[84] * * * The leading material facts found by the master may be summarized as follows: The plaintiffs carry on a business which includes the selling at wholesale and retail of masons' supplies. The defendants are members of a voluntary unincorporated association or labor union in Holyoke, hereinafter called the union. It is the object and purpose of all the members of this union to make themselves and the union as powerful as possible in Holyoke and its immediate environment, and to exert their power for the purpose of bettering the labor conditions of members of the union, especially with reference to rates of wages and periods of labor. It is a part of their principles which all the members of the union are under obligation to respect and uphold, that all men of their craft or trade working in Holyoke or its immediate vicinity, that is, within the jurisdiction of their union, must be members thereof; that all their members should refuse to work with men of their craft who were not members of the union or had not declared their intention to join it; should refuse to work for employers who were declared "unfair" by the union; and should refuse to use in their work any materials that had been sold or furnished by any merchant who was declared unfair by the union. They aimed to accomplish their purpose, of bettering the labor conditions of their members, primarily by persuasion coupled with the fear of consequences if the party addressed should not yield, and secondarily, if necessary, by troubles and loss to the business of contractors or merchants. This union was connected with the Building Trades Council of Holyoke, which represented the various building trades unions (some 14 in number) of Holyoke and vicinity, and was composed of delegates sent from these unions. In July, 1911, one Gauthier employed nonunion masons in certain construction work in Holyoke, against the protest of this union; and the plaintiffs furnished to him mason materials. In August, 1911, the union voted to refuse to handle any building material of any firm that furnished stock to Gauthier or to any "unfair" contractor. Soon after this, the delegates from the union to the Building Trades Council reported these facts to that body; and the agent of the council sent a written notice to the plaintiff that Gauthier was "doing work contrary to laws of Building Trades Council," and was "therefore recognized by us as being unfair," and expressing the hope of "co-operation in this matter." The plaintiffs continued to furnish material to Gauthier. Thereupon, by successive votes, the union declared that the plaintiffs were "unfair." This was for the reason that the plaintiffs continued to furnish masons' supplies to Gauthier, and refused to promise not to sell to any party who should not be in good standing with the union. All the members of the union would have refused since August, 1911, and would refuse now and in the future (so long as the plaintiffs were held by the union to be unfair) to work with materials purchased from the plaintiffs. It has not been and in the future it will not be practicable, without the labor of members of the union, to perform building contracts of any size or importance in Holyoke or its immediate vicinity, without serious inconvenience, trouble and loss to the contractors, and the defendants have intended that owners and contractors should fear this result if they purchased masons' supplies from the plaintiffs. The union and its officers and members, including some of the defendants, have notified various owners and contractors, who either were buying or were intending to buy masons' supplies from the plaintiffs for construction work upon which members of the union necessarily were employed, that the plaintiffs were upon the "unfair" list of the union, and that its members would not use or work upon material furnished by the plaintiffs, and in substance threatened to strike if masons' supplies were purchased from the plaintiffs. These contractors and owners feared, and it was intended that they should fear and they were justified in fearing, that these threats would be carried out; and in consequence thereof they ceased or refrained from buying supplies of the plaintiff, as otherwise they would have done, and the plaintiffs' sales of masons' supplies were considerably diminished and their profits lessened in consequence of these facts. This state of affairs will continue, to the serious loss and damage of the plaintiffs, unless they shall promise not to sell to any one considered unfair by the union.

The defendants did not act from actual personal malice towards the plaintiffs; but their acts were done in pursuance of their union principles and purposes, as above stated, and without caring for the injurious consequences to the plaintiffs. Indeed these injurious consequences were anticipated and contemplated by the defendants. They did not attempt to declare or enforce any boycott against the plaintiffs, except as this is included in the acts that have been mentioned. During the period involved in this case, some of the defendants have bought for their own use small quantities of masons' supplies from the plaintiffs, and others of the defendants during the same time have made purchases from the plaintiffs in other branches of the plaintiffs' business.

Although there has been a little contrariety of decisions in other jurisdictions, we do not consider that there is any doubt as to the rule of law to be applied in this case. The defendants have no real trade dispute with the plaintiffs. No one of the members of the union is, or so far as appears ever has been, employed by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have not interfered or sought to interfere with the employment of any of those members, or with the rates of pay, the periods of labor, or any of the conditions of such employment. There is no competition between these parties, as there was in Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499. The matter that lies at the foundation of these proceedings is a dispute between the union and Gauthier. He employs or has employed nonunion labor; the defendants (including under this term all the members of the union) object to this. They have a right to say that they will do no work for him unless he will give to them all the work of their trade, that they will do all or none of his work. That was settled by our decision in Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638. If they were employed by Gauthier, and if he employed also nonunion men of their craft, they would have a right, unless they were bound by some term of their contract of employment, to strike unless all of this work should be given to them or to their associates. But it was pointed out in the same case that not all strikes are lawful; and it now is settled in this commonwealth that it is a question of law whether any particular strike is a lawful one. Reynolds v. Davis, 198 Mass. 294, 84 N. E. 457, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 162; De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 94 N. E. 317, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1048. But the second point decided in Pickett v. Walsh, supra, is in our opinion decisive of the principal question raised in this case. It was there held that the members of a labor union who are employed by a contractor to do work upon a building, and who have no dispute with that contractor as to work which they or their fellows are doing for him, cannot lawfully strike against him for the mere reason that he is doing work and employing some of their fellows upon another building upon which nonunion men are employed to do like work, not by him, but by the owner, of that building. The language and reasoning of that decision are applicable here. The reason of the decision was that, as the court said (Loring, J., 192 Mass. 587, 78 N. E. 760, 6 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638), such a strike "has an element in it like that in a sympathetic strike, in a boycott and in a blacklisting, namely: It is a refusal to work for A., with whom the strikers have no dispute, because A. works for B., with whom the strikers have a dispute, for the purpose of forcing A. to force B. to yield to the strikers' demands." So in the case at bar, the threat of the defendants was to strike against owners and contractors, with whom the defendants had no dispute, for the purpose of forcing those owners and contractors to refuse to buy masons' supplies from the plaintiffs, and thus by the loss of business and of the profits to be derived therefrom, force the plaintiffs to refuse to sell to Gauthier or others whom the defendants might call unfair, and thus put a pressure upon those persons which should force them to cease employing nonunion masons and to give all their mason work to the defendants. This was a step further than what was held in Pickett v. Walsh to be an unlawful combination for an unjustifiable interference with another's business. It was in intention and effect a boycott; and it was none the less so because it was aimed at only one branch of the plaintiffs' business. There is no more right to interfere with one branch of a merchant's business, to obstruct it and lessen its profits, and so far as may be done to destroy it entirely, than there is so to interfere with, obstruct and destroy the whole of that business. The difference is merely one of degree, not of kind. And Pickett v. Walsh is well supported as to this point both upon the reasoning of the opinion and by authority. * * *[85]

As was said in Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co., 83 Fed. 912, 917, 28 C. C. A. 99, 105: "Persons engaged in any service have the power, with which a court of equity will not interfere by injunction, to abandon that service, either singly or in a body, if the wages paid or the conditions of employment are not satisfactory; but they have no right to dictate to an employer what kind of implements he shall use, or whom he shall employ." * * *

The defendants contend earnestly that each one of them has a perfect right to refrain from dealing himself, and to advise his friends and associates to refrain from dealing, with the plaintiffs, and that they have a right to do together and in concert what each one of them lawfully may do by himself. But that is not always so. It is especially true in dealing with such questions as these that the mere force of numbers may create a difference not only of degree, but also of kind. No doubt the defendants' organization is a lawful one, and certainly some of the objects aimed at by the union thus formed are both legal and of high utility. But, as was pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S. 418, 31 Sup. Ct. 492, 55 L. Ed. 797, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 874, "the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one, cannot be met, except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution; or by standing on such rights and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many as well as the many against the one." To the same effect is what was said by this court, through Mr. Justice Hammond, in Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255, 260, 69 N. E. 1085, 1087, 64 L. R. A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341, quoting the words of Lord Justice Bowen in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. D. 598, 616: "Of the general proposition that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done in combination among several, there can be no doubt." So in Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638, it was held among other things that "what is lawful if done by an individual may become unlawful if done by a combination of individuals." And see the cases collected on page 582 of 192 Mass., on page 757 of 78 N. E. (6 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638), in that opinion. This principle is peculiarly applicable to cases like the one at bar. There is no such thing in our modern civilization as an independent man. No single individual could continue even to exist, much less to enjoy any of the comforts and satisfactions of life, without the society, sympathy and support of at least some of those among whom his lot is cast. Every individual has the right to enjoy these, and is bound not to interfere with the enjoyment of them by others. That right indeed is usually one of merely moral obligation, incapable of enforcement by the courts, but it is none the less an actual wrong for any body of men actively to cause the infringement of that right in definite particulars; and especially where such an infringement is made possible only by the concerted action of many in combination against one and results in direct injury to his business or property, the courts should interfere for the protection of that person.

St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638 [1906]). See also New England Cement Gun Co. v. McGivern (1914) 218 Mass. 198, 105 N. E. 885, where De Courcy, J., remarks: "It was not lawful for them to strike to compel Monahan, with whom they had no trade dispute, to compel the general contractor to compel the owner to compel the plaintiff to give to the defendants the work they demanded. In other words, it was an unjustifiable interference with the plaintiff's business to injure others in order to compel them to coerce the plaintiff. Martin, Modern Law of Labor Unions, § 77, and cases cited. The acts of coercion and procuring breaches of contract mentioned in the sixth finding plainly are not justified by the law of this commonwealth. It is unnecessary to consider further the unlawfulness of such a secondary or compound boycott in view of the full discussion of the subject in the recent opinions of this court in Pickett v. Walsh (1906) 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638, and Burnham v. Dowd (1914) 217 Mass. 351, 104 N. E. 841, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 778, in which cases are collected the authorities in this and other jurisdictions."

In Worthington v. Waring, 157 Mass. 421, 32 N. E. 744, 20 L. R. A. 342, 34 Am. St. Rep. 294, where the court refused to enjoin the defendants from putting the names of the plaintiffs upon a blacklist and thus making it impossible for them to obtain in that neighborhood employment in their trade, there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs. Apart from this technical difficulty, the decision was put upon the ground that while courts of equity may protect property from threatened injury when the property rights are equitable or when they cannot be protected adequately at law, yet equity has in general no jurisdiction to restrain the commission of crime or to assess damages for torts already committed, and the rights there alleged to have been violated were said to be merely personal rights and not rights of property. That case is not applicable here, for the rights now in question are distinctly property rights. Accordingly we need not consider whether the doctrine of that case can be reconciled with our later decisions, or whether it now would be followed if the same state of facts were again presented.

The question of damages remains to be dealt with. Upon that we find no error in the master's report. That the plaintiffs have sustained substantial damage is manifest; and the mere facts that it may be impossible to determine the total amount of their loss, and that it may be difficult to ascertain with absolute certainty the money value of even the damages that can be proved, is no reason for refusing to allow to the plaintiff what has been found to be capable of substantial proof. Fox v. Harding, 7 Cush. 516; Speirs v. Union Drop Forge Co., 180 Mass. 87, 61 N. E. 825; C. W. Hunt Co. v. Boston Elev. Ry., 199 Mass. 220, 235, 85 N. E. 446 et seq.; De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 600, 94 N. E. 317, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1048. We find nothing inconsistent with this in Todd v. Keene, 167 Mass. 157, 45 N. E. 81; John Hetherington & Sons v. William Firth Co., 210 Mass. 8, 23, 95 N. E. 961, et seq., or the other cases relied on by the defendants. Doubtless merely speculative damages or any damages that have not been proved cannot be recovered; but this does not require absolute mathematical demonstration or prevent the drawing of reasonable inferences from the facts and circumstances in evidence.

The result is that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree enjoining the defendants from keeping the names of the plaintiffs upon their unfair list, from threatening to strike or to leave the work of any owner, builder or contractor by reason of such persons having purchased masons' supplies from the plaintiffs or having dealt otherwise with the plaintiffs, and from ordering or inducing any strike against an owner, builder or contractor for such reason, and that the plaintiffs shall recover from the defendants the sum of $500 with interest from the date of the filing of the master's report, and their costs of suit, and have execution therefor.

So ordered.
